

MYSORE GAZETTEER

COMPILED FOR GOVERNMENT

VOLUME II

HISTORICAL

PART II

EDITED BY

C HAYAVADANA RAO BA., BL.,

Fellow, University of Mysore,

Editor Mysore Economic Journal Bangalore.

NEW EDITION

BANGALORE

PRINTED AT THE GOVERNMENT PRESS

1930

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER VI

HISTORICAL PERIOD

Early Period

From the earliest times to the Foundation of Vijayanagar Kingdom

	PAGE
NANDAS—5th century B C	462
Their succession and history	462
THE MAURYAS—327 B. C—185 B C	464
Chandragupta's Rule 323 B C to 298 B C	464
Chandragupta's Abdication and Retirement to Mysore 298 B C	466
The Bhadrabāhu tradition	466
Reason for his abdication	466
The testimony on which it rests	467
Opinion of Sir Vincent Smith	473
Bindusāra, 298 272 B C	474
Bindusāra's Conquest of the South	475
Asokavardhana or Asoka, 272 232 B C	477
His edicts in Mysore and elsewhere	477
His early life	478
Contents of the Mysore Edicts	479
Successors of Asoka	483
Break up of the Maurya Empire	484
THE SUNGA DYNASTY 185 B C to 73 B C	485
KANVA DYNASTY Circa 63 28 B C	486
ANDHRA, SĀTAVĀHANA OR ANDHRABHRIĪYA DYNASTY	486
Their connection with Mysore—Circa 1st 2nd century A.D	490

	PAGE
Relics of Sātavāhana Rule	493
End of the Āndhra Rule	494
THE KADAMBAS	494
Legendary tales about their origin	495
The story of their origin as told in the Tālgunda Pillar inscriptions	499
Period of Kadamba Giants	501
Succession List	504
Later History, 7th to 14th century	505
Kadamba Feudatories, 5th century A D	506
BRIHAD-BĀNAS OR MAHĀVALIS	507
THE VAIDUMBAS	514
PALLAVAS	515
Their origin	516
Their Southern movement	517
The Theory of their indigenous origin	518
Theory of Brāhma-Kṣhatṛya Origin	521
Dynasties of Pallava Kings —	522
(i) That mentioned in Prākṛit Charters, from about 3rd century A D to 4th century A D	523
(ii) That mentioned in Sānskrit Charters, 5th and 6th century A D	528
(iii) That mentioned in Lithic Inscriptions, 6th century to 9th century A D	533
(iv) Line of Nandivarman II Pallavamalla also called Ganga-Pallava	537
History of the different branches of the Pallava Kings —	537
(i) That of the Prākṛit charters 3rd and 4th centuries A D.	537
(ii) That of the Sānskrit charters Circa from about 5th to beginning of 7th century	538
(iii) That of the stone inscriptions, beginning of 7th to end of 9th century —	541
Simhavarman	542
Simhavishnu	542
Mahēndravarmān I
Beginning of the war with the Chalukyas	543
Its probable cause	543

	PAGE
The first part of the war	544
Successful action at Pullalur	545
Pulake in his contemporary	545
Peace from 611 to 612 A.D.	545
Narasimhavarmān I
Renewal of Hostilities with Chalukyas	550
Lataśa Varasarmān I	554
Narasimhavarmān II	554
Paramśa Varasarmān II	558
Mahēśvararmān III	558
Struggle for the throne	558
(i) Lane of Nandivarmān II Pallavamalla also called Ganga Pallavaśa	562
Nandivarmān II Pallavamalla	562
Dantivarmān	564
Nandivarmān III	564
Nripitūṅgavarmān	564
Apārjitavarmān	564
The probable successors of Ganga Pallavaśa	567
(ii) Pallavavilakaśaśa Lane of Kings	568
(iii) Pallava King mentioned in Amaravati inscription	569
NOLAMBIA PALLAVAS	569
Their genealogy	570
The Cāṅga conquest	580
Chola conquest and after	580
Under the Western Chālukyas	581
Social life in the 9th century A.D.	581
GANGAS	586
Circa 2nd century A.D. to 11th century A.D.	586
Period and extent of their rule	586
The country ruled by them and its capitals	586
Origin of the name of Ganga	587
Traditionary stories	588
Chronology of the Ganga kings	593
Geneological Table of the Ganga kings	601
List of Ganga copper plate inscriptions	602
Differences between copper plates and lithic inscriptions in regard to dates	608

	PAGE
Collateral lines	608
Reconciliation of dates in copper-plate and lithic inscriptions	611
Dadiga and Mādhava I	611
Mādhava I, Kongunivaima	614
Mādhava II	614
Harivaima	616
Vishnugōpa	619
Tadangāla Mādhava or Mādhava III	619
Avanīta	621
Duvinīta	623
Duvinīta	624
Mushkara or Mokkara	629
Siivikrama	629
Bhūvikrama	630
His collateral descendants	631
Attack on Gangas	632
Sivamāla I	633
Eleganga, his unnamed son	634
Sripurusha	634
Sivamāla II, surnamed Saigotta, 788-812 A D	639
Mālasimha I, 799, A D — (?) 853 A D	646
Evidence of partition of Ganga kingdom, 8th century A D	648
Dindiga or Prithivipati I	650
Prithivipati II	650
Nanniya Ganga	651
Rājamalla Satyavākya I	651
Nitimārga	652
Rājamalla Satyavākya II, 870 A D — 907 A D	657
Būtugēndia or Būtarasa, 870-907 A D	660
Eleyappa, or Nitimārga II, 887-935 A D	661
Nālasimha-Dēva, entitled Satyavākya and Bīlavēdēga, 920 A D	667
Rāchamalla Satyavākya III, 920 A D	668
His descendants and their succession	669
Būtuga II, Būtayya entitled Nanniya Ganga, Ganga Nārāyana, Ganga Gāngeya 925-960 A D	670
Marula Dēva, Punuseya-Ganga, Kaliyuga-Bhīma	676

	PAGE
Narasimha III Guttija Ganga Nolambantaka
961 974 A D	676
Rachamalla Satyavakya	682
Rakkasa Ganga Rachamalla 991 1021 A D	687
Arumuli Deva	688
Nitimarga III Rachamalla 989 999 A D	688
Rajendra Chola's conquest	690
Later Ganga	690
EASTERN GANGAS	691
Their inscriptions in Mysore	691
Their Grants and Genealogy	692
The period of their Rule	700
Chola Ganga in Mysore	701
Chola Ganga in Ceylon and East Mysore	702
Ganga Raja of Ummattur	702
CHALUKYAS	703
Their Origin and Descent	704
Their succession list	706
Jayasimha and his successors	706
Pulakesi I	707
Founding of Eastern Chalukya line	707
List of Eastern Chalukya Kings	708
Pulakesi II Hiuen Tsiang's Description of his Rule	708
Identification of Konkanapura with Banavasi	711
Vikramaditya I	714
Vinayaditya	714
Vijayaditya	716
Vikramaditya II	716
Kirtivarma II	718
Early Chalukyas in Mysore State	716
Minor Branch of early Chalukyas	720
Branch of Chalukyas at Varuna, South West of Mysore	721
RASHTRAKUTAS	724
The First Kings of the Dynasty	725
Krishna I	725
Govinda II	728
Dhruva, Dharmavarsha 780 A.D	729
Character of Dhruva supercession of Kambha	730

	PAGE
Kambha, 802-807 A D .	731
Gōvinda III, 798-815 A D	733
Amōghavarsha I 815-873 A D, Nripatunga
Atisava-Dhavalā . . .	738
His war against the Gangas . .	739
His policy towards the Gangas	740
His religion and literary works . .	741
His trans-Indian reputation	745
Kṛishna II, 880 A D 911 A D .	746
His suzerainty over Banavāsī .	748
India III, 912-916 A D	749
Amōghavarsha II, 916-917 A D	750
Gōvinda IV, Gōjjiga, Suvavarsha, 918-933 A D	750
His suzerainty over Sāntalige	751
Extent of his Kingdom .	751
Amōghavarsha III 935 A D	752
Kṛishna III (Kannara, Irivī-kannara, Akālavarsha)
939-966 A D	753
His character and conquests	753
His Kērala ally Chaturānana Pandita .	755
Rāshtrakūta supremacy over Southern India	756
Vaidumbas as Feudatories	756
Suzerainty over Kadambalige ...	757
Gangas as feudatories of Kṛishna III ...	758
Suzerainty over Banavāsī	758
Khottiga, Nityavarsha, 966-971 A D	759
Kakka II, Kakkala Dēva, Amōghavarsha IV,
Nripatunga, 972-977 A D	760
India IV, died 992 A D	761
Revolution of Taila II, 978 A D	762
Simultaneous fall of Rāshtrakūtas and Gangas	763
Arab tribute to Rāshtrakūta Rule	763
Coinage of Rāshtrakūtas and Gangas	764
CHĀLUKYAS OF KALYĀNI .	764
Taila II, 973-997 A D	766
Satyāśraya, (Irivī Bedenga) 997-1009 A D .	768
His son, Kundamarasa, Governor of Banavāsī Province, etc, 1012-1042 A D	770
Dasavarma . . .	771

	PAGE
Vikramāditya V (Vikrama Tribhuvanamalla) 1009 1018 A D	771
His supersession of Kundamarasa	771
Ayyana II 1014 A D	773
Jayasimha II (Jagadēkamalla) 1018 1042 A D	773
Somēśvara I Trailōkyamalla Bhavamalla 1012 1068 A D	778
Somēśvara II (Bhuvanāikamalla) 1068 1076 A D	791
Somēśvara an upholder of Saiva faith	796
Somēśvara's dethronement	797
Somēśvara's death	798
Vikramāditya VI (Vikramārka Vikramanka Per mādi Tribhuvanamalla) 1076 1127 A D	800
Story of his reign	803
Vikramāditya's Governorship of Banavāsi	804
Founding of the Chālukya Vikrama Era	804
Vikramāditya's Capitals	807
His Rule	807
Expulsion of the Chōlas from Nolambavīdi	808
Vikramāditya's other conquests	810
His conquest of Chchēdina and Āndhras	812
Rebellion of Jayasimha III	814
Feudatories of Vikramāditya	814
References to his Feudatories	817
Vikramāditya's ministers and generals	819
Provincial Rule	822
Kālāmukha Saiva Revival	826
Vikramāditya's patronage of the Brāhmanas	829
Description of Balagāmi	830
Character of Vikramāditya's rule	833
His Domestic life	834
His probable change of faith	838
His personal traits	838
Somēśvara III, Bhulōkamalla Sarvājña-chakra- vartin 1126-1138 A D	839
Jagadēkamalla Perma, 1138 1150 A.D	842
Taila III Tailapa Trailōkyamalla, 1150 1163 A.D	846
Jagadēkamalla III	853

Sōmēsvara IV, or Vira Sōmēsvara IV, Tribhuvana-	856
malla, Vīṇanāṭavana	863
Western Chālukya coinage	864
KALACHURYS OF KALYĀNI—	864
Their origin	865
Their Genealogy	867
Their dynastic titles, etc ...	867
Succession list of their kings	868
Jōgama ..	868
Permādi, 1128 A D ..	868
Bijjala, Tribhuvanamalla, Nissankamalla 1156-1167	868
A D,	872
Saiva Revival .	875
Story of Basava's life—Saiva version according to	876
Basava Purāṇa	877
Basava's Popularity	878
Popularity of his creed	879
Bijjala's Counter-measures	880
According to Channabasava Kālagṇāna	882
Jaina version according to Bijjala-rāya Charita ..	882
Bijjala as described in this Poem .	882
Sir John Fleet's criticism	883
His criticisms answered	885
The leaders of the Saiva revival	887
Story of Ēkāntada Rāmayya ...	893
Bijjala's successors—Sōvidēva or Sōmēsvara, Rāya	895
Munāri, Bhujabalamalla, 1167-1176 A D	896
Sankama-Dēva, Nissankamalla, 1177-1180 A D ...	897
Āhavamalla, 1180-1183 A D .	898
Singhana-Dēva, 1183 A D	899
Importance of Kalachurya Rule	899
Kalachurya coinage	899
CHŌLAS—	900
Their origin and history, Circa 4th to 3rd century B C	900
The Early Chōlas 3rd century B C to 1st century	900
A D . .	900
Kopperun-Chōla, Kochcham-Kanna .	901
Karikāla-Chōla, 1st century to 2nd century A D	902
Nedumadi Kili . .

Destruction of Kāvṛipāmpattinam	902
Hsuen Tsang's description 7th century A D	902
Imperial Chōlas	901
Vijayālaya, 816-890 A D	901
Chronology of the Imperial Chōlas	901
Aditya I Rājakesari varman 850-907 A D	909
Parāntaka I Virarādhyaṇa Rājakesari varman 907-917 A D	909
His religion domestic life etc	911
His Capitals and his Queens	911
Period of his rule	912
War against the Pāndyas	913
Second war against the Pāndyas	914
His feudatories	916
His relations with the Chēras	917
His titles and surnames	918
His army and Royal Regiments	920
An estimate of his rule	920
Reform of Village Assemblies	921
His death	921
Rājāditya Rājakesari varman 919-950 A D	922
Gandarāditya Rājakesari varman 919-950 A D	925
His part in the Pāndyan war	925
His religious piety and zeal in temple affairs	925
His literary work Tiruttiraippa	925
His death	925
His Queen Sembayan Mahādēviyār	927
Her record of pious deeds	927
Her canonization 1020 A D	929
Araṇjaya Maḍhuraikondaṇ Rājakesari 916-950	930
The temples founded by him	930
His death	931
His brothers Arikulā kēsari and Uttamaśūla	931
Sundara Chōla Parāntaka II 919-966 A D	932
His daughter Anṇḍavāl	933
Aditya II Karikāla 965-970 A D	934
His war against Pāndyas	935
His unhappy end	935
Dispute about the succession	936

Uttama-Chōla, Madhurāntaka, Parakēśari-varman, 969-985 A D	..	936
Influence of his mother	..	937
His Queens		937
His two invasions of Ceylon	. ..	939
His Officer Paluvēttaiar	...	940
His religious toleration	. ..	941
Rājaiāja the Great alias Rājarāja I, 985-1013 A D		941
His sister Kundavai	.	941
His period and extent of his rule		942
His military conquests—their chronology		943
Campaign against Pāndyas and Chēras	...	943
Occupation of Tinnevely		945
Conquest of Vēngi etc		946
Conquest of Kalinga	.	946
Conquest of Ceylon	.	947
Campaign against Western Chālukyas		948
Date of this War, 1006-1007 A D	..	949
The order of his conquests		950
Expedition against the Laccadives, 1013-1014 A D		950
Conquest of Pākenādu	.	951
Conquest of Gangavādi or Nolambavādi, 1003-1004 A D		951
Details of Rājaiāja's Conquests		954
His performance of Tulabhāna Ceremony		954
His inscriptions in the Kolar District		955
Period of peaceful rule—construction of temples		957
Revenue Survey and Settlement carried out, 1002 A D		960
Rājaiāja's greatness and character	...	961
His intellectual worth	...	962
His army—its organization	..	964
Encouragement of weavers		966
His administrative Divisions		966
His Secretaries and Officers	.	967
His Public Works—Construction of the great Tanjore temple		969
The Tanjore temple and its construction		971
Social life	.	977

	Page
Amusements—Theatre and Dancing	979
Temple management and Audit	981
Rājārāja's religious toleration	982
Position of Art and Industry in his time	983
Economic condition of the people in his time	984
Village Administration	986
The Village Sabha and its Committees	986
Limits on its powers of Taxation	989
Restrictions on Exactions	989
Influence on literature	990
Rājārāja's Imperial and Provincial capital	993
Rājārāja's titles	993
His domestic life, etc.	994
Rājārāja's metallic likenesses in the Tanjore temple	998
His coinage	998
His death	999
Rājendra Chōla I (Cangalkondān 1012-1013 to 1016 A.D.)	999
His conquests	1000
Order in which conquests were effected	1005
War against the Pāṇḍyan king	1009
Conquest of Ceylon	1002
War against Kēraḷa king	1010
War against Western Chālukya king Jayasimha II	1010
Date of war against Jayasimha II 1018 A.D.	1012
Campaign against kings on the Ganges border	1013
Bringing the Gangā into his own country	1014
Authenticity of this event	1015
Consecration of the Chōla Cāṇṇam tank	1018
Celebration of the conquest of the Ganges chiefs	1019
Origin of the title of Cangalkondān or Capturor of Gangā	1021
Conquest of the Gangapāḍi and Nulanibapāḍi	1023
Conquest of Kulata and Utkala	1024
Conquest of the "Eastern country"	1025
Conquest of Kalinga and Vāṅga	1025
Invasion of Burma and Indonesia	1026
The date of this conquest	1031
Summary of his conquests	1033

	PAGE
His capital cities . .	1033
His religious faith—Saivism . .	1034
Worship of Viṣṇu during his reign	1039
Worship of Sūrya and other Gods ...	1040
Features of his administration .	1040
Criminal Justice . .	1042
Conduct of Public Business .	1043
Supervision of temples ...	1045
His domestic life ...	1045
His nobles and generals	1047
His coinage	1048
His titles	1048
Identification of Rājēndia-Chōla with Satyēndra-Chōla of literature	1049
His death, 1044 A D	1050
Estimate of Rājēndra-Chōla's career ...	1050
Rājādhirāja I, 1018-1055 A D .	1051
His other name, Vijayaīājēndriādēva and his surnames ...	1053
Description of his reign	1054
His Conquests .	1059
First war against Chālukyas .	1059
War against Pāṇḍyan and Ceylon kings ...	1061
War against the Vēnādu King	1061
Rājādhirāja as a builder of temples	1062
Brahminic education in the 11th century	1063
Second war against the Western Chālukyas, death of Rājādhirāja, 1054-1055 A D	1065
Internal Condition . .	1068
Rural Administration	1069
Rājēndra-Dēva, 1052-1062 A.D .	1069
His Conquests—War against the Western Chālukyas 1054-1055 A D ...	1070
War against Ceylon . . .	1072
Description of his reign	1073
His domestic life, etc ..	1075
His military officers	1076
Floods and famine .	1076
Rajamahendra-Dēva, Rajakēśavarman, 1063-1065 A D	1077

Vīrarājendra Dēva I Vira Chōla, Karikala Chōla, 1062
1063 to 1070-1071 A D	1078
His Conquests	1079
Their order fixed by his inscriptions	1083
Description of battle of Kūdalsangamam	1084
Narrative of the battle continued	1086
Imposition of a war tax	1089
Internal conditions in the Chōla Empire	1089
Vīrarājendra as a literary patron	1092
His titles and probable relationship to Rājendra Chōla I	1093
Vīrirājendra Dēva, Parakēsarivarman 1063 1070 A.D	1095
His Death	1097
Rājendra Chōla II alias Kulōttunga Chōla I Rājakesari varman 1070 1120 A D	1097
The story of his usurpation	1097
Sources for the history of his reign	1099
His inscriptions in Mysore State	1100
Outline of the story of his reign	1103
Period of his rule	1104
Birth and parentage	1104
His rule over Vēngai	1105
His conquests	1106
His other names and titles	1112
His capitals	1113
His Queens	1113
Duration of his rule- fifty years	1114
His conquests as described in his inscriptions	1115
Expulsion of the Chōlas from Mysore 1116 A D	1117
The date of the Chōla expulsion	1118
Features of his administration	1118
Temple construction and administration	1120
His ministers	1122
Social life	1123
Literary activities during his reign	1123
Influence in Indonesia	1124
Coinage and currency	1125
Death of Kulōttunga-Chōla I 1110 A D	1128
Vīkrama Chōla, Tūlgasamudra, Akalanaka, etc. 1118- 1185 A D	1128

	PAGE
Period and extent of his rule	1129
His conquest of Kalinga about 1095-96 A D	1131
Viceroy of Vēngi, 1092-93 to 1118 A.D	1132
His religious faith	1133
Rural administration . .	1134
Re-survey of land, 1134 A D . . .	1135
Social conditions	1136
Sale of women to temples	1137
Administration of Justice ..	1138
Domestic life .	1138
Kulōttunga-Chola II, Anapāya, 1133-1145 A D	1139
His peaceful reign	1140
His religious faith ..	1141
Srī-Vaishnavism, Rāmānuja and his activities	1141
Rāmānuja, a contemporary of Kulōttunga-Chōla II. .	1142
Death of Kulōttunga-Chōla II, 1145 A D. ..	1143
Rājārāja II, 1146-1172 A D	1143
An eulogy of his reign	1145
Political decline reflected in social life	1145
Rājādhirāja II, 1168-1191 A D	1146
Pallavarāyar's Revolution . . .	1147
Justification of his Policy .	1149
Period of Rājādhirāja's Rule	1150
Chief events of his Reign	1150
Pāndyan War of succession, 1171-72 A D	1151
Cause of the War	1151
Progress of the War	1152
Criticism of the Mahāvamsa Narrative	1155
Epigraphical references to this war	1156
The story of the war as told in Inscriptions	1157
The Mahāvamsa and the inscriptions refer to the same war .	1159
The combined version	1160
The inscriptional narrative entitled to greater weight	1162
Country affected by the war	1162
Date of the war, 1169-1173 A D	1163
Continuation of the war, 1179-1181 A D	1164
Did Kulōttunga-Chōla III take part in this war? ...	1165
Pallavarāja probably a near relation of Rājādhirāja II	1166

	PAGE
Effects of the Pāndyan succession war Weakening and decay of Chōla power	1167
Break up of society Rājādhirāja's Reforms	1169
Land Law Reform	1169
Right of married women to property	1170
Social reform	1170
Minor Rural Regulations	1171
Moral and Religious Life	1171
Death of Rājādhirāja	1173
Kulōttunga Chōla III Tribhuvanaśra Virarajendra II 1175-1218 A D	1173
Records of his Reign	1175
Period of his Rule	1175
His other names and surnames	1175
Reconquest of Madurai continuation of the Pāndyan war of succession Circa 1187 A D	1178
Conquest of Ceylon Circa 1190 A D	1181
Conquest of Kongu Circa 1194 A D	1181
Expedition against the North Circa 1198 A D	1182
Fight against rebellious Vassal Circa 1205 A D	1183
Pāndyan usurpation of Chōla kingdom 1222 A D	1185
Restoration of the Chōla kingdom 1223 A D	1186
Political and Civil Administration	1187
Re-engraving of Public records	1190
Criminal Justice	1190
Feudatories	1193
Building activities of the period	1194
Kulōttunga III a great temple builder	1195
His feudatories as builders	1199
Suppression of unpopular monasteries 1200 A D	1200
Was Kulōttunga III a religious bigot?	1200
Kulōttunga III as a literary patron	1202
A review of the reign of Kulōttunga III	1203
Rajaraja III Tribhuvanaśra 1210-1257 A D	1203
Political decline of the Chōlas	1205
Weakening of the Central authority and the rise of the feudatories	1208
Political compacts between feudatories and their significance	1211

	PAGE
Anarchy at its height Revolt of Kopperunjinga, 5th to 16th regnal year	1212
The course of the revolt	1212
The revolt and its probable object	1214
How Rājārāja III was imprisoned and how he was liberated	1215
The story as told in the inscriptions	1216
Kopperunjinga's confederates	1218
The story of Kopperunjinga	1219
His rule over the usurped territory, A D 1243-1279	1220
Character of his Rule	1224
The better side of his nature	1227
The significance of Kopperunjinga episode	1229
Administration in Rājārāja's time	1233
Administration of Criminal Justice	1235
Erection of Public Buildings	1235
Literary activities of the Reign	1237
Domestic life	1238
Coinage	1238
Probable end of Rājārāja	1239
Character of his Rule	1239
Chōlas in Mysore in the reign of Rājārāja III	1240
Rājēndia-Chōla III alias Manukulamedutta-perumal, 1246-1268 A D	1242
An eulogy of his reign	1243
Conflict with the Pāndyas	1244
Relations with Hoysalas	1245
Re-conquest of the Northern country	1246
Object of the Northern conquests	1247
Rājēndia-Chōla III as a resuscitator of Manu	1248
Rājēndia-Chōla's fall becomes a Mahāmandalēsvara under the Pāndyas, 1268 A D	1249
His two sons Sēliyai Kōnāi and Sēma Pillai	1250
The Pāndyan Invasions	1252
Pāndyan influence checked temporarily	1255
Renewed conquests of Jatāvarman Sundara- Pāndya	1257
His effective rule over Chōla country	1259
A Kērala invasion under Ravivarman Kūlasēkhara	1266

	PAGE
His identification	1267
Effect of the Pāṇḍyan Invasions	1268
Tribhuvana Vira Chōla Deva Parakramavarman Tribhuvana Chakravarti 1331 A D	1269
The End of the Chola Empire	1270
Chōla Coinage during Pāṇḍyan Supremacy	1271
Cholas of Nidugal—a local Dynasty	1272
Relations with the Hoysalas	1275
Chōla Mahārājas	1276
Review of the economic religious and social life of the people Circa 850 to 1250 A D	1276
(i) Economic life	1277
(a) The Village and its Assembly	1277
Its Committees	1277
Reforms introduced by Parantaka 921 A D	1279
Qualifications for Committee Membership	1280
Mode of Selection—Combined election and drawing of lots	1281
Universality of Committee System in Southern India	1283
Its principal merits	1283
(b) Towns and Trade	1284
(c) The King's Revenue	1286
(d) Money	1288
(ii) Religious Life	1289
(a) The Temple—the Centre of Religious Life	1289
(b) Temple income	1289
(c) Its management	1290
(d) Its property	1291
(e) Its duties and responsibilities as to hospitality education medical aid etc	1292
(f) Women and the temple	1295
Position of women	1296
(g) Temples and teachers	1297
(h) Mathas attached to temples	1299
(iii) Social Life—the temple as a social centre	1300
Social instinct highly developed in the people	1302
Protection of Society against malefactors	1303

	PAGE
Chōla-Pāndyas	1305
Chōla Princes as Viceroyals in Pāndya Kingdom	... 1306
Their rule over Kērala	.. 1308
Genealogical Table of the Imperial Chōla Dynasty	. 1308
HOYSALAS, STORY OF THEIR ORIGIN	1309
Derivation of names Poysala, Hoysala, etc	1310
Hoysala inscriptions and where they are found	1311
Hoysala capitals	1311
Chief Hoysala titles	... 1312
List of Hoysala kings	1312
Sala, Circa 10th century A D	1312
Vinayāditya I, 1006-1022 A D	... 1313
Nripa Kāma or Kāma Hoysala, 1022-1047 A D	1315
Vinayāditya II, 1047-1100 A D	1316
Ereyanga, 1063-1095 A D (1100 A D)	1319
Ballāla I, 1100-1106 A D	1320
His death	1322
Bitṭi-Dēva, or Vishnuvardhana 1111-1141 A D	1323
Date of his accession	1323
His conversion to Vaishnavism, Circa 1113 A D	... 1324
His conquests	1329
Capture of Talkād, 1117 A D	1329
Conquest of Kongu and other kingdoms	. 1332
The Chālukyas defeated at Kannegala	1333
Conquest of Nīlgiris	. 1333
Conquest of the Pāndyas of Uchchangī	1334
Other conquests mentioned in his inscriptions	1334
Boundaries of his kingdom	. 1336
His capital cities	1336
His Generals and Ministers	. 1337
Architecture and Sculpture	1342
Domestic Life	.. 1343
Coinage and currency	1345
Relations with the Western Chālukyas	. 1347
Religion and Society	.. 1348
An estimate of his reign	1351
Date of his death, 1141 A D	1353
Nālasimha, I, Pratāpa-Nālasimha, 1143-1173 A D	1354
His rule	1355

His General and Ministers	1356
Provincial Rulers	1358
Architecture	1360
Insurrectionary war of Ballāla II 1172-3 A.D.	1360
Ballāla II Vīra Ballāla, Yādava Nārāyaṇa 1173-1220 A.D.	1361
Expedition against the Changālvās 1173 A.D.	1362
Conquest of Pāndyas of Uchchangī Circa 1117 A.D.	1362
War against the Kālachūrya king Sankama, Circa 1179 A.D.	1363
Victory over Sēvunās 1191 A.D.	1363
Founding of the Ballāla Era, 1191-2 A.D.	1365
His Generals Ministers and Foudatories	1366
Domestic Life	1368
His capital cities	1371
Religion Architecture and Sculpture	1371
Social condition	1373
Death of Ballāla II 1220 A.D.	1374
Nārasimha II Vīra-Nārasimha II 1217-1235 A.D.	1375
Destruction of Magara kingdom Circa 1220 A.D.	1375
Restoration of the Chōla king Rājārāja III Circa 1220 A.D. and Circa 1232 A.D.	1376
Sēvunās turned back, Circa 1224 A.D.	1378
War against Pāndyas of Madura, Circa 1224 A.D.	1379
Occupation of Kānchi Circa 1229	1379
Nārasimha's Titles Generals and Ministers	1380
Architecture and Sculpture	1381
Domestic life and death 1235 A.D.	1382
Sōmesvara Vīra Sōmēsvara Sōvi Dēva, or Sōma, 1234-1262 A.D.	1383
War against Chōlas Circa 1237 A.D.	1383
Campaign against Kāḍavarāya, Circa 1237 A.D.	1383
Expedition against Pāndyas of Madura, Circa 1237 A.D.	1383
Kannanur new capital in Chōla Kingdom 1239 A.D.	1384
War against Sēvunās Circa 1229 A.D.	1386
His principal Generals and Ministers	1387
Domestic Life	1388

	1389
Trade and Progress in Agriculture ..	1390
Death, 1254 A.D.	1391
Vijayaditya III, Vikramaditya, 1254-1291 A.D.	1391
Collisions with Rameswara, 1269-1290 A.D.	1391
Invasion of Seunna, 1276 A.D.	1391
Renewed Attempts ..	1391
Attacks against Nidaval Fort, 1285 A.D.	1391
General and Minister of the Court ..	1391
Domestic Life ..	1395
Architecture and Sculpture ..	1395
Vijayaditya, 1254-1295 A.D.	1395
Vijayaditya-Vijayaditya, 1291-1298 A.D.	1398
Ballala III, Vikramaditya, 1291-1312 A.D.	1398
Insurrection put down, 1299-1309 A.D.	1399
War against Seunas, 1305-1307 A.D.	1400
First Muhammadan Invasion, 1310 A.D.	1400
Second Muhammadan Invasion, 1316 A.D.	1401
The probable causes of the Muhammadan Invasions ..	1401
Generals, Ministers, etc., etc.	1403
Domestic Life ..	1403
Death of Ballala III, 1312 A.D.	1405
Break-up of Hoysala Kingdom, 1311 A.D.	1405
The Dynasty cursed ..	1406
Ballala IV, Vikramaditya Ballala or Hempa Vodevar, 1343 A.D.	1407
Absorption of the Hoysala Kingdom in that of Vijayanagar, circa 1316 A.D.	1407
The fall of Hoysalas ..	1407
Hoysala Comage ..	1408
Pedigree of the Hoysala Dynasty ..	1409
SEVUNAS ..	1410
First Muhammadan Invasion, 1294 A.D.	1412
Second do do 1306 do	1413
Third do do 1309 do	1414
Fourth do do 1312 do	1414
Fifth do do 1318 do	1414

THE MYSORE GAZETTEER

VOLUME II

HISTORICAL

PART II

CHAPTER XI

EARLY PERIOD

From the earliest times to the Foundation of the Vyayanagar Kingdom

In Part I of this Volume we have not only tried to make out the Pre-History and Proto-History of Mysore so far as modern research has enabled us to do so, but also endeavoured to glean as much information as we could about the Archaeology of the Historical Period. We have seen to what extent the aid of Epigraphy, Numismatics, Sculpture and Painting Architecture, other allied Fine Arts like Engraving and Music Palm leaf and other Mss., Literature (Sanskrit, Kannada and other) etc., could contribute to our knowledge of the History of the State. These sources of History show the wide ground that has to be covered by the Historian of Mysore before he can present a faithful account of its past and show how the present has grown out of it. That is the task that we set before ourselves in this and the succeeding Parts of this volume. In this Part, the extent of the influence exerted by the following dynasties of Kings on the State will be considered, in so far as it may be possible in the light of recent research —Nandas, Mauryas, Sunga Dynasty, Kanva Dynasty, Andhrias, Kadambas, Vaidumbas, Pallavas, Gangas, Chālukyas, Rāshtrakūtas, Kalachuryas, Chōlas, Hoysalas and Sevunas Only so much of the history of these different dynasties will be set down below as is necessary for the purposes of elucidating Mysore history For the rest, reference should be made to the works mentioned in the Bibliography

NANDAS—
5th Century
B C

Certain inscriptions of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries found in the present Shimoga District refer to the Nandas, the predecessors of the Mauryas, as being connected with parts of northern Mysore. Thus, one inscription (E.C VII, Shikarpur 225, dated in 1204 A D) states that Kuntala, a province which included the Western Deccan and the north of Mysore, was ruled by the "renowned Nandas" Another (E C VII, Shikarpur 236, dated in 1173 A D) derives the descent of the Kadambas, the early rulers of the north-west of the country, from Nanda

Their succession
and history

The Nandas were the successors of Saisunāgas or Saisunākas The Saisunāgas derive their name from the name of the founder of their dynasty, Saisunāga His dynasty is the earliest in the Purānic lists which can claim historical reality (Circa 642 B C) Saisunāga ruled over a country which comprised the modern districts of Gaya and Patna His capital was Gṛivāṇa, near Rājagṛha Fifth in succession to him was Bimbisāra (Circa 582 B C) who extended his Kingdom by the addition of Anga, the modern district of Bhāgalpur He has been regarded as the real founder of the Magadhan imperial power He fortified his position by marital alliances One of his wives came from the famous Licchhavi clan at Vaishali, the modern Basia, 27 miles west by north of Patna. Both Vardhamana Mahavira the founder of Jainism and Gautama Buddha the founder of Buddhism appear to have lived in Magadha and preached during Bimbisara's reign though it is difficult as Sir Vincent Smith remarks to reconcile the traditional dates. After 28 years of rule Bimbisara retired. He ruled the country as a wise and sensible king. He extended his influence over Kāśi, conquered Vaisali and built a fortress at the village of Patali, famous later as Pataliputra the modern Patna to safeguard his frontier. Ajātasatru died in Circa 527 B.C. His grandson Udaya built Udayapura, which adjoins Pataliputra (Circa 503 B.C.). His successors were Nandivardhana and Mahānandin of both of whom little is as yet known. They were probably both Nandas. Mahānandin's illegitimate son Mahāpadina Nanda usurped the throne and established the Nanda dynasty in or about 413 B.C. According to the Purāṇas Mahāpadina was followed by his eight sons the two generations of nine (nava) Nandas reigning for a century a length of rule which indicates a confusion in chronology. At the time of Alexander's conquest—he reached Hyphasis in 326 B.C.—there was one of these Nandas ruling over the Magadha country. Greek accounts show he was not only of a base origin but also odious and contemptible to his subjects. His great military power is attested to by Greek testimony but the extent of the Nanda kingdom cannot be defined and the duration of the reign of the dynasty fixed with certainty. Mr. K. P. Jayswal has suggested that Nava Nanda means the new not the nine Nandas as distinguished from the Pūrvananda, the early Nandas i.e. Nandi (or Nanda) Vardhana and Mahānanda (or Nandiv) of Kāśhemendra. Good reasons have also been adduced to show that Chandragupta Maurya, who displaced the Nandas was a respectable kinsman of the early Nandas and not of a base origin like the later. Whether this was so or not, there is scarcely any doubt that Chandragupta effected a successful revolution with the aid of his Brāhman adviser, Chānakya (also called Kautilya or Vishnugupta) and then leading the Indian revolt against Alexander's conquests, destroyed most of the Macedonian garrisons (See below) At the time of his accession, which may be dated between 325 and 320 B C, perhaps in 322 B C., the Kingdom of Magadha was large in extent and included the territories of the nations called Prasii and Gangaridæ by the Greeks, and probably comprised the kingdoms of Kōsala, Tihut (North Bihar) and Benares, as well as Anga (modern Bhāgalpur) and Magadha proper (South Bihar). Whether it extended as far as present northern Mysore, as stated in inscriptions of the 12th century A D or not, and whether the reference to the Nandas mentioned in them is to the early or later Nandas or to the restored dynasty of Nandas in Chandragupta, it is impossible to say in the present state of our knowledge.

THE MAUR-YAS—
327 B C —185
B C

Chandragupta's Rule
—323 B C to
298 B C

The authentic history of India may be said to begin with the invasion of the Greeks under Alexander the Great in 327 B C When the Sandrakottos (or Sandrakoptus) of the Greek writers was identified with Chandragupta, a secure basis was established on which to found the chronology of events in India From the little we know of Chandragupta, he first appears as a youthful adventurer in the camp of Alexander, from which, owing to some quarrel or disagreement, he had to flee From the writings of Justin, it has been inferred that Chandragupta had offended the reigning king Nanda, who had ordered him to be put to death He sought safety "by a speedy flight" He proposed to Alexander, if Plutarch may be believed, that if he advanced, he would make an easy conquest of the kingdom on the Ganges, by reason of the extreme unpopularity of the reigning king. Collecting bands of followers, he contrived to overthrow the dynasty of the Nandas in Magadha or Bihar and made himself a supreme sovereign throughout northern India with his capital at Pataliputra (Pālim bothra in the Greek version) the modern Patna on the Ganges. In the play called Udāra rākṣasa he is represented as having effected this with the aid of Chāṇakya the Indian Machiavelli. This play makes Chandragupta a relation of the reigning sovereign Mahāpadma Nanda and attributes a low origin to Chandragupta. It has been pointed out that the play though founded on accurate information and ancient court tradition may still lack in certain respects, a historical basis especially by reason of later sectarian rancour which may have affected the character of Mahāpadma himself. The view has also been advanced that Chandragupta was as above stated connected with the earlier Nanda and was superior in status to Mahāpadma whom he overthrew. After the death of Alexander in 323 B.C. Bactria and the Greek provinces in India had fallen to the share of Seleukos Nikator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy. But it was not till he had recovered Babylon in 312 B.C. that the latter was at leisure to turn his attention to India. He then found himself unable to cope with Chandragupta and as the result of a humiliating peace entered into alliance with him ceding the Greek settlements in the Punjab and the Kabul valley in return for a present of 500 elephants, and ratified the peace by giving him his daughter in marriage. He also appointed to the court at Pataliputra an ambassador named Megasthenes from whose accounts the Greeks obtained much of their information about India. The reign of Chandragupta lasted for twenty four years, from about 323 to 298 B.C., and the line of kings originating with him are known as the Mauryas. His overthrow of the Nanda king of Magadha, his driving the Macedonian troops out of India, his conquests from sea to sea, his system of administration, etc., do not fall within the scope of this work. There is the less need to refer to these matters here as they will be found fully described in Sir Vincent Smith's Early History of India (Fourth Edition, 1924, 121-161), to which reference is invited by the interested reader.

Chandragupta's abdication and retirement to Mysore, 298
B.C. The Bhadrabāhu tradition.

The earliest event in the annals of Mysore that may be regarded as historical is connected with Chandragupta. It refers to his abdication and retreat to Mysore about 298 B.C. According to the accounts of the Jains, Bhadrabāhu, the last of the śrutakēvalis, or hearers of the first masters, foretold the occurrence in Ujjayīni (modern Ujjain) of a dreadful famine which would last for twelve years. On its approach the main body of the Jains there forsook the northern regions and migrated to the south under his guidance. When they had journeyed as far as Sravana Belgola, Bhadrabāhu, feeling that his end was drawing nigh, sent on the rest of the pilgrims, under the leadership of Visākha, to the Chōla and Pāndya countries, and remained behind at the smaller hill (called Katavapura in Sanskrit and Kalbappira or Kalbappu in Kannada) to die, attended by only a single disciple. That disciple, it is alleged, was no other than the Maurya Emperor Chandragupta.

Reason for his abdica-
tion.

In accordance with the obligations of the Jaina faith, he had abdicated towards the close of his life and renounced the world in order to prepare for death by acts of penance performed under the direction of a spiritual guide. For this purpose he had attached himself to Bhadrabāhu, the most distinguished professor of the faith at that time living, and had accompanied him to the south. He continued to minister to the wants of Bhadrabāhu, his guru, to the last, and was the only witness to his death. According to tradition, Chandragupta survived his guru for twelve years, which he spent in ascetic rites at the same place and died there after welcoming the emigrants on their return journey from the south when the great famine was over which had driven them from their homes

In testimony of these events not only is Bhadrabāhu's cave in which he expired pointed out on the hill at Sravana Belgola but the hill itself is called Chandragiri after Chandragupta while on its summit, surrounded with temples is the Chandragupta basti the oldest there, having its facade minutely sculptured with ninety scenes from the lives of Bhadrabāhu and Chandragupta though these may be more modern, probably belonging to the 12th century A.D. Additional evidence is contained in the ancient rock inscriptions on the hill. The oldest of them relates the migration of the Jains and the other events abovementioned, while a second associates Bhadrabāhu with Chandragupta as the two great munis who gave the hill its distinction (Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola, Nos 1, 17 = New Edition 81, 108 = New Edition 258, 54 = New Edition 67 40 = New Edition 64.) Similar testimony is borne by two inscriptions of about 900 A.D., found near Seringapatam (Epigraphia Carnatica I Seringapatam 147, 148). Furthermore stone inscriptions at Sravana Belgola, dated in the twelfth and fifteenth centuries, confirm the same traditions. That Chandragupta was a Jain by creed may be inferred from the statements of Megasthenes who, writing of the Sarmanes (or Sravanas) distinguishing them both from the Brachmanes (or Brāhmanas) and from the followers of Bontta (or the Buddhists), says —

The testimony on which it rests

They communicate with the kings who consult them by messengers regarding the causes of things and who through them worship and supplicate the deity

That Bhadrabāhu was contemporary with Chandragupta is not denied. The story of Chandragupta's accession to the throne of the Nandas is dramatised in the Sanskrit play named Mudrā-rākshasa by Viśhākadatta. In this play we see the Jains holding a prominent position at the time, and Chānakya who was the prime agent in the revolution, employs a Jain as one of his chief emissaries. This play used to be assigned by scholars at one time to the 7th century A D, but recent opinion credits it to the period of Chandragupta II, about 400 A D. Speyer and Konow would refer it to the 4th century A D. (See Sir Vincent Smith's Early History of India, 45 foot-note 1)

The literary evidence, though somewhat late and even slightly contradictory in character, bears testimony to the fact that Chandragupta was Bhadrabāhu's disciple and that he migrated to the south. The Bṛhatkathā-kōsa, a work by Harishēna, dated in 931 A D, states that Bhadrabāhu, the last of the Śrutakēvalis, had the king Chandragupta as his disciple. A similar account is contained in the Bhadrabāhu-Charita by Ratnanandi of 1450, and is repeated in the Rājāvali-kathe by Dēvachandīa, which is a modern compilation of about 1800. In the Bhadrabāhu-Charita and the Rājāvali-kathe, the migration to the south is stated to have been led by Bhadrabāhu, a statement which is repeated in the Munivamsābhya-daya, a work by Chidānandakavi (C. ca 1680), in which the additional information is given that Bhadrabāhu was killed by a tiger springing on him. In the Bṛhatkathā-kōsa, however, it is mentioned that Bhadrabāhu having foretold the 12 years' famine, remained away at Ujjain and that Chandragupta, after taking the dīkṣhe, became the head of the sanghas under the name of Viśākḥāchārya and by order of his guru, Bhadrabāhu, he led the sangha to the Punnata kingdom, the Ponnata of Ptolemy, whose capital was Kīrūpūr, the modern Kittūr, on the Kapini, in the Heggaddēvankote Taluk of the Mysore District. Harishēna, the author of Bṛhatkathā-kōsa, and Jinasēna, another well known Jain saint who wrote the Harivamsa in 783 state that they belonged to the Punnata sangha which has been identified with the Kuttur sangha mentioned in an inscription (No 81, dated about 700 A.D.) included in the Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola. It would also appear from the Bṛhatkathāśloka that Bhadrabāhu after the despatch of the sangha to the south under Chandragupta's leadership, retired to Bhādrapada, 'fasted for many days and expired'. This part of the story is not accepted by the later writers mentioned above who have agreed in saying that he also migrated to the south leading the sangha and died on a certain hill in the Karnaṭa. Inscription No 1 (of the Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola) mentions this hill as Katsapara at Sravana Belgola where Bhadrabāhu dismissed the sangha in its entirety and in company with a single disciple mortifying his body on the wide expanse of the cold rocks, accomplished śamādhi. Harishēna's statement that Bhadrabāhu did not lead the sangha to the south is not acceptable because two inscriptions near Seringapatam, which probably are a little older than Harishēna's period describe the summit of Chandragiri at Sravana Belgola as marked by the impress of the feet of the great sages Bhadrabāhu and Chandragupta thus indicating that the two lived there. A still earlier inscription on Chandragiri itself (No 31 of the New Edition = Nos. 17 18 of the Old Edition of the Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola, dated about 650 A.D.) refers to the same two sages (Bhadrabāhu and Chandragupta) although it does not expressly state that they lived there. The Bṛhatkathāśloka apparently records a variant version of the story which in the light of the evidence afforded by earlier inscriptions, has to be neglected. Tradition has unequivocally identified the Chandragupta of the Jain story with the Mauryan Emperor of that name the grand father of Aśoka. Sir John Fleet's mistaken identification of this Chandragupta with Guptigupta has been mentioned above. More recently, it has been suggested by Dr. R. Shama Sastri (see M A R for 1923, para 67) that this Chandragupta is Chandragupta II of the Gupta dynasty, with whom Mayūrasaṃman of the Kadamba dynasty is said to have contracted marital alliances. "It is possible," he writes, "that it was this Chandragupta who in his old age embraced Jainism and being moved with pity at the sight of the famished people in a terrible famine in his country in his old age left the country in company with Bhadrabāhu III, a Jain teacher, to spend his days in solitude in Sravana Belgola in Mysore under the rule of his father-in-law. The Sravana Belgola inscription written in memory of the death of Prabhāchandra can only mean, if it means anything, that the person named Bhadrabāhu who came to Sravana Belgola was one of the many disciples who came after the first Ganadhara Bhadrabāhu." This identification depends primarily on the accuracy of Dr. Shama Sastri's proposed initial point of the Gupta era at 200-201 A D. This theory, however, still awaits closer examination. Among the objections that might be urged against it are that it predicates not only a famine of 12 years' duration in the reign of Chandragupta II but also suggests his migration to the south, for which, from the received accounts of his reign, there was no need. The theory also neglects the fact that Chandragupta II followed the Brāhmanical and not the Jain religion, while the foundation of the Chandragupta-Bhadrabāhu tradition is that Chandragupta was of the Jain persuasion. Chandragupta, the Mauryan Emperor, was a born Jain and lived and died a Jain and hence the story of the migration fits him more nearly than the Gupta king of the same name. Moreover, the theory of Dr. Shama Sastri as to the initial date of the Gupta era does not depend for its cogency or support on his proposed identification of the Chandragupta of the Chandragupta Bhadrabāhu tradition with the second Gupta Emperor of the same name Mr Rice writes —

We are therefore not without warrant for assuming that Chandragupta was a Jain by creed. At the period when he becomes associated with Bhadrabāhu he was much troubled in mind on account of sixteen dreams with which he had been visited. These are mentioned in many narratives relating to him. Bhadrabāhu in the course of his travels having come to Pataliputra the capital the king consulted him as to their interpretation and was dismayed at the coming troubles which they portended including the twelve years of famine. He seems, consequently impressed by Bhadrabāhu's exhortations to have resolved to retire from the throne and to place himself under the guidance of this the most distinguished Jain teacher then living for the right performance of penitential acts in view of the impending calamities. How as Mr V. A. Smith has pointed out (F H I 128) not fifty years ago at the time. He is not expressly stated to have died and no special reason appears for his death at this early age. Had he fallen in battle or his life been cut short by accident or disease the circumstances could not fail to have been mentioned. But if he retired from the throne in order to devote himself in accordance with the dictates of the Jain religion to an ascetic life in the last stage of his existence (Asoka who was his grandson did the same as will be seen below) and accompanied Bhadrabāhu to the South this affords a reasonable explanation of his early disappearance from public notice and of the silence regarding his further career for absolute renunciation of all earthly ties was of the essence of the vow he had taken. On the other hand the southern accounts represent him as living on ascetic life at Sravastī Belgachia for twelve years after the decease of Bhadrabāhu. (Twelve years of penance were always thought essential for obtaining perfection and for every ascetic who endeavours to quit this life with the best claims to enter one of the highest heavens or even Nirvāṇa (Jacobi S B F VIII Introd 18). His death then occurred when he was about sixty-two years of age which seems more natural and so far entitled to credence.

"That the north of Mysore may even at that period have been a part of the Maurya empire is not beyond probability. For the edicts of Asōka are evidence that it was so two generations later, and as the only conquest Asōka is said to have made was that of Kalinga or Orissa, it follows that the rest of his empire was inherited from his predecessors. If it be true, moreover, as above stated, that the Nandas ruled over Kuntala, then the Mauryas naturally acquired it in succession to them. One inscription, indeed (Sravana Belgola 263), says that Nagakhanda (the Shikarpur Taluk) "was protected by the wise Chandragupta, an abode of the usages of eminent Kshatriyas," but this is of the fourteenth century and too much cannot be built upon it. Of special interest, however, is the statement in the work of Harishēna before referred to, that when, as described in the Sravana Belgola inscription, the sangha were sent on their way, "they went by the guru's direction to the Punnata country, situated in the South." This was a province in the south-west of the Mysore State. It is mentioned in the second century by Ptolemy as Pounnata, "where is beyl." It is also named in the fifth century in connection with the Ganga king Avinīta (Coorg 1), whose son Durvinīta married the Punnad king's daughter, and united it to the Ganga territory. An inscription of the Punnad Rājas gives Kitthipura as their capital, which is identified (Heggaddevankote 56) with Kittūr on the Kabbani river in the Heggaddēvankote Taluk. One of the ancient rock inscriptions on Chandragiri (Sravana Belgola 7) records the death of a Jain guru from Kittūr."

Opinion of Sir
Vincent
Smith

The above is a brief summary of the evidence on which the Chandragupta-Bhadrabāhu tradition rests. Mr. Rice has always maintained its credibility, while Sir John Fleet has consistently argued against it. He thinks that the Bhadrabāhu of inscription (No. 1, Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola), assigned to about 600 A.D., is a later saint of that name who lived in the 1st century B.C. and identified—wrongly as stated above—Chandragupta with Guptigupta. Mr. Rice's views have been re-stated with great force by Rao Bahadur

R A Narasimhachar in his new Edition of Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola (E O II) Sir Vincent Smith, who at one time disbelieved the story, has lately written in favour of it. He writes thus in his Early History of India (Fourth Edition 1924) —

In the Second Edition of this book I rejected that tradition and dismissed the tale as imaginary history. But on reconsideration of the whole evidence and the objections urged against the credibility of the story I am disposed to believe that the tradition probably is true in its main outline and that Chandragupta really abdicated and became a Jain ascetic. The traditional narratives, of course like all such relations are open to much criticism and the epigraphical support is far from conclusive. Nevertheless my present impression is that the tradition has a solid foundation on fact.

In another of his publications the Oxford History of India (Edition 1919), he more fully sets out his grounds. He writes —

“The only direct evidence throwing light on the manner in which the eventful reign of Chandragupta Maurya came to an end is that of Jain tradition. The Jains always treat the great emperor as having been a Jain like Bimbisāra, and no adequate reason seems to exist for discrediting their belief. The Jain religion undoubtedly was extremely influential in Magadha during the time of the later Sāśunāgas the Nandas and the Mauryas. The fact that Chandragupta won the throne by the contrivance of a learned Brāhman is not inconsistent with the supposition that Jainism was the royal faith. Jains habitually employ Brāhmanas for their domestic ceremonies, and in the drama cited above a Jain ascetic is mentioned as being a special friend of the minister Rākshasa, who served first the Nanda and then the new sovereign.

‘Once the fact that Chandragupta was or became a Jain is admitted the tradition that he abdicated and committed suicide by slow starvation in the approved Jain manner becomes readily credible. The story is to the effect that when the Jain saint Bhadrabāhu predicted a famine in northern India which would last for twelve years, and the prophecy began to be fulfilled the saint led twelve thousand

Jains to the south in search of more favoured lands King Chandragupta abdicated and accompanied the emigrants, who made their way to Sravana-Belgola ('the white Jain tank') in Mysore, where Bhadrabāhu soon died The ex-Emperor Chandragupta, having survived him for twelve years, starved himself to death The tradition is supported by the names of the buildings at Sravana-Belgola inscriptions from the seventh century after Christ, and a literary work of the tenth century The evidence cannot be described as conclusive, but after much consideration I am disposed to accept the main facts as affirmed by tradition It being certain that Chandragupta was quite young and inexperienced when he ascended the throne in or about 322 B C, he must have been under fifty when his reign terminated twenty-four years later His abdication is an adequate explanation of his disappearance at such an early age Similar renunciations of royal dignity are on record, and the twelve years' famine is not incredible In short, the Jain tradition holds the field, and no alternative account exists "

A dispassionate consideration of the known facts leads one, says Mr Narasimhachar, to the conclusion that the Jain tradition has some basis to stand upon The evidence may not, as he admits, be quite conclusive, but it may be accepted as a working hypothesis until the contrary is proved by further research

Bindusāra
298-272 B C

According to the Greek accounts, Chandragupta was succeeded by Amitrachades (probably Amitraghāta, slayer of foes, one of the king's titles) He was, as his name indicates, a conqueror. To the Purāṇas, he is known as Bindusāra He seems to have maintained the friendly relations with the court of Seleukos, who being assassinated in 280 B C had been succeeded by his son and colleague Antiochus Soter, who continued his father's policy towards India. Deimachos succeeded Megasthenes as ambassador to Bindusāra's court. Ptolemy Philadelphos, who ruled over Egypt from 285 to 247 B C, also sent an envoy named Dionysios to his court Both Deimachos and Dionysios-recorded their notes on the country, like Megasthenes their predecessor. While very few of Deimechos observations have come down to us, the accounts of Dionysios were still available to Pliny when he wrote his Natural History about 77 A.D. The Ishnu Purāna gives the following list of the Maurya kings —

Chandragupta	B.C. 321-22 to 298 B.C.
Bindusāra,	B.C. 298 to 272 B.C.
Asoka vardhana	272 to 232 B.C.
Kuyasa
Kusala of	(Id. unified with Dasaratha of the inscriptions).
Sangata	? 231 B.C.
Saliśka	? 216 B.C.
Sāma arman	? 206 B.C.
Satadhinwan	? 191 B.C.
Prithadratha	? 181 B.C.
Pushyamitra Sunga	181-144 B.C.
Final destruction of Maurya Empire	143 B.C.

Bindusāra reigned for twenty eight years from 298 to 272 B.C. His military exploits included the conquest of the South. Though there is no direct evidence for it, it is fairly inferable from the writings of Tāranāthe, the Tibetan historian and the Tamil poet Māmulanār that Bindusāra following the advice of Chanakya effected extensive conquests and carried the limits of his State from sea to sea. Sir Vincent Smith is of opinion that these conquests should have been in the South and not in the North where Chandragupta had firmly held his kingdom. Tāranāthe says that Bindusāra killed the kings and ministers of sixteen capitals and annexed their territories. Māmulenār refers in several of his poems to the conquest of the South by the new Menryas ' (Vamba Moriyar as he calls them) through what is now Kanara and the Coimbatore countries, to the extreme south of the peninsula up to the Pothiya Hill in the South West of Madurai and Tinnevely Districts. He even hints that these new Menryas succeeded in wresting power from their predecessors by force. His words are reminiscent of the revolution in Pāṭaliputra, when he says that "the wealth of the Nandas, which having accumulated first in Pātali, hid itself in the floods of the Ganges." Māmūlanāi also refers to the chieftain of Erumai of Kudanādu, parts of Mysore and Coorg, a name which as Erumaimādu (Sanskrit Mahīshamandala) has survived to our own times. Though Sir John Fleet has identified Mahīshmatī with Mandhata on the Naibada, it is still an open question whether Asōka's Mahīshamandala does not refer to the country which is now generally known as Mysore. Tamil literature and later inscriptions seem to support this view. That the conquest of the South included parts of Mysore need not be doubted, if they were not already part of Bindusāra's kingdom by virtue of the right of conquest from the time of the Nandas. Echoes of this early Mauryan rule over parts of north-west Mysore are preserved for us in inscriptions as late as the 12th century A.D. One of these found at Bandanike, Shikarpur Taluk, Shimoga District, describes Kuntala as the province governed by the Mauryas. This, roughly speaking, would be the country between the rivers Bhīma and Vēdāvatī, bounded on the west by the Ghāts, including Shimoga, Chitaldrug, Bellary, Dharwar, Bijapur, and adjacent parts to the north of Bombay and the Nizam's dominions. There are other references which show that these Mauryan incursions were frequent, and that success did not always lie with the Mauryas. That they could not hold their southern conquests is evidenced by the inscriptions of Asōka. These unmistakably prove that in his time the southern States—Chōla, Pāndya, etc.—were independent neighbours of the northern empire, which included a vice-royalty with its head-quarters at Suvarnagiri, "presumably situated in the ancient gold-field near Maski in the Raichur District of the Nizam's Dominions, where an inscription exists." Faint memories of the Mauryan conquest of the south lingered for centuries. Apart from the inscriptions dated as late as the 12th century and found in the north west of Mysore referring to it the Kadamba kings claim descent from Nanda himself. Early Pallava inscriptions claim Asōka as one of the ancestors of the dynasty and as late as the 7th century A.D. the Chōlokyā monarch subdued Maurya chiefs in the Konkans. The Mauryas who began their incursions in the south from a time probably anterior to Bindusāra ceased to be a power in the south with the fall of the Sanga dynasty and the rise of the Āndhrabhūtiyas.

Bindusāra's conquest of the south

Bindusāra was succeeded by his son the famous Asōka vardhana or Asōka. He is directly connected with this State where the discovery by Mr. Rice in 1892 of three of his inscriptions in the Molakālmuru Taluk Chitaldrug District, dating perhaps from 258 B.C. has put it beyond doubt that the Mysore country or at any rate the northern part of it was included in his dominions. All that was previously known of his connection with Mysore was contained in the statement in the Mahāwanso that after the third convocation (244 B.C.) he despatched missionaries to foreign parts to establish the religion of Buddha among whom he deputed the thera Majjhantika to Kāśmīra Gandhāra and the thera Mahadēva to Mahīshāmandala (Mysore). He deputed the thera Rakkhita to Vanavāsī (Banavāsī on the Sorah frontier), etc. These places would seem therefore to have been just beyond the limits of his territories. An inscription of the twelfth century as already stated describes Kuntala as a province governed by the Mauryas.

Asōkavardhana or Asōka
272-232 B.C.

The remarkable Edicts of Asōka engraved on rocks and pillars, are as is well known the earliest specimens of writing that have been found in India. With the exception of those at Manāghra and Shahbazgarhi in the Ynsufzai country in the extreme north west of the

His Edicts in Mysore and elsewhere.

Punjab, which are in the Baktrian-Pāli characters, (also called Arian-Pāli and Kharoshti) written from right to left, all the others are in the Indo-Pāli characters (properly the Brahmi lipi), written from left to right. But a singular circumstance about the Edicts found in Mysore is that although, as was to be expected, they are in the Indo-Pāli characters, the scribe who wrote them has, as noted by Buhler, introduced the Baktrian-Pāli at the end in describing his profession. This character appears in no other inscriptions throughout India, except those in Yusufzai first mentioned. The inference is that the scribe may have been an official transferred from the extreme north to the extreme south of the empire, which implies a freer inter-communication than has been generally supposed to exist at that period.

His early life

Asōka was governor of the north-west frontier province (capital Taxila) and of Ujjain, under his father, before he came to the throne. He reigned for forty-one years, from about 272 to 232 B.C., or thirty-seven if counted from his coronation-anointing which did not take place before the year 269 B.C. During those previous four years, he appears to have been engaged in struggles with his brothers, though according to Sir Vincent Smith the account of these struggles as told in Ceylonese monkish chronicles is a much exaggerated one. That he was at first a Jain has been deduced (see Ed. Thomas, Jainism, or the Early Faith of Asōka) from his Edicts, and also from the statement by Akbar's minister, Abul Fazl, in the Ain-i-Akbari, that Asōka introduced Jainism into Kashmīr, which is confirmed by the Rāja-taranginī, the well-known Brāhmanical history of Kashmīr, recording that Asōka "brought in the Jina Sāsana". Others, however, consider that he followed the Brāhman creed. His grandson Dasaratha dedicated the Nāgarjunī caves to the Ājivikas, a sect of Jains, who may be regarded as the fore runners of the Digambaras while his grandson Samprati was certainly a Jain. At any rate he eventually embraced Buddhism and made it the State religion doing for that faith what the Emperor Constantine at a later period did for Christianity. In the 13th Rock Edict he informs us that his conversion was due to the remorse he felt on account of the slaughter and devastation which attended his conquest of Kalinga in 261 B.C. in the ninth year after his coronation. Hence forward he resolved to maintain peace and devote himself to religion. He thus gradually came to appoint officials (mahāmātras and others) to watch over morality and by teaching and persuasion alone to extend the knowledge of dhamma or moral duties. The slaughter of animals was to a great extent stopped, he had wells dug and avenues of trees planted along the roads, made arrangements for dispensing medical aid in all parts of the empire and taught that the attainment of future happiness was open to all classes and dependent not on the ministrations of priests but on personal right conduct and humanity.

The Edicts in Mysore (of which translations have been published by Dr. Bühler in Epigraphia Indica, III 140, by M. Senart in French, in the Journal Asiatique for 1892 and by Mr. Rice in Epigraphia Carnatica VI Chitaldrug District Molakalmuru 14, 21 and 34) are issued in the name of Devānam Piye (the beloved of the gods), a royal title of the Maurya kings and are addressed by the Prince (ayaputa) and mahāmātras in Tachchannugiri and Suvannagiri to the mahāmātras in Isila places which have not so far been satisfactorily identified. According to Mr. Rice Isila possibly represents Sidda in Siddapara near where the inscriptions have been found. Sir Vincent Smith apparently agrees with this view when he states that Isila was "probably represented by an ancient site near the places where the inscriptions exist." He also suggests that the royal commands were first received from Asōka by the Prince and the high officials at Suvarnagiri and then transmitted to the high officials at Isila. He understands that "Suvarnagiri was somewhere in the south, and that the Prince was Asōka's Viceroy of the Deccan—the fourth of the kind, the three others being stationed respectively at Taxila in the north-west, Tosali in the Kalinga country, in the East, and Ujjain in the western country including Mālwa, Gujarāt and Kathiawār." Sir John Fleet has suggested that Suvarnagiri should be identified with Songir at Old Rajgir in Magadha, and on that basis elaborates a theory that Asōka was living in retirement at that place. He writes —

Contents of the Mysore Edicts.

"Particular interest attaches to the Mysore versions, because the Brahmagiri text discloses the fact that it was framed on the anniversary of Asōka's abdication, and when he was living in religious retirement on the hill Suvarnagiri, still known as Songir, which was one of the hills surrounding the ancient city of Girivraja in Magadha" (J R A S 1905, 304 see also J R A S 1909, 981-1016)

Sir Vincent Smith can find no evidence that Asōka abdicated and he prefers to believe that Suvarnagiri was situated somewhere in one of the ancient goldfields. Maski, where an Asōka inscription was discovered in 1915, is situated in a country which "abounds in numerous gold workings," and was, as he adds, following Bruce Foote, an important settlement even in the later neolithic period. The contents of the Edicts found in Mysore run as follows —

"The Beloved of the gods (thus) commands —For more than two years and a half, when I was an upāsaka (or lay-disciple), I did not take much trouble. For one year (I took) immense trouble, the year that I went to the sangha (or assembly of clerics) I put forth great exertion. And in this time the men who were (considered) true in Jambudvīpa (were shown to be) false together with the gods. This indeed is the result of exertion. But this cannot be attained only by the great. For in any case even to the lowly, by effort high heaven (svarga) is possible and may be attained. To this end has this exhortation been delivered—Both humble and great should so exert themselves and the neighboring countries should know this and this exertion should be of long continuance. Then will this matter increase. It will increase greatly. It will increase to at least as much again. And this exhortation has been delivered by the ryāṭha 256

Thus says the Beloved of the gods—Obedience should be rendered to mother and father. So also regard for living creatures should be made firm. Truth should be spoken. These and the like virtues of the dhammas should be practised. So also the disciple should honour his teacher. And due respect should be paid to kindred. This is the ancient natural way. This also tends to long life and this should thus be done. Written by Pada the scribe.

The above will suffice to show the earnestness and high moral tone of these singular and interesting inscriptions so unlike any others met with in the country. As Sir Vincent Smith puts it, the words of his inscriptions are Asoka's own. No Secretary would have dared to put them in his master's mouth. The style is of the man and his character is deducible from them. 'The Edicts reveal Asoka as a man who sought to combine the piety of the monk with the wisdom of the king and to make India the kingdom of righteousness as he conceived it a theocracy without a God in which the Government should act the part of Providence, and guide the people in the right way. Every man he maintained must work out his own salvation, and eat the fruit of his deeds. The fruit of exertion is not to be obtained by the great man only because even the small man by exertion can win for himself much heavenly bliss and for this purpose was given the precept—Let small and great exert themselves. (Minor Rock Edict I). The Government could only point out the road, which each man must travel for himself. Reverence, compassion, truthfulness, and sympathy were the virtues which he inculcated—irreverence, cruelty, falsehood, and intolerance were the vices which he condemned. The preacher was no mere sermon-writer. He was a man of affairs, versed in the arts of peace and war, the capable ruler of an immense empire, a great man, and a great king." The whole tone indeed of the Edicts is, as Mr Rice remarks, both higher than and quite different from that of any other inscription found in India. Solicitude for the welfare here and hereafter of all his subjects, high and low, is manifest throughout, and is extended even beyond his boundaries in an all-embracing humanity. His concern for the latter was shown specifically by the despatch of missionaries to bordering lands. Among other places, it is of special interest to note that a thera named Mahādēva was, as already stated above, sent to Mahīsa-mandala, the country round Mysore—which appears in the Tamil poems of Māmūlanār (2nd century A D) and inscriptions as Erumanādu or the Buffalo country and must have been even at that period a place of some importance—and another named Rakkhita to Vanavāsī (modern Banavāsī), on the north-west of the State. The sentence in the Edicts above quoted about the men who were regarded as gods in Jambudvīpa or India is considered to refer to the Brāhmanas, and to their being now deprived of the almost divine prestige they had arrogated. At the same time, the duty of reverence to them and the bestowal of alms both upon Brāhmanas and Sramanas is more than once inculcated. Toleration seems to have been denied only to their priestly claims.

It may be noted here that Asōka never calls himself by that name in his inscriptions, but always Piyadāsī or Devānam Piye, except in the single minor Rock Edict at Maskī, 45 miles north-west from Siddapura and situated in the present Nizam's Dominions, whose opening words are Devānampiyasa Asoka confirming Princes' & famous equation of Asoka with Devānampiyasa. Further details about Asoka's rule including his pilgrimage of Buddhist holy places, his buildings, his inscriptions, his inculcation of the Dhamma (Sanskrit Dharma) or the Law of Duty, his precepts and personal practice, his official propaganda of same through official censors, his missions to distant countries and to border kingdoms and tribes with a view to making Buddhism from a local into a world religion cannot be gone into here but may be read in Sir Vincent Smith's work already referred to.

Who the immediate successor of Asoka was it is not definitely known. It has been suggested that the kingdom was probably divided among his grandsons, his son Tisra, known to us from the Queen's Edict having pre-deceased him. Of these, Dosarattha, identified with Kāsala of the Vāyu Purāṇa is a reality being known to us from the brief dedicatory verses on the walls of the cave-dwellings at the Nāgārjunī Hills which he bestowed on the Ājivikas. He probably succeeded to the Mauryan throne itself, directly to his grand father Samprati, son of Kunāla the blinded son of Asoka is also a reality as his name appears in both Buddhist and Jain traditions. He probably succeeded Asoka in the Western Province, as many Jain temples—he is described as an avowed Jain—in that region are ascribed to him. Jaluka a son of Asoka figures in Kashmir tradition, but he has been described as "essentially legendary" no independent combination of the tradition having so far been discovered. Kunāla, the blinded son, is also claimed as the founder of the Khotan royal family. Sir Vincent Smith remarks that this story is merely a mythological explanation of the fact that the ancient civilization of Khotan was derived from India. What became of the Deccan

Successors of Asoka.

Provinces and who succeeded to it is not known even to tradition. Probably they fell away from the imperial rule, and as in the case of the Āndhras, grew into independent kingdoms. According to the Purānas, the whole duration of the Maurya dynasty was 137 years. If this period be accepted, as suggested by Sir Vincent Smith, and reckoned from the accession of Chandragupta in 322 B C., the dynasty must have come to an end in 185 B C., which date seems approximately correct. Four princes of varying names, who according to the Purānic lists, succeeded Asōka's grandsons and reigned for brief periods of time, are no more than mere names, except Salisuka, who is independently known to us from the well-known historical passage in Gārgī Samhitā. As Sir Vincent Smith writes —

“The only certainty is that the great Empire founded by Chandragupta, and gloriously maintained by his son and grandson, did not long survive the latter. The fall of the Maurya authority probably was due in large measure to a reaction promoted by the Brāhmins, whose privileged position must have been seriously affected by the extreme favour which Asōka showed to the Buddhist monks.”

Break up of the Maurya
Empire

• The prohibition of sacrifices and the irritating proceedings of the censors must have, it is suggested, produced much unrecorded discontent, so that when the mighty rulers retired, the old influences re-asserted themselves and produced a revolt against his system. Pandit Haraprasāda Sastri compares the case of king Palaka of Ujjain in the ancient drama, the Toy-Cart. The Sunga, Kānwa and Sātavāhana dynasties which succeeded one after another the Mauryas were, it should be noted, all Brāhmanic in their creed and persuasion. So also was the Cheta dynasty of Orissa. Even the royal title of Devānamprya came to be equated, as explained by Kātyāyana in the Vārtikas to Pāṇini, with mūrkhā, a fool. “This,” as Mr Rice remarks, “was a very characteristic retaliation if so meant and the use of the word thus authorised has come down even to the present time and is common I am told at all events among the Brāhmanas. The satirical verses on Aśoka from the Bhūja Prabhandā quoted by Mr Rice also indicate later Brāhmanical feeling in the matter (see F C V Introduction 30-31). The descendants of Aśoka whose names are recorded in the Purāṇas probably retained possession of only Magadha and the neighbouring home provinces. In or about 185 B.C. the last prince of the Maurya dynasty, named Brihadratha was slain by his commander Pushyamitra (or Pushpamitra) who established a new dynasty known as that of the Sungas.

The Sungas according to the Purāṇas reigned for 112 years. Pushyamitra the first king had to face two invasions (165 B.C. and 161 B.C.) from Khāravela king of the Kaluṅgas and Menander the Bactrian king of Kabul and the Punjab (155-153 B.C.). The latter he beat off but in the second war with the former he suffered defeat which ended in the plunder of his capital. Pushyamitra revived after victories over neighbouring kings the horse sacrifice which testifies to the growth of the Brāhmanical reaction during his reign. The story of his persecution of the Buddhists seems highly exaggerated. He was succeeded by his son Agnimitra who figures in Kālidāsa's Valaṅkīlāgnimitra (i.e. the story of Malavika and Agnimitra) which belongs to about the 5th century A.D. Agnimitra bore rule at Vidisa identified with Bhilsa in Central India which apparently formed the southern part of his father's dominions. He was succeeded by Vasujyesta, probably a brother, who in his turn was succeeded by Vasumitra son of Agnimitra. Then followed four other kings about whom little is known. The ninth king Bhāgavata, is known by an inscription on the stump of a garuda pillar at Besnagar 'where he

THE SUNGA
DYNASTY 155
B.C. TO 73
B.C.

had been crowned twelve years" He is said to have reigned for thirty-two years. He was succeeded by Devabhūti, a dissolute prince, who was, at the instance of his minister Vasudēva, killed by a daughter of his slave-woman, disguised as his queen. Vasudēva, the minister, founded a dynasty of his own known as the Kānva dynasty. They are also known as Sungabhṛityas or servants of the Sungas.

KĀNVA
DYNASTY,
Circa 73-28
B C

Vasudēva, the founder of the dynasty, was succeeded by three of his descendants, of whom nothing is known. They ruled in all only forty-five years. The last of them, Susarman, was slain about 28 B C, by a king of the Āndhra or Sātavāhana dynasty, which, at that time, possessed vast dominions stretching across the table-land of the Deccan from sea to sea.

ĀNDHRA,
SĀTAVĀ-HANA OR ĀNDHRA
BHRITYA
DYNASTY

The name of the Āndhra king who killed Susarman, the last Kānva king, is not definitely known, though the Purāṇas, which (wrongly) treat the whole Āndhra dynasty as following the Kānva, identify the slayer of the last Kānva with Simukha or Sipiaka, the first of the Āndhra line. As Simukha is described as a servant of the Āndhras, he is mentioned in the Purāṇas as the founder of the line of Āndhrabhṛityas. Apparently he had displaced some unknown king who ruled over the Āndhra kingdom previous to him. The Āndhras are an extremely ancient nation, being mentioned in the Āitarēya Brāhmaṇa vii 18, which dates prior to 500 B C. Rapson thinks, from a consideration of the Purāṇic lists, that Simukha must have commenced his rule about 200 B C, a deduction which is confirmed by Bühler's referring the Nāsik inscription assigning the second king Kṛishna to the 2nd century B C. Working back from the accession of the twenty-third king Gautamiputra Sātakarni, which must be dated in 106 A D or a few years later, the maximum readings of the Purāṇas according to Rapson would indicate Circa 244 B C and the minimum readings Circa 202 B C as the date of Simukha's succession. Seeing that the last Kāṇva king was slain about 28 B C by an Āndhra king the latter has been identified by Sir Vincent Smith to be one or other of the three Āndhra kings numbered 11, 12 or 13 in the list given below taken from Mr F E Pargitor's work Dynasties of the Kāṇva Age with notes based on Professor Rapson and Sir Vincent Smith —

- (1) Sisuka Sindhuka or Sipraka (= Simukha of the Nāgabhāṭi inscriptions inscribed in script of about 200 B C) ..

Reigned 23 years

- (2) Krishna his brother (= Kanha of Nāgabhāṭi record)

Reigned 10 years

- (3) Sātākarni or Mallakarni, son of Krishna (= Sri Sātākarni identified with the Sātākarni mentioned in Khāravāḍa's inscription and in one of the Nāgabhāṭi epigraphs. He was defied by Khāravāḍa, king of Kalinga who sent an army against him. He is described as Lord of the West)

Reigned 10 years.

- (4) Purnōtsanga 18 years

- (5) Skandastambī 18 years

- (6) Sātākarni 20 years.

- (7) Lambōdara 18 years

- (8) Āpīlaka 12 years.

- (9) Meghasvātī 18 years

- (10) Svātī 18 years

- (11) Skandavātī 7 years

- (12) Mrigēndra Svātīkarna 3 years

- (13) Kuntala Svātīkarna 8 years

- (14) Svātīkarna 1 year

- (15) Pulumāyī (I) 26 years

- (16) Arishtakarna 25 years.

- (17) Hāla 8 years.

- (18) Mantalaka 8 years

- (19) Purikaśna 21 years

Accession Circa A.D. 59

- (20) Sundara Sātākarni Reigned 1 year A.D. 80

- (21) Chakora Sātākarni 1 year A.D. 81

The bow and arrow coins of Vāsishatīputra Viśvāyarkura (I) have been assigned to one of these kings, but may belong to a different line

- (22) Sivaśvātī, 28 years, A.D. 81 Identified with Rāja Sri Sivamahā Saka of Amarāvati inscription. The bow and arrow coins of Mahariputra Bhojalāra have been assigned to this king but may belong to a different line

- (23) Oantamiputra 21 years. A.D. 100. Identified with the king of the name mentioned in the Nāśik inscriptions of the

- 24th year of his reign He struck coins of Nahapāna with the legend Rāja Gautamīputra Śrī Sātakarni
- (24) Pulōma (vi II), son of Gantamīputra, above, 28 years A D 123 of the Kanheri, Nāsik and Amarāvati inscriptions Also called Rāja Vāsishṭīputra Śrī Pulomāyī, sometimes Svāmi Śrī
- (24a) Sātakarni, 29 years Mentioned in one recension of Vāyu Purāna only
- (25) Śiva Śrī Pulōma [vi III] 7 years A D 156 The Eastern coins of Rāja Vāsishṭīputra Śiva Śrī Sātakarni belong to him
- (26) Śiva Skandha Sātakarni 13 years A D 163 Mentioned in Banavāsī inscription, with prince Sata or Śiva Shandānga Śrī (See below)
- (27) Yagnasrī Sātakarnika, 29 years A D 166 Mentioned in Kanheri and Nāsik inscriptions, Rāja Gautamīputra Svāmi Śrī Yagna Sātakarni Aryaka is substituted for Svāmi in an inscription at China in the Krishna District To year 27. Numerous types of coins, with legend Rāja Gautamīputra Śrī Yagna Sātakarni, or parts of that legend are known
- (28) Vijaya, 6 years A D 195
- (29) Chandasrī (Chandra) Sātakarni, 10 years A D 201 Mentioned in an inscription at Kodavolu (Gōdāvari District) Raja Vāsishṭīputra Svāmi Śrī Chanda (Chandra) Sata Eastern coins bearing the legend Rāja Vāsishṭīputra Śrī Chandra Satī or simply Śrī Chandra Satī have been assigned to him
- (30) Pulomāvi (IV) 7 years A.D 211.
- These thirty kings are stated to have ruled during a period of 460 years

We learn from Megasthenes that the Āndhras, during the time of Chandragupta (300 B C.), occupied the deltas of Gōdāvari and Krishna, and possessed a strong army second only to that of Chandragupta. Their territory included thirty walled towns and many villages. Their capital was Śrīkākulam, on the lower course of the Krishna Its site has been, at present, cut away by the river. In Asōka's Edicts (256 B.C.—Rock Edict XII) they are mentioned as semi-independent, if not wholly so, and as professing the Buddhist religion. On the disruption of the Maurya Empire (240 B C), they were among the first to make inroads on its territories. Under Simukha apparently, they so rapidly extended their sway that in the reign of his successor Krishna, the Nāsik, near the source of the Gōdāvari, was included in Śāatir territories. Though Khāravēla (171 B.C.) sent an army against Śrī Sātakarni the third king, it did not apparently check their progress. Of Śrī Sātakarni's successors nothing is known until we come to the 11th and the 13th kings in the list above given one of whom probably overthrew the last Kāva king and thus assumed the imperial sway that once belonged to the Maurya Emperors. With the seventeenth king Haia is associated, either as author or as patron, the Prakrit work Saptasataka (or Seren Centuries of erotic verses) which has been independently assigned to the 1st century A.D. Frequent conflicts between the Satakarni kings and foreign tribes settled on the confines of their territories subordinated to the Indo-Parthian or Kushān kings of the N.W., are referred to. One of these tribes was the Kshaharatas who about the first century A.D. occupied a large extent of territory extending from southern Rajputana as far northward as Ajmer and Pushkar to the Nāsik and Poona districts in the Western Ghats and including the peninsula of Saurashtra or Kathiawar. The Āndhra king Rājā Gantamīputra Śrī Sātakarni succeeded about 110 A.D. in extirpating the Kshaharatas and annexing their dominions. He coined in the currency issued by the vanquished princes during many years and so issued it by stamping on it in a crude fashion his own insignia. He proved himself a patron of the Brahman religion, whose usages he re-established. But he was a highly tolerant prince for his donations to the Buddhists were equally large. Sir Vincent Smith notes the curious fact that although the Āndhra Kings officially professed the Brahman religion most of their recorded donations were made to Buddhist institutions. Gantamīputra was succeeded about 128 A.D. by Vāsīṣṭīputra Śrī Pulmāyi, who married the daughter of the then Kshaharata king Rādrādāman I grandson of the Mahākshatrpa Chashtana (Tiastanes of Ptolemy), whose coins in silver and copper inscribed with Greek Brāhmi and Kharoṣṭī legends are found in Gujarat and who has been assigned to a period somewhere between 80 to 110 A D. Despite this relationship, Rudradāman twice warred against his son-in-law and wrested back the lost territories. These reconquests should have been completed, at the latest, before 150 A D, when he recorded a list of the countries under his rule. Yagna Śrī, 27th in the list, probably renewed the struggle with the Kshatrapas and recovered some at least of the territories reconquered by Rudradāman I. His rare silver coins, showing an imitation of the Kshatrapa coinage, were probably intended for circulation in the re-conquered western districts. His numerous and varied, but rude, bronze and leaden coins, which formed the currency of his eastern provinces, confirm the testimony of inscriptions that he had a long reign. A few bearing the figure of a ship have been referred to his reign by Sir Vincent Smith, who suggests that Yagna Śrī's power was not confined to the land. Of his three immediate successors, with whom the dynasty came to an end about 225 A D, little is known, except that a few leaden coins bearing Chandīa Śrī's name are known. The causes which contributed to the downfall of the Āndhras, who had retained power for over four centuries, are not yet known. Yagna Śrī was probably the last to control the whole of the Āndhra Empire, including both the Mahārāshtra and Āndhra dēśas.

Their connection with Mysore, Circa 1st-2nd
century A D

The Āndhras under their alternative name of Sāta-vāhanas are closely connected with Mysore. Their rule in the northern parts of the State is proved both by inscriptions and coins. The Prākṛit inscription on the Malavalli Pillar (E C VII, Shimoga, Shikaripur 263) records a grant by Hāritiputta-Sātakaiani, of the Mānavyagōtra and Vinhu Kaddachutu family, king of Vajayanti, that is Banavāsī, engraved in cave characters. He commands the Mahāvallabham rajjukam that the village Sahaldēati has been given for the enjoyment of the Mattapatti (that is Malavalli) god as a Brāhman endowment to Kondamana a Haritiṣputta of the Kodinva gotra. It is dated in the second fortnight of the hot season the first day of the first year. There is in Banavāsī also an inscription (I A XIV 333) of apparently the same king, dated in the twelfth regnal year in the seventh fortnight of winter the first day. In this the Mahārāja's daughter the Mahabhīṣi Sivakhada Nāgarī (Sivakhanda Nāgarī) makes the grant of a nāga (the cobra in the middle of the slab on the margin of which the inscription is engraved) a tank and a śikhāra. According to Rapson Sivakhada Nāgarī denotes the name of the Prince associated with the queen in the donation. From an inscription at Kanheri his name is inferred to be Nāgaśulanikā. The Haritiṣputra Sātākarni mentioned in the Malavalli and Banavāsī inscriptions was apparently closely connected with the reigning Āndhra king of the time and probably his viceroy in the ancient Kuntala province of Nanda and Maurya times. Alternatively they may represent a branch of the Sāta-vāhanas of Pāṭan the ancient Pratistāna on the Gōdāvarī, in the Anrangabad district of H. E. H. the Nizam's Dominions which was their western capital their eastern capital in later historical times being Dhanyakataka Dharanikōṭa or Amarāvati on the Krishna in the Guntur District where according to an inscription found in the Jaggayasvīta Stupa of the time of Puruṣa Datta son of Mādharī was another branch of the Sātākarnis claiming descent from the Ikshaku i.e. Ikshvaku family (4 S I No 8 page 36). Again in the Tālgunda pillar inscription (E C VII Shimoga Shikarpur 176) Sātākarni is mentioned as one of the great Kings who had worshipped in the temple there. As to coins the evidence derived from them is summarised in the chapter on Numismatics (See Chapter IV ante). At Chandravalli, an ancient city which was situated immediately to the north-west of Chitaldrug, ancient pottery and lead coins have been frequently found with legends on them connecting them with the Sātakaṇiṣ. Three of the coins found in 1888, belong to Mahāīāthī, the legend on them being Sadakana Kalalāya Mahārathīsa, i e , Sātakarna-Kalalāya-Mahārathī. One of the coins in the Bangalore Museum is of the Mahārathī and the other of Mudānanda referred to below. In 1908, the finds included four large lead coins, one of the Mahārathī, two of king Mudānanda, and one of king Chūtakudānanda. The Mahārathī coin has on the obverse, the legend Mahārathīsa Sadakana Kalayasa round a humped bull, standing to left with a crescent over the hump and on the reverse a tree within a chartya to right surmounted with a crescent. The Mudānanda coin has on the obverse a chartya and round it the legend Rāno Mudānamdasa, and on the reverse a tree within railing in the centre flanked by two symbols to right and left. The obverse on the third coin is the same except that the legend reads Rāno Mulānamdasa, with la for da and the reverse is made up of a tree within railing to left and the Nandipada symbol to right. On the fourth coin, the obverse has a chartya and round it the legend Rāno Chūtukudānamdasa, while the reverse is made up simply of a tree within railing. A Roman silver coin, a denarius of the time of the Emperor Augustus, was also dug near where the abovementioned coins were found. With the Mahārathī coin, was also found a clay seal, bearing the figure of an elephant and what looks like a soldier (sentīy) with a weapon standing facing it. Some letters on its back, said to be in Brāhmī and running round an ornamental ring, have not been deciphered. The Mahārathī mentioned in the first coin above was, it has been suggested, a viceroy of the Āndhras stationed at Chandravallī, whose site is now marked by Chitaldrug, while Mudānanda and Chūtukudānanda were it is said, Āndhrabhṛityas or "feudatories of the Āndhras who subsequently became independent. This is a use of the term 'Āndhrabhṛityas' which is not in consonance with the Purāṇic usage and is likely to cause confusion. It is possible that Modānanda and Chutukudānanda were local kings recognised as such by the Āndhra viceroy represented by the Mahārathi. This is in accordance with later practice in the Chālukya, Kālachūrya and other periods when local rulers were re-appointed under the imperial viceroy as local rulers of their territories. The Chūtukudānanda mentioned in the Chandravalli coin may be taken as connected with the Chutukudānandas mentioned in the Banavāsī (I A XIV, 931) and Malavalli (EC VII, Shikarpur 263) inscriptions. That these viceroys and kings professed the Buddhist religion there can be no doubt: their coins attest to the fact. The discovery of a denarius of the Emperor Augustus may indicate that the date of the Mahārathi and the Kānas mentioned in the coins may not be far removed from the 1st or the 2nd century A D.

A peculiarity of the kings of this dynasty is that the names of their mothers always appear with their own. Thus we have Gautamī Sātakarni, Vāsishṭīputra Pulamāyi, and in Mysore Hārīṭīputra Sātakarni. This seems a relic of the ancient Kshatriya custom due to polygamy. The actual names of the mothers are not given but they are called as suggested by Dr Bühler (see Cunningham's Stūpa of Bhārhut 129) by the gōtra of their family priest. Sir Walter Elliot long ago pointed out that the two branches of the Gōdāvarī which form the delta are still named after the two great queens—the northern is the Gautamī and the southern the Vāsishṭī (Coins of Southern India 21). The dynastic name Sātavahana is itself preserved in the term Sālavāhana with which has been long connected the well known era which commenced in 78 A D. This era, it is now agreed, was almost certainly founded by Kanishka, the great Kushāna king of Taxilla. For many centuries this era was called the Saka-Kāla or Saka-nripa-Kāla—the time of the Sakas or of the Saka kings. But eventually the word Saka came to be misunderstood as itself meaning era, and to distinguish it, was then called the Sālvāhana-saka. Mr. Rice has drawn attention to a reminiscence of its origin in Shikarpur 281 (E.C. VII, Shimoga i) of 1368 A D., which is dated in the Sātavāhana-saka, instead of the Sālvāhana-saka. The latter, he thinks, came into decided use with the foundation of the Vijayanagar Empire. We find the Mysore State spoken of in 1717 in Chikmagalur 109 (E.C. VI, Kadur) as in the Sālvāhana country, which is probably meant for the Sātavāhana country.

Relics of Sātavāhana
Era

End of the Andhra
dynasty

Professor Rapson thinks that "the end of the Āndhra dominion in India is most clearly to be traced in the Province of which Banavāsī was the capital." The two inscriptions on the Malavalli pillar show, according to him, "the transference of the Province from the Chūtu dynasty to the Kadambas, soon after, probably immediately after, the reign of Śivaskandavarman." He assigns no precise date to this transference but adds, "it probably took place at some time in the first half of the 3rd century A D," an opinion which is fully in agreement with Mr Rice's Mysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions, 24. Dr Shama Sastri, however, arguing that the initial point of the Gupta era commenced at 200-201 A D., places the transference of the power to the Kadambas immediately after Vishnu-Kūda-dūtukulānanda Sātakarni, about 180 A.D.

THE
KADAMBA

In the early centuries of the Christian era, we find the Kadambas occupying the north-west of Mysore, where they succeeded the Satavāhanas the Mahavalis or Bānas and Pallavas occupying the east and the Gangas the centre and the south partially ousting the Mahavalis. The Kadambas undoubtedly succeeded the Satavāhanas in the north west of Mysore. While they were thus in possession of the north west part of the north was under the rule of the Rashtrakūtas or Rattas. The Kadambas continued to be independent rulers from the 3rd to the 6th century A.D. Their dominions embraced all the west of Mysore together with Haiga (N. Kanara) and Tulava (S. Kanara). Their original capital was Banavāsi (Jayantipura or Vijayantipura) situated on the river Varada on the western frontier of the Sorab Taluk. It is an ancient city mentioned as one of the places to which a Buddhist mission was sent in the 3rd century B.C. It is also mentioned by Ptolemy in the 2nd century B.C. In later times Banavasi or Banavāse as it is often spelt, was a Twelve Thousand Province corresponding more or less with the present Shimoga District.

The origin of the Kadambas is mixed up with various legendary stories. Some years after Parasu Rāma had recovered Haiga and Tulava from the sea. Shiva and Parvati came to the Sahyādri mountains the Western Ghats in order to look at this new country and in consequence of their pastimes a boy was born under a Kadamba tree whence came the name of the dynasty. According to another version, he was born from the drops of sweat which flowed from Shiva's forehead to the root of the Kadamba tree in consequence of his exertion in conquering the asura Tripura. A more realistic account given in an inscription is, that a Kadamba tree grew in front of the family residence and that by cultivation of it they acquired its name and qualities. In any case, they appear to have been an indigenous race. The tree

Legendary tales about
their origin

itself is said to have been produced by a drop of nectar which fell upon the earth from the churning stick, the Mandara mountain, at the churning of the ocean. The tall and handsome trees bearing this name are species of nauclea, of the natural order cinchoniacæ, and grow in many parts of India. A spirit is said to be distilled from the flowers (See Wilson's Vishnu Purāna, Bk v, Ch. XXV.) In Watt's Dictionary the tree is described as an anthocephalus, belonging to the rubiacæ, and the flowers are said to be sacred to Siva. According to the Pharmacographia Indica, it is the arbor generationis of the Mahratta Kunbis, and a branch of it is brought into the house at the time of their marriage ceremonies.

The people of the country, being at the time without a monarch, had recourse to the State elephant, which being turned loose carrying a wreath, presented it to the youth whose birth was so miraculous, and he was consequently proclaimed king. He is variously styled Jayanta, Trilōchana Kadamba, and Trinētra Kadamba. The royal line thus founded in about the second century continued independent till the sixth century and during this period they claim to have performed many asvamēdhas or horse sacrifices, indications of supreme authority. Their family deity was Madhukēśvara of Banavāsī.

After Trinētra, the kings in regular succession ascribed to this line were Madhukēśvara, Mallinātha and Chandravarma. The last had two sons, named Chandravarma or Chandavarma and Purandara, the elder of whom was the father of Mayūravarma. Of these early kings, it is not improbable that the first Chandravarma may be the Chandrahāsa, whose romantic story has already been given above. The second Chandravarma, again, may be the prince of that name who was the progenitor of the Kodaga or Coorg race. Of him it is related that he rescued from a forest fire a serpent named Manjista, which entering his mouth took up its abode in his stomach. He was forced to wander about with his wife Pushpurati, in search of a cure, which was eventually effected at Vulabhi by a woman whom he was obliged in return to marry and desert his wife then with child. She was it would appear the attendant at the chatram in which he lodged, and advised him to worship the goddess Kalika and the effigy of a serpent curved on a stone at the back of her temple. On his doing so another serpent appeared out of an ant-hill, and tried to persuade Munjista to come forth but without success. The woman, overhearing the dispute between the two speedily possessed herself of certain plants they had threatened to use against each other, vishamardi and sarpamari growing at the foot of an ant hill and ahindra hara a creeper spreading over the ascattha tree. Munjista was expelled and died by virtue of the juice of the former and the other serpent was got rid of by that of the latter. The truth probably is that his kingdom was usurped by some Nāga chief such as we know were special enemies of the Kadembas (see Ind Ant XIV 13). According to the Cauvery Purāna Chundravarma was a son of Siddhārtha, king of Matsya (Virāta's capital Hangal in Dharwar one of the Kadamba chief cities). He left his country, it is said, and went on a pilgrimage to all the holy bathing places, until Pārvatī appeared and offered him a boon, in consequence of which he received a kingdom at the source of the Cauvery, and a Sudra wife from whom he as a Kshatriya, should beget a valiant race called Ugras. For the eleven sons he had by her the hundred daughters of the king of Vidarbha (Berar) by Sudra mothers were obtained as wives. Each of these bore more than a hundred sons who to provide accommodation for their growing numbers levelled the hill slopes and settled over a district five yūjanas in extent at the sources of the Cauvery river in Coorg.

Mayūravarma seems to have restored the authority of the Kadambas, and is sometimes represented as the founder of the line. He was the son of whom Chandravarma's wife was delivered at Valabhī after she had been deserted. The following is the legend of the manner in which he acquired the throne.—

One night some robbers got into the house of a Brāhman at Valabhī, and at the same time a peacock in the yard screamed. They then overheard the Brāhman laughing and telling his wife the story of the peacock. He said that a Brāhman of Banavāsī once performed various penances with the view of becoming a king, but a voice from heaven informed him that he was destined to be born again as a peacock, and whoever should eat the head of the peacock would be king. On this, he went to Benares to die, and was re-born as the peacock now in the yard. Hearing this the robbers made off with the peacock, but immediately fell disputing as to who should have the head. To decide the matter they resolved to ask the woman staying in the chatram to cook the bird for them, and see to whom she gave the head. But while she was getting the meal ready, her little son suddenly snatched up the head and ate it. Being thus clearly indicated as heir to the throne, the robbers conveyed him and his mother to Banavāsī, and had just arrived at the outskirts of the town when they met the State elephant carrying a wreath which it at once presented to the boy. His origin being revealed, he was forthwith recognized as king of Banavāsī, under the name of Mayūravarma, from mayūra, peacock. He there obtained "the sword of sharpness, the shoes of swiftness, and the garment of invisibility." He is said to have rescued Sasiprabhe, the wife of Rāja Vallabha, prince of Kalyāna, from a Yaksha named Kandarpa Bhūshana, living in Gōmanta-guhe, who had carried her off. He received in consequence a large accession of territory together with the Kalyāna princess Sasānkamudie in marriage.

He is also stated to have introduced Brāhman colonists from Abichchatra (in Rohilkhand), and distributed the country below the Ghats into sixty-four portions, which he bestowed upon them. In the reign of his son Kshatraraina Chandrāṅgada or Trinētra these Brāhmanas attempted to leave the province but they were brought back and in order to prevent a repetition of the attempt were compelled to leave unshorn a lock of hair on the forehead as a distinguishing mark. From these are descended the Haiga or Havika Brāhmanas of the north west of Mysore. They would appear on this occasion to have been settled by Mukanna that is Trinētra, above the Ghats at Sthānagundur modern Tālgunda in Shikarpur Taluk (see F C VII Shimoga, Shikarpur 186). During his reign a kinsman named Chandrasena ruled the south of Tulava and the Brāhmanas were spread into those parts. Lūkāditya or Lūkādīpya the son of Chandrasena married Kanakavati the sister of Trinētra and had by her a daughter whom Hubasiga the king of the mountain Chandālas, sought as a wife for his son. In pretended compliance he was invited to Tripura and there treacherously murdered. The authority of the Kadambas was extended in consequence above those Ghats, and the Brāhmanas followed this accession of territory. Lūkādīpya is said to have reigned fifty years.

These traditions no doubt include much that is entitled to credit. But a fine stone inscription at Tālgunda (EC VII Shimoga Shikarpur 176) gives a different version which seems to refer to the same period, or to a time when the Pallavas were supreme from west to east. It gives a realistic account of the family, beginning with Mayurasarma. In it we are informed that a Brāhman named Mayurasarma of the Kadamba family who are described as very devout Brāhmanas, went with his guru Virasarma to the Pallava capital (Kānchi) to study. While there, a sharp quarrel arose between him and the Pallavas, and he became so enraged that he resolved, although a Brāhman, to become a Kshatriya in order to revenge

The story of their origin as told in the Tālgunda Pillar Inscription

himself Arming himself and overcoming the Pallava guards at the frontier, he escaped to the inaccessible forests at Sripārvata (in Kuinool district, near the junction of the Tungabhadra and Krishna rivers), and there attained such power that he levied tribute from the Brihad Bāna and other surrounding kings. The Pallavas thereupon led an army against him, but he swooped down upon them like a hawk in night attacks and completely defeated them. They therefore resolved to make peace with him, and invested him with a territory extending from the Amāra ocean to the borders of the Premāra country. Perhaps the Pramāra kingdom of Mālwa in Central India is here meant. Amāārṇava, the other limit, is difficult to determine, unless it means the Western Ocean. His son was Kangavarma, whose son was Bhagīratha, sole ruler of the Kadamba territories. His son was Raghupārthiva, whose brother was Bhagīratha or Kākustha or Kākusthavarma. The latter was a powerful ruler, and his daughters were given in marriage to the Gupta and other kings. He had a reservoir made for the temple of Pranavēśvara at Tālgunda, now in ruin, at which Sātakarni (i.e., Sātavāhana) and other great kings had worshipped. His son was Sāntivarma, who wore three crowns and in whose reign the Tālgunda inscription was composed and engraved. This interesting record states that Mayūrasarma was anointed to the throne by Shadānana after meditating on Sēnāpathi and the Mothers. In like manner other early grants describe the Kadambas as purified by meditation on Swāmi Mahāsēna and the group of the Mothers. Shadānana, Sēnāpathi and Swāmi Mahāsēna refer to the War-God, Kārtikēya, son of Siva. The Seven Mothers, Saptamātrika, were his services (see Chapter V ante on Sculpture and Painting). The Kadambas are also said, in this record, to be the lords of Vaijayanti (i.e., Banavāsī) of the Mānavyagōtra, Hārītīputras, and Pratikṛita-svādhyāya charchāparaś This unusual and difficult phrase has been rendered by Dr. Keilhorn 'studying the requital (of good or evil) as their sacred text' and he adds 'If this interpretation be correct, I cannot help thinking that the epithet alludes to the history of the Kadambas as told in the Talgond inscription. So long as the Kadambas were private Brāhmins, it was one of their chief duties to study the sacred texts: in other words, they were Srādhyāya-charchāparaś. When they had become kings, it was an equally sacred duty for them to requite good and evil: to do so was what the study of the Vēda had been to them before: and thus having been Srādhyāya charchāparaś they then were Pratīkritasrādhyāya charchāparaś (E I VI 17)

These Kadamba grants are dated only by the ancient system of seasons or in regnal years running from 2 to 11 and accordingly furnish no definite dates for the kings mentioned in them. One of them however issued when Kākasthavarma was Yuvaraja, is ascribed to the eightieth year of Kadamba's victory which until recently has not been satisfactorily explained (I A VI 23). Certain allusions, however, occur which serve as a guide to the Kadamba period. It is known, for instance, from inscriptions that the Chālukya king Kirtivarma who reigned from 566 to 597 A.D. subdued the Kadambas (E I VI, 8). Their independence must therefore have been before this. On the Melavalli pillar a Kadamba grant immediately follows one of Satakarni, who when he made his, was in possession of Banavāsī (E C VII, Shimoga, Shikarpor 284). The Talgunda pillar (ibid Shikarpor 176), again, names Satakarni as one of the great kings who worshipped at the temple here. Between the time of the fall of the Sātavāhanas, the beginning of the 3rd century A.D., and that of the reign of the Chālukya king Kirtivarma the latter part of the sixth century,

Period of Kadamba
Grants.

the period seems thus marked out as that of Kadamba independence. During this period, they claim to have performed many horse sacrifices, which indicates that they exercised supreme power in the land. This inference is confirmed by other considerations as well. The statement that Kākustha gave his daughters in marriage to the Gupta and other kings, refers, in the opinion of Mr. Rice, first to Samudragupta, the only one who is known to have made an expedition to the South, as recorded in the Allahabad pillar inscription. This took place, according to him, in the latter half of the 4th century A.D. The Ganga king Tadangāla Mādhava, who, we learn from Shikarpur 52 (E.C. VII, Shimoga District) reigned about 357 A.D., is said to have married a sister of the Kadamba king Krishnavarma and a daughter of Kākustha. Her son was crowned while yet a child on his mother's lap in 430, which brings us to the end of the 4th century, the time of Kākustha. Besides this, the rare metre employed in the main part of the Tālgunda inscription is one that has been found, Mr. Rice adds, only in a few documents of the 4th or 5th century A.D. Accordingly he sets down the victory in the eightieth year of Kadamba to the events which enabled Mayūrasarman to gain his throne "which would thus be at the beginning of the fourth century." If he had predecessors, he adds, going back four or five generations, "the rise of the Kadambas may safely be placed early in the third century, the time at which the Satavāhana power came to an end." Dr. Shama Sastri, however, arguing that the Bhattabānas of Jinashā's Haravansa are identical with the Brihadbānas of the Tālgunda inscription and suggesting that the Gupta king Sri Gupta and the Kadamba king Mayūrasarman succeeded or gained victories over the Brihadbānas about the same time fixes the initial date of the Guptas at 200-201 A.D. and states that this was the date of the Kadambas' victory over the Brihadbānas. If this date prove acceptable, the date of Kākusthavarmā's grant (Halsi grant—I A VI 22) to his general Srutakīrti should be fixed at 282 A D — 60 years after the Kadambas' victory. At about that time the Guptā king was Chandragupta II with whom Kākustha should have set up a marriage alliance. Dr. Shama Sastri adds that the Sātākarni of the Banavāsi inscription, which he fixes at 180 (interpreting lascuatyā Samcacehara as meaning Varshadvisata i.e. one hundred and two years and not merely twelve years as attempted to be done by Bühler) was a contemporary of Mayuravarman and that he is the Sātākarni who is mentioned as having worshipped god Bhava in the Siddhālaya at Tālgunda. He further suggests that palaeographically, there is justification for pushing back the dates of the Tālgunda and Malavalli inscriptions, whose characters are almost similar to those of the Nānāghāt and Nāsik inscriptions of the Āndhras to the middle of the third and the close of the second century A D.

Kākusthavarmā thus ruled about Circa 282 A D. He married a daughter of Kaikeya who intermarried with the Ikshvākus identified by Mr. Rice with the Gangas who claimed to be descended from Ikshvāku. During his time the kingdom seems to have been divided between his sons Sāntivarman and Krishnavarman I. His son Krishnavarman I was ruler of Dakṣiṇapatha or the South. He was, according to the old Anājī inscription (EC VI, Chitaldrug District Davangere 161) defeated by Nānakkasa Pallava Rāja and that prince Sivānandavarman, whose country was ruined thereby, retired in consequence from the world and gave himself up to a life of penance. Sivānanda was probably son of Krishnavarman I governor under his father in the Eastern part of the kingdom. His older brother was Vishnuvarman. The other son of Kākustha Sāntivarman is said to have ruled over the entire Kārnāṭa region. His son Mrīgēsa varma is described as a destroying fire to the Pallavas (J.A. VI, 24), while his son Ravivarma, by Prabhāvatī of the Kaikeya family, uprooted, it is stated, Chanda-danda, the lord of Kānchi, presumably a Pallava king. Mandhātrivarma was probably a grandson of Sāntivarma, his father being Kumāravarma (M.A.R. 1911). Ravivarma's son was Harivarma. The Sāngli plates of this king are dated in a year equivalent either to 526 A.D. or 515 A.D. According to Sir Vincent Smith, the latter is the more probable date, as Harivarma came to the throne in 538. Copper-plates mentioning him and Krishnavarma II of the collateral line have been discovered in North Kanara (Report A.C.W.C. 1918). These are probably the last kings of the original Kadamba line which was displaced by the Chālukyas about the middle of the 6th century.

There is still a great deal of doubt attaching to the rule of Kadamba kings. Their succession, period of rule and the extent of the territories ruled by them from time to time are all yet shrouded in mystery. Mr. Rice has constructed a genealogical table of these kings based on a study of the inscriptions relating to them. This being brought up-to-date yields the following list of kings, some of whose positions require confirmation —

Mulachana (also called Trinātra, or Trilochana)

M. Bhutavarma

Mallinatha

Chandavarma I

Chandavarma II (another son being Pandavarma)

Mayuravarma, afterwards Mayāvarma

Mayavarma

Mayavarma

Mayavarma (the last of the line according to Rice)

(the last of the line according to Smith)

Santivarman ruler of Karnaṭa and Krishnavarman I ruler of Dakṣiṇapatha.

Santivarman a son Nrigavarman

Ravivarman (son of Nrigavarman)

Harivarman (538 A.D.) son of Ravivarman

Krishnavarman a son Vishnunarman

Simhavarman (son of Vishnunarman)

Krishnavarman II (son of Simhavarman)

Davavarman (son of Krishnavarman)

From their inscriptions we learn that though the proper capital of the Kadambas was always Banavāsī, there were apparently other royal seats—at Palatikā (Halsi in the modern Belgaum District) at Uchchangī (near Molakalmuru in the Chitaldrug District) and at Tripurvata (not yet identified). They appear to have controlled a good deal of the North Western Deccan and Northern Mysore from these different seats. The royal insignia of the dynasty until the 6th century and later were the lion crest and the monkey flag and a musical instrument named permatṭi. The kings were styled Dharmamahārājādhirāja and their family god was Jayanti Madhukeshvara of Banavāsī. Many of their grants are to Jains but a few are to Brahmans, even to an Atharvāni Brahman. Their coinage was in gold, resembling in fabric and execution those of the Western Chālukyas. Their Padmatankas, so called from the lotus which occupies the centre of the coin, have been referred by Sir Walter Elliot to the flourishing period of their independence in the 5th and 6th century A.D. Rapson, however, thinks that they should be attributed to a considerably later period. The form of the Sanskrit letters which are found on them certainly supports this view (See below).

After their overthrow by the Chālukyas, the Kadambas do not entirely disappear from history. From the 7th

Later history
7th to 14th century

century onwards names of Kadamba rulers occur but they are not, however, prominent owing probably to the fact that they were subordinate rulers under the Chālukyas. From the end of the 10th century, they again emerge as rulers of various provinces.

This was a period of general subversion of old dynasties in the South. The Rāshtrakūtas were brought to an end, and the Western Chālukyas regained ascendancy. The Pallavas and Eastern Chālukyas were subdued by the Chōlas, who also overthrew the Ganga sovereignty in Mysore. The Hoysalas were there rising to power, and the Nolambas, who were Pallavas, having subjected the Mahāvalis or Bānas, whom the Chōlas finally absorbed, were forming the Nolambavādi province of Mysore. Following upon this period of general commotion and transition, we find the Kadambas ruling Bayal-nād (the Wynaad) from the tenth to the twelfth century, Manjarabad in the eleventh century, Hangal (in Dharwar) and Goa from the tenth to the thirteenth century, Lunke (near Molakalmuru) in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, Nāgarakhanda (the Shikarpur Taluk) in the twelfth century, and the Banavāsī Twelve Thousand (the Shimoga District) from the tenth to the fourteenth century.

The Kadambas, indeed, do not altogether disappear from history till the rise of the Vijayanagar dynasty in the later (14th) century. Mr. Rice suggests that the founders of that empire may have been connected with them. Actually the last Kadamba inscription is Sagar 32 (P. C. VIII, Shimoga District), dated in 1307.

An inscription in box-headed characters on the right jamb of the doorway of Prantavara temple at Tālgundi, is dated about the middle of the 5th century A.D., and mentions a prince of the Blataruvara as a feudatory of the Kadambas. The prince, called Kālustha, born of a Kadamba princess, was at Chōman, it is said, in the

... because he was born through the century onwards names of Kadamba rulers are not met with south as Pasupati, because he was born through the favour of Pasupati (Siva) and by reason of his gifts and prowess in battle. He was chief among the ten mandalīkas, had control over the customs duties and was leader among the wise and pleased his master (the king) not only by his modesty but also by the addition he made to the royal treasury. He was liberal in his endowment to Brahmans at their numerous sacrifices. Among his charities was the provision of funds sufficient for the feeding of thirty Brahmans in the holy city of Tālgunda, (M.A.R. 1910-1911 Para 70)

The Kadamba kings were probably the first to strike a type of gold coinage known as padma tankas so called from the lotus which occupies the centre of the coin. They bear a curious cup-shape. Their coinage was copied by the Western Chālukyas. Sir Walter Elliot attributes these padma tankas to the flourishing period of Kadamba independence but it seems probable that like the coins of the Western Chālukyas they should be attributed to a considerably later period. The form of the Sanskrit letters which are found on them certainly supports this view (Rapson Indian Coins 88).

Kadamba
Coinage

The gold coins of two of the later Kadamba chiefs of Goa Vishnu Chittadēva (circa 1137) and Jayakēsin III (circa 1187), are also known. These bear the special Kadamba symbol the lion passant on the obverse and a Nāgarī legend on the reverse. One interesting inscription of the latter runs as follows —

The brave Jayakēśidēva, the destroyer of the Mālavas who obtained boons from the holy Saptakōṭīsa (i.e. Siva)

The Mahāvalī kings were of great antiquity and according to their inscriptions ruled over a seven and a half lakh country containing 12 000 villages situated in the west of the Āndhra-mandala, or Telugu country

BRĪHAD-BĀNĀS OR MAHĀVALĪ

This seems to have been known as the Vadugavalli Twelve Thousand (S.I.I. iii. 90), in Sanskrit the Āndhrāt-pathah (E I iii 76). They were in possession of the east of Mysore, where several of their inscriptions are found, especially in Mulbagal Taluk, and their kingdom was evidently to the east and north of the Palar river. They claim to be descended from Bali or Mahā Bali, and his son Bāna, whence they are also styled the Bāna kings. According to Hindu mythology, Bali was an Asura emperor, who through his devotion and penance defeated Indra, humbled the gods and extended his authority over the three worlds. In order to restrain him, Vishnu who was appealed to by the gods for protection, assumed his fifth incarnation, the form of the Brahman dwarf, the vāmana avatāra, and appearing before Bali, asked for only three paces of ground as a boon, which was granted. As the water conveying the gift fell into his hand, the dwarf's form expanded till it filled the world, and Vishnu, now manifesting himself, deprived Bali, in two strides, of heaven and earth, but on account of the virtues the latter possessed, left Pātāla or the infernal regions still in his dominion.

The ancient ruined city of Mahābalipur or Māmalla-pura, generally known as the Seven Pagodas, situated on the east coast, thirty miles south of Madras, was perhaps their original capital. According to legend (see Captain Carr's Seven Pagodas 13; Asiatic Researches, I, 156) it was founded by Bali. His son was Bānāsura, who is represented as a giant with a thousand hands; Aniruddha, the son (or grandson) of Krishna, came to Bāna's court in disguise and seduced his daughter, which produced a war in the course of which Aniruddha was taken prisoner and brought to Mahābalipur, upon which Krishna came in person from his capital Dvāraka and laid siege to the place. Siva guarded the gates and fought for Bānāsura who worshipped him with his thousand hands, but Krishna found means to overthrow Siva, and having taken the city, cut off Bānāsura's hands except two with which he obliged him to do homage. He continued in subjection to Krishna till his death after which a long period ensued in which no mention is anywhere made of this place. It seems to have been subsequently destroyed by an inundation of the sea. The inscriptions now found there appear to be all Pallava, of about the seventh century or Chōla, of a later date than that (Hultzsch S.I.I., I : 11).

The oldest Mahāvālī inscription bearing a date is one professing to be of 339 A.D., found by Mr. Rice at Mudivanūr in the present Mulbagal taluk (EO X Kolar District, Srinivasapur 5 and 6 also see I.A. \ 80). But from the one which contains the fullest genealogy of the line published by the Rev. T. Fonlkes (I.A. XIII, 6 E.I., III, 74) there were several generations before that. Many inscriptions were later found in the Kolar District while some further details were contributed by inscriptions at Tiruvallam, north of Vellore in the North Arcot District (S.I.I. iii 88) a place described as Vānapuram (Bānapuram), situated in Perumbānappādi, the great Bāna country or country of the great Bāna (or Brihad Bāna). The Mudivanūr inscriptions supply only three dates—338, 909 and 961 A.D. Those at Tiruvallam add one 888 A.D., but do not specify the name of the Bāna kings of the time. As aids towards fixing the period of the kings, we have the statements that the early Kadamba outlaw of Śrīparvata levied tribute from the great Bāna—that the first Ganga king assigned to the second century conquered the Bāna country—that the Chōlukya king Vikramāditya I ruling in the seventh century subdued Rājamalla of the Mahāmalla family, that the Chōla king Vīra Nārāyaṇa uprooted the Bānas about the end of the ninth century but that they were replaced soon after by the Gangas in the person of Hastimalla (see I.A. XIII, 6, 187).

The genealogy as derived from inscriptions is as follows —

Bali, Mahābali, his son
Bāna, in whose line was born Bānādhirāja

After he and many other Bāna kings had passed away, there were —

Nandivarma, Jayanandivarma Vijayāditya I
Malladēva Nandivarma, Jagadēkamalla, Vadhuvalabha, 338 A D.

After him, others followed, and then

Jaya-Nandivarma
Vijayāditya
Malladēva Jagadēkamalla .
Bāna Vidyādhaia, Vikramāditya Jayamēru, married Kundavvai, daughter of Prithu-vīpati I, son of the Ganga king Sivamāra I Prabhumēru
Vikramāditya I, ? 888 A D.
Vijayāditya II, 909 A D Vikramāditya II, Vijayabāhu, the friend of Krishna Rāja (? Rāshtrakūta king, 884-
913 A D)

After him, there reigned other kings and then came—

Sāmbayya, 961 A D , ruling under the Pallava
king Iriva-Nōlamba or Dīlpa (963-966 A D).

The Bānas appear to have ruled from about the beginning of the Christian era to the first half of the 10th century A.D. The first Nandivarma is said to have promoted the fortunes of the family and obtained the crown and the throne amid the blessings of the Brahmins. He was possessed of mighty elephants and other forces, which secured him against conquest by the most powerful kings. The Chōla king Killi-Valavan, who is said to have reigned from about 105 to 120 A D, married the princess Sithathakani, claiming descent from Mahābali apparently a Bāna king in the Mysore country. The first Ganga king Hongunivarman who has been assigned to the 2nd century A D, is said to have been consecrated to conquer the Bāna country (S I I 11 187). In another inscription (E C I N, Doddaballapur 67) he is said to be a wild fire in consuming the stubble of the forest Bāna. Apparently the Bānas lost ground about this time. Mayurasarman the progenitor of the Kadambas at about the same time—if Dr. Bhama Sastri's suggestion is correct, the date of this incident would be about 200-201 A.D.—is said to have loved tribute from the Brihad Bāna king, among others. Malladeva Nandivarman is likened to a sun in waking up the lotus lake of the Bāna family, and in compassion for all living things in the three worlds was it would appear, like Bōdhisatva or Buddha. Little or nothing is known of the fortunes of the dynasty from the 4th to the middle of the 8th century, from when we again have some references to them.

Thus an inscription at Khāji Hosahalli, Hoskote Taluk records a grant by a Vinayādityasarasar, whom it describes as ruling over the Kori Knudālko 300. This inscription has been assigned by Mr. Narasimhaiah on palaeographical grounds, to about 700 A D. He suggests that the Vinayāditya mentioned may have been a feudatory of the Chālukya king Vinayāditya (680-696 A D), son of Vikramāditya I of the same dynasty, who is said to have conquered a Bāna king (see I A VI, 75 and M A R 1919 para 74). About the middle of the 8th century, during the reign of the Ganga king Śrīpurusha, we have mention of his invading Nekkundi a place within the territories of the Mahāvāli Bānārman apparently a Bāna king (E C X Kolar 200 and Bowringpet 18). This is confirmed by a virakal found at Nekkundi in Chintamani taluk, which commemorates a gift to a fallen hero on the part of the Bāna king (M A.R. 1916-1917, Para 86) Under the Gangas, in 776, the Nirgunda Yuvarāja, Dundu, is said to have put the Bāna family to confusion (E C IV, Mysore District, Nagamangala 85). The Ganga king Nītimāṅga, in about 850 A D, is said to have captured Bānavasa's Mahārājana-nād, situated mostly in the modern Cuddapah District (E.C. X, Kolar District, Mulbagal 228)

In the Chikballapur plates of the Ganga king Jayatēja, of about 810 A.D., there is mention made of a Bāna Vidyādhara; also of his son Dodda-narādhīpa by his queen Ratnāvalī. His other wife Kundavvi was the daughter of Prithivīpati (S I.I. III, 98). According to the Udayēndīram plates, his son was Prabhumēru (E.I. III, 74) Prabhumēru is referred to in E C X, Srīnivasapur 5 and 6 and Chintamani 107. In the absence of the explicit statement that he was Kundavvi's son, Mr. Narasimhachar suggests the identification of Prabhumēru with the Bānarasa Dodda-narādhīpa of the Chikballapur plates. In the Nandi plates of the Rāshtrakūta king Gōvinda III (A D. 806), Dadda's mother, Ratnāvalī, is called Mānikabbe (Mānikya and Ratna being synonymous). The Siva temple at Nandi is described as hers, which in the Chikballapur plates is mentioned as having been built by her. This shows that the Siva temple at Nandi was in existence before 806 A D., though it might have come into existence only a few years before that date. Her father's name is given as Indapparasa, probably identical with India, the brother of the Rāshtrakūta king Gōvinda III and the founder of the Gujarāt branch. We have also a reference to a Mahābalī-Bānarāja named Srīparāma, at whose request Gōvinda III made a grant in 806 A D, for the Siva temple built by Ratnāvalī. Mr. Narasimhachar identifies this Bāna king with Bāna-Vidyādhara, the consort of Ratnāvalī (M A.R. 1913-1914, Paras 61, 69 and 72). A record at Būdīkōte (E C. X, Boweringpet 86) refers to a Banarasa who was the ruler of the Ganga six thousand and to a conflict between him and the Ganga king Rachamalla Permiānadi i.e. Rachamalla I who began to rule in 817 A.D. (M.A.R. 1916 1917, Para 86)

The Nolamba king Mahēndra (Circa 878), is termed Mahābali Jala vidhramsanam or destroyer of the Mahābali family, (E.I.V. 85). The Chola king Vira Nāravana or Parāntaka claims in 921 A.D. to have uprooted by force two Bāna kings, and conferred the title of Bānādhirāja on the Ganga prince Prithivipati II great grandson of Sivamāra I. Though they claimed to be the allies of Krishnā Rāja no doubt the Rāshtrakuta king of the same name (881-911 A.D.) the Bānas seem to have lost their independence in the first half of the 10th century. Hence we find Sambayya, in 961 A.D. ruling a district under the Pallava king Irivi Nolamba or Dillipa. Also we find an inscription at Podili Nellore District dated in 968-969 A.D., of the Bāna king Aggaparaja termed illustrious and described as the lord of Nodagiri and the supreme lord of Parigipora. (Inscriptions in the Nellore District III 1201-1202). Parigipora appears to be another form of Parivipuri and Padavipuri in which form the name occurs in other Bāna inscriptions. It has been identified with the modern Padavidu south of Nellore in the North Arcot District, where there are extensive ruins the ancient city having been destroyed apparently by a volcanic eruption. According to the Podili and other inscriptions their crest was the recumbent bull Nandi, their banner was a black buck and they were heralded in public by the Paisāchi pataha a drum given by a paisācha or demon (E.I.V. 162). Aggaparaja was like Irivi Nolamba apparently a local Bāna chief, who bore rule in the Nellore District after the fall of the dynasty in the first half of the 10th century.

The Bānas appear to have later recovered their lost power When this recovery actually occurred is not capable of being established to a certainty. The Bāna kingdom is mentioned along with others in Southern India in the twelfth century in Vaidyanātha's Pratāpa Rudrīya. Trivikrama Dēva, the author of the Prākṛit Grammar Trivikrama Vritti, of probably the 15th century, claims to be a descendant of the Bāna family. (I.A. XIII, 13). Inscriptions at Srīvilhuputtur, in the Tinnevely District, show that two kings, named Sundara Tol and Muttarasa Tirumala, who obtained possession of the Pāndya throne in 1453 and 1476, call themselves Mahāvali Vānadhīrāja (ibid XV. 173). Their dates indicate they should have been mere local chiefs

VAIDUMBAS.

Inscriptions of Vaidumba kings are met with in Bowringpet, Bagepalli, Mulbagal and Chintamani Taluks of the Kolar District. Fragmentary vīnakals referring to valorous warriors of this dynasty, assigned to about 900 A D, have been found in the second of these taluks. (M.A.R. 1921, Para 59) These kings seem to have been connected with Tumba, in the North Arcot District. In about 900 A D a Vaidumba-mahārāja described as Ganda Trinētra, was ruling, with Kirudore or little river as his boundary. What particular river is meant to be indicated by the term "Kirudore," (lit little river) is not clear (see E.C. I, Bagepalli 62 and Srīnivasapur 85). The Chōla king Parāntaka I (907 A D) subdued the Vaidumbas. About the middle of the 10th century, the Nolamba king Dilīpa also called Irīva Nolamba, had according to certain inscriptions (E.C. X, Bowringpet 4 and Kolar 198) conquered the Vaidumba king Vikramāditya Tuvayya (951 A.D). Vikramāditya (E.C. X, Chintamani 49) restored the breached tank of Vijayādityamangala or Bētamangala. His son was Chandrasēkhara (E.C. X, Mulbagal 198). The Kalinga Ganga king Kāmavarma VI had for his queen Vinaya-Mahādēvi, a Vaidumba princess, who became the mother of Vajrabasti V, crowned in 1039 A D. In an inscription dated in 1007 A D, the Chōla king Virarājāditya I claims to have cut among other royal heads, that of the then Vaidumba king. It is possible that the Vaidumbas were finally subdued by him about this time. After this we have a succession of Vaidumba Gamundas who received the title and permission to use the insignia together with the grant of a village in Melaimārājapādi or Western Mshārājavādi.

The Pallavas were a powerful dynasty who succeeded to the dominions of the Āndrabhritya or Sātavāhana family throughout the region in which the Telugu language prevails. They seem at first to have had a chief city at Vātāpi (Budāni in Bijapur District), from which they were expelled by the Chālnkya in the fifth century, and also at Vēngi between the Krishna and the Godavari which was taken from them by the Chālokyas in the seventh century. But from an early part of their history their capital was Kāncī (Conjeveram near Madras). Their grants were also issued from Palakkada, Dasanapura, Mūnmatra, Chendalur, Pikkā and other places, which were all situated in the Telugu country between the Northern Pennār and the Krishna. Palakkada may be the Palakka of the Samudragupta inscription at Allahabad. Trichinopoly seems to be the southern most point in which Pallava inscriptions have been found. Stone inscriptions in the Kolar, Chitaldrug, Tumkur and Bangalere Districts bear evidence to the fact that the Pallavas in the ninth and tenth centuries exercised dominion throughout the north and east of Mysore. Here they frequently had the cognomen Nalamba, and their territory came to be known as Nelambavādi or Nonambavādi, a Thirty two Thousand province, the subjects of which are represented by the Nonabas of the present day.

PALLAVAS.

Their origin

The origin of the Pallavas is uncertain, though they profess in some grants to be of the Bhāradvāja gōtra. They are mentioned in the Purānas along with the Haihayas, Sakas, Yavanas etc, as Pahlavas, which would imply a Persian source. In the Mahābhārata (Sānti-parva, 64), Harivamsa (XIV, verses 15 to 19), Manu and the Vishnu Purāna, the Pallavas, appear in the lists of tribes on the frontiers of the Indus. These allusions would suggest that they were either foreigners or closely connected with them. The late Rai Bahadur V Venkayya has pointed out that the word Pallava in Sanskrit means a sprout and that the dynasty with which it is concerned claims to be so called, because the progenitor, who is said to have been the son of the Mahābhārata hero Asvatthāman by a celestial nymph, was laid on a litter of sprouts soon after he was born. This is the derivation furnished in two inscriptions, where the name, instead of being applied to the tribe is given to the first king. In the Mahābhārata, as well as in the Purānas, the name is applied to the tribe and not to an individual. This fanciful derivation, however, is not supported by other inscriptions, which suggest a foreign origin to the dynasty. Thus the Āndhra king Gōtamiputia claims to have defeated, about 130 A D, Pahlavas along with the Sakas and Yavanas. In the Junagadh inscription of the Kshatrapa king Rudradāman, belonging to about 150 A D, mention is made of a Pahlava minister of his, named Suvishka. The form Pahlava, which appears in the earliest records suggests a foreign origin, connecting the dynasty with the Persians. But that Pahlava and Pallava denote two different peoples is, as pointed out by Dr Krishnaswami Aiyangar, clear from Rājasēkhara's Bhuvanakōsa (about 10th century A D), in which he allots the Pahlavas to the Uttarapatha beyond Prithudaka or the great river, probably the Indus, and the Pallavas to the Dakshinapatha, lying beyond Mahishmati in the South Professor Weber says (Hist Ind I 188) — As the name of a people this word Pahlav became early foreign to the Persians learned reminiscences excepted in the Pahlav texts themselves for instance it does not occur The period when it passed over to the Indians, therefore would have to be fixed for about the second to the fourth century A.D. and we should have to understand by it not directly the Persians who are called Parasikas rather but specially Arsacidan Parthians. Pallava may possibly be derived from Pārthava (Parthian) The Parthians revolted from the Seleucids about B.C. 150 under a chief named Arsakes (Askh) who founded an independent monarchy The Parthians subsequently overran the provinces east of the Euphrates and about B.C. 130 overthrow the kingdom of Bactria so that their empire extended from the Euphrates to the Indus and from the Indian Ocean to the Paropamisus or even to the Oxus The memorable wars between the Parthians and the Romans eventually weakened the former and gave the Persians the opportunity of throwing off the Parthian yoke Led by Artaxerxes (Ardashir) they put an end to the Parthian kingdom of the Arsacids, after it had lasted 476 years and established the Persian dynasty of the Sassanids A.D. 226

In accordance with this theory of the foreign origin of Pallavas, it has been inferred that their movement from the west to Kānchi their capital, should have occupied a considerable time Sir Vincent Smith at one time assumed that it might have ended before 150 A.D. Mr Venkayya suggested that it was their defeat at the hands of the Āndhra king Gūtāmi-putra, that compelled them to seek their fortunes further south and beyond the Āndhra dominions From linguistic considerations derived from the earliest Pallava records,

Their southern movement.

Dr. Hultzsch has arrived at the conclusion that they could not be far removed in point of time from the Āndhra period. It is thus reasonable to suppose that the Pallavas took the place of the Āndhrias after the latter ceased to be the ruling power. Until more satisfactory evidence is forthcoming to definitely fix the date of the Pallava migration to the south, says Mr Venkayya, it may be assumed that they had become established in Conjeevaram about the end of the 3rd century A D

The Theory of their indigenous origin.

The theory of the Parthian origin of the Pallavas has, however, in recent years been nearly given up. It has been suggested that the Pallavas represent a dynasty of Chōla and Nāga origins, who, in historical times, were at first feudatories of the Sātavāhanas of the Deccan and subsequently succeeded them in a part of their territory. The first Pallava king, according to tradition enshrined in Tamil classical works, (Chilappathikāram, Manimēkhalai, Perumbānappadai) was the illegitimate son of Killivalavan, the Chōla king of Uaiyūr and a Nāga princess of Manipallavam, identified with the peninsula of Jaffna, which at about the time referred to (the third quarter of the 2nd century A D), was an island off the coast of Ceylon. It has been suggested that Jaffna has been known locally as Manipuram and Mani-Nāgadīpa, and that the Tamils of the mainland of India called it Mani-pallavam, the word, pallava, or sprout, being added in allusion, it is said, to the island, which to persons sailing from India to Ceylon would have looked very like a sprout or branch from the parent island. Attention in this connection has been drawn to the fact that the Pallava kings called themselves Pōt-rāyar, from the Tamil word pōttu, a synonym of pallavam. The later Pallavas adopted Sanskrit titles ending in ankūra, which also means a sprout. The illegitimate prince, called

Tondaimān Mantirāvan became it would appear, the first king of Tondaimandalam with his capital at Kānchi. His dynasty took it would appear, its name after the second part of the name Manipallaram the home of his Nāga mother. If this story of the origin of the Pallavas is to be credited it is a dynasty connected with the Chōlas of Uraiyur on the one side and with the Nāgas of Jaffna on the other. The first Pallava king was called Tondaimān because it is said, on his way from Manipallaram to the Chōla capital, he was ship wrecked and washed ashore on a Tondai creeper. Sir Vincent Smith suggests that the name probably indicates the name of the tribe or community. However this might be, there is no doubt that the term Tondaiyar is the name of the Pallavas in Tamil literature. In inscriptions of a later date (8th century A.D.) and in the writings of Tamil Vaishnava saints (e.g. Tirumangai Ālvār in his Periya Tirumoli) and poets (e.g. Nachchinārkkiniyar the great commentator), Pallava kings are termed Tondaiman, Tondaiyarkōn while the Pallava territory is termed Tundaka Vishaya or Tondakarāshtra. As Rai Bahadur V. Venkavya has cautioned it seems right in the absence of more satisfactory evidence, not to place too much reliance on this story of the Pallavas which connects them with the Chōlas and the Nāgas. 'It is he says 'doubtful if this story explains the origin of the Pallavas, or if it only shows how they got possession of Kānchipuram and the surrounding country at some stage of their history' (J.R.A.S. 1906-1907, page 220). In any case, seeing that the Pallavas are mentioned in the Mahābhārata, the Vishnu Purāṇa, Manu and other works, they will have to be treated as much older than the 2nd century A.D. to which the story above referred to would assign their rise as a dynasty. Since they are not mentioned in Asōka's inscriptions and as they are later than the Śātavāhanas, their rise may be set down approximately to about the 1st century A.D. It should be remembered that they were admittedly at first feudatories of the Sātavāhanas and after the decline of the latter, set up independent rule in a part of the territory of their old masters. The term Tondan, in Tamil, means a slave, which is suggestive, when we consider the position of the Pallavas—whose alternative name, as above stated, was Tondaiyar—bore to the Sātavāhanas. The Tondaiyars were at first the governors—probably of local origin—of the Sātavāhanas in their conquests as far south as Kānchi. Dr. Kṛishna-swami Iyengar has suggested that the Sātavāhana province in the south extended from Amarāvati on the Krishna to Kānchi on the Pālāi. The Tondaiyars—literally the servants or slaves of the Sātavāhanas—governed the province on behalf of their masters and later, after the fall of the Sātavāhanas, about the 3rd century A.D., succeeded in annexing a great part of the Chōla country as far as Pudukkōtai. Their territory came to be known subsequently, appropriately enough, as Tondaimanadalam or the province of the servants (of the Sātavāhanas), in contradistinction to the Chōlaman-dalam of the more ancient Chōlas. Tondaiyar in this sense would be the equivalent of the Sanskrit term Bhrītya, thus bringing the Tondaiyars as a section of the Āndhrabhrītyas. Sātavāhana and Pallava coinage show remarkable affinities which have been referred to by Rapson. Apparently the Pallava coinage was essentially based on the Āndhra model, both as to style and as to the use of the ship as a reverse type, testifying to the foreign trade for which the Pallavas were famous. Coins of this type have been traced on the Coromandel Coast (Elliot's Coins of Southern India, Plate II, 55-58), while genuine Sātavāhana coins, with the ship and the Ujjain symbol, indicating the Sātavāhana connection with that ancient city before its Saba conquest, found in about the same area show that this part of the country passed in the natural order of events from the Sātavāhanas to the Pallavas, who continued not only their coinage but also their traditions for conquest and trade. It seems thus fair to infer that the Pallavas were closely connected with, if they were not actually a dynasty of, the Sātavāhanas themselves. The people resident in their dominions called themselves, after their rulers, Palli the name by which the generality of the agricultural castes are still known in the Tamil districts of Madras Presidency as far south west as Bangalore in this State (Cf. Gangadikāras in the ancient Ganga dominions and Nonabas in the ancient Nolamba territories). That the Pallavas succeeded and were even closely connected with the Sātavāhanas is testified to by tradition as well (Vide Wilson, Mackenzie Collection I cxx cxliv)

Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sastri has thrown out the suggestion that the possibility of the Pallavas being a class that originated from an inter mingling of the Brāhmanas with the indigenous Dravidian tribes is not altogether precluded. This presumption, he says is confirmed partly by a curious statement made in the Rāyahōta copper plates that Asvatthāman the Brahman founder of the race married a Nāga woman and had by her a son called Skandasishya. Other copper plates which relate a similar story mention in the place of Skandasishya the eponymous king Pallava after whom the family came to be called Pallava. Hence it appears almost probable that the Pallavas, like the Kadambas of Banavāsi, the Nolambas of Mysore the Matsyas of Oddavādi (Oddādi in the Vizagapatam District) and other similar dynasties were the products of Brāhmana inter connections with the Dravidian races, as the stories related of their origin indicate. (E I XV 246) The Pallavas belonged thus to the class of Brahma Kshatriyas, i e ,

Theory of Brahma-Kshatriya
origin

a line of kings who were Brahman in origin and Kshatriya by dharma or profession

Dynasties of Pallava kings

Recent researches show that there were several dynasties of Pallava kings who bore rule in Southern India, either simultaneously or successively. Of these, four are definitely known from inscriptions, the first three of which seem to have ruled one after the other, with intervals of little over a century between them. Towards the close of the 9th century, the kingdom proper of the Pallavas, i.e., Tonda-mandalam, was conquered by the Chōlas of Tanjore. The continuity of Pallava rule during these different periods has not yet been clearly established. It may, however, be generally stated, that the kings of the first dynasty (of the Prākṛit charters) came quickly after the Āndhīa or Sātavāhana kings, but they were eventually thrown out of Kānchi. The second dynasty (of the Sanskrit charters) ruled from a capital other than Kānchi, their grants being dated variously from Palakkada, Dāsanapūra, Mēnmatūra, etc.—all unidentified places, probably situated somewhere to the north of Nellore. One of these kings, Kumāra-Vishnu I, retook Kānchi, evidently from the Chōlas who had been in possession of it since their last capture of it, sometime after Samudragupta's conquest of it. Then came the third dynasty, called the line of Simhavishnu. They were distinguished as the first builders of lithic monuments (chartyakāras—builders of chartyas or temples) in Southern India. They were the bitter enemies of the Western Chālukyas of Bādāmi, and distinguished themselves as the establishers of Pallava power in the heart of the Chōla country. These facts have been finally settled with the aid of the evidence derived from their own copper-plate grants, the copper-plate grants of their adversaries, the Western Chālukyas and from the many Pallava stone inscriptions which have been traced in Southern India and at Bādāmi the Chālukya capital. During the rule of the fourth dynasty tracing its descent from the usurper Nandivarman II Pallavamalla, descended from a collateral line the kingdom apparently fell to pieces owing partly to internal dissensions and partly to foreign invasions with the result that we find during this period a number of local chiefs with pretensions to sovereignty ruling in different parts of the kingdom.

Altogether these four dynasties ruled for nearly five centuries extending from about the 3rd to about the end of the 8th century A.D. The earliest of these is the one to which the kings mentioned in three well known Prākṛit copper plate charters belonged (see E I I 2, E I VI 84 and E I VIII, 48). These grants present to us the following succession list of kings —

(1) That mentioned in Prākṛit charters from about 3rd to 4th century A.D.

Bappa Dēva. He is said to have cleared the forest converted it into arable land and dug tanks and provided for irrigation.

His son Sivaskandavarman (or (?) Vijayaskanda Varman)

His son Yuvamahārāja Vijaya Buddhavarman husband of Chārudēvi. He made Kānohi his capital.

His son Buddhyaṅkura.

These copper plate charters prove that there was a time, even in Southern India, when the court language was Prākṛit. Sir Vincent Smith was inclined at one time to assign Sivaskandavarman of this dynasty to the middle of 2nd century A.D., the correctness of which date Rai Bahadur Venkayya doubted. Recently, however, Sir Vincent Smith has veered round to the view that the dynasty to which Sivaskandavarman belonged could not have originated earlier than 'the beginning of the third century'. According to Mr Venkayya, this dynasty belonged to a period long posterior to the rise of the Pallavas, "whenever that might have been" Its kings are described as belonging to the Bhāradvāja gōtra One of the grants was issued from Kānchi, the capital, while the order contained in it was addressed to the Provincial Governor of Dhanakāda, i.e., Amarāvati, in the modern Guntur District, and the village granted was situated in the Āndhra country (Āndhripathā). At this time, therefore, the Pallava dominion should, as Mr. Venkayya suggests, have included not only Tondaimandalam in which their capital Kānchi was situated, but also the Telugu country as far north as the Krishna river In another charter, Sivaskandavarman is said to have performed the Agnishtōma, Vājapēya and Asvamēdha sacrifices The last of these could, according to the Hindu religious code, have been undertaken by Sivaskandavarman only after conquering all his neighbours. That he ruled over an extensive territory is clear from the grant which is addressed to "lords of provinces, royal princes, generals, rulers of districts, custom-house officers, prefects of countries," and others. The king's father, we are told, had granted many crores of gold and one hundred thousand ox-ploughs The land granted by Sivaskandavarman was to be "free from taxes . . . from the taking of sweet and sour milk, from troubles about salt and sugar, from forced labour, from the taxing of oxen in succession, from the taking of grass and wood, from the taking of vegetables and flowers." It thus appears, as Mr. Venkayya remarks, unless specially exempted by the king, the villagers were liable to all these taxes and imposts The earlier grant threatens with corporal punishment those who transgress the terms of the royal order The system of administration of the time was apparently of an advanced type, partaking of the character of the one familiarised by Asōka and the Arthasāstra. This by itself should suffice to show that the early Pallavas were the successors of the Sātavāhanas in the south and followed them in their administrative system. This is not strange when we remember that in the Vēlurpālaiyam plates the Pallavas claim one Asoka-varman, identified by Dr Hultzsch with 'the ancient Maurya king Asoka' as their ancestor (S.I I II 302).

After Baddhāmkara of this dynasty, came probably Vishnugōpa who is mentioned in the Allahabad pillar inscription of Samudragupta. Rai Bahadur V Venkayya thinks this king was later than the dynasty mentioned in the Prakrit charters. Professor Dubreuil suggests that he was the immediate successor of Baddhāmkara the last of the line referred to in the Prakrit charters (Ancient History of the Deccan, 54). If the initial date for the Gupta era is, as suggested by Fleet and Smith taken to be 319-320 A.D., Samudragupta's date would be 350 A.D., but if Dr Shama Sastri's proposed initial year of 200 A.D. for the Gupta era is taken, his date would be 242 A.D. In the former case Vishnugōpa would have to be assigned to about the middle of the 4th century A.D. in which case he would come at the end of the king mentioned in the Prakrit charters. If Dr Shama Sastri's date is accepted then Vishnugōpa would have to be assigned to the middle of the 3rd century and thus would fall within a period anterior to the Pallava kings mentioned in the Prakrit charters. The other Pallava kings mentioned in the Allahabad pillar inscription, Hastivarman of Vōṅga and Ugrasūna of Palakka were probably ruling simultaneously with Vishnugōpa other parts of the old Sātavāhana Empire.

On this subject of the exact connection of this dynasty with the Andhras, whom they seem to have succeeded, Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sastri writes thus (E.I. XV 247-248) —

Connection of this dynasty with Andhras

What position these early Pallavas occupied under the Andhras and under what particular circumstances they rose into supreme power are questions which could not be answered at present, but must await future research. The earliest document of these early Pallavas is that of Siva-Skandavarman, issued while the latter was yet a crown-prince (yuvamahārāja). It is dated from his capital Conjeeveram and is addressed to his Viceroy at Dhannakada (Dhanyakataka, Dhananikōta, near Amarāvati) in Āndhrapatha, the Āndhra country. The next is a copper-plate record of the same king after his accession to the throne and the assumption of the title dharma-mahārājādhirāja, 'the righteous supreme king of great kings'. This was also issued from Conjeeveram. It refers to the grant of a village in Satabani-Rattha, a territorial division which is evidently to be located in the Bellary District. The mention of Satabani-Rattha in this record of about the 3rd century A D, and of Satavaghani-hara in an Āndhra record of the 2nd century A D, recently discovered by the Madras Epigraphist's office at Myakadoni in the Adoni talūka of the Bellary District, plainly indicates not only the possible identification of the two territorial divisions, but further suggests by inference the political succession of the Āndhras by the Pallavas of Kānchi (Conjeeveram). Still another record of this same early Pallava period is that of queen Chāru-dēvi, the wife of the yuvamahārāja Vijaya Buddhavarman and mother of Buddhyānkura. It comes from the Guntur District and is dated in the reign of Vijaya-Skandavarman, who was evidently the grandfather of prince Buddhyānkura and the ruling sovereign at the time of the grant. It is doubtful what relationship this Vijaya-Skandavarman bore to Siva-Skandavarman of the two records mentioned above. Anyhow, it is gathered from the three early Prākṛit records quoted above that the Pallavas of the Bhāradvāja gōtra were the political successors of the Āndhras, that they had their capital at Kānchi (Conjeeveram), and that their kingdom roughly included at that period the Tonda-mandalam and the Āndhra country right up to the river Krishna, including the Bellary District in the west. Another name might still be added to these early Pallavas, viz., that of Vishnugōpa of Kānchi, mentioned in the famous Allahabad posthumous pillar inscription of Samudragupta. This powerful Gupta king of about the middle of the 4th century A D is stated to have captured and then liberated among others the king Vishnugōpa of Kānchi.

It is not made clear in the Allahabad pillar inscription whether this subdued Vishnugōpa was a king of the Pallava dynasty or not. But as the name is quite popular with the later Pallava kings, and as we do not know of other kings of that name who ruled at Kānchi at this early period it may be presumed that the Vishnugōpa mentioned as a contemporary of Samudragupta was a Pallava. If so the question arises how this Vishnugōpa was connected with the kings Śiva Skandavarman and Vijaya Skandavarman already mentioned. Now inscriptions dated prior to the 4th century A.D. such as those of the Andhras, are always in Prākṛit and it is consequently not unreasonable to suppose that the Prākṛit charters of Śiva Skandavarman and Vijaya Skandavarman do actually belong at least to the beginning of the 4th century A.D. If not earlier Vishnugōpa, the contemporary of Samudragupta was perhaps therefore of a somewhat later period when already Prākṛit was beginning to be replaced by Sānskrit in the language of the documents. In a stone inscription at Vayalur not far from Sadras is given a long list of early Pallava names with however no apparently definite plan of supplying a regular genealogical succession. I have noted in detail the contents of this record at page 77 of the Madras Epigraphical Report for 1909 paragraph 17. The name Vishnugōpa is there mentioned thrice and it is not unlikely that one of these three perhaps the earliest of them is identical with Vishnugōpa the contemporary of Samudragupta, who was still ruling with his capital at Kānchi. From what follows it will be apparent that now i.e. about 350 A.D. the Pallavas—perhaps on account of the disturbances caused by the victorious campaign of Samudragupta from the north or owing to the rise of the Kadambas mentioned in the Talgunda inscription—were dispossessed of their territory round Kānchi and pushed back farther into the interior. Still another cause is to be found in the rise of the Chōlas under Karikala, who is stated in the unpublished Tiruvālangadu plates of Rājendra-Chōla I to have made Kānchi new with gold. The date of Karikala has been roughly fixed to be the 6th century A.D. But since after Vishnugōpa of Kānchi of the middle of the 4th century we do not know so far of any Pallava rulers of that town until the time of Kumāravishnu I a son of Skandasishya (Skandavarman II) who, according to the Velurpālayam plates (S I I., Vol II. P 502), re-captured Kānchi in about the 6th century, the possibility of Karikala or his immediate ancestors having taken possession of Kānchi in the period between the middle of the 4th century and the 6th becomes apparent "

(11) That mentioned in Sanskrit charters, 5th and 6th century A D

The next dynasty known is the one referred to in certain Sanskrit charters (E I. III 142 , VIII. 233 , and XV. 246 and I A V 50 See also S I I II Part v 504) Between it and the dynasty mentioned in the Prākṛit charters there is an unfilled gap of about a century Of this dynasty, the following succession list of kings has been worked out mainly on the authority of the writings of Rao Bahadur H Krishna Sastri (in S I I II. v 504-517) —

Kālabharti, descended from Asōkavarman, identified with the Maurya king Asōka This king (Kālabhartri) has been suggested to be the same as Kānagōpa, who is mentioned in the Kāsākudī plates, in the group of kings that ruled after Asōkavarman Kālabhartri has also been identified with Kumāravishnu, the first Pallava king mentioned in the Ōmgōdu grant (E I XV 250-251)

His son Chūtupallava, a name indicating connection with the Chūtukudānanda and Mudānanda of the lead coins of Chandravallī (Chitaldrug) This king, Chūtupallava, has been surmised to be the same as Skandavarman I, mentioned in the Uruvupallī grant In that case, the term Chūtupallava is only a surname of Skandavarman I In the Ōmgōdu grant he is described as having acquired the kingdom by his own prowess

His son Virakūrcha, identified with Virakōrchavarman mentioned in an odd Pallava grant published by Dr Hultzsch (E I I 397), and Viravarman of the Pikira, Māngadūr, Uruvapallī and Chendalūr plates, all of which belong practically to the same period, and in the Ōmgōdu grant of Skandavarman II, made in his 33rd year He is said to have married the daughter of a Nāga chief—the connection of the Pallavas with the Nāgas has been narrated above—and through her to have acquired the insignia of royalty The Ōmgōdu plates describe him as having been victorious in many battles and as having subdued the circle of kings

His son Skandasishya (Skandavarman II) perhaps identical with the Pallava king of that name who is referred to in one of the Tirukkarukunram Inscriptions as having made a gift to the temple of Molasthāna at that village (I I III 277). He is also called Vijaya Skandavarman and was the donor of the Ūmā Ju grant dated in the 33rd year of his reign from his royal camp at Tāmbraipaithāna an unidentified place in the north of the present Vellore District (I I XV 20). He is described in the Ūmā Ju plates as a king true to his word as one who made religious gifts of cows, gold and land who always desired to serve God and Brāhmanas and ably understood the purport of the Sūtras. He is said in the Velōrpalaiyam plates to have seized from Satyaśena the ghatika of the Brāhmanas. The king Satyaśena referred to has not been identified. The term ghatika has been variously interpreted—a place of assembly for Brāhmanas (Hill) a religious centre (Pathak) and a Brāhmapuri (hearth) The term occurs in the famous Talgunda Inscription where Mayasarma on going to the Pallava capital Kāंची for his studies is said to have frequented every ghatika (I C VII Shikarjūr 176) also in Sira 23 (I C XII Tumkur) where the Nambiyāra temple is described as the great ghatika sthāna of the City of Kāंची. In Shikarjūr 197 dated in 1182 A.D. ghatika sthānas are described as supports to dharma and mines for enjoyment (bhōja). In Chennarayana 178 dated in 1142 (I C Hassan V) contains the statement that a ghatika was established in a certain place "in accordance with the saying (or directions) of Uttara in the Sāmaveda." According to the Kāंची Inscription of Vikramāditya II Kāंची continued to be the seat of a ghatika in the beginning of the 8th century A.D. (I O III 369 note 4). Rao Bahadur II Krishna Sastry has suggested that the hill at Sholingpur in the present North Arcot District is known as Ghatikāchala perhaps on account of its having been the seat of a ghatika. If ghatika may be taken as the name for a seat of Brāhmanical learning the chief seat of such learning in the South would be Kāंची and its capture from king Satyaśena, would mean its dispossession by Skandasishya from its rightful ruler Satyaśena perhaps, belonged to the original dynasty which ruled over Kāंची and the surrounding country—called Satyaaputra in Minor Rock Edict II of Aśoka. The frontier State of Satyaaputra, grouped with the Southern kingdoms of Chōla, Pāndya and Kēralaputra, can only be looked for in the South. It cannot be Satyamangalam, in the present Coimbatore District, as suggested by Sir Vincent Smith (E H I 171, Note 3), for there is not the smallest tradition of a royal capital about the place or any remains of a historical or antiquarian character connecting it with any kingdom. The Satyamangalam province of Nāyak times was practically Coimbatore and the surrounding country and no more. Mr S V Venkatesvara's suggestion that Satyaputra might refer to Kānchi seems correct not only because it is mentioned with the other Southern States in Patanjali and that it is known even to this date among Brāhmins as Satyavrata-kshētra but also because if it, were not so meant there would be no reference in Asōka to so famous a Brāhmanical seat as Kānchi. The fact that in later times—until the 9th century or so—Kānchi was a Buddhist centre as well and the seat of a Royal family shows that the possibility of its being referred to under the name of Satyaputra in Asōka's edicts is not ruled out. The reference to king Satyasēna as ruling over Kānchi in the Vēlūrpālayam plates and its capture by Skandasishya indicates that in the 5th and 6th centuries A D, it was still the most important ghatika of the Brāhmins, as it is actually described. Skandasishya probably extended his conquests as far as the Krishna river, his sons Simhavarman and the Yuvamahārāja Vishnugōpa apparently taking part in the campaigns, as some of the grants are made by them in the conquered area. This reconquest of Kānchi by Skandasishya shows that Kānchi was not the capital of the Pallavas for some time during the interval between the periods covered by the Prākṛit and Sanskrit charters. Kānchi probably reverted to its original rulers represented by the family of Satyasēna during this period.

His son Kumāravishnu I, who is said to have captured—or rather re-captured—Kānchi, for either its fresh capture is a boast, for it had already been captured by his father Skandasishya from Satyasēna or it should have been temporarily lost to Satyasēna or his family and re-captured once again. From a reading of the Chendalūr, Vēlūrpālayam and the Vāyalūr pillar inscription of the time of Rājavarman, Mr Krishna Sastri tentatively suggests that Kumāravishnu I had two brothers Simhavarman I and Yuvamahārāja Vishnugūpa (or Vishnugōpa Varman). Simhavarman I probably ruled for a time before Kumāravishnu I. He may be the ruler Sunhavarman of Kanchei mentioned in copies of the Jaina author Simhasūtri's work Lōkaribhāga which state that the copying of that work was finished in the Sakavāhana era 380 which was the 22nd year of a Simhavarman's reign. He should, therefore have commenced to rule in Saka 359 i.e. 438 A.D. Dr Fleet and Mr Krishna Sastri have suggested that the Simhavarman of the Lōkaribhāga should be identified with Simhavarman II mentioned below and the suggestion seems fairly sustainable on the grounds mentioned by them.

Kumāravishnu was succeeded by his son Buddhavarman, who was a submarine fire to the ocean like army of the Chōlas. The Yuvamahārāja Vishnugūpa, who granted the Uruvupalli village in the 11th year of his brother Simhavarman's rule, probably never ascended the throne.

Buddhavarman was succeeded by his son Kumāravishnu II who is credited with the conquest of the Chōla country. Then came Simhavarman II son of the Yuvamahārāja Vishnugūpa. He was the donor of the Pīkura grant of his 5th year and the Uruvupalli grant of his 8th year and the Ōmgūdā grant of his 4th year, which is the earliest known so far. Yuvamahārāja Vishnugūpa varman's Mangadūr grant, is dated in the 10th year of Simhavarman's reign. He is said to have had a victorious reign. If the synchronism recorded by the Penugonda plates of the Western Ganga Kings Ayyavarman (Harivarman) and Mādhava (III) with the Pallava Kings Simhavarman and Skandavarman is interpreted with the aid of the date mentioned in the Lōkaribhāga the initial year of the reign of Simhavarman II would be 436 A D., which, in the opinion of Mr Krishna Sastri, "tallies with the palæographical indications, which place his inscriptions in about the 5th century of the Christian era" The statement in the Lōkavibhāṣa that Simhavarman II was the Lord of Kānchi is also an indirect confirmation of the fact that Kumāravishnu, the uncle of Simhavarman II, recaptured, as stated in the Vēlūrpalaiyam plates, the capital town of Conjeevaram, which the immediate predecessors of Kumāravishnu had evidently lost,—their grants being dated from Tāmbrapa, Mēnmatura, Palakkada and Dāsanapura, while their still earlier predecessors referred to Kānchi as their capital. Simhavarman II was followed by his son Vishnugōpa Varma Then came Skandavarman III and finally Nandivarman (see E C III. 142 and Madras Epigraphy Report for 1914, Para 82) Some at least of the kings of this dynasty professed the Buddhist faith, which was at the time in a flourishing state in Southern India Several of them issued their grants from places far beyond Kānchi, in fact, from a number of places situated in the Telugu country between the Northern Pennar and the Krishna rivers Among the places connected with them are Tāmbrapa, Chendalūr, Pikira, Māngadūr and Dāsana-pura and Mēnmatura The Ōmgōdu grant of Skandavarman II was made at Tambrapa, while he was encamped there Professor Dubrueil suggests that there were two dynasties of Pallavas during this period ruling simultaneously, one at Kānchi and another at Palakka. He adds that the Palakka dynasty later got possession of Kānchi, to which the later Pallavas claiming descent from Simhavarman and Simhavishnu, to be mentioned below, belonged There is, however, no evidence for this speculation, in fact, the uniform agreement disclosed in the succession lists of the grants above mentioned show that Kings belonged to the same family and that it was a single one

The next dynasty that we know of is the one mentioned in stone inscriptions. Between this and the one referred to in the Sanskrit grants there are two gaps which require to be made up. The genealogy of this dynasty has been reconstructed with the aid of the lists of succession furnished by the Kāśakudi Kuraim Udaverdiraim and Velurpālavam plates (see § 11 II Part V 506). The exact relationship which this dynasty bore to the preceding one is not known. The Velurpālavam plates say that after a list of kings including Vishnugopa (identified with Vishnugopa II of the Sanskrit grants) had passed away, was born Nandivarman who with the favour of (the god) Pinakapāni (Śiva) caused to dance a powerful snake whose poison was in (its) eyes (Droṣṭuḥ Iṣṭha). Apparently we have once again here the influence of the Nāgas so closely connected with the Pallavas in settling the succession. The Nāgas were it is clear compelled to aid Nandivarman in his attempts to gain the throne. But Nandivarman's descendants are not mentioned nor is there anything to show in what relation hip they stood to their successors the family of Simhavarman the father of Simhavishnu who conquered the Chōla country which was fertilised by the Cauvery river and from whom the dynasty mentioned in stone inscriptions claims descent. These stone inscriptions, which commence from this period are found engraved in the Pallava Grantha characters, a fact which suggests that with the conquest of Simhavishnu the Pallavas must have extended their dominion further south of Kāंची into the Chōla country and adopted the Dravidian language generally found mixed up with Sanskrit in the later stone inscriptions. The following is the succession list of this and the preceding dynasties combined —

Nandivarman I who came after Vishnugopa II but whose relationship to Vishnugopa is not known.

at That mentioned in this inscription is the 6th century A.D. 17

Then a gap, which remains to be cleared up

Then Simhavarman, his exact relationship to the family of Nandivarman being not known.

Simhavarman's son Simhavishnu, styled "the victorious" and described as one "whose prowess was widely known on earth" He is described in the Vēlūrpālayam plates as having "quickly seized the country of the Chōlas embellished by the daughter of Kavira (i.e., the river Kāvērī) whose ornaments are the forests of paddy (fields) and where (are found) brilliant groves of areca (palms) "

His son Mahēndravarman I

His son Narasimhavarman I, who took Vātāpi (Bādāmi)

His son Paramēśvaravarman I, his brother Mahēndravarman II perhaps having pre-deceased him (In this, the argument of Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sastri is followed See S I I II v 504-505) Paramēśvaravarman I defeated the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya I

His son Narasimhavarman II, who re-organized the ghatika of Brahmans and built the temple of Kailāsanātha at Kānchi

His son was Paramēśvaravarman II, who "governed the earth according to the rules laid down by Manu "

He (Paramēśvaravarman II) had a brother Mahēndravarman III, but he was superseded by Nandivarman II Pallavamalla, who usurped the throne Nandivarman II was sixth in descent from Bhīmavarman, brother of Simhavishnu, the conqueror of the Chōla country and virtual founder of this dynasty, and thus belonged to a collateral line

Nandivarman's usurpation is thus clearly referred to in the Vēlūrpālayam plates —

"After him (i.e., Paramēśvaravarman II), the repository of the aggregate (good) qualities of all ancient kings, got possession of the prosperity of the family together with the earth whose garments are the four oceans "

His son by Queen Rēva was Pallava-Mahārāja Dantivarman, who married the Kadamba princess Aggalanimmati

His son by Queen Aggalanimmati was Nandivarman III, also called Vijaya-Nandivarman, in the sixth year of whose reign the Vēlūrpālayam grant was made. As he is stated in this grant to have acquired the prosperity of the Pallava kingdom by the prowess of his (own) arms. It may be inferred that the sovereignty over that kingdom had during his time been keenly contested either by outsiders or by some direct descendants of the Sīmahaviṣṇu line.

In the Chingleput, North Arcot South Arcot and Trichinopoly Districts there have been discovered a number of stone records, more or less of the same age as the Vēlūrpālayam plates, which refer themselves to the reigns of Dantivarman, Dantivarma Mahārāja, Dantipōttarasar or Vijaya Dantivikramavarman and also of Nandivarman with similar variations in the name (S.I.I II v 505). Again, the Bāhur plates supply the names Dantivarman (his son) Nandivarman and (his son) Nripātūṅgadeva or Vijaya Nripātūṅgavarman, as members of the Pallava family among whose ancestors were Vimala, Kōṅkanika and others (ibid 518). From this latter statement Dr. Hultzsch inferred that the kings mentioned in the Bāhur plates were different from the Pallavas of Kāंची and were only "Pallava by name but Western Ganga by descent." Mr. Krishna Sastri thinks that it is therefore difficult to say if the Dantivarman and the Nandivarman of the stone records mentioned above, are to be identified with those mentioned in the Bāhur plates or with those of the Vēlūrpālayam plates or with both. (S.I.I ibid 505). The late Rājā Bahadur V Venkayya was inclined to connect the names in the Bāhur plates with those of the Vēlūrpālayam plates. He suggested that Vijaya Nripātūṅgavarman of the former was apparently the son of Nandivarman III of the latter. Against this Mr. Krishna Sastri urges —

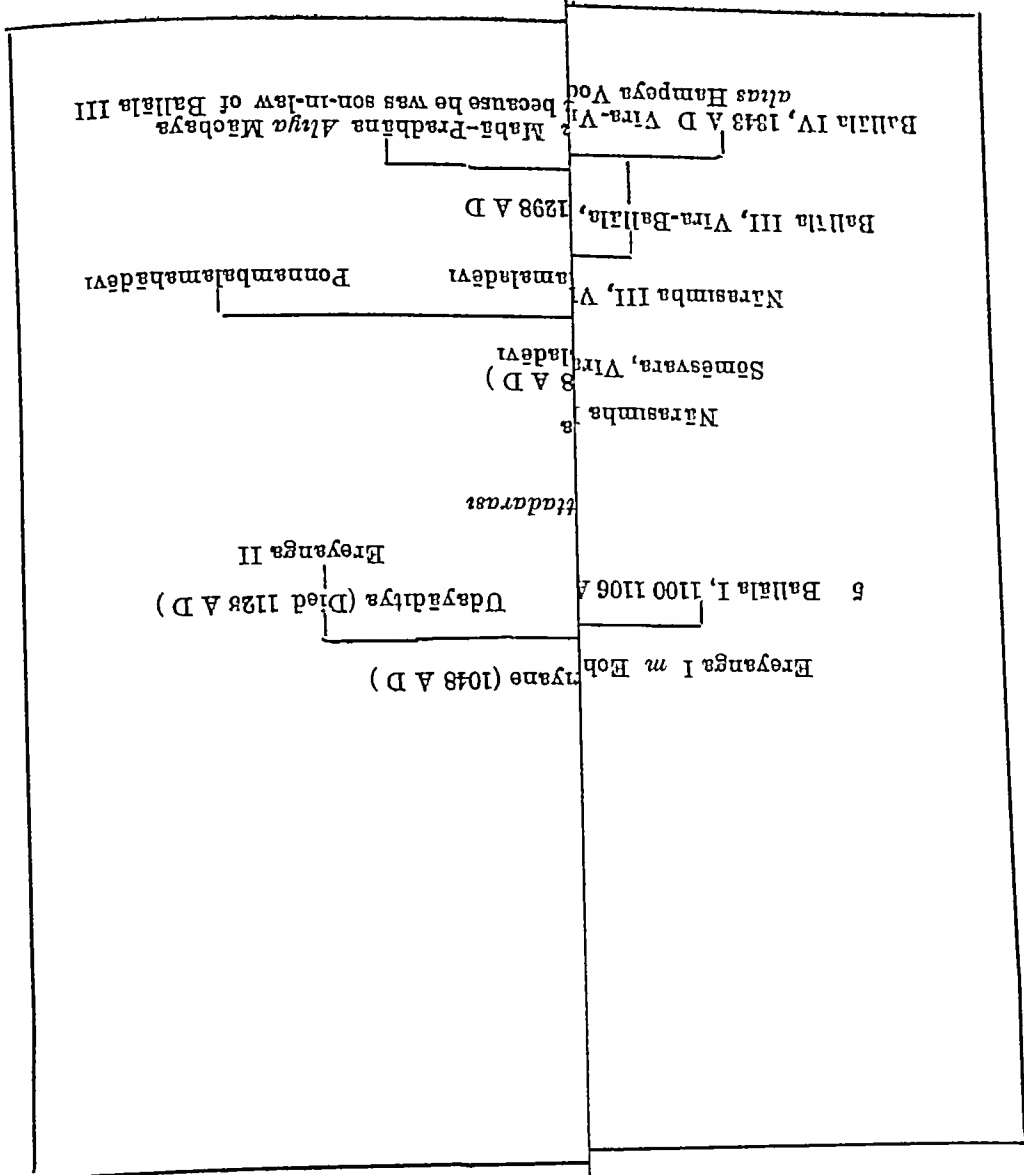

The only objection is the ancestry which in one case includes the clear Western-Ganga name (or surname)

Kōnkanika, while in the other it does not. If, however, Mr Venkayya's suggestion is accepted, we must presume two facts to arrive at a concurrent genealogy, and to connect the kings of stone records with those mentioned in the Vēlūr-pālayam and the Bāhūr plates. The prefix Ko-Vijaya and the suffix Vikrama-Varman which are invariably found appended to the names of the kings in this series must have been introduced for the first time by the usurper Nandivarman Pallavamalla, who, we know, literally won the kingdom by victory (vijaya) and by prowess (vikrama), and that Nripatungavarman who was decidedly the most powerful of this last branch of the Pallavas (see E I VIII 293 and f n 3), and a son of the Rāshtrakūta princess Sankha, must have contracted new relations with the Western Gangas to justify the insertion of one or more of the names of that dynasty among his Pallava ancestors. Even with these suppositions granted, the identification of kings mentioned in stone records with the Nandivarman and Dantivarman of the copper-plate grants presents peculiar difficulties. The script of the copper-plates, though of the same age with that of the stone inscriptions, often differs from it, and the information supplied by the latter is so meagre that hardly any points of contemporaneous nature that could help us in such identification are forthcoming. In the present state of our knowledge, therefore, it may be hypothetically presumed that kings of names of Nandivarman and Dantivarman with or without the prefix Kovijaya and the suffix Vikramavarman, may be taken to be one or the other of the immediate ancestors of Nripatunga-Vikramavarman, while kings described as Dantivarman Māhārāja of the Bhāradvāja-gotra, Dantivarman and Nandivarman of the Pallavatilaka-kula (hero of the Tamil work Nandi-kkalam-bagam, I 1 XXXVII 171) and Nandivarman who conquered his enemies at Tellaru have to be kept distinct."

To the above view of Mr Krishna Sastri, it might be added that the titles vikrama and vijaya appear to be added to the names of this series of kings in their technical sense. Vikrama, in ancient Indian International Law, means a war which ends in an unequal peace;

kings of the dynasty made its downfall only a matter of time. While it lasted, during a period of nearly two and a half centuries, it ran a course of brilliant exploits both

To face page 1409

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA—contd.

Page	Line	Add
CHAPTER XI—contd.
1256	27	After the words "regual year," insert the word "which"
1257	10	For "Jatīvarma" read "Jatīvarman"
1261	10	For "Chalurvēdimangalam" read "Chaturvēdimangalam"
1260	Last line	For "Rudaimba" read "Rudrāmba"
1263	Last but one line	After the word "maintains" insert a comma
1264	8	Before the word "the" add the word "and"
1264	11	After the word "began" insert a point
1265	22	After the word "Kampana" insert a point
1268	7	For "Tiruvoniyur" read "Tiruvorriyur"
	From bottom
1269	9	After "Madias" insert a comma
1272	5	For "tālayānān" read "talayānān"
1278	4	After "suggestion" insert a comma
1279	17	Before "built" insert "etc."
1284	Marginal note	Before the word "Towns" add "(b)"
1285	38	After "merchants" add —"During the reign of Rājendra-Chōla, there is mention made in an inscription dated in the 9th year of the existence of a gadiṇai (ghatika) at Vēmbarrūr, modern Vēppattūr, Tanjore District (M E R 1909 Appendix B No 273 of 1908, dated in 1021 A D)"
1286	12	After "(M E R Para 28)" add —"In an inscription dated about the 11th century A D, registered as No 256 of 1912 (M E R 1913 Appendix B) a guild of merchants describe themselves as consisting of various sub-divisions covering from the 1000 (Districts) of the four quarters, the 18 towns, the 32 Vēlupuram and the 64 ghatikāsthānas . It would seem as though India was conceived of as possessing, about the 11th century, 64 ghatika-sthānas (M E R 1913, para 25)"
1286	Marginal note	Before the word "The" add "(c)"
1288	Marginal note	Before the word "Money" add "(d)"
1333	9	Omit "and" before "59"
1333	19	For "dandadhīpa" read "dandādhipa"
1333	25	For "under ground" read "underground"
1333	25	After "Nilgiris" insert a bracket
1339	4	For "husband" read "step son"
1343	3	Before the word "the" insert a semicolon in place of the comma
1345	22	Omit double inverted commas after the word "born"
1347	7	For "Gongai" read "Gangai"
1351	3	After the word "carried," insert "on"
1354	3 From the bottom	For "represented" read "referred to"
1357	15	For "Yōgandharōyana" read "Yōgandharāyana"
1357	19	After "indeed" insert the words "he is"
1358	18	For "Ibā" read "Ibid"
1360	9	Omit the word "the" before "five" and for "five" read "ten"

Ballala II dated in 1203 and 1220 A D. In one the rent of an agrahara including tribute is fixed at 100 nishka out of which 18 nishka are assigned for the recital of the śāstra and bhagavata (F C V Channarayana 172). Of these different coins the gadyānam is probably the gadyāpura which has been identified by Cunningham with the śaṅkhaśrīra of the Jaunpur inscription. They are found in S W Rajasthan Alwar, Marwar and Gujarat. They are thick pieces of silver derived from the Sakarian type but so degraded in execution as to show little similarity to their originals (See Rapson Indian Coins, 31). The name of gadyānam so commonly met with in the above inscriptions of this period is distinctly a corruption of gadyānam which itself seems a variant of gadyāna. The pon was a gold coin based on the weight of the red kalāṅga or moluccan kaṇ (catapina bonduc) probably about 50 or 60 grams in weight. The kaṇ of later days was doubtless a corruption of the kaṇṇaṇḍa hōṇṇu and the Tamil pon. The nishka originally signified a gold ornament but later was the name given to a gold coin which has a history going back to Buddhist times. (Rapson Ancient India, 317). It is not a little curious that these ancient coins should have persisted during Hoysala times despite the now comango introduced by Vishnuvardhana.

An inscription of Yāmahā II mentions the gold coin Bhuyabala mada (M.E.II 1897 No 406 of 1896) apparently coined on the model of the Chola gold coins called mada. A mada was equal to half a paṇḍa. Though the above-mentioned coins are referred to in inscriptions no finds of them have so far been made in the State.

The accompanying pedigree of the Hoysala dynasty is based on the materials thus far made available in the Pedigree of the Hoysala Dynasty different archaeological and other reports.

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA—concl'd

Page	Line	191
CHAPTER XI—concl'd.
170	24 and marginal note	For 1123 read "112112.
171	10	For Gava g ula Gava-d vunda
171	2	For 1177 read 1171 113
172	From below 6	All after "h m —Whether king Hallala of Dikraamale referred to in the Nilam akṣaraṇam by Vidyā bhāṣa artha (see M. O. M. Library Technical Catalogue of M. A. Vol. 141 et al. Sansk. C. P. vol. 14. N. 364) can be identified with king Hallala remain to be determined.
171	11	After "large insert
174	1	(omit comma after "was
177	4	For Mahip Jāna read Mahip adha a
176	21	For "M. Hume read M. Sullivan
176	3	For Māla aukt vara read Mālas uk vara
177	2	After "alternative" add "in the
177	21	For Ṭajakkaladyan read Ṭajakkaladyan
1801	20	Insert a comma after "chief "

The Sevunas (also called Yadavas of Devagiri), who were the great rivals of the Hoyasals in contending for the possession of the Western Chulukya and Kalachurya dominions, claim descent from Krishna, through Subahu, a universal monarch, who divided his empire between his four sons. The second son, Dridhaprahara, obtained the south, and his descendants ruled over the Sena or Sevuna country, extending from Nasik to Devagiri. He was succeeded by twenty-two kings of his line, down to Bhallama (Cf Bhandardkar's Early History of the Dehkan), who was contemporary with the Hoyasala king Vira Ballala II, and from whose time alone the history of Mysore is concerned with the dynasty. They style themselves lords of Dvaravati (the capital of Krishna, not that of the Hoyasals), and their standard bore the device of a golden ganda. They generally describe themselves as destroyers of Malava Raya, tenniers of the Gurjara-Raya and the establishers of the Telunga-Raya. They overcame the Kalachuryas and became masters of all the western Dekhan, having their capital at Devagiri, the ancient Tagara, now known as Daulatabad. Their destruction was due to the incessant warfare they carried on with the Hoyasals, which, in its turn, invited the same Muhammadan invasions from Delhi which proved so disastrous to the Hoyasals and ended their rule. The following is a list of the kings of this dynasty —

Bhallama	1187-1191
Jatugi, Jatrapala	1191-1210
Singhana	.	.	1210-1247
Kandhari, Kanhara, Krishna	.	.	1247-1260
Mahadeva	.	.	1260-1271
Ramachandra, Rama Deva	1271-1309
Sanhara-Deva	.	.	1309-1312

We have already referred to the severe struggles that took place between the Hoyasala and Sevuna armies for

Of the kings mentioned in the Sanskrit charters, it has been remarked by Mr Venkayya that as the earlier of these charters are not dated from Conjeevaram place cannot have been their capital. He suggests that they might have been driven out of it for a time. He writes —

"The kings of this series are generally described as fervent Bhagavatas meditating on the feet of Bhagavat (Vishnu) and as being devoted to the feet of their fathers. They belonged to the Bhavadvaja gotra and were the rightful Maharajas of the Pallavas, who were the abodes of the fortunes of other kings overcome by their own valour and who, according to rule, had performed many horse sacrifices. Several kings of the series bore names connected with Vishnu, such as Vishnugopa and Kumaranvishnu. Perhaps it was a time when the Vaishnava creed was in the ascendant. Future researches may prove that some of the Vaishnava Alvars flourished during the period. Vaishnava tradition has it that Tirumangai-Alvar, one of the early saints, was ill-treated by the contemporary Pallava king, who had subsequently to repent of his conduct. The boast of these Pallava kings to have performed horse-sacrifices may prove to have been borrowed from Givaskandavarman of the Prākṛit charters, who must have actually undertaken the task. If my surmise prove correct, the Pallavas must have regained Conjeevaram towards the close of the period with which we are now dealing. The time when the kings who issued the Sanskrit charters flourished is not known. But, roughly speaking, they may be assigned to the 5th and 6th centuries A D. The chief characteristic of Pallava history so far as that it has to be made out solely from copper-plate grants. No stone monuments of the period have been hitherto unearthed. Perhaps, the temples which did exist were of wood or some other perishable material. Mr Fergusson says — "The conclusion seems inevitable that all buildings anterior to the year A D. 700 or thereabouts were erected in wood or with some perishable materials, and have perished, either from fire or from causes which, in that climate, so soon obliterate any but the most substantial erections constructed with the most substantial materials."

(ii) Those of the Sanskrit Charters circa from about 5th century to beginning of 7th century

the possession of the Chalukya Rajacharya dominions and bow Ballala II by a series of victories over the forces of Bhallala and Jajjala carried his conquests up to and beyond the Krishna. The bloody battle of Soratte previously mentioned checked the ambitions for a time. Later the Sevunas gained the advantage and the Hoysalas were forced to retire to the south of the Tungabhadra. The earliest of the Yadava inscriptions in Devanagari of the time of Singhana and he probably took a large number of Ballala's date to extend his power to the south. In this and the succeeding reigns a portion of the north west of Mysore was permanently in their possession. According to one epigraph an army of 30,000 horses sent by Singhana captured the hill fort of Gutt (i.e., Chanderagutta) in 1239 A.D. (A.C. VIII, Sorab 119). His attempts to collect the local revenue however, seem to have been resisted by force (Ibid Sorab 120, 217). About the same time, the Sindas attacked his army at Nemati (A.C. VII, Honnali 64-65).

Randhura was Singhana's grand son. He describes himself as thrust out of the Hoysala king and restorer of the Telugu king (Ganapati of Oranga). His general also boasts of subduing the Kattas the Kadambas of the Konkana the Pandyas of Gutt and the turbulent Hoysalas, and setting up pillars of victory near the Canara. This is probably a reference to his fight against the Hoysala king Somesvara. (See ante) Mahadva was Randhura's younger brother and attempted to establish his own son on the throne after him. But Randhura, son of Randhura secured it. His general Saluva Tikama professes to have captured Dorasamudra and obtained a tribute from it of all manner of wealth, especially horses and elephants. On the other hand a Hoysala record states that he died in a single night. Saluva-Tikama made some additions to the great temple at Harbhara which Krishna himself had visited and

Of the kings mentioned in the Sanskrit charters, it has been remarked by Mr Venkayya that as the earlier of these charters are not dated from Conjeevaram that place cannot have been their capital. He suggests that they might have been driven out of it for a time. He writes —

"The kings of this series are generally described as fervent Bhāgavatas meditating on the feet of Bhāgavat (Vishnu) and as being devoted to the feet of their fathers. They belonged to the Bhāradvāja gotra and were the rightful Malikarajas of the Pallavas, who were the abodes of the fortunes of other kings overcome by their own valour and who, according to rule, had performed many horse sacrifices. Several kings of the series bore names connected with Vishnu, such as Vishnugōpa and Kumāravishnu. Perhaps it was a time when the Vaishnavā creed was in the ascendant. Future researches may prove that some of the Vaishnavā Alvars flourished during the period. Vaishnavā tradition has it that Tirumangai-Ālvar, one of the early saints, was ill-treated by the contemporary Pallava king, who had subsequently to repent of his conduct. The boast of these Pallava kings to have performed horse-sacrifices may prove to have been borrowed from Sivasakundavarman of the Prākṛit charters, who must have actually undertaken the task. If my surmise prove correct, the Pallavas must have regained Conjeevaram towards the close of the period with which we are now dealing. The time when the kings who issued the Sanskrit charters flourished is not known. But, roughly speaking, they may be assigned to the 5th and 6th centuries A D. The chief characteristic of Pallava history so far as it has to be made out solely from copper-plate grants. No stone monuments of the period have been hitherto unearthed. Perhaps, the temples which did exist were of wood or some other perishable material. Mr Fergusson says — "The conclusion seems inevitable that all buildings anterior to the year A D. 700 or thereabouts were erected in wood or with some perishable materials, and have perished, either from fire or from causes which, in that climate, so soon obliterate any but the most substantial erections constructed with the most substantial materials."

(ii) Those of the Sanskrit Charters Circa from about 5th century to beginning of 7th century

where he had remitted all the taxes of the agrayāra (E C XI, Davangere 59)

During the reign of Rama-Dēva, the next king, the seat of the Śevuna government in Mysore was fixed at Bettur, close to Davangere on the east. In 1276 A D, a second invasion of Dōṣasamudra, led by Tikkama, was entirely defeated at the battle of Belavādi (E C V, Belur-164 and 165). It was in his time that the Muḥammad-āns first appeared in the Dekhan. Āla-ud-din, nephew of Jalāl-ud-din Khiljī, the founder of the second Pāthan dynasty, resolved in 1294 A D, to attempt the conquest of the Dekhan, and in order to throw the enemy off their guard, pretended to leave his uncle in disgust. Suddenly changing his course to the west, he appeared before Dēvāgnī. Rama-Dēva was quite unprepared, but hastily collected a small army, and after vainly trying to oppose the enemy near the city, retired to the fort, carrying in a great quantity of sacks belonging to passing traders, believed to contain grain, but really filled with salt. Āla-ud-din plundered the town, levying heavy contributions on the merchants, and besieged the fort. He at the same time gave out that a larger army was following, and thus induced Rama-Dēva to offer 50 maunds of gold to buy him off. Meanwhile, the king's son, Saṅkara-Dēva, arrived with a large force, and, contrary to his father's advice, attacked the Muḥammad-āns. Though successful at first, he was defeated. Āla-ud-din now raised his demands, but the contest might have been prolonged had not the troops in the fort discovered to their surprise that their provision was salt and not grain. At last it was agreed that the enemy should return on receipt of 600 maunds of pearls, 2 of jewels, 1,000 of silver, 4,000 pieces of silk, etc., besides an annual tribute to be sent to Delhi. How the aged Jalāl-ud-din came forth to welcome his victorious nephew, and how the

First Muḥammadinvasion,
1294 A D

the close intimacy that existed between the Gangas and the Pallavas of this period. The genuineness of these plates has been admitted even by Sir John Fleet (J R A S. 1915, 475). It is stated in these plates that the Ganga king Aryavarman (i e, Harivarman of other plates) "was duly placed on the throne by Simhavarma-Maharaja, the lord of the prosperous Pallava family" and that his son "the banner of the Gangēya race," the Ganga king Mādhava Mahādhiraja (alias) Simhavarmā, "was duly installed on the throne by the illustrious Pallava (king) Skandavarma-Maharaja." This Skandavarman may be Skandasishtya, also known as Skandavarman II, the donor of the Omgodu grant, in the 33rd year of his reign (H I XV. 249). The Simhavarmā mentioned in these plates has been identified with Simhavarmā II of the Sanskrit Pallava charters (of about 5th and 6th century A D) in whose 8th year were issued the Mangadūṭ plates (Mr Krishna Sastri, Madras Epigraphy Report, 1913-1914, Paras 3 and 4). The Skandavarman mentioned in these plates may be identified with Skandavarman III, son of Simhavarmā I of the Sanskrit charters. Messrs Rice and Krishna Sastri both agree in these proposed identifications (M H R 1913-1914, Paras 3 and 4 and H I. XIV 333). That the Ganga kings of this period were feudatories of the Pallavas, as the assumption of their second names after Pallava kings and their being enthroned by the latter would indicate, there appears no reasonable doubt (H I XIV. 333). Mr Rice thinks that as Pallava kings crowned the later Ganga kings Nivivita's (i e, Avinita's) younger son and Sivamarā-Saigotta, the Pallavas should have laid claim to be overlords of the Gangas, if so, they appear to have asserted the claim on rare occasions (ibid). The following facts may be taken as finally settled about this line of kings—that they lost Kānchi, their capital temporarily and ruled over parts of the present latter with the fact that he was a matter of history making, for the cause of attachment are matters of history.

As will be seen from the above, the main part of the expedition in 1413 against the king of Delhi was held the ground of tribute. It was commanded by the emperor Shah Rukh, and was a success. (1)

Shah Rukh, the son of Timur, the great conqueror of the East, had been the slave of a merchant and taken prisoner in the conquest of Gujarat, but having attracted the king's notice was specially raised to the high position of a high official in the whole country and thus a high position in the whole country and thus a high position in the whole country.

He was then received with distinction and restored to his kingdom with additional honours which kept him faithful during the rest of his life. In this expedition occurred an incident deserving to be mentioned. On the conquest of Gujarat that ruler's wife, Kaula Devi, had been taken captive and being admitted to Alauddin's court by her beauty and talents gained his favour.

She had charged the commander during this expedition to recover her daughter by the Gujarat king who had been long sought in marriage by Sankar, the son of Alauddin. She was in his custody and he had consented and sent her under an escort to Durgam. No clue could be gained as to where she was when a party from the camp going to see the caves of Jhera by chance fell in with the escort. They were forced to fight in self-defence, and captured the princess. But it was not till after wards they knew the value of the prize. The girl was carried off to Delhi where the king's son, Alauddin, was being brought up with her, because endeavoured of her and ultimately married her. Their lovers are the subject of a celebrated Persian poem by Amir Khusrau.

them They powerfully aided in the revival of the ancient Saiva and Vaishnava faiths and thus paved the way for the final absorption of Buddhism in the South They were apparently mighty warriors, who for some unknown reason entered into a life-and-death struggle with the Chālukyas of Bādāmi, which partly explains their own intrusion into the Chōla country This warfare, which lasted almost a century, eventually exhausted both the parties and led to their ultimate downfall about the middle of the 8th century.

The exact relationship that this line of kings bore to their immediate predecessors—those of the Sanskrit charters—is nowhere stated, though four of the latter are mentioned among the ancestors of the former in the Kāsakūḍi plates of the 8th century These are Virākūṭiṇa, Skandavarman, Viṣṇugopa and Simhavarmā. Of Simhavarmā, described as the father of Simhaviṣṇu, in the Veṭṭurpālayam plates, nothing more definite is known than that he “wiped off the pride of his enemies”

Simhavarmā

Simhaviṣṇu himself claims to have vanquished the Simhaviṣṇu

Malaya, Kalabha, Mālava, Chōla and Pāṇḍya kings, also the Simhala king proud of the strength of his arms and the Kēraḷas. His chief exploit was the conquest of the Chōla country fertilized by the river Cauvery (Veṭṭurpālayam plates, verse 10, S.I.I II v 503, 510) The village of Mānālī in the Sāḍapet taluk of Chingleput district, in the present Madras Presidency, was in ancient times called Simhaviṣṇu-chaṭurvedimangalam according to an inscription of the Chōla king Kuṭōttunga I (S.I.I III 134) It is, however, not yet determined whether the village is so named after this Simhaviṣṇu or his grandson Narasiṃhavarmā, who was also known as Narasiṃhaviṣṇu, according to a fragmentary inscription at Bādāmi (Fleet, Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, 328).

In 1309, the army under Malik Kafur passed through Devagiri on its way to the conquest of Oiangal (Wairangal), and was hospitably entertained by Rāma-Dēva. But the following year Sankara-Dēva came to the throne, and the army being on its way to the conquest of Dōsasmudra, he was less friendly.

Soon after, he withheld the tribute, on which Kafur a fourth time marched into the Dekhan, in 1312 A D, seized Sankara-Dēva, put him to death, and took up his own residence in Devagiri.

In 1316 Haripāla, the son-in-law of Rāma-Dēva, in common with many of the conquered princes, raised the standard of revolt in the Dekhan and recovered their possessions, expelling the Muhammadan governors. The paroxysms of rage into which Alā-ud-din was thrown by this intelligence brought on his death, hastened, it is said, by poison administered by Kafur. The latter attempted to place himself next on the throne, but he was assassinated, and Alubāk succeeded. In 1318 A D, he marched into the Dekhan, took Haripāla prisoner, and ordered him to be flayed alive and his head put up over the gate of his own capital. Thus ended the line of the Sultans of Devagiri, and in 1338 A D, Muhammad Tughlik removed the capital of his empire from Delhi to Delhi, giving it the name of Daulatabad.

pillar of victory standing at Vatapi (S.I.I. II v 504 and 511). Mr Krishna Sastri suggests that it is not unlikely that the pillar of victory had been set up there by one of the ancestors of Narasimhavarmā himself. A fragmentary rock inscription at Badami published by Sir John Fleet (I.A. IX 99) refers to Vataṭṭipikonda (Narasimhaviṣṇu), and a pillar of victory. Sir John Fleet infers from this inscription that Vataṭṭi was temporarily recovered by the Pallavas from the Western Chalukyas after (?) the reign of Pulakēśin II. These facts suggest that originally the Pallavas were settled at Vataṭṭi, from where they were driven south. From their new abode they appear to have led expeditions to recover their lost northern capital and territory, and in the long-drawn struggle they and their advisers were exhausted and easily fell a prey to their respective neighbours. The war apparently commenced with the Eastern campaign of Pulakēśin II, which began about 611 A.D. (E.I. VI. 3 and B.I. 4, IV.1, October 1922). The last important event of the war was the invasion of Kānchi by the Chalukya king Vikramāditya II, who reigned from 733-734 to 746-747. Kirtivarmā II, son of Vikramāditya II, also claims to have led an expedition in his youth against the Pallavas. The Pallava king, unable to fight in open battle, took refuge in a fort, but was defeated by the Chalukya prince. The enmity thus appears to have lasted for over a century and only ended with the destruction of both the dynasties.

26. 17.
Part of the War.

The first part of the War was fought during the reign of Mahēndravarmā I. Pulakēśin II of Badami, who was Mahēndravarmā's contemporary, ascended the throne about 608 A.D., and was formally crowned king in the following year. He probably lived till 642 A.D. Among his several conquests was the conquest in 611 A.D. of Vengi, where he installed his brother Kuṇja-Viṣṇuvardhana as Viceroy in 611 A.D., with his capital

Page	Line
513	10	For "Chalyas" read "Chalyas". Add after last - King Mahendrasvar was then w a contemporary of Harsha. His work "Mudrarakshasa" is interesting for several reasons. It is only in the only early Sanskrit known but also it comes from the south and shows how of the same technique as that of Bharata. It is a special section devoted to it remarks that "the author undoubtedly shows a considerable knowledge of the tenets of the Buddhist and the play is not unassuming the style is certainly appropriate to the subject matter; it is like that of Harsha (and I repeat, while many of the verses are not without force and beauty." The king has the merit of avoiding the gross vulgarity which marks normally the later work of this type. (The Sanskrit Drama 1921-22) The addition to us the evidence of Buddhism in the south at the time to which it belongs (first quarter of the 7th century A.D.) and the variety of Prakrits it exhibits—for a short play it has both Sanskrit and Magadhi— would seem to indicate that these dialects were in common use at the time in the South (1921)
513	10	Before the word "Pallava" add (iv) After (i) (v) add — "Pallava", a village in the Chyavara of North Arcot Dis- trict, is called in the earliest records. It is Chaturmurti of the Pallavas. It is not impossible that the village owed its origin to one of the Pallava kings named Pallava. The Pallava referred to may have been Pallava I who married Pallava II's daughter. But it is more probable that he was Pallava II, eldest son of Nidamar, who distinguished himself at the battle of Samudra and an inscription of whose has been found in the North Arcot District. (S I IV 140) As mentioned in the text, he is said to have overcome the Hoysala five times. In Harsha's Chola time it was known after his two titles, Pallava-Chola-Chaturmurti and Kirtimukha-Chaturmurti-mangalam. Later still represented in one of the Ajanta frescos. Apparently so far as he was concerned, the war against the Pallavas was over, for we have no indication, in the inscriptions extant, of a renewal of the contest until the counter-invasion of Badami itself was undertaken in or about 642 A D by Narasimhavarmā I, son of Mahēndravarmā. What actually led to this invasion of Badami is not known, though it might inferentially be set down as a set off against Pulakesin's renewed attack against Kānchi in 640 A D. It is possible that Mahēndravarmā could not himself undertake the arduous task of the reduction of Badami for the time being and it was accordingly left to his son to carry the war into the enemy's country and repulse him there.

CHAPTER XL

If this view-point is acceptable, Mahēndravarmā may be taken to have settled down to a quiet rule after the victorious action at Pullalur. This gives the time necessary for the advance he made in the peaceful arts with which his name is more closely connected than with war in Pallava history. Among these were the cutting of rock-cut cave temples in different parts of his territory and their dedication to Brāhma, Viṣṇu and Śiva, the excavation of a tank obviously for extending irrigation, and the laying out or building of towns. These are referred to in some detail below, but it may be stated here that Mahēndravarmā was famous as an excavator of rock-cut caves. At least eight cave temples excavated by him or connected with him are known from inscriptions in them. They are to be seen from Pallavaram, a town named or founded after him, near Madras, to Pudukkōtai in the south. One of his titles mentioned in the Pallavaram cave inscription is Cheṭṭahārī (i.e., Chaityākārī) or creator of chaitiyas, the reference being to the monolithic cave temples excavated by him or under his orders in his domains. Another śrīrūḍa of his appearing in the same cave temple is chitrakārapputi which means "the tiger

Page	Line	Add
659	11	as Karaikkottu-Brahmadeyam or Brahmadeyam. It was an agrayada and a ghatika-sthana . It had an organized village assembly called Ganapernumalhal or Ganavayyappal-un-makkal or Ayastha-Sattu-Sabhar , the meaning of which term is not clear. Many committees must have worked under it. (For details about them, see M E R 1916, Para 8.)
659		After "in Coorg" add—"The Vallimalai Jain cave inscription was excavated by the Gangga king Rajamallu, the son of Ramavikrama, grandson of Stripustha, and great-grand-son of Sivamara (M E R 1895, No 6 of 1895). One of the Jain images represents Devassena, the pupil of Bhavara handini, who was the principal preceptor of a Bana king (M E R 1896, No 7 of 1896). This image and another were set up by the same preceptor Aryamandini (M E R 1895, No 8 of 1895).
666	13	After "feudatories" add—"An inscription which has been assigned by Mr. Rice to 997 A.D. explains Nittimiga's name by suggesting that he was "versed in the Dharm of ruling the world ever according to the Niti-Sastra " and calls him "the foremost of kings" (E O IX Channapata 48.)
701		At bottom of page add—"Recently a Sanskrit historical work (Gangga Samvatsaravamsa) in prose and verse dealing with the genealogy of the Gangga dynasty of the Orissa country has been traced. It is by Rajaguru Vandevaratha Somayajin of the Arjyagotma. It is a work in ten Parichcheda and awaits critical examination.) See E O and Was of the Madras Oriental Mss Library , IV. S. 1 R No 1030, pp 1116-1117.
		For "Chalukya" read "Chalukya." After the word "subjects" add—"Vataputunga During the reign of this Gangga Pallava king, the temple of Venkatesa-perumal at Tirumalakkudam in the Midhuruttham Taluk, Chingleput District seems to have come into existence (M E R 1916, Para 11.)"
		After word "151 1912-31" add the following: "In inscription at Khandagiri, about Taluk, District (M E R 1920, App No 698 of 1919, Para 13) it is stated that Bhadrabala remitted a portion of his taxes, certain of the tax on cotton and on silk, in the District. Prohibit it from being used in the direct line of milch."

appears to be a genuine work of this king, as the information it gives about Mahēndravarmān is confirmed from independent sources. As Mattavilāsa is known to be a title of Mahēndravarmān from the Pallavaram cave inscriptions, there can be little doubt that the Piḥasana is named after him and is his own, as declared in this (Māmandū) inscription. His claim to the title of Kāvām pīākasa, "Light of poets," mentioned in the Māmandū inscription, is therefore fully deserved and not a mere boast. His queen is referred to as Chāndrarēkha and compared to Kānti (i.e., Durga). In this inscription, he is also referred to as Nyāvinṭa satyāsāndha and as the pupil of some person whose name is unfortunately lost, and as delighting in the company of learned men, as great in painting and as having written on dancing. His knowledge of painting is borne out by the virudā he assumed, chitrakāppuli, "a tiger among artists," mentioned in the Pallavaram cave inscription, while his knowledge of music is testified to by his inscription at Kudimiyārmalai in the Pudukkōttai State. This inscription is a regular treatise on music, the vāgas mentioned in it being unknown to the earliest works on music which have come down to us. It is in characters of about the 7th century A.D. and in the very script in which the other undoubted inscriptions of Mahēndravarmān are found. This treatise, according to the colophon at its end, was composed by a king who is described as Parama Mahēsvara, i.e., a king who was a great devotee of Śiva. This king describes himself as the pupil of Rudrāchārya, who, it is impossible to say, is or is not the same as Rudrata mentioned by Matanga in the Saṅgita Ratnākaśa, a work of about the 12th century A.D. As will be seen, Mahēndravarmān is described in the Māmandū inscription as the pupil of some person, whose name it has apparently been impossible to read. If his name there could be read, perhaps it might inscription, we infer that the name of one queen—probably the principal queen—was Chandrarēka. The name of the other is not known. From the manner in which he is represented in the statue, it might be reasonably gathered that Mahendravarma was physically a powerfully built man, tall, graceful in form, strong in limb and body, with a royal mien and a determined mind. His two queens also seem to have been graceful person-ages, slender in build and only a little less tall than himself. Their statues seem to have been set up by their grandson Parameśvaraivarma I (A S I 1926, No 26).

Mahendravarma I was succeeded by his son Narsimhavarma I. He is said to have repeatedly defeated the Cholas, Keralas, Kalabhras and the Pandyas (S I I 152). He also claims to have written the word "victory" as on a plate on Pulakēsin's back which was caused to be visible (2 e, which was turned in flight after defeat) at several battles. These battles appear to have been fought at Pariyāla, Mamamangala, Sūlamāla and other places. If Pulakēsin was defeated at Mamamangala (in the present Cojaveeramm Taluk of the Chingleput District), he must have, in Mr Venkayya's opinion, advanced into the heart of the Pallava territory. It is not unlikely, he adds, that these battles as well as the encounter at Pullalur were fought in the same campaign and that Narsimhavarma I probably fought in it as Xuvartja and drove back the invading army (A S I 1906-1907, 228). For this, however, there is no evidence, and the possibilities are that they belong to a renewed campaign in or about 640 A D. against Kānchi, in which these battles were fought, with the result that Pulakēsin, being repeatedly defeated, withdrew to his capital, being pursued by the enemy. Narsimhavarma thus carried the war into the Chālukya territory and actually captured

Narsimhavarman I Renewal of hostilities with the Chālukyas

apparently Nandivarman's victory against his opponent was one of this character. Vijaya means likewise conquest and is in that sense a shortened form of digvijaya.

With Nandivarman II Pallavamalla is reached the fourth period in Pallava history. The following is the list of his ancestors and successors as worked out by Mr Krishna Sastri with the aid of the Vēlurpālaiyam and Bahur plates —

iv Line of Nandivarman
II Pallava-malla: also called Ganga-
Pallava.

Bhīmavarman brother of Simhavishnu founder of the Simhavishnu line.

His son Buddhavarman

His son Adityavarman

His son Govindavarman

His son Hiranya or Hiranyavarman I

His son Nandivarman II Pallavamalla—the usurper and founder of the new line.

His son Dantivarman or Vijaya Dantivikramavarman (Hiranyavarman II)

His son Nandivarman III Vijaya Nandivarman or Vijaya Nandivikramavarman

His son Nripatungavarman or Vijaya Nripatungavarman

His son Aparājita who was subdued by the Chōla king
Aditya, about the close of the 9th century A D

This branch of the Pallava dynasty from Nandivarman II Pallavamalla to Aparājita has been termed Ganga-Pallava to distinguish it from the Simhavishnu and other branches (E.I. IV 182)

The history of these different branches of the Pallava dynasty still remains, for the most part to be written up. Of the kings mentioned in the Prākṛit charters all that is known has been mentioned above.

History of the different branches of Pallava
Kings
(i) Those of the Prākṛit Charters, 8th and 9th
century

Struttoda apparently was Narsimhavarman's principal general, and therefore a great military officer before he turned a religious devotee. Tinguṇasambada, the great Devāram saint, is related to have visited Struttoda in his native village and the Devāram hymn dedicated to the Siva temple of that place mentions the latter and thus enables us to fix the date of the former as well as of the Gaṇa revival in which he played so prominent a part. Narsimhavarman and his two queens are represented by stone statues in Adivaraha temple at Mahābalapuram. These statues seem to have been set up by their son Paramēśvaravarman I, together with the statues of his grandfather and grandmothers, Mahēndīavarman and his two queens (see above). It was apparently during the reign of Narsimhavarman I that the Chinese pilgrim Hsien Tsang visited Kānchīpuram. His visit might be set down to somewhere about 640 A D. His itinerary began in 629 A D and ended in 645 A D, so that 640 A D seems not improbable. Kānchī was, according to Beal, the last place in the South visited by Hsien Tsang. It was at that time the capital of Dīāvīda and the seat of a king, whom Hsien Tsang does not name. It seems to have been the capital town from which the traffic to Ceylon was conducted. The journey to Ceylon from Kānchī by sea occupied three days. Hsien Tsang was desirous of embarking here for Ceylon but when he heard from the priests who had come from that country of the death of the king of that country and the famine and disorder prevalent there, he desisted from proceeding to it. This probably refers to the disturbances which ended in Mahāvāmana's seeking the aid of Narsimhavarman and eventually occupying Ceylon as mentioned above. Hsien Tsang's account of Dīāvīda and its capital Kānchī indicates the high state civilisation had reached at the time in South India. He says —

"This country—of T'u-lo pi ch'a (Dīāvīda)—is about 6,000 li in extent (1 li = $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile), the capital of the country

The Pallava dominions during this period probably comprised of the districts of Nellore Guntur Kistna Godavari, and perhaps also Cuddapah Bellary and Anantapur, besides parts of Mysore. The Kadambas of Banavasi defied the Pallavas under Mayurasharman—afterwards Mayuravarman—and gained their independence of them. (The probable date of this event has been discussed above under Kadambas.) The later Kadambas appear to have been not over friendly to the Pallavas. One of them Mrgēśivarman boasts of having been the fire of destruction to the Pallavas and another Ravivarman is said to have conquered Krishnavarman and other kings and overturned Chandadanda lord of Kūncī. A Nanakkarasa Pallavarāja is also mentioned to have overcome the Kadamba king Krishnavarman about the middle of the 6th century. However this might be, the Kadambas undoubtedly proved a serious obstacle to Pallava expansion in the north. The Bānas who played an important part subsequent to the decline of the Pallavas, were about this period but feudatories of the Pallavas. Later Eastern Chālukya tradition refers to a battle between the Pallava king Trilūchana and the Chālukya Vijayāditya who claims to have come from Ayūdhya in the north. The latter is said to have been victorious but lost his life. His queen took refuge at a place called Mndivēmn which has been identified with Peddamndiyam in the present Cuddapah District. The event has been assigned approximately to the end of the 6th century A.D. Though this story is not found in inscriptions earlier than the 11th century, it shows that belief current about that time recognized that the Pallava kingdom extended in those early times as far as Cuddapah.

The Penugonda plates of the Western Ganga king Mādhava-Mahādhirāja alias Simhavarman identified with the early Ganga king Tadangāla Mādhava disclose

25,000 slohas, a commentary on the Satasāstra-vāipulyam, on the Vidyā-mālā-siddhi, and on the Nityāyadvāra-tāṇkā-sāstra. He describes his works as "very extended and highly significant of his eminent virtue and great talent." "There is, moreover, he adds, "a personal narrative of his history," which, if found, would throw much light on contemporary history. It may be inferred from Hiuen Tsang's account that in Kānchi, Buddhism, Jainism and Brāhmanism flourished during the time of his visit and that there was constant connection between Ceylon and Kānchi. The form of Buddhism current was Mahāyāna. Kānchi apparently enjoyed a great fame as a city of learning. The great Buddhist teacher Dharmapāla, who was born in it, subsequently proved himself not only a great writer and metaphysician but also attained to the headship of the great monastery at Nalanda, in which he preceded Śīlabhadra, the teacher of Hiuen Tsang (Beal, II 110-111). From the way in which he notes the fact of Kānchi being his birth-place, we are led to infer that the one object of his visit to that place was because it was the birth-place of so famous a Buddhist teacher. It will be seen that the Chinese pilgrim calls the territory ruled by the Pāllavas Dāvāda, not Tondamandala. It is possible that the older name of Dāvādamandala had not been ousted by the new name Tondamandala. Even now the former is more popular than the latter, though it signifies generally the south of India, while Tondamandala means Kānchi and the country surrounding it. That Kānchi was about the 9th century still an important Buddhist centre is testified both by tradition (vide story of Alakānka and dispute with them described below) and by the discovery of Buddhist images reported to have been found in it (I A 1915, 127-129).

Narasimhavarman I appears to have been succeeded by his second son Paramēśvaravarman I, his elder brother

The Pallava dominions during this period probably comprised of the districts of Nellore Guntur Kistna Godavari, and perhaps also Cuddapah Bellary and Anantapur, besides parts of Mysore. The Kadambas of Banavasi defied the Pallavas under Mayurnasarmā—afterwards Mayuravarman—and gained their independence of them. (The probable date of this event has been discussed above under Kadambas.) The later Kadambas appear to have been not over friendly to the Pallavas. One of them Mrigūśivarman boasts of having been the fire of destruction to the Pallavas and another, Ravivarman, is said to have conquered Krishnavarman and other kings and overturned Chandadanda lord of Kāuchi. A Nanakkarasa Pallavaraja is also mentioned to have overcome the Kadamba king Krishnavarman about the middle of the 6th century. However this might be the Kadambas undoubtedly proved a serious obstacle to Pallava expansion in the north. The Bānas who played an important part subsequent to the decline of the Pallavas were about this period, but founders of the Pallavas. Later Eastern Chālukya tradition refers to a battle between the Pallava king Trilōchana and the Chālukya Vijayāditya, who claims to have come from Ayōdhya in the north. The latter is said to have been victorious but lost his life. His queen took refuge at a place called Mndivēmu which has been identified with Peddamndiyam in the present Cuddapah District. The event has been assigned approximately to the end of the 6th century A.D. Though this story is not found in inscriptions earlier than the 11th century, it shows that belief current about that time recognized that the Pallava kingdom extended in those early times as far as Cuddapah.

The Penngenda plates of the Western Ganga king Mādhava Mahādhirāja alias Simhavarman identified with the early Ganga king Tadangāla Mādhava, disclose

on a further war of aggression against him, for meeting which he set up a combination of all the southern kings But before he was finally defeated at the bloody battle of Pervulalanallur, i.e., in the earlier stages of the war, Vikramāditya appears to have been fairly successful He claims, indeed, to have "received by surrender the town of Kanchi after defeating the lord of the Pallavas, who had been the cause of the humiliation and destruction of his family," apparently a reference to the defeat and destruction inflicted on Pulakesin I at Vatapi about 642 A.D., by Narasimhavarmān I. (Bombay Gazetteer I ii 362) But this success was of a short-lived character, for at the decisive battle of Pervulalanallur, Vikramāditya's forces were so badly beaten that they apparently retreated in confusion leaving everything on the field The Kūṭam plates describe them as flying before the pursuing forces covered only by a rag! One result, however, of this war was that the Pallavas lost to the Chālukyas a further part of their territory in the north The modern district of Kurnool, or a good part of it, passed out of their hands as testified to by several copper-plate grants issued by Vikramāditya and his son Vinayāditya and found in it (Bombay Gazetteer, 363 and 369, E.I.X 98) Among the temples connected with his name are the Mūlassthana temple at Tirukkalkūṭam, near Madras, which, dating from the time of Skandasiṅha, was restored by him, the Uṣkal mantapa at the same place with fine figures of Brahma and Viṣṇu in it, and the ratnas at Māmālapuram, called after him (or rather after his title Mahāmalla), which were begun during his reign

Narasimhavarmān II, also called Rājasiṅha, son of Paramiśvāravarmān, succeeded him Among his chief surnames are Chitākarṇukha and Hlavāra He married Raṅgapātaka He appears to have had a long and

Mauras Presidency from about Nellore to Guntur that their new capital is not known definitely though various places are mentioned in their inscriptions as their royal camping places that one of the later kings of the line Kṣmāraviśnu I re-captured Kāncī and apparently re-set up there that they possibly followed the Brahmanical faith both their names and their grants testifying to this fact and that in the part of the country they ruled they seem to have been well and firmly established with a system of Government organized on the Arthaśāstra model In exemplification of this last statement, it might be added that king Simhavarman II—the king identified with the one mentioned in the Lūkavibhāga—in his Ūṃgōḍu grant, dated in the 4th year of his reign, threatens as the king in one of the early Prakrit plates of the first Pallava dynasty does corporal punishment (Sarira dandam arhati) to transgressors of his edict The order contained in the Ūṃgōḍu grant of Skanda varman II, dated in the 33rd year of his reign is, it might be added addressed to officers (adhikṛita) and the āyuktas of karma (or kamma) rāshtra i.e. the northern part of the modern Nellore and Guntur districts

We next come to the period of stone inscriptions covered by the rule in the first instance of the time of Simhaviśnu the conqueror of the Chōla country The records for this period are more numerous and less liable to suspicion, while chronology is not altogether a field of conjecture and doubt Mr Venkayya has brought together the history of this branch (see A.S.I. 1906 1907) and what follows is mainly based on his account which as far as possible, has been brought up to-date in the light of recent research The main features of their rule seem undisputed The earlier kings of this line laid the foundations of Dravidian architecture the earliest stone monuments in Southern India being assignable to

(III) Those of the stone inscriptions Beginning of 7th to end of 9th century

been named after his uruda Īkavira. So great a benefactor of the Saiva faith cannot have gone without recognition (AS I 1906-1907 229 fn 8 and 10). Mr Venkayya suggests that he should be identified with one of the sixty-three canonized saints of the Saiva faith—either Kalarchinga-nāyanai or Aiyadigal Kāḍavaiḱon, both of whom were Pallava kings (ibid 229 fn 11). The Gaṅga king Bhūvirkīrma claims to have defeated him in a great battle at Vilanda and is said to have captured the whole of the Pallava kingdom. Some other details are given in Mandya 113 (EC III, Mysore) and Tumkur 23 (EC XII Tumkur). Two grandsons of his were apparently brought up by the Gaṅgas. These, however, are unknown to Gaṅga genealogy (S I I II. v 506 Table).

Paramēśvara-
vartman II

Narasimhavarman II was succeeded by his son Paramēśvaravarman II. Not much is known about his rule. He seems to have built the Vaikūṭṭa Perumal temple at Kāñchi, which is called Paramēśvara Viṣṇuṅṅiḥ in one of its inscriptions and Paramēśchuravinnagaram in one of the hymns of the Vaiṣṇava saint Tūmāṅgai Alvar. His death is referred to in an inscription on the wall of the verandah of the Kailāsanātha temple (S I I II. 244).

Mahēndra-vartman III

Mahēndravartman III is known to have built the shrine close to the Kailāsanātha temple (S I I I 23). Mr Venkayya suggests that it is possible that he did not succeed to the throne and that therefore he is not mentioned either in the Udayēndirām grant or in the Kāśākudi plates.

Struggle for the Throne

After the death of Paramēśvaravarman II, there seems to have been a struggle for the throne. The exact cause of this struggle is not, however, clearly known.

Simhavishnu was succeeded by his son Mahendra varman I. The war against the Chālukyas apparently began during his reign. What actually led to the war is nowhere found stated. The hostility between the two dynasties became so intense that each looked upon the other as its natural enemy. Mr Venkayya thinks that it is possible that the hatred had a religious basis. The Pallavas he remarks were Saivas and had the bull for their crest, while the Chālukyas were devotees of Vishnu and had the boar for their emblem. But as he himself remarks there is no reason to suppose that in those early days religious bigotry went so far. Mr Rice in the last edition of this Gazetteer observed as follows —

Mahendravarman I
Beginning of the war with the Chālukyas

Its probable cause

The name Chālukya bears a suggestive resemblance to the Greek name Seleukia, and if the Pallavas were really of Parthian connection, as their name would imply we have a plausible explanation of the inveterate hatred which inscriptions admit to have existed between the two, and their prolonged struggles may have been but a sequel of the contests between the Seleucids and the Arsacids on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates. In support of this Mr Venkayya mentions the tradition that the Chālukyas are said to have come from Ayūdhya in the north and the first thing they did after going to the South was to defeat the Pallava king Trilochana. If the theory of the foreign origin of the Pallavas is untenable it follows that this suggestion of a transference of hatred from Mesopotamia to South India seems far fetched. Sir John Fleet is of opinion that Bādāmi (ancient Vātāpi), from where the Chālukyas marched down to the South, 'was originally the Western India stronghold of the Pallavas and that it was from them that the Chālukyas wrested it. The Vēlurpālayam plates mention the fact that Nerasimhavarman I defeated the Chālukyan king Pulakēśin II and his allies at Vātāpi and add that he took, at the same time, from them the communicated this to some of the capable members of his family, who, however, refused to go. Then calling his own sons Srinalla, Ranamalla, Sanghatimamalla and Pallaramalla, he enquired of them if any would accept. The first three having refused, the fourth, Pallavammalla-Damiruvva consented. Though pleased with the noble resolve of this Kathaka prince, the father was against sending this son who was then only twelve years old. At this stage, an old agamiya (agami?) of the court, called Tamankonda-Pōsar said, "This (prince) is one who is devoted to Maha-Vishnu. He must become an emperor." On this the required permission was granted and the prince started in a palanquin with Hunarya-vamma-Maharaja himself and Tamankonda-Pōsar leading the guarding armies. After going some distance the prince got down from the palanquin and taking leave of them, went on his way crossing several mountains, rivers and impassable forests. Hearing of his approach Pallavadi-Aryya received him with a vast army, placed the prince on an elephant, took him to Kanchipuram-Mahānagar (the capital), but himself died (?). Pallavadi-Aryya was perhaps some distant kinsman of the king with, however, no right to succeed to the throne. The Mahāsāmantas, the merchants (nagarattā) and the assembly and Kāḍakka-Muttaraya having heard of the prince's arrival, met him with honours and entered the Palace with him. (The merchant community of the Nāttukkōta Chetties are even now known by the name nagarattā.) Then, under the name Nandivarman, the circle of ministers, the feudatory chiefs, the two assemblies of administrators and the senators crowned him emperor and decorated him with the insignia of royalty such as the peacock (?) parasol, the conch Samudra-ghōṣa, the Khatvanga banner, the Bull-crest, etc., and offered him the royal seal Vidēlividugu."

This detailed description agrees, in the main, with what is hinted of him in the Kāsākudi plates. A recently discovered copper-plate record, to be soon published in the Epigraphia Indica, also confirms the very tender age of Nandivarman when installed on the Pallava throne. It says of him "he of well established strength, received the kingdom while he was yet a youth."

at Pisthapuram the present Pithapuram in the Godavari District (E I VI 11 M E R 1908 Paras 10 11 et seq and B I 4 1922 IV 1 in which the Koppuram plates of Pulakesin II are considered and the date 611 A D is fixed) In 616 Kubja Vishnuvardhana became an independent sovereign and the founder of the line of Eastern Chālukyas. He and some of his successors are mentioned in different copper plate grants (see M E R, 1908 Para 13 and M E R 1917 Paras 10 24 et seq)

In this campaign against Vengi Pulakesin claims that he caused the splendour of the lord of the Pallavas, who had opposed the rise of his power to be obscured by the dust of his army and to vanish behind the walls of Kāncipura. This might imply a previous encounter of Pulakesin against the Pallavas. This invasion of the Chālukyas seems to be acknowledged by Mahēndra varman who declares that he defeated his chief enemies at Pullilura the modern Pullalur (Pōhilur) which later was the scene of two battles fought between Haider Ali and the English. The Pallavas were apparently driven off from their possessions in the north—between the Krishna and the Godavari—and even their capital—Kānci—threatened. Mahēndravarman beat off the invading hosts but lost permanently the northern part of his territory, which was occupied by Pulakesin's brother. It is possible as suggested by Mr Venkayya that the Pallavas tried to make good this loss in the north by an extension of territory in the south which is supported by the fact that no Pallava monuments earlier than the 7th century A D have been so far found in the Tamil country.

Successful action at Pullilura.

In 620 A D Pulakesin II repulsed King Harsha of Kanauj, the hero of Bana's Harshacharita and five years later he sent an embassy to Khosru II the Persian king whose reception at his court is believed to be

Pulakesin his contemporary Peace from 611 to 612
A.D.

Kadabka-Muttarayar who joined with the chiefs and merchants of Kānchi in installing Pallavamalla on the throne must have been another near kinsman of the Pallavas and an ancestor of Kaduvatti Muttarasa who about the end of the 9th century A.D. laid siege to Koyatur (Laddigan), a village included in the Pungavur Zamin of the Chittoor district, in the time of the Bana king Vijayaditya II (see H.I. XVII, p. 3). We learn further that the term Kadabka, through the Sanscritized Kathaka, was also a form of Kadava (H. I. VII, p. 167, f n 2).

Nandivarman II Pallavamalla, the usurper, thus began to rule while he was still young. He appears to have ruled for not less than fifty years (H. I. IV, 137). His reign might have extended to the third quarter of the 8th century A.D. The Udayendian grant shows that, despite his choice by the subjects, his position was highly insecure. In this grant, we are told that the Pallava general Udayachandra "bestowed the whole kingdom many times on the Pallava," i.e., by his repeated victories against the enemies (S. I. I. II, 372). Udayachandra, indeed, is said to have killed with his own hand the Pallava king Chitrāmāya, who seems to have been allied with the Dramila princes (ibid). Pallavamalla was, it is stated, besieged at Nandipura by the Dramila princes. As Mr Venkaya has suggested, it has accordingly to be inferred that the Dramila princes took up the cause of Chitrāmāya, who was probably the son of Paramēsvaraman II or some one else who had a right to the Pallava throne. Among the Dramila princes allied with Chitrāmāya, the Pandyas under Rajasimha Pandya I, must have been prominent, as they claim to have defeated the Pallavas at Sankararamangai which, in the Udayendian grant, is Sanscritized as Sankaragrāma. (A. S. I. 1306-1307, 231 and M. E. R. 1307-1308, para. 28)

Time of Nandivarman
II Pallava
malla, also called Gangas
Pallavas
Nandivarman
II Pallava
malla

among painters i.e. of temples or towns (U F R 1809, Para 14) That he was well versed in painting is known to us from the Mānandur inscription referred to below Mahēndravarman apparently imitated the cave temples north of the Krishna--e.g. at Undavalli (see V E R 1809 Para 13)—in his own dominions in the south and the Virudas show that his claim to be an innovator in this respect is well founded He was it would seem at first a Jain and was converted to the Saiva faith by the Saint Appar (or Tirunavakkarasar) Though a Saiva he was catholic enough to admit the worship of Brahma and Vishnu with that of Siva The number of cave temples dedicated by him to Siva however are relatively greater which shows that he was more particularly a devotee of Siva This is confirmed by the Mameodur inscription [S I I IV (Texts) No 136] which though unfortunately badly damaged still furnishes much useful information about this king Though discovered as far back as 1888 it has not been critically edited, largely because its text is difficult of restoration In view of its intrinsic importance—if restored, it is likely to prove invaluable for a proper appreciation of Mahēndravarman's pre-eminently great qualities—it deserves to be re-copied in situ and critically edited There is scarcely any doubt that it is an inscription of Mahēndravarman for he is referred to in it as Satrumallesa Dhūbhujā, a title by which he was known according to other inscriptions of his Among the personal details gleaned from it are that he was conversant with the Gandharva Sāstra, i.e. music which is confirmed by the Kndimlyamalai inscription referred to below that he wrote many works—all doubtless in Prākṛit—connected with or having relation to the compositions of Vālmiki and Vyāsa the Mattavilāsa Prahasana, the Danduga etc Of these the Mattavilāsa Prahasana has been traced in Travancore and published in the Trevandrum Sanskrit Series (No V) This work

Kaīasānātha temple (H. I. III 339) Its immediate effect was to break the power of the Pallavas. Nandi-varman being unable to face another Chālukya force, under the crown prince Kirtivarma, fled for refuge to a hill-fort. The Chānga king Śrīpuruṣa retook Kādavēthi which the Pallavas had recovered and seized the Pallava umbrella assuming at the same time the title of Permaṇadi, which he took from the lord of Kānchi.

Nandivarman II Pallavamalla was succeeded by his son Pallava-Mahārāja Dantivarman, son of Rēva, daughter of an unnamed king (S. I. I II v 505). Velurpālayam plates, verse 16, S. I. I II v 511. He was also known as Viyaya Danti-Vikramavarman and Hanyavarman II (S. I. I II v 518). No specific historical details are known about this king or his successor. His chief queen was the Kādamba princess Aggalaṇṇamāthi.

Dantivarman

Their son Nandivarman III (also called Viyaya Nandivarman and Viyāṇandi Vikramavarman) next succeeded to the throne. In the sixth year of his reign the Velurpālayam grant was made. If Mr. H. Krishna Sastry's reasoning is correct, he was also the donor of the Tandanātōtam grant (S. I. I II v 518). He had the surname Ekādha. His reign, if the description given of it in the Tandanātōtam plates can be accepted, should have been a prosperous one. He appears to have encouraged learning. He is said to have snatched away from an unnamed Chānga king a necklace in which was a gem called Ugrodaya. To his lot also fell, we are told, an excellent elephant named Pattavaradhana, which Mr. Krishna Sastry identifies with the rutting elephant controlled by Lord Śiva by a twig as mentioned in Saint Sūndara's hymn on the Vadamullavayal temple. If so, Sūndara cannot have been long distant from the time of Viyāṇandi Vikramavarman III—middle of the

Nandi-
varman III

help us to clear up the doubt whether Rndrāchārya is mentioned in it as well. As the name of the king who composed the treatise is not mentioned in the inscription it is as well to emphasise the fact that he must be the Pallava king Mahendravarman for the following reasons —

(1) The character in which the inscription is recorded—which is the same as the one used in recording inscriptions definitely known to be those of Mahendravarman (2) the country in which the inscription is found which was part of the dominion of Mahendravarman where his other inscriptions have been found, (3) the independent evidence available confirmatory of the fact that Mahendravarman was a musician both from the Māmandur inscription where he is described as one who knows the Gandharva Śāstra i.e. music, and from his work Mattavilāsa Prahasana which refers to his musical talents (4) the independent proof we possess of his literary abilities as testified to by the Māmandur inscription and Mattavilāsa Prahasana and (5) the fact that the king who is described as the author of this treatise is described as a Parama Mahāśvararājya, i.e. a king who was a devout follower of Śiva which Mahendravarman certainly was, having among other things excavated a large number of cave temples and dedicated them to Śiva.

The musical treatise composed by Mahendravarman apparently relates, it may be added, to music as played on an instrument (of five strings) possibly the matchless Yāl associated with the singers of the Devaram hymns but now obsolete or the vina. The playing of musical instruments should judging from this inscription have reached a high state of perfection in South India by about the middle of the 7th century. Mahendravarman and his two queens are represented by stone statues at Mahabalipuram. From the Māmandur at Tunchennampundi, Tanjore District, dated in the 18th and 22nd years of the reign of Nripatunga (M E R 1901, Stone inscriptions Nos. 303 and 300) This subordinate position of Marambavai suggests, in Mr Krishna Sastri's opinion, either the defeat or death of her husband at the hands of Nripatunga Therefore, Nandipottarayana of the Pallava tilaka family should have been the enemy against whom Varaguna Mahaija and Nripatunga jointly fought

Aparajita-
varman.

Nripatunga's successor, and possibly son, was Aparajita-varman (M E R 1906, Part II, Para 9 and A S I 1906-1907, 239) It has been suggested that Aparajita is only another name of Nripatunga It is true that the dates of the other kings do not, as pointed out by Mr Venkaya, leave any margin for this king This, however, is not a sufficient justification for saying that Aparajita was another name for Nripatunga It is quite possible he was co-regent for Nripatunga for some time and reigned independently a short time after the death of Nripatunga Unless the identity is independently established, it seems safer to treat them as two distinct kings, the more so as there are several inscriptions in the name of each of them Aparajita, with the aid of the Western Ganga king Prithivipati I, defeated Varaguna Pandya in the battle of Sripurambiya, identified with Tirupurambiyam near Kumbakonam in the Tanjore district (S I I II 381, M E R 1906, Part II, Para 9) Apparently Prithivipati I was a feudatory of Aparajita and the latter checked the oppression of the Pandyan king Varaguna by fighting him out and defeating him This Varaguna is the Varaguna-varman of the Pandya line who began to rule in 862-863 A D (M E R 1906, Part II 66, Table) In Aparajita's reign the stone temple of Virattanesvara at Tiruttani was built by one Nambi Appi, while an unnamed king is recorded to have written a

153848

these kings might, judging from their names, have belonged to the same family as the Gangga-Pallavas (AS I 1906 1907, 239). He infers from the localities where the inscriptions relating to them have been found that they were probably governing some province between the Gangga and Pallava territories. From the fact that some of their inscriptions are in Vattelattu, it has been inferred that either they themselves or the country over which they ruled, was under the influence of the Chéas, who used that alphabet. Whatever the relationship of these kings to the Gangga-Pallavas, the Gangga-Pallavas were the overlords of the Western Gangas of Mysore and of the Banas

Pallavatilaka-Kula Line of Kangas

Apart from the Gangga-Pallavas, there seems to have flourished another family who claimed descent from Nandivaiman II Pallavamalla and who ruled over part of Tondar-nadu and the Chola country. Dantivarma Mahaiśya of the Triplicane inscription, Vararamēgan mentioned in the Nāṭyanprabhāṇam as the king of the Tondaiyār, Tellareriṇḍa Nandipōttaiyār, whose inscriptions have been found in Conjeevaram and a few villages in the Tanjore District, and Nandipōttaiyār, who belonged to the Pallavatilakakula, are the known names of this series of kings. The last of these has been assumed to be a contemporary of the Gangga-Pallava Nripātunga mentioned above. Their relationship to the Gangga-Pallavas has not yet been determined. Dantig, ruler of Kānchi, from whom the Rāshtrakūṭa king Govinda III levied tribute, in or about 804 A D, might have been either a Gangga-Pallava or a regular descendant of Nandivaiman II Pallavamalla (HC VII 292). A Pallava king Nandivarma is also found associated with Govinda III in replacing on his throne the Gangga king Sivamaru II, in about 813 A D (HC IV Yedatore 60 and HC IX Nelamangala 60) is called Kānchīpura (kīn ohī pu lo) and is about 30 li (= 10 miles) round. The soil is fertile and regularly cultivated and produces abundance of grain. There are also many flowers and fruits. It produces precious gems and other articles. The climate is hot the character of the people courageous. They are deeply attached to the principles of honesty and truth and highly esteem learning in respect of their language and written characters they differ but little from those of Mid India. There are some hundreds of Saṅghāramas and 10 000 priests. They all study the teaching of the Śthavira School belonging to the Great Vehicle. There are some eighty Deva temples and more heretics called Nirgranthas. (Beal Buddhist Records of the Western World II 228 229)

A few further facts about Kānchī the capital city, are mentioned by Hwui Li in his Life of Hsien Tsiang (Beal 138-139). It is there mentioned that the city is 'situated on the mouth (bay) of the southern sea of India looking towards the kingdom of Simhala distant from it three days voyage. Hsien Tsiang notes —

To the south of the city not a great way is a large saṅghārāma in which men of the same sort renowned for talent and learning assemble and stop. There is a stūpa about 100 feet high which was built by Aśoka rāja. (Beal II 230)

Hsien Tsiang mentions the fact that Kānchīpura was the native place of Dharmapala Bōdhisattva who he says was the eldest son of a great minister of the country. He gives at length the story of how he with the aid of friendly spirits escaped from his marriage feast which the king and queen had arranged for him and how he was deposited in a distant mountain convent, where he joined the order and became a great teacher of Buddhism. Hwui Li supplements the information by giving the names of a number of works he wrote which altogether he says, were several tens. Among the works mentioned are Śabdavidyā samyukta sāstra in important section of Volkiliga (cultivators) in the State represent its former subjects

The Nolas claim to be Pallavas Though their exact relationship is not yet clearly established, they by inter-marriages with the Gangas on the one hand and with the Chalukyas on the other, grew to be a powerful line of kings, who during the 9th and 10th centuries A D extended their sway over the whole of the Ganga domains and drove the Banas into a corner A princess named in Chamarajaneagar 10 (H C IV) is said to be of the Nolas and Pallava-kula Modern scholars have called this line of kings as Nolas-Pallava, to distinguish them from other Pallava families The genealogy of the line is given in the Hemavati pillar.

(H C XII, Sira 28) They are described as belonging to the Isavavamsa and as descended from Triyana, though Pallava, the king of Kanchi The first king named is Mangala or Nolasabharaya, praised by the Kanas His son was Simhapota, whose son was Charupondra, whose son was Polachora Nolas, whose son was Mahendra, whose son was Namas or Ayyapadeva, whose sons were Aniga (or Bira Nolas) and Dira or Iva Nolas Triyana Pallava, the founder of the family, has been identified by Mr Venkaya with the king of the same name, who was defeated by the early Chalukya king Vijayaditya, according to the later tradition (S I I I. 50 and A S I 1906-1909, 241) One of the Virupakshapuram pillar inscriptions also mentions Pallavabhaya (M H R 1911, Para 14) Simhapota or Singapota was subordinate to the Ganga king Sivamara Saigotta Saigotta sent him against his younger brother Duggama, who tried to become independent (H C XI Chalkere 8) On Sivamara being taken prisoner by the Rashtrakutas and his country being occupied by them Simhapota's son and grandson passed under their

Mahēndravarmān II probably predeceasing him (S I J II v 501 503 and table on 506) During his reign the Chalukya king Vikramāditya I son of Pulakēsin I invaded the Pallava territory. Though there are many references to this war neither the origin of it nor its course is clearly indicated in any of them. The Kuram copper plates, which record a gift by Paramēśvaravarman I, give the details of the fight that ensued. The invasion was successfully beat off, Vikramāditya being defeated at a fearful battle which was fought at Peruvālanallur an unidentified place situated apparently in the Tamil country. Vikramāditya's army which consisted of many lakhs of troops took to heels leaving the spoils of the war to the victors. (S I J I 153 and S I I II 344) On the other hand the Gadwal plates of Vikramāditya I, dated in 674 A D and issued from Urāgapura on the southern bank of the Canvery furnish a graphic account of the invasion by the Chalukyas of the Pallava country (E I V 101). In opposition to the Chalukyas all the southern kings, including the Kēśalas Kalabhras and the Sindhakas combined and defeated Vikramāditya I (E I IX. 205). In other records Paramēśvaravarman I is said to have destroyed the city of Ranarasika i.e. Vikramāditya I (S I I I. 18). If so he could have only repulsed a counter invasion undertaken in consequence of his attack on the Chālukyan capital. It has been suggested that the city of Ranarasika referred to should be identified with the Urāgapura—Urāiyūr the capital of the Chōlas—where Vikramāditya I was encamped. As Urāiyūr was the capital of one of the confederate chiefs it could not have been the place destroyed by the Pallava king. Moreover the words "city of Ranarasika" could only apply to Vikramāditya's permanent not temporary capital. If this be so it would follow that Paramēśvaravarman invaded or attempted an invasion of Vātāpi once again in about 674 A D and this brought over a territory up to the Kirudoi, or little river, as its boundary. Sir 38 (E.C. XII) represents him as assuming independence in 878 A.D., while Doddaballapur 3 (E.C. LX) says he was ruling as king and fighting with the Gangas. He is said to have destroyed the Mahabali family (i.e. the Bāṇas), which conquest brought him the title of Mahābali-kula-vidhvamsanam (E.I. X., 65). According to one of the Vinupākṣhipurāṇi pillar inscriptions, engraved in beautiful arrow-headed Kannada characters, Mahēndia is described as "the sole lord of the lady Gaṅga-mandala, which consisted of 96,000 (villages)". This is a clear statement of Mahēndra's extensive conquest in the last quarter of the 9th century A.D., which brought about the ruin of the Mahabali race (i.e. the Bāṇas). The sway of Mahēndia over Dharmapuri (the ancient Tagadur) and the adjoining country appears to have been remembered even in the time of the Hoysalas in the name Mahēndramangalam, which was evidently conferred by Mahēndrāditya-Nolamba on the present village of Aḍḍamankōtta, and in a Siva temple referred to in inscriptions as Mayindisiam-Udayār or Mayindiram-Udayār. Mr. Krishna Sastri adds—"To-day it is seen in the Mallikāyana temple whose unique architecture is undoubtedly to be attributed to the Nolambas of the 9th century A.D. The temple of Bhūga-Nandisvara at Nandi in the Kolar District of the Mysore State also belongs to the same period. A comparison of these structures with the Kailāsanātha temple at Conjeevaram will corroborate the possibility of my surmise." (M.E.R. 1911, Para 14). A number of inscriptions found in the border districts of Chittoor and Anantapur refer to the Nolamba conquest of the former, which in those days included, what is now the Zamindari of Pungaur, under the name Puli-nadu. The conquest is attributed to Nolambādityas, which is a corruption of Nolambādhirāja, which may refer either to peaceful reign undisturbed by the Chalukyas. He re-organized the ghatika of the Brahmanas at Kānchi and distinguished himself as a religious devotee. He claims to have washed away his sins by walking on the path of the Saiva doctrine. In keeping with his title Chitra-lārmukha he made himself famous by building (some of the earliest) structural stone temples which were beautified by sculptural work. Among these is the central shrine of the Itjasiṃhāsvara or the Kailāsanātha temple at Conjeeverain which has been described as 'comparable with the mountain Kailāsa' (S I I II v 504 and 511 and S I I I No 24). He built this in consequence of a dream he had. The other structural stone temples built by him are the Airāvatisvara at Kanchi the shore temple at Māmallapuram (M E R 1913 Para) temples at Vayalur and Tiruppōrur in Chingleput District, which have disappeared but whose pillars are in existence (M F R 1909 Para 16) and the temple on the Panamalai rock. The last of these is much like the Kailāsanātha temple at Kānchi and an inscription on the outer part of the wall that runs round it explains the title of Rājasiṃha as applied to Nara-siṃhasvarman II. It designates him as a royal lion to his enemies as a terror to them and as having never been defeated in war and as being famous. This description cannot be mere praise, for it seems clear from this and other inscriptions of his that he was really a distinguished warrior. It is possible that he proved his worth in the military line during his father's reign and that the fear he inspired in his enemies especially the Chālukyas cowed them into silence during his own reign. The absence of any details of the wars fought by him seems to lend some support to this view. He seems to have patronised Brahmanas by founding townships for them. Ukhal in Chingleput was called Sivacholāmanimangalam after him so also a part of Kānchi itself seems to have an undated inscription of Nombadhira (Nombadhira) at Kambaduru, which refers to the construction of a tank at Beddugonde and to some early Nolamba (Pallava) names such as Singapota, Ponnera (Charu-Ponnera) and Dharmma-Mahadevi. If thus the dominion of Nolambadhira Polachora was not strictly confined to the petty territorial division of Gangaisasina in the Kolar District, there is no reason why he should not have extended his sway as far as Kanchi. This, however, requires confirmation, for, as stated above, the first Nolamba king, hitherto known to have actually extended his dominion, on all sides, was Mahendra I" (MEH 1913, Para 13). Mahendra was opposed by Butuga, the Ganga Xvaraja, and finally slain by Butuga's son Ereyappa, who thence obtained the title Mahendrantaka. Mahendra seems to have had a step-brother Noliyaya (MEH 1917, Para 1). He appears to have married a Kadamba princess of the name of Divabharasa or Divambike (EC X, Mulbagal 38). According to the Virupakshapura pillar inscription, he appears to have married a Ganga princess as well. Her name is given as Gumbabe. By Gumbabe he had a son named Ayyapa, of whom this record says that, like his father, Ayyapa was a devotee of Siva. Besides, he had an enemy in a certain Ammanaraya, who, in all probability, is identical with the Eastern Chalukya king Ammaraya I (918-925 A.D.) and was involved in war with many other kings. This statement agrees with what is stated of Ayyapa in contemporaneous records of the Eastern Chalukyas and the Gengas, it being hinted in the Kalachumburu grant of Aruna II that Ayyapa fell in a battle with the Eastern Chalukya king, Chalukya-Bhima II, between 934-945. He was ruling in 919 A.D. (EI X 62). In Jagalur 29 (EC XI) of 920, he is described as ruling the Nolambavidi 32,000 with Anaya, his son, under him as a governor. He must have been an independent ruler as

The Katakudi copper plates hint that there was some dispute about the succession after Paramēśvaravarman's death. These plates also suggest that the dispute had relation to the purity of descent of the two parties. Of Nandivarman who actually succeeded to the throne it is said that he was suldhāmdī anraytā i.e. pure on his mother's side thereby suggesting by implication that either Paramēśvaravarman II or Śunhaviśnu from whom he was descended was of illegitimate descent. Apparently there was some fear of the old kingly line becoming extinct and hence an attempt seems to have been made to bring a new king from a royal family elsewhere. This is in accordance with the principles enunciated in Hindu polity (Liṅga smṛiti II 31 and 40). This Nandivarman distinguished in history as Nandivarman II Pallavaśalla is known from the self same plates as a distant cousin from a collateral branch, of Paramēśvaravarman II. In the Udayendiram plates, Nandivarman calls himself the son of Paramēśvaravarman but this seems wholly incredible in view of the disputed succession after the death of Paramēśvaravarman II, which actually occurred as testified to by many inscriptions. A fairly full account of the circumstances under which Nandivarman II succeeded to the throne after the death of Paramēśvaravarman II is depicted in twelve sculptured scenes, with explanatory labels on the south wall of the verandah running round the central shrine of the Vaiṣṇoṭha Perumal temple at Conjeeveram. It is stated therein —

The race of the Pallavas commenced with the creator Brahma and after the death of Paramēśvarappōttariyar (i.e. Paramēśvaravarman II) the kingdom having become kingless, the ministers, senators and the assembly consulted together and approached Hiranyavarma Mahārāja of the Kāṇḍiśa family and asked him to grant them a king. Hiranyavarman of certain lands under certain tanks. Anni, a son of the Ganga prince Prithivipati II, was killed in battle when fighting in his army (E C X, Goididuni 4). Another fight is referred to in an inscription at Tatanakere, Goididuni Taluk (M A R 1925, No 86) in which one Anyagunda is said to have fallen after piercing hostile warriors in a Nolamba invasion under Anniga of the Ganga kingdom. Anniga, however, was defeated by the Rashtrakuta king Krishna of Kannara III in 940 A D (E I IV 289, V 191). A vinaya to commemorate his death is to be seen at Hinegundagali, Tumkur Taluk (M A R, 1909-1910, Para 66). It is a simple, unpretentious one with only one word Sri-Anniga on it. Seeing that he is mentioned in widely distant parts of the State (as at Hosahalli, Marale, Chamarajanager Taluk, M A R 1916, Para 69, and Lakshmesvara temple at Avani in the Kolar District), he must have continued to rule over the large extent of territory acquired by his grandfather Mahendra. Near the inscription at Lakshmesvara temple, is another mentioning the name of Tribhuvanadeva, the famous guru Tribhuvanakartadeva, who according to Mulbagal 65 dated in 961 A D (E C X) is said to have presided over the religious establishment at Avani for forty years and to have built fifty temples and two big tanks during that period (M A R 1910-1911, Paras 82-83). From the inscriptions of Anniga and Tribhuvanadeva appearing close together on the basement of this temple, it might be presumed that the Lakshmanadevara temple was caused to be built by Tribhuvana with the aid of king Anniga, about 940 A D (M A R 1918, Para 81). Seeing that his father Ayyapa is described (see above) as a great devotee of Siva, this inference seems fairly sustainable.

Anniga married the Chaluki queen Attiyabbarasi, and to them, we are told (M E R 1911, Para 14), was born "the jewel of the Pallava family," whose name has

The terms Kāḍavēṣi, Kāṭhaka and Kāḍakka which occur in the inscription are of much interest. The former as the name of the family in which Hiraṇya varman was born gives us a clue as to what the position was of the descendants of Simhaviṣṇu's younger brother Bhīmanavarman during the active rule at Kāuchi of Simhaviṣṇu's son Mahendravarman I and his successors. Kāḍavēṣa means the chief of the Kāḍava which in the Tamil Periṇṇapūrāṇam occurs as a synonym for Pallava. The Tondaim inscription (E.I. VII p. 25) uses kāḍava and Pallava in identically the same sense. The term also occurs in the Velvikudi grant of the Pāṇḍya king Nedunjadaiyan published in Epigraphia Indica, Vol. XVII No. 16 p. 308. Its interpretation as synonymous with Pallava was not hitherto based on any direct statement. Now we clearly see that the kings of the collateral line of Pallavas which descended from Bhīmanavarman were actually called kāḍavas and ruled simultaneously with the Pallavas of the main line some where over a distant part of the Pallava country. This latter fact is inferred from the statement that Pallava malla had to go a long distance crossing several mountains and impassable forests to reach Kāuchi. Perhaps we can even conclude from the frequent occurrence of the name Kāḍuvetti and other allied forms of Kāḍava in records from the modern Cuddapah and Kurnool districts and the Mysore State that the Kāḍavas of the Bhīmanavarman line ruled in those parts though later on they claim to have ruled over Kānchi also. A Pallava ruler of the Telugu country at the time of the Chālukya invasion from the north under Satyasraya of Ayōdhyā was Trinayana of about the 6th century A.D. He is often mentioned in Telugu inscriptions as Trinayana Pallava or Mukhanti Kāḍuvetti (see M.E.R. for 1908 p. 70 and E.I. X p. 58). The Nolamba Pallavas of the Kanarese country also trace their origin to him.

the Rashtrakuta king Krishna III (M.E.H. 1917, Para 1) The Commander of the Ballaha (Rashtrakuta) army appears to have been one Kotaya Dandanayaka, who is recorded to have made some gifts of land to a temple of Vishnu at Agali, in Madakuru taluk, Anantapur District (N.E.H. 1918, Para 21)

The succession after Dilpa is not quite clear. According to the Karshnapalli stone inscription, it was as follows—Dilpa, his son Nanni-Nolamba, his son Polachola, and his son Virra-Mahendia Nolambadhiraia. (M.E.H. 1913, Para 14) This is confirmed by other inscriptions found both in and outside the State. According to Hiriyur 1 (H.C. XI), Nanni Nolamba was Dilpa's son and according to Muibagal 122 (H.C. X) he had assumed the crown by 969 A.D. The Kambaduru inscription mentioned below calls him Chaladankakara and Pallava-Rama (M.E.H. 1913, Para 14) There was, however, according to certain inscriptions found at Hemavati and at Honerahalli, Madakuru Taluk (M.E.H. 1917, Appendix C, Nos 17 and 58) dated in 966 and 963 A.D., one Iriva Nolambadhiraia or Irivi Nolamba Nolapayya ruling about the years mentioned. As his dates come immediately after Dilpa, he may be taken to have succeeded him, followed by Nanni Nolamba, whose known earliest date is 969 A.D. This Irivi Nolambadhiraia seems to have had a queen of the name of Pariyabbarasi and a son Ayyapadeva (M.E.H. 1917, Para 1) Of Nanni Nolamba's son Polachola II, an inscription dated in 965 A.D. in the Mallikarjuna temple at Kambaduru, Anantapur District, styles him "lord of Kanchi," and as grandson of the ruling king. As regards his son Virra-Mahendia Nolambadhiraia, who may be called Mahendia II, the Karshnapalli record, which is not dated but has been assigned to the middle or end of the 10th century, which is supported by its palaeography, states that on returning from his conquest of the Chola country, he entered

Rājasimha Pāndya's successor Jatila Nedunjadaiyan Parāntaka, the donor of the Velvikudi grant 769-770 also claims to have defeated the Pallavas of Pennagadam (U.E.R. 1907-1908 para 28). Vikramāditya II, the then king of Bādāmi took advantage of the disturbed conditions in the Pallava kingdom and invaded it. He, having resolved 'we are told to uproot completely his natural enemy the Pallava who had robbed of their splendour the previous kings born from his (Chalukya) race' reached with great speed the Tondaka Vishaya (Tondamandalam) attacked at a head of battle and put to flight the Pallava king Nandipūtavarman, who had come to meet him. Where this pitched battle was fought is not mentioned but there can be no doubt it was near Kanchi. Among the things captured (trifles of war) were the Pallava war trumpet, their drum called 'roar of the sea', their Siva banner, many elephants and heaps of splendid rubies (S.I.I. 1 140). The city of Kanchi was at the capturers' mercy, but was spared. Vikramāditya's treatment of the city was characteristically Hindu and humane to a degree. 'Having made the twice-born the distressed and the helpless rejoice by continual gifts he acquired great merit by granting heaps of gold to the temple of Rājasimbhūsvara, i.e. the present Kallāsanaṭha temple at Kānchi. His treatment of the city and of its people was wholly in accordance with tradition and practice as codified in Manu (VII 201). His reduction of Kanchi probably took place shortly after his coronation in 733-734 A.D. (Bombay Gazetteer I, ii 374). Sir Vincent Smith dates it 'in about 740 A.D., but it might have been a few years earlier' (E.H.I. 497). Vikramāditya's wife Lōkamahādēvi afterwards caused a temple to be erected at Pattāḍakal in the present Bijapur district to celebrate this victory (I.A. VI 85). This event which marked the downfall of the Pallavas is corroborated by an inscription of Vikramāditya II found on a pillar in the District, and in inscription No 70 found at Mudigere in Baṛakur hobli, Kolar District, both of which are in characters of about the 10th century, is a son of Viramahendra (M A R 1924, Inscriptions Nos 47 and 70). In No 70, he is described as "ruling over the earth," and independently, while in No 47, he is spoken of as "ruling over Nolaṃbanaḍu." Probably the former description is a rhetorical one while the latter signifies the actual position

Apparently by the time of the latter inscription, which may be dated sometime before 974 A D, the Nolaṃbapallavas had been overrun by the Gangga king Maṛasiṃha, who boasts of having destroyed the Nolaṃba family, whence he had the name Nolaṃbakulaṇṭaka. He was ruling, among other provinces, over the Nolaṃbavāḍi 32,000 (E I IV 352) As Maṛasiṃha ruled till 974 A D, this conquest of the Ganggas may be set down to about that year. In Mulbagal 84 (E C X) dated in 974 A D, we have the mention of three Nolaṃba princes, who had escaped and were, perhaps, hiding, hearing with relief the news of Maṛasiṃha's death. The conquest was, however, more nominal than real. For we have evidence enough in Rakkaṣa Gangga's inscription dated in 985 A D, to infer that the Nolaṃba-Pallavas continued even after the Gangga conquest to rule over Nolaṃbavāḍi 32,000 (E C X, Srivāspur 59).

Not long after the Gangga conquest, the Cholas appear to have secured a foothold about Biṛayati-Maṅgala (modern Beṛaṅgala in Bowringpet Taluk, Kolar District). From Hoskote 47 (E C IX) we might infer that in the reign of Nolaṃbādhirāja—perhaps the Maṅdamara of the Kaligūḍa inscription above-mentioned—the Chola king fought with Nolaṃbaraṣa's army stationed at Biṛayati-maṅgala with the result that Nolaṃbaraṣa conquest and after

Chola

The Gangga
conquest

9th century. The unnamed Pallava king may have been Ntunārga I who claims a victory over the Pallavas (Cholar 90 Nanjangud 269). He is stated to have acquired the prosperity of the Pallava kingdom not easy for others to obtain by the prowess of his (own) arms by killing (his) enemies in the field of battle. This clearly shows that the sovereignty to the throne was keenly contested by outsiders or by descendants of the Simhavishnu line. (S.I.I II v 50a and 511)

His son and successor was Nripatungavarman (also ^{Nripatunga} ^{NATMAN} called Vijaya Nripatungavarman) in the 8th year of whose reign the Bāhur grant for Udyāsthāna (College of learning) was made by his minister. He was perhaps the greatest of his line, as his inscriptions have been found over a larger extent of country than the rest. He seems to have been troubled by descendants of the old Simhavishnu dynasty. The latter seem to have proved obnoxious to the Pāndyas as well. In his Aimbāsamundram inscription we see the Pāndya king Varaguna Mahārāja advancing as far north as Arakur on the Pennār in the Tonda mandalam country. (E.I. IV 81 94) In verse 10 of the Bāhur plates reference is made to a victory gained by a Pāndya king with the help of Nripatunga. The name of the Pāndya king is not mentioned in it but it is inferred by Mr. Krishna Sastri that he must be the Varaguna Mahārāja of the Aimbāsamundram inscription. As the Bāhur inscription states that a victory was gained by the Pāndya king with the help of Nripatunga, it seems correct to infer that the Pallava and Pāndya kings made common cause against a king of the Simhavishnu line who was ruling simultaneously with Nripatunga in some portion of Tonda mandalam. (S.I.I II v 518) Mr. Krishna Sastri suggests that this king was Nandippōttaraiyan of the Pallava tūlaka Kula, whose queen Mārambāval figures as the donor in two inscriptions.

title Virā Nāmba (or Nāmba) Pallava-Perumāḍi
 He was governor of various provinces under his father from 1048 to 1054 (Ibid Holakere 107 and 119) The next king Somēśvara II, his elder half-brother, by a Ganga princess, made him governor of the Nāmba-Sindhavadi province in 1068 (H.C. VII, Shikarpur 136)
 We have two records of him dated in 1072 and 1074 respectively (H.C. XI, Mōlakalmuru 28 and Chitaldūg 82) His another elder half-brother Vikramāka, also by the Ganga mother, on coming to the throne in 1076, made him Yuvārāja, and he made some important conquests for the kingdom In 1080 A.D., he was ruling Bana-vāsī and other large provinces for his brother (H.C. VII, Shikarpur 293) But his eventual rebellion against his brother ended in his defeat and imprisonment A curious inscription of his is Bangalore 9 (H.C. IX), which is ante-dated in 444 A.D. and is the model on which the professed Jānāmēyā grants (H.C. VII, Shikarpur 45, Sorab, 183, etc.—see ante) were framed His third half-brother, Viṣṇuvardhana Vijayāditya, the son of an Eastern Chālukya princess, was ruling the Nāmbavādi 32,000 in 1064 and 1066 A.D., with Kāmpī as his capital (H.C. VII, Channagiri 18) He is described as about to sink into the ocean of the Chōlas, but this fate was averted by Rājārāja and Chōla-Ganga of the Kalinga-Ganga line Then we hear of another Udayāditya ruling over the Nāmbavādi 32,000 in 1072 A.D. It is said of him that he extended the Penuu—Hengeru—kingdom on all sides (H.C. XII, Sira 9) He was apparently under the Chōlas, as he has a sub-title Virā-Rājēndra, as well as Virā-Nāmba-Pallava-Perumāḍi Apparently the Chōla invasions on the Chālukyas during the reign of Virā-Rājēndra led to the transference of the suzerain power to them after the battle of Kūḍal-saṅgamam Hengeru appears to have been the capital at the time Udayāditya seems to have continued his rule till 1109 A.D. He now verses (carala) in honour of it (M.F.R. 1906 Stone inscriptions Nos. 435 and 437). It is possible that Aparajita himself was the author of the verse though it is difficult to imagine why in that case he should have preferred humble anonymity and left out his name from the inscription. It was probably after him that Ukkal in the North Arcot District was called Aparajita chaturvidimangalata. He was apparently after an unsuccessful rule lasting for some years defeated in battle by the Chōla king Āditya I, who annexed his territories. This event probably occurred about the close of the 9th century A.D. and practically terminated independent Pallava rule in the south (I.I.N. 88 M.F.R. 1906 Part II Paras 10 and 16). What became of Aparajita after the battle is not known. But as the Tiruvālangādu plates mention that he was conquered in battle with his brilliant arms it might be presumed he was taken prisoner by Āditya I and ended his days in prison. If he had fallen in battle the fact would have been mentioned in the inscription.

How the kings of the Ganga Pallava line above mentioned are connected with the kings Vijaya Narasimhavikramavarman, Vijaya Skandasishya Vikramavarman and Vijaya Isvaravarman in the Salem and North Arcot Districts and in the areas immediately adjoining these districts in the Mysore State it is not yet determined. They were probably the successors of the Ganga Pallavas. Mr Rice connects them with the Ganga Pallavas (Mysore and Coorg 8). In Mysore we have inscriptions of these kings in the Mulbagal Taluk of the Kolar District (E.C.N. Mulbagal 227-221). One is of the 24th year of Narasimhavikramavarman and the other of the 12th year of Isvaravarman. Mr Rice assigns them to about 880 A.D. as they contain references to Bānarasa and Mahēndra. Mr Venkayya thinks that of the 9th century A D Mr Venkayya has fully set out this part of their career in his paper on the Pallavas, (A S I, 1906 1907, 241-242) In the Telugu Districts, local chiefs claiming Pallava descent seem to have ruled down to the middle of the 13th century. (M.E.R 1905-1906, Part II, Para 7)

The probable successors of Ganga-Pallavas

The Veitupalayam and Tandantotam plates throw some light on the state of society that prevailed about the 9th century A D The Brahmanical religion had re-asserted itself Temples for Siva and Vishnu had come into existence, and grants to Brahmins were on the incase Settlements of learned Brahmins were apparently encouraged by gifts of land Learned Brahman priests became the spiritual preceptors of kings Thus Nandivarman Pallavamalla had for his teacher Bappa-Bhatta (Kasakudi plates, text, line 78) In the 6th year of Nandivarman III, a Siva temple was built at Tirukattupalli by Yagnabhatta, surnamed Bappa-Bhatta, who was probably the spiritual preceptor of Nandivarman III The village itself was made over to the temple assembly (called paradin, i.e. Sanskrit parishad) which enforced the conditions of the grant The vyavastha or written declaration effected the transfer and the parishad mentioned the exemptions to be enjoyed by the residents of the village These related mainly to those obligatory services which they could enforce on the people for the benefit of the community These duties the residents of the village were exempted from. The dones were permitted by the vyavastha to build without any special license, mansions of burnt brick, grow red hills and other plants in their gardens, to plant coconut trees in groves, sink reservoirs and wells, use large oil-trees, and prohibit toddy-drawers from tapping for toddy the coconut and the palmyra trees planted within the four boundaries of the village Apparently none of the 9th

Social life in
century A D

The Ameravati pillar inscription mentions another series of Pallava kings. Seven names are mentioned in it. Among these is Mahēndravarmān, apparently a reference to Mahēndravarmān I. Some others referred to in it figure among the ancestors of Nandivarmān Pallavamalla. The last of them Simhavarman is credited with planting a pillar of victory at Sannara. He is also said to have visited the Buddhist shrine at Dhanyaghata (i.e., Amarāvati in the modern Guntur District) where he listened to a discourse on the law. The connection of these kings with the other dynasties is not yet known. The inscription in which they appear seems to be a copy of an earlier record as for the events mentioned in it, the alphabet is of later date. Mr. Venkayya thinks that if it is an original document, the kings mentioned in it must belong to a local family not mentioned elsewhere. (A.S.I. 1906-1907 240). He throws out the suggestion that on the disruption of the Chōlas in the 12th century, several local families came into prominence claiming relationship with the Pallavas of Kāंची and the Chōlas of Uraiyur. Simhavarman II of the Ameravati inscription may perhaps be assigned to that period if it is held to be an original document.

Pallava kings
mentioned in Amarāvati Pillar inscription

On the disruption of the Pallavas the greater portion of the northern and north-eastern portions of Mysore comprising generally the modern districts of Chitaldrug and Bellary passed under the rule of the Nonambas or Nolambas their kingdom being called after them the Nonambavāḍi or Nolambavāḍi. Inscriptions found at Dharmapuri in the Salem District show that Nolambavāḍi extended far into that district. (M.E.R. 1911 para 14). The original capital of this kingdom seems to have been Henjēru (or Penjēru) or Hēmavati, on the northern border of the Sira taluk in the present Anantapur District. The existing Nonabas a large and

NONAMBA
PALLAVAS.

coming from the Telugu country and some from the Tamil As the village granted is near Kumbakonam, the settlement of Brahmans from the Telugu country in the heart of the Chōla country shows that the kings of older days induced Brahmans to settle in their new acquisitions The Telugu bruidas of the Pallava king Mahēndravarmān found in the Trichinopoly cave inscription testify to the influence of the Telugu people in the Chōla country already in the 7th century A D (S I I II V 519)

The Gangas were a line of kings who ruled over the greater part of Mysore State and of the Cauvery basin (excepting the delta of Tanjore) from about the 2nd century A D to about the beginning of the 11th century A D Their grants—of which some fifty-two are on copper-plates—have been found in all parts of the State and the neighbouring British Provinces, from Coorg in the West to North Arcot and Tanjore in the East, and from the extreme South of the Mysore State in the South to the Belgaum District of Bombay in the North To about the time of Sivamāra I—who reigned about 680 A D according to Mr Rice and 750 A D according to Sin John Fleet—these are mostly on copper-plates, though a few such as Mulbagal 263 (H C X, Kolar District) and Chikmagalur 50 (H C VI, Kadur District) are on stone From his time, lithic inscriptions become more numerous

GANGAS —
CIRCA 2nd
CENTURY A D
TO 11th
CENTURY A D
PERIOD AND EVENTS OF THEIR RULE

THE COUNTRY
RULING THEM
CAPITAL

The country occupied or ruled over by the Gangas kings was known as Gangavādī, a Ninety-six Thousand province, and the existing Gangadikāyas (a sub-division of the Vokkaligas, who form the largest section of the agricultural population of the State) represent its former subjects, their name being obviously a contraction from Gangavādī-kāra At the time of the foundation of the Gangga kingdom, its chief city was Kuvāhla (Kolar), protection (ibid Challaḷero 33 34). These set up rule over Nolambūḷge 1 006 and other provinces. Mr Rice suggests that this must have been the nucleus of the Nolambavadi province. Rājamalla Satravahya I the Ganga king married on his restoration to his possessions Sunhap, a grand daughter and gave his own daughter Jayabhe the younger sister of Nitimarga in marriage to Nolambādhirāja Pūlalehora (E C VI Sima 38). Sunhap is a son Chāruponnēra is probably identical with Ponnēra mentioned in an inscription of about the 8th century at Sravandanahalli Maddigiri Taluk. He is mentioned with a Chōḷa mahārāja apparently an early Chōḷa king ruling the country around Hemavati and Nidugal (V. A. R. 1918 Para 81). A Biyalcheṇra is mentioned in three fragmentary virgals at Sutanur Kankanhalli Taluk. One of these mentions a Chōṛayya and his son and another a Rachayya but their relationship if any to Pūlalehora is not known (V. A. R. 1922 Para 40). Pūlalehora is described as ruling over the Ganga 6 000 under the Ganga king Nitimarga (E C X Kolar 79). His alternative name or surname was Nolambādhirāja. His son by the Ganga princess was Mahendra or Bīra Mahēndra or Mayindamma (= Mahēndravamma) who is probably identical with Mayindra mentioned in many Virgals (e.g. V. A. R. 1919 Para 72). He is described as ruling over the Ganga 6 000 as his father did under the Gangas (E C X Bowringpeto 64). He appears to have also been known as Nolambādhirāja and Nolamba Nārāyaṇa. He had apparently a younger brother Nolambādhirāja Nalipayya ruling in 897 (E C IX Maddagiri 88 and 52) who had a son Anḱayya (E C IX Maddagiri 27). Evidently he was a great conqueror (E C X Chikballapur 26 of 880 and E C III Mandya 18 of 895). Several inscriptions indicate the progress he made towards independence. In Srinivaspor 86 (E C X) he appears as ruling in conjunction with two others

Though Ganga inscriptions possessing to be of the 3rd century A D have been found, the earliest which contain a detailed account of the origin of their family are stone inscriptions of the 11th and 12th centuries in the Nagai and Shimga Taluks, the earliest being Nagai 35 and Shimga 10, 4 and 64 (E C VIII) Little inscriptions of an earlier date have been found but none so far with the details about the origin of the dynasty. According to the stone records mentioned above, which were inscribed in the time of the great Chalikya king Vikrama-ditya or Vikramarka, the son of a Ganga princess, the Gangas were of the Ikshvaku and therefore Solar race In the Ikshvaku-vamsa arose Dharmajaya, who slew the king of Kanyakubja. His wife was Gandhavidyā, by whom he had a son Harsichandra, born in Ayodhyapura The first two inscriptions referred to above make Dadiga and Madhava (see below), the sons of Harsichandra The other two make them the sons of Padmanabha, descended from Harsichandra and interpose a number of steps Thus Harsichandra's wife was Rohinidēvi, and their son was Bhairava, whose wife, Vijayamahadēvi, having bathed in the Ganga at the time of conception, the son she bore was called Gangadatta (the gift of Ganga), and his posterity were the Gangas The account given in the Kalinga Ganga inscriptions is that Puvasa, the son of Yayati, being without sons, practised self-restraint and propitiated the river Ganga, the bestower of boons, by which means he obtained a son, the unquellable Gangēya, whose descendants were victorious in the world as the Ganga line From him was descended Vishnugupta (also called Vishnuvaman in the Nasasmharajapura Plates, M A R, 1919-1920, Para 61), who ruled in Allichhattapura (said to be in the Bareilly District, Rohilkhand), to whom Indra, pleased with his performance of the Aindra-dhva-puja, presented him an elephant Vishnugupta, by his wife Pithuvimati, had

Pośāch-ra Nolaṃbādhirāja the father of Mahendra or to Mahendra himself both of whom were the subordinates of the Ganga kings as above stated. The invasion is stated to have taken place in the reign of the Bāna king Bānavīḍvādhirāja. Mr. Krishna Sastri is inclined to attribute this to Mahendra who as above mentioned receives the title of the destroyer of the Bāna race. In an inscription at Kaimbāduru dated in 883 A.D. he is called Tribhuvanadhīra i.e. the hero of the three worlds. This invasion of Pulinaḍu is confirmed by another inscription as well. This record, which comes from Kalakkottur in Chittoor District says that Nolaṃbādhirāja under the orders of the Ganga king started on a conquest of Talakad which was then evidently in the hands of a rival Ganga king and in the course of the campaign asked his chiefs Kuduvetti and Maduva to capture Pulinaḍu. These accordingly took the town of Permaḍi and burnt it. On hearing this Vira Chulamani (i.e., the Bāna king Vijayādityan Vira Chulamani Prabhumaru) started with his army, dispersed the enemy's forces and stabbed several chiefs in a tumultuous conflict. Another inscription at Punganur mentions the name of the Bāna king Prabhumaru and refers to an attack on Kōyarrur identified with Laddigam near Punganur, by one Kōdivatti Muttarasa, who is probably the same Kuduvetti referred to above as burning Permaḍi. In a mutilated Ganga inscription found at Hindupur—included in the ancient Nolaṃba kingdom—the Nolaṃba subordinate of the king is stated to have 'ruled as far as Kāuahi. The record is dated (in words) in Śaka 775 (=853 A.D.) and thus leaves it doubtful whether this Nolaṃba is to be identified with Mahendra himself, whose earliest record as stated above is 878 A.D. or his father Nolaṃbādhirāja Pośāchūra. 'The possibility of the latter alternative is suggested' writes Mr. Krishna Sastri 'by goddess Padmavati, conformed by the gift of a sword and the promise of a kingdom. Mādhava, with a shout, at once laid hold of the sword and struck with all his might at a stone pillar, when the pillar fell in two. What this pillar (śila-sthambha) was, it is difficult to understand, but in one place it is described as the chief obstacle in the way of his securing the throne (Sivamu Belgola 54). This feat is mentioned in nearly all the inscriptions that refer to Dādiga and Mādhava. The ācharya recognized this as a good omen, made a crown from the petals of the kāmkara blossom, and placed it on the heads of the brothers, giving them his peacock fan as a banner, and in due course, providing them with an army, invested them with all kingly powers. The kingdom thus founded was named Gangavādi, a Ninety-six Thousand country. He also impressed upon them the following counsel —

If you fail in what you promise, if you dissent from the śiva śāsana, if you take the wives of others, if you are addicted to spirits or flesh, if you associate with the base, if you give not to the needy, if you flee in battle,—your race will go to ruin

Thus, with Nandagiri as their fort, Kuvālaia as their city, the Ninety-six Thousand country as their kingdom, Victory as their companion in the battlefield, Śiṇēndra as their god, the śiva mātṛa as their faith,—Dādiga and Mādhava ruled over the earth. The north, touching Māandale, the east, Tondanād, the west, the ocean in the direction of Chera, the south, Kongu,—within these limits of the Gangavādi Ninety-six Thousand did the Gangas undertake the subjection of all enemies. Most of this is no doubt legendary, but some truth may perhaps underlie the narrative, and with the arrival of Dādiga and Mādhava at Perui we seem to be on solid ground. For, Perui must be the place in all Nolamb's Pallava inscriptions from Mahendra in Paragadda 45 (of about 880) to Nanni Nolamba in Mullagal 122 (I C V) of 909 represent the kings as ruling the kingdom of the world i.e. as without acknowledging any paramount power over them. Nalinivavadi seems to have been the main portion of their kingdom which we learn from inscriptions to have extended as far south-east as the Srivastapur Taluk and as far south as Dharmasपुर. Apparently after the death of Ayyapa in battle about 915 A.D. the kingdom was divided for Sorab 474 (I C VII) of 914 A.D. speaks of the time in the near past when the kingdom was under one king. Ayyapa is also known from inscriptions as Nanniga Nannigastava Nchayya Nolambadhiraja (M.F.R. 1910 1911, Para 81 M.A.R. 1918 Para 81 and M.F.R. 1921 In No. 1011 and as Bira Nolamba (M.F.R. 1919 Para 1). We have for him the dates 918 A.D. 920 A.D. and 929 A.D. (F.C. IV Dodballapur 9 F.C. VII Sira 79 and F.C. VI Kadur 6). As he fell in a battle with Chālukya Bhīma who reigned between 931-945 A.D. he must have died some time after 931 A.D. and some time before 945. He married the Ganga princess Pollabharasi by whom he had a son Anogga (M.F.R. 1911 Para 14f, who succeeded him having first been a governor under him as stated above. He was also known as Annayya or Bira Nolamba. In an inscription dated in 931 A.D. (E.C. V Chintāmanī 43 and 44) he is described as being at peace and in the enjoyment of sovereignty. As his father should have been still alive and ruling in 931 A.D. it can only be inferred that he was joint ruler with him in 931 A.D. An inscription at Guniwarubagal in the border district of Anantapur gives him the Saka date 858 (=936 A.D.). This inscription mentions a Siva temple of Nolambāvara and a Siva teacher named Varunasiva Bhatōra and the grant he made with the mahājans of the village in connection with the cultivation being descended from Kanva. Mr. Rice has, in the last edition of his work, thrown out a faint suggestion that the Kanva of the Ganga dynasty might be traced back to the Kanva of the Kanva dynasty. The Kanva dynasty succeeded the Sunga dynasty about circa 73 B. C. (see art.) and ruled according to Puranic tradition for some forty-five years. They were apparently of Brahman descent and are known also as Sungabharthas or Kanva-yana kings. The Kanvas, as has been seen, were the successors of the Sungas, who were the successors of the Mauryas. Seeing that parts of the Nanda and Maurya dynasties held away over Mysore, it is possible that the Kanvas, as indeed their successors the Andhas, did also secure a footing in the State in very early times. If this suggestion proves acceptable, the Gargas might represent a Kanva off-shoot in the south. Their connection with the name Ganga would, in view of the northern origin of the Kanvayanas and their close connection with and rule over the Maurya Empire, be well justified. The change of religion of the early Ganga kings from the Brahmanism of the Kanva kings cannot prove an insuperable objection to the consideration of this suggestion, for such change seems not only common on the part of dynasties and kings but also seems to have been insisted upon by the Kshatriya Simhasthans as a sine qua non for his taking the interest in the two boy-princes Dadiga and Adadhava. The Kanvas ruled during disturbed times and it is not wholly impossible that some scion of the family emigrated South in search of a throne. The last of the Kanvas is said to have died about 25 or 27 B. C. by a king of the Andhas, who was then in possession of a large tract of territory. It is, however, to be noted that the Kanvas cannot have been living from sea to sea, the emigration cannot have taken place later than the close of the 1st century B. C.

been tentatively read by Mr H Krishna Bastri as Irula. From the date recorded he infers that Irula should have been a predecessor of Diliparasa said to be the last of the line. What became of Irula and how long he ruled is not known. He was apparently succeeded by his nephew—Anniga's son—Dilipa or Iriva Nolamba. He was also known as Nolapayya or Nollipayya. He had the Vaidambas and the Mahavahas under him (F C \ Bowringpet 4 Kolar 4 and Mulbagal 126). For him we have the dates 943 948 961 and 966 (F C \ II Sira 28 and 35 F C \ Chintamani 49 Mulbagal 126 and Kolar 215). An inscription dated in Sala 88 (=A D 963) has been found at the choultry at Agali just across the Mysore State border in the Madakapura taluk of Anantapur District (M F R 1918 Para 21). Tribhuvana kartaradeva the Saiva guru of Āvami lived in his time and was probably his guru. He was called Kalivuga Rndra and died in 961 A D (F C \ Mulbagal 65). Dilipa fought a battle against the Ganga king Butuga or his son Mārasimha (M F R 1917 Para 85). An inscription of the 20th year of his coronation on the sluice of the tank at Banahalli Hoskote taluk, records its construction by some local gacundas. If his earliest inscription, dated in 943 A.D. is his coronation year, then the date of this inscription would be 968 A D which is well within the period of his rule. Apparently he fought against the Chōlas, under the banner of the Rashtrakuta king Krishna III whose occupation of the Tondaimandalam part of the Chōla kingdom is well known. An inscription at Madakapura Anantapur District dated in 948 A D, records the interesting fact that Dilipa fought the battle of Ipli against Gajankusa Chōla (identified with Rājāditya, the son of Parantaka I, who was killed by a feudatory of the Rashtrakuta king Krishna III) and that some of the best archers of the time served under him in obedience to the commands of the Ballaha king (identified with

Gangam Plates of Mārasinga Bīyappa Lōka-Tīnētra Yuvārāja (Mārasimha), Gāṅgikēre Plates of Rānavikrāmayya (Nītimāga I), the Tagare Plates of Polavīa (either identical with Mushkara or a brother of his), the Narasimharajapura Plate of Sripurusha and his son Sivamāra, the Kondunjeruvu Plates of Avinita, the Nallala Plates of Divinita, the Chūkkutūru Plates of Simhavarma, son of Krishnavarma, the Kulagana Plates of Sivamāra and the Kandāsala Plates of Mādhavavarma. The following are wrongly dated, in the sense that the particulars given for the dates do not work out correctly — The Tanjore Plates of Aivaraman are dated Saka 169 Prabhava, Phalgunā Amāvāsya Bhīgu. But it is found on checking that Phalgunā Amāvāsya of Saka 169 (=248 A D) fell on Sunday 12th March, 248 A D, but not on Thursday as stated in the Plates. Similarly the Tagare Plates of Mādhava III are dated Saka 272 Sādhānna, Phalgunā Amādvāra. But Phalgunā 30 of Saka 272 (=350 A D) fell on Thursday the 14th March 350 A D but not on Sunday. The Meikara Plates of Avinita are dated Saka 388 Māgha Suddha 5 Somavāra. But Māgha Suddha 5 of Saka 388 (=466 A D) fell on Tuesday the 27th December, 466 A D and not on Monday as stated in the Plates. Likewise the Javali Plates of Sīpuruśa are dated in Saka 672 Vaisākha 5 Somavāra of Saka 672 (=750 A D), which however, fell on Thursday the 16th April of 750 A D and not on Monday. Similarly the Hosur Plates of the same king are dated Saka 684 Vaisākha Suddha 15 Sukravāra. But Vaisākha Suddha 15 of Saka 681 (=762 A D) fell on Tuesday the 13th March, but not on Friday as stated in the grant. Likewise, the Manne Plates of Mārasimha are dated Saka 719 Ashadha Suddha 5 Soma. But Ashadha Suddha 5 of Saka 719 (=797 A D) fell on Sunday the 4th July and not on Monday. The Narasāpura Plates of Rājamalla are dated Saka 824 Phalgunā Suddha 5 Buddha. But

Nolanibavāli encamped at Kolar in the Gangasaviri district and conferred on a private individual the rank of an officer with a village in Pāṇṇadu (Punganur) as a personal gift. Mr. Krishna Sastri thinks that this statement of Vira Mahendra's campaign in the Chōḷa country may be accepted as a fact. He suggests that it indicates that during the slack rule of the Chōḷa kings subsequent to the death of Parantaka I and the sweeping conquest of the Rāshtrakuta king Krishna III who took Kānchī and Tanjore and planted a pillar of victory at Rameswaram, the Nolamba descendants of the great Mahendra I took service under the Rāshtrakutas and perhaps helped the latter in their invasion of the Chōḷa country. Future researches must clear up the exact relationship that existed between Vira Mahendra and the Rāshtrakuta king Krishna III. The Chōḷa country and to have been invaded by him may not refer to the Chōḷa territory proper but to the province of Tondamandalam which formed the northern portion of the Chōḷa kingdom and was completely overrun by Krishna III (M. F. R. 1913, Para 14). As Krishna III ruled from 979-968 A. D., the period of Vira Mahendra might have extended to the end of that reign seeing there is an inscription of Polalchēra II dated in 965 A. D. (see above). This Vira Mahendra has been identified with the Nolamba Pallava king Maydammarasa who is said, in an inscription copied at Hologol in the Rayadrug Taluk, Bellary District, dated in 977 A. D., as ruling at Fragnru (M. F. R. 1924, Para 4). But this suggestion has to be doubted because the Gangas had overrun the Nolamba Pallavas before 974 A. D. The Maydammarasa of this inscription should be a later king of that name, probably a son of Vira Mahendra who assumed his father's best known title. Similarly it has been suggested that the Indra or Indradeva who is referred to as ruling over Nolambanādo in inscription No. 47 found at Madigero in Chintamani taluk, Kolar

- (3) the general rudeness of execution of the plates,
- (4) the disagreement of palaeography with the given period,
- (5) the unduly long periods of reign assigned to several of the kings,
- (6) suspicious forms of the names given to the engravers of and the witnesses to the grants, and
- (7) the lack, in some cases, of external or internal evidence corroborative of the statements in them

It is some of these defects, coupled with the want of dates or the inaccurate character of the dates given which induced the late Sir John Fleet at one time to condemn the whole series of Ganga Plates as spurious and even stigmatise the dynasty itself as the fabrication of interested persons. His criticism of Mr Rice's attempts to resuscitate this long-forgotten dynasty is too well-known to need further iteration here (see H. I. III 171-3), the more so as he, just before his much lamented death, showed an inclination to recede from the extreme position he had taken. What inclined him to revise his views was first the discovery of lithic inscriptions of undoubted Ganga kings, e.g., of Sripurusha (788 A.D.) whom he treated as a historical personage, though he consigned his predecessors as mythical characters, and then the discovery in 1913 of the Penukonda Plates of Madhava III by Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sastri, whose characters, language and orthography—though it is undated like many other Ganga plates—impressed him so highly that he pronounced it as “genuine” and assigned it to about 475 A.D. His words (see J. R. A. S. 1915, 471-472) are worth quoting as they succinctly sum up his views in the matter —

“This new record from Penukonda is in Sanskrit and in characters of an early type of the alphabet of Western India. It gives a short pedigree Its object is to recite that Madhava II granted to a Brahman . . . 65 plots of fell in the action. His son apparently succeeded him. Hoote III (I C IX) shows that the Chola king Rajaraja had established him self in the Vijayamangalam area and that Gannaraja son of Araya was acting as governor under him. But a Nolambadhiraja Chiraya continues as a Nolamb Pallava ruler under Rajaraja in 1010 A D (I C X Mullagal 203 and Chintamani 116). Mr Rice identifies him with the one of the same name mentioned in Mullagal 84 (I C X) as having escaped the general massacre of his family.

About this period (Circ. 1010 A D) the Nolamb Pallavas went over from the Cholas to the Western Chalukyas. Hampi on the Tungabhadra in the west of Bellary became now the capital of the Nolambas. One Jagadekamalla Nolamb Pallava was ruling the kingdom in 1022 A D (I C XI Malakambur). He was apparently subordinate to the Chalukya king Jayasinga Jagadekamalla. Udayaditya entitled Nolamb Pallava Perumnanadi was ruling in 1030 A D under the same Chhalukya king (Ibid Davangere 71). Then came Nolamb Pallava Perumnanadi II under the same Chhalukya king. He was ruling in 1037 A D (Ibid Davangere 126). Next we hear of Nanni Nolamb Pallava ruling Kadamballige in or about 1042 A D. The then Chhalukya king was Trailokyamalla after whom he calls himself. This Trailokyamalla has been identified with Somesvara or Ahavamalla who ruled from 1040 to 1069 A D (Ibid Davangere 124). He was ruled with extended authority in 1045 A D (Ibid Davangere 20). Perhaps Narasimha followed him, as we see him ruling over Kadamballige and other provinces under the same Chhalukya king in 1054 A D with his son Chiraya as governor under him at Uchchangi. The Chalukya king Somesvara entitled Trailokyamalla married a Pallava princess by whom he had a son Jayasinha who took the inscriptions on copper plates are 'spurious,' and only those on stone genuine, is on the face of it unsound and paradoxical. Why should a line of kings issue chronicles of their past which are true and to be accepted as such when on stone, but false and to be rejected when on metal? Especially when, as here, such stone inscriptions as have survived, even for the early periods, confirm, so far as they go, the accounts on the metal plates, which, being portable and indestructible, have more easily been concealed and preserved. In fact, it is not uncommon for a stone inscription to state that the grant recorded in it was also engraved on a copper-plate.

Under the Western
Chalukyas

"Then a condemnation, perhaps for a discrepancy in the week day of the date, as sometimes happens, is not a sufficient reason for rejecting them as altogether false. Dr. Fleet has himself said that 'the fact that a date has been recorded accurately does not prove the authenticity of a record, any more than an incorrect date proves that the record in which it is put forward is spurious.' This completely cuts away the ground from under the feet of those who insist unduly upon the value of such testimony, though it is not to be disregarded.

"As regards the palaeography, again, although changes have undeniably taken place in the forms of certain letters from time to time, it is impossible to draw a hard and fast line, as Dr. Fleet does at the year 804, for instance, and to lay it down that a particular form cannot occur before that, in which particular he has been shown to be incorrect. The standards, therefore, by which he proceeded to judge the Ganga copper plate grants and reject them as 'spurious' were themselves in need of revision and correction. Approaching these grants with pre-conceived ideas, it be found that the facts did not support his views well, so much the worse for the facts."

Since he wrote this—and his list includes discoveries of Ganga Plates only up to and inclusive of 1917 and not later—many other discoveries have been made and some of these undoubtedly stand the test prescribed by Sir John Fleet. Prominent among these are the Plates of Polavira, Kantavita, who was probably either Mushkara appears not as a Chola feudatory but as a Chola (E.C. V. Gopichand 57). Apparently the Cholas viewed with disfavour the activities of Chola feudatories. Probably with their aid the Pandvas of Uchchangi came into view as governors of the Nolambavadi province. Tribhuvanamalla Pandva was ruling it about 1033 A.D. and he is described as the defector of the designs of Rajaraja Chola (E.C. VII Channagiri 33). He was the younger brother of Tribhuvanamalla Nolamba Pallava Perumnanadi, the Jayasimha above mentioned (I.C. XI Davangere 155). About this time the capital of the kingdom had been transferred to Boltur identified by Mr. Huce with Bottur near Davangere (I.C. XI Davangere 1). In 1121 Rava Pandva was ruling the province from the same place (Ibid. Davangere 2). In the succeeding year the capital was moved back to Uchchangi where it remained (I.C. VII Channagiri 61). Rava Pandva had a Pallava (i.e. Nolamba Pallava) feudatory under him. Vijaya Pandva ruled apparently from 1113 to 1140 A.D. (I.C. XI, Davangere 4. E.C. VII Channagiri 39 and 39). At the time of Bijjana the Kalachurya king in 1160 A.D. Palatta Pandva was ruling Nolambavadi (I.C. XI, Holakere 166). A Pallava (i.e. Nolamba Pallava) is mentioned in 1160 A.D., but no name is given (Ibid. Davangere 118). In 1184 A.D., Vijaya Pandva appears to have been ruling Nolambavadi (E.C. XI Chitaldrug 18). In 1205, we have a Pallava prince, Machi Dēva, as a feudatory to the Hoysala king Ballala II. (Ibid. Chitaldrug 2). His descent is given for three generations. He was ruling over Halketti (Ibid. Chitaldrug District) and the adjacent parts (Halketti, Mysore and Coorg 57 to 59). There is no precise evidence to show that Nolamba-Pallavas exercised an extent of power over parts of the present Bellary District (Mysore Gazetteer L. II. 333). In the Tamil country, the Pallavas appear to have taken service under the Cholas after Aditya's conquest of the Gangai-Pallavas about the end

As issue involved in this half-a-century old controversy suggested by Dr Shama Sastri, if the Chūkkutur Plates of Simhavarma, son of Krishnavarma, the Kondanjeruvu Plates of Avinita and the Nallala Plates of Duvinita, which are similar in characters, language and orthography to the Penunkonda Plates, from which the Kondanjeruvu and Nallala Plates are not far removed in point of time, and whose genealogical tables could—even without assuming the theory of "three different branches springing from Madhava I" proposed by Dr Shama Sastri—be reconciled, there is no reason to disbelieve the existence of a Ganga dynasty up to the time of Duvinita. From Duvinita to Srivikrama is only two steps. Of Srivikrama, we have a stone inscription at Kallur in Srivivaspur Taluk (M A R 1916-1917, para 77), of his successor Bhuvikrama, we have a stone inscription dated in Saka 556, or 634 A D (M A R 1915-1916). Of Sivamara, the next ruler, we have a lithic inscription at Bhaktarhalli, Hoskote Taluk. Of Srivunsha, whose existence is accepted as proved from lithic inscriptions by even Sir John Fleet, we have stone inscriptions at different places. We have for him the Saka date 710, or 788 A D., in the stone inscription at Halkur in the Siru Taluk. (M A R 1819, Para 76). Inscriptions of his 7th and 27th years have been found at Oddapatti, Salem District. Fleet assigns for him, as probable, the dates 765 to 805 A D. The archaic character of the lithic inscriptions with which his name has been coupled supports this view. Thus, of the five kings mentioned from Duvinita to Srivunsha, four are found named in stone inscriptions and their existence cannot therefore be doubted, the more so as the existence of those who preceded them from Duvinita upwards cannot now be doubted, as the Penunkonda, Chūkkutur, Kondanjeruvu and Nallala grants have to be accepted as genuine, and those who succeeded them from Sivamara II downwards have been generally admitted as

th these things could be done without Royal license (See 577 B V pp 206-207)

The Hāhūr plates show that the kings of the time encouraged high Sanskrit education. In Bahur (called Bahurpāṇi in the inscription) was a vidyāsthana or college to which three villages in the neighbourhood were granted by a member of the Bāṣi family and a descendant of the Kuru race. He was the minister of Nripitunga who issued the order for the grant. The college referred to appears to have consisted of 14 ganas and was controlled by the learned men of the village being organised and maintained by them as the Ganges descending from the sky with all the fury of its rushing waves is borne by god Hiva on one of his matted locks. The order conveying the grant which as usual excluded all previous grants and expropriated former owners was communicated to the assembly of Bāhurnāḍin (nāṭhā) who on receiving it obeyed it by placing it on their heads circumambulated the village planted stone and milk bush and drew up the necessary document (aranyajit). This grant for the advancement of learning is interesting as indicating the esteem in which learning was held at the time.

The Tandantōttam plates refer to a grant of land which being converted into a village was made over to the donees who were 308 Brahmins of different gotras and śāstras. To judge from their names and titles they should have been all learned men, specially selected as fit persons for receiving the gift. The temple (probably of Vishnu) got 5 shares while the Śiva temple received 2 shares. One share was allotted to the reader of the Bhārata which was apparently recited in the Assembly Hall. At this Hall we are told provision was made for pouring water and for lighting fire for which a share was reserved in the grant. The donees seem to have belonged to different parts of the country some

Madhava I, Madhava
namahadburaja

2 (Kanya) Madhava II
(Circ 240 A D)
Nandi C P
Kandasala C P of 9th Hegnal year

Dadiga

Gatta
Kereg
Debu
A D Prab
Aueh
Biser
(74)

8 Harivarma
Madhava C P 189 A D 98A

19 Narasimha Deva, Satyavakya,
Bhavendanga (Kudlit plates of Marasimha III)

20

(From Iohavadi L I
Circ 960 A D

960 A D

Marula Deva

23 Rachamalla Satyavakya IV, 977 A D Jagadekavira
Kudernu L I (date illegible) ? Circ
Pegun L I Saka 899 Isvara year= Rajavidyadhara
Arumudi Deva

Note—Lithic inscriptions give detailed acc
4 and 64)

but the capital was removed in the 3rd century to Tolkād on the Cauvery, in the south east of the Mysore District. This remained the permanent capital although the royal residence was fixed at Janakonda west of Channarayana in the 7th century and at Manyapura (identified with Manne north of Nelamangala) in the 8th century.

The name Ganga of the dynasty is not an ordinary one. How it came to be its designation is not accounted for. It is impossible to avoid noticing that the only other occurrence of such a name in history is in the Greek accounts relating to the times of Alexander the Great and Seleucus. The Nandas and Chandragupta after them are described as ruling over the Prasii and the Gangaridæ. Ptolemy locates the Gangaridæ in all the country about the mouths of the Ganges with their capital at Gangæ which has not been identified. They are also mentioned by the Latin authors Virgil, Valerius Flaccus and Curtius. Pliny on the other hand calls them Ganga-ridæ Calinga Gangas of Kalinga who as he terms them gens horissima cannot have been very ancient (Mc Crindle's Ptolemy's Geography I A. VIII 805). We know from inscriptions that there was an important line of Ganga kings in Kalinga in the 7th and 8th centuries, and Ganga kings continued there down to as late a period as the 16th century. The connection of the Kalinga Gangas with the Mysore (or Western) Ganga kings who were earlier is admitted by the Kalinga Gangas themselves but there is nothing to show that the name originated with the Gangaridæ Calingæ. Both branches trace their name to the river Gangā or Ganges but the traditions on which the stories of their connection with the river (see below) seem to be based appear to lack credibility. They appear as suggested by Mr Rice, to have been only invented from the name.

Origin of the name Ganga

The following is a list of Ganga copper-plate inscriptions discovered. It brings up-to-date the table given by

List of Ganga copper plate
inscriptions

LIST OF GANGA COPPER-

Name	No of plates	Reference	Date
			Saka	Regnal
1 Nandi (1)	3	M A R, 1914		1
2 Bendigahalli	4	" 1916
3 Tanjore	3	I A, VIII, 212	169
4 Tagadur	8	E C, III, N, 122	188	28 (Bana)
5 (Mudiyannur)	6	I A, XV, 172 " X, Mb 167;	261
6 Tagarti	3	E C, VII, SK 52, I A, VII, 172	279	.
7 Nonamangala (1)	3	E C, X, Mr 73		13
8 Melakote	5	M A R, 1910
9 Pennugonda	8	M E R, 1914, J R A S, 1916
10 Nonamangala (2)	4	E C, X, Mr 72		1
11 Sringeri	5	M A R, 1916		2
12 Do	.	"
13 Bangalore Resi- dency	6	M A R, 1911		25
14 Mallahalli (1)	3	E C, IX, DB, 67, I A, V, 196		29
15 Morkara	3	E C, I, C, 1, I A, I, 862	888
16 Bangalore Mu- seum	5	E C, IX, Bn 141		3
17 Kadagatur	4	" XII, M, 110		4
18 Uttanur (1)	6	M A R, 1916		20
19 Uttanur (2)	5	" 1917		20
20 Mallahalli (2)	6	E C, X, DB 68, I A, V, 188		35
21 Gummaredi- pura	5	M A R, 1912		40

two sons Bhagadatta and Sridatta. On Bhagadatta was bestowed the government of Kalinga whence he became known as Kalinga Ganga, while to Sridatta was given the ancestral kingdom together with the elephant which thence forward became the crest of the Gangas. Subsequently a king named Pravabandhinavarna was born in that line to whom Indra appeared and presented him with five royal tokens or ornaments at the same time uttering a warning that if any king of the line should prove an apostate they would vanish. Giving to Vijaya pura the name of Ahichelhatra Indra departed. Vijaya pura appears as the place from which a Chälukya grant of the 5th century was issued and was probably in Gujarat (see IA VII 211). The Gange line continuing to prosper there was born in it Kampa whose son was Padmanābha. Being in great distress on account of his childless condition he supplicated the śāsana devatā of Padmaprabha and obtained two sons whom he named Rāma and Lakṣmīnara. Mahīpala the ruler of Ujjaini, now made a demand for the delivery to him of the five royal tokens presented by Indra. Padmanābha indignantly replied that they could not be given up and would be of no use to another also that if the demand were persisted in it would be met by force. He then prepared for war, but first sent an army to the south the five tokens along with his two sons whose names he changed to Dadiga and Mādhava accompanied by their sister Ālebbe (Shimoga 64), and forty eight chosen attendent Brāhmanas. The further history continues only in connection with the two brothers. Their line was the Gange line—taḍ anvayō Gangānvayah (EO Nagar 35). On arriving at Perur Dadiga and Mādhava there met with the great Jain Āchārya Simhenandi of the Kānūrgana (or Krānūrgana), and explained to him their circumstances. He took up their cause gave them instruction and obtained for them a boon from the

Name	1	No of plates	Reference	Saka	Regnal	Date	A D
22 Hebbur	6	6	E G, XII, 7m, 28	686	84	c 680	713
28 Halligere	5	5	" III, Md 118
24 British Museum	7	7	I A, XIV, 229			c 720	728
25 Nandi (2)	8	8	M A R, 1911		3
26 Sargur	5	5	E G, IV Hg 4			c 730	733
27 Kondajji Agra bars	5	5	M A R, 1907		7
28 Javali	6	6	E G, VI, Mg 36	672	25	750
29, Islampur	5	5	E I, XII, 48		30	756
30 Hosur	5	5	E G, X, Gd 47, Md 1878	684		762
31 Devarhalli	6	6	E G, IV, Ng 85, I A, II, 165, 870	698	50	766
32 Manne (1)	7	7	E G, IX, NI 60	719		797
33 Ganjam	5	5	" IV, Sr 160			c 800	810
34 Chikballapur	3	3	M A R, 1914		17	828
35 Manne (2)	5	5	" 1910	750	12
36 Galigekere	5	5	E G, IV, Yd 60			c 860	908
37 Narasapura	7	7	" X, KI 90	824
38 Gattavardipura	9	9	" XII, Nj 269	826			904

Cuddayah District still distinguished from other Perura as Ganga Perur. Simhanandi is known from literature and is expressly stated in various inscriptions to have helped to found the Ganga kingdom. He is named by Indralohi in his Samayabhūṣana along with Flachārya (Padmanandi the guru of Śākatāyana) and Puṣyakapada (I. I. VII 20). In Sravana Belgola 51 he is mentioned next to Samantabhadra who belongs to the 2nd century A.D. and the Bāna plates say the Ganga dynasty obtained increase from the great Simhanandi (S. I. I. II 387). In Nagr 35 and 36 he is described as Gangarājyamaṃ māddida Simhanandyaśchārya—the achārya Simhanandi who made the Ganga kingdom. The succession of kings as given from Dadiga and Madhava is in general accordance with numerous records found in all parts of Mysore. Several inscriptions however carry the foundation of the line back to Kāṇva and the Gangas are described as of the Kāṇvayana gotra (see below). Of the places mentioned in connection with the Ganga possessions Nandagiri can only be Nandi-durga and Kavalāla is Kolar but though the Gangas are called lords of Kavalāla pura we know that from an early period their capital was at Talavanapura (Talkād on the Cauvery). Marandale the place given as the northern limit of Gangavādi has not yet been identified though one or two places whose names sound something like it are found in the north of the Kolar District, but the other limits are well known places. Tondanad a forty-eight Thousand province, is Tonda mandala, the Madras country to the east of Mysore the ocean for the western boundary seems to be a stretch of the imagination as Gangavādi, so far as we know did not extend below the Western Ghats. Chūra corresponds with Cochin and Travancore and Kongu with Salem and Coimbatore. It has been mentioned above that the Gangas are described in many inscriptions as of the Kāṇvayana gotra.

LIST OF GANGA COPPER-

Name	No of plates	Reference	Date
			Saka	Regnal	A D
39 Sudi	2	E I, III, 161	4	5	6
40 Tagare	8		860
41 Keregod-Rand-gapura	5		8	(Incom-plete)	c, 6th cent A D
42 Rajapura	2			Middle plate missing	Circa 9th cent A D
48 Narasimharaja-pura	5	" 1919-20		No date given	Circa 8th cent A D
44 Kudur	3	" 1920 21	? 189
45 Kudur	7	" "	Details don't agree 884		962 A D
46 Kondumjeruvu	4	" 1928 24	Saka not given Year? Vijaya Saka	25th year	c 5th cent A D
47 Nalila	5	" "	Saka date not given	40th year	Circa 5th cent to 6th A.D
48 Alur	7	" "	721	8rd year	799 A D
49 Chukuttur	5	" "	Not given	Not given
50 Bedurur	5	" 1924-25	556	25th year	684 A D
51 Kalaguna	5	" "	Not given		Circa 7th cent R(ice) (Fleet)
52 Kandasaḷa	3	" "

certain of their copper plate grants. The total number of Ganga copper plates so far discovered and published is about fifty. These plates generally agree in regard to their text and the succession lists of kings they enumerate except that four of them differ from the rest and from one another in certain respects. These four are the following —

(1) The Penukonda Plates of Mādhava III whose genealogical list is short. (V F I 1913 1914 and F I XIV 331)

(2) The Chikballapur Plates of Jayatīja Dattīya which really concerns itself to a collateral line descended from Jihvīkrama. (V A R 1913 1914 Plate VII also pages 29 30 and paras 63 64)

(3) The Tagore Plates of Polavra which confines itself to three generations from Mādhavavarma III and his son and grandson his great grandson being called Polavra instead of Mūshkara as in the other plates. (V A R 1917 1918 Plate VI also Paras 73 76) and

(4) The Chikuttūr Plates of Simhavarma which also mention only three stages in the succession from Honkani varma but describe as Krishnavarma's son one Simhavarma (M A R 1923 1924 Plate XIV also page 79 89 No. 81)

Some of the differences are it is true capable of explanation but the fact that they differ has to be noted especially in view of the fact that these differences have led in certain quarters to doubts being cast on the genuineness of most of these copper plate grants. Another serious difficulty in regard to a number of them is that they are either not dated, or if dated the details mentioned in them do not work out satisfactorily. Thus the following Plates are not dated — The Nandi Plates of Mādhava II the Bendiganahalli Plates of Krishnavarma, the Nonamangala and Melkote Plates of Mādhavavarmian (Mādhava III) and the Penukonda Plates of Mādhava (III) Simhaverman the Hebbur and the British Museum Plates of Navakama (Sivamara) the Sargur Plates of Prithvivikongani (Sripurusha) the

From the annexed table it will be seen that the dates as mentioned in the copper-plates do not always agree with those available from the lithic inscriptions. For the earliest kings, we have so far had no contemporaneous lithic or copper-plate inscriptions, i e, inscriptions of the time to which these kings themselves actually belonged. There are at least three different sections of the genealogical table which deserve to be differentiated from one another. The legendary part is made up of the kings up to Padmanābha. Even Dadiga and Hūya Madhava or Madhava I belong to the same class, for both of them seem all but shadowy. The earliest lithic inscriptions which refer to them are of the 11th and 12th century A D and belong to the times of the Chālukyas. The Gangas had then ceased to be an independent ruling power. Among these the Kallīngudda lithic inscription (E C. VII Shimoga 4) which traces the descent of the dynasty from the legendary Ikshvāku, Hārischandra, etc., the Tattakere lithic inscription, dated in Saka 1001 A D (E C VII. Shimoga 10), which mentions Dadiga from him, and the Parale lithic inscription (E C VII Shimoga 64) assigned to 1112 A D which also traces the descent of the dynasty from Ikshvāku, Hārischandra, etc., are the most important. The true historical section might be taken to begin from Kīrya Madhava or Madhava II. From Madhava II to Mushakara, we have to depend almost entirely on copper-plate inscriptions. From Srivikrama onwards, we have lithic inscriptions as well, while from the time of Sivamāra, we have an increasing number of the latter, with Saka dates in several of them.

Descended from Bhūvikrama, we have a collateral line of seven generations, ending with Jayatēja. This line is mentioned in the Chikballāpuri copper-plates A Difference between copper-plates and lithic

inscriptions in regard to dates

Collateral Lines

Phalguna Suddha 5 of Saka 824 (=903 A D) fell on Friday the 4th February and not on Wednesday. The Sudhi Plates of Bātuga are dated Saka 860 Vihāri Kārtika Suddha 8 Ādivāra. Kārtika Sudhi 8 of Saka 860 (=938 A D) fell on Thursday the 4th October and not on Sunday as stated in the Plates. The Kādūr Plates of Marasimha are dated Saka 881 Rādhirādgāri Chaitra Suddha 5 Budha. But Chaitra Suddha 5 of Saka 881 (=962 A D) fell on Tuesday the 19th March and not on Wednesday as mentioned in the grant. On the other hand however there are copper plate inscriptions in which the details of the date mentioned work out quite correctly. Thus the Gattaradipura Plates of Rājainalla hatyavākya and Niti and Ntunarga Erigappa is dated Saka 862 Mārgasira 10 Suryavara. Mārgasira 15 of Saka 862 (=901 A D) actually fell on Sunday the 25th November as specified in the inscription. The Alur grant of Yavaraja Mārasimha is dated Saka 721 Śravana Suddha 15 Śrūnavara Śrūnagrahana. Śravana 15 of Saka 721 (=709 A D) corresponded to Monday the 22nd July on which also occurred a lunar eclipse, as stated in the grant. The Bedirur Plates of Bhuvikrama are dated Saka 556 Chaitra Śukla Pakṣe, 10 Bhīrhaspativāra. On verification, the particulars given are found to be correct. The date Saka 556 (=634 A D) has therefore to be accepted as correct. Judged by the same test the Kādūr Plates of Marasimha dated Saka 881 (=962 A.D) seems a genuine grant.

Apart from the different accounts given of the genealogy of kings in certain of the plates and the discrepancies found in many of them, in regard to the dates mentioned in them, a few other arguments have also been advanced for rejecting most of them as spurious. Among these are —

- (1) the corrupt language of the records
- (2) the occurrence of serious errors in orthography

Mārasimha I
Rajamālla entitled Jagattuṅga and Rāja Vidyādhara

Son

Maruḷayya
Būṭuga-Permadi

Breyappa

Vira Vedaṅga

Rajamālla

Breyanṅga

Būṭuga

Maruḷa-dēva

Guttaiya Gaṅga

Mārasinṅga

Gōvindara

Saṅgotṭa Vijayāditya

Mamasa-Gōvindara

Younger son

Kaḷyāṅga called

Rakkaṣa Gaṅga

Barma-Dēva,

Bhujabali Gaṅga,

Permadi-Dēva
(1054 A D)

Bhujabala

Gaṅga alias

Gaṅgarā Bhīma

m Gaṅga Mabhādevī
(1105 A D)

Gōvindara

Mārasimha
(1065 A D)

Nanniya
(1070 A D)

Rakkasa

Gaṅga Gopa

Bhujabala

Gaṅga alias

Gaṅgarā Bhīma

m Gaṅga Mabhādevī
(1105 A D)

Gōvindara

Nanniya Gaṅga

alias Mārasimha and Jayadattaruṅga

m Kanchala Dēvi

(Shimoga 61)

(re constructed

Pattada Basadi

in stone, 1121 A D)

Hermadi Dēva alias Herman Mandabata Bhūpa

(Governor of a nad)

m daughter of Treyanṅga-Hoyasāla

(Shimoga 64)

land in Parvati district. The charter was written by Apapa son of the Goldsmith Arya. In its characters language and orthography this record stands all the usual tests and its execution is good throughout. In all respects it contrasts very favourably with the other records of the same series of which some are plainly spurious and others are to say the least doubtful. And my conclusions about it are that we have here at last a genuine early Ganga record and that on the Palaeographic evidence it is to be placed about 600 A D and somewhat before that year rather than after it. 475 A D seems a very good date for it.

Mr Rice's latest remarks on Fleet's views are summed up by him in F.J. XIV 310 and they deserve to be set down here as they may be taken to finally dispose of this long contested point of the authenticity of Ganga records generally. After giving a tabular list of 10 copper plate inscriptions of this dynasty he writes —

This array of documents provides us with the inscripational chronicles of the Ganga kings of Gangavāṇi or Mysore. They have been found in all parts of the country and of various dates throughout the period to which they relate a period for which but for them the local history is a blank. They present a consistent and consecutive account not discredited by contradictory statements or anachronisms. They are supported and confirmed by scores of stone inscriptions of all periods and by references in contemporary records of neighbouring and other dynasties. They are thus entitled to acceptance as credible and authentic though it would be unreasonable to expect that chronicles for so extended a period of antiquity should be free from all difficulties.

Objections have been raised to them by Dr Fleet who prefixed the epithet 'spurious' to the whole series and this has been simply repeated by others, following his authority. But the grounds of his opposition mainly relate to faults that may be in some cases detected in style or orthography. These however are not such as to affect the veracity of their contents. The basis of his sweeping dictum that all the Ganga to one Govinda Bhatta by Kongunivarma Dhamma-mahādhuja, the first Ganga (prathama Gangasya), in Saka 25, Subākrītu, the 5th of the bright fortnight of Phalguna, Saturday, under the asterism Rōhini Saka 25 corresponds to A.D. 103, but as Mr. Rice justly remarks, "without corroboration from other sources," this can hardly be accepted as deciding the matter, especially as the only other document which professes to give his (Mādhava I Kongunivarma's) date, namely, the Tamil chronicle called Kongu-dēsa rājakal places his reign in Saka 111 (A.D. 189)." Kongu-dēsa-rājakal (see M J L S. XIV 1), moreover, is as an authority only of limited value, it cannot be accepted in any respect unless what it states in any matter is independently confirmed from creditworthy sources. One guide to fix the date of Mādhava I is to ascertain the date of Simhanandi, who, it is mentioned in many inscriptions as a collateral fact, helped him and his brother Didiga in establishing their power. As he is mentioned with Ellacharya Padmanandi, the guru of Śakātāyana, he might be inferred to have lived about the time of Śakātāyana, who, we know, is mentioned as one of his predecessors by Yaska. As Śakātāyana's theory of the verbal origin of names is the sheet-anchor, as it were, of Pāṇini's system, it may not be remiss to conclude that Śakātāyana belonged to a period anterior to Pāṇini, who has been assigned to "about 300 B.C." (Mac Donell's Sanskrit Literature, 431). In Sravana Belgola 54, (Inv. at Sravana Belgola), Simhanandi is mentioned next to Samatābhara, who belongs to the 2nd century A.D. As Simhanandi is mentioned after Samatābhara, the date of Simhanandi cannot be fixed earlier than the period ranging from about the 3rd century B.C. to about the 3rd century A.D. Probably the latter date is nearer the mark. Accordingly, Mādhava I might, until more satisfactory evidence is available, be tentatively assigned to Circa 3rd century A.D.

or his brother, which has been pronounced genuine by Rao Bahadur R Narasimhaiah. Similarly, the Kero godi Rangapura Plates of Rajamalla II, the Narasimha rajapura Plates of Sripurusha and his son Sivamara the Kudlur Plates of Mārasimha the Kondunjeruvu Plates of Avinita the Nallala Plates of Durvinita the Chukutturu Plates of Simhavarma son of Krishnavarma and the Bediruru Plates of Bhuvikrama have been from the point of view of orthography palæography and language, declared genuine. Of these, Kudluru Chukutturu and Bediruru are dated and the rest though undated furnish sufficient internal evidence to be set down as genuine. It will thus be seen that genuineness depends not in the specific mention of a date—right or wrong—in a grant but on its general character i.e., the evidence of orthography language execution, genealogical details and the like. Judged from this point of view the generality of the Ganga grants stand the test fairly well and they establish beyond all reasonable doubt the existence of a line of kings in Mysore termed 'Ganga'—Janhaveya or Ganga kula—who bore honourable rule over it during some centuries together. As has been remarked, even those Plates which are plainly spurious and have to be definitely set down as such do not go far wrong in the details they furnish about the donor and his ancestors and the donee and his parentage. They may often copy matters of this kind from genuine grants. Where they may be expected to go wrong is in regard to the object or time of a grant, which are both capable of verification and check. The ascription of a number of forged grants to a whole dynasty and to almost every member of it extending over a long period of time and containing a long line of descendants seems as much opposed to reason as to well ascertained facts.

Recent discoveries of more Plates of the Pennhonda type have unexpectedly still further narrowed down the

To Madhava I is invariably ascribed the feat of cutting through the stone pillar with a single stroke of his sword, he is therefore the Madhava of the narrative before given, and in one place is described as but a boy at that time. The succession of kings, on the other hand, was through Dadiga, of whom it is said that with the Kaurava army he stopped the army of the Matsya king. Supposing the founders of the Ganga dynasty to have come from Central India, and matured their plans at Perur, in Cuddapah District, for the acquisition of Kolar and the midland and southern parts of Mysore, they would soon encounter the opposition of the Mahavali or Bana kings, whose western boundary was probably the Palur, which is close to Kolar on the east. We accordingly find Kongunivarma described as consecrated to conquer the Bana mandala, and as a wild-fire in consuming the stubble of the forest called Bana. From the east the Ganga princes marched to the west, and are represented as engaged in leading an expedition to the Konkan or western coast, when they came to Mandali, near Shimoga, where, by the advice of Simhanandi, they established a chaturyalya. Probably there was a considerable Jain element in the population of Mysore at the time, over whom Simhanandi exerted his influence to gain their acceptance of the Ganga rule.

Madhava II

Dadiga's son, Kiriya Madhava, or the younger Madhava, succeeded to the throne. He is distinguished as Madhava II by Mr. Rice, Dadiga's brother being termed Hirya Madhava or Madhava the Elder or Madhava I. He was born in Kolar and was the donor of the grant referred to in the Nandi copper-plates. These plates (M. & R. 1913-1911, Pans 53-54) are not dated but have been assigned by Mr. Narasimhachari to about 210 A.D., on the basis of the dates to which Mr. Rice has referred the Tanyore and Tagadiri plates to is stated, specially skilled in the theory and practice of the lessons of political science (Niti-sastra) and—the Kandasale plates add—in the Upanishads as well. He was habitually devoted to the worship of the gurus, cows and Brahmans and attached to his devoted subjects distinguishing between his admirers, feudatories, and loyal subjects and servants. The Bedur plates state that he was a kalpa tree to his followers. He was, we are also told, the author of Dattaka's aphorisms (Dattaka-sūtravṛtti). The Bedur plates refer to him as the expounder of the treatise by Dattaka. Mr Rice took Dattaka-sūtra to mean the law of adoption and suggested that Mādhava II wrote a commentary on the law of adoption. This does not, however, appear to be the correct explanation. Dattaka is mentioned by Vatsyāyana, author of the Kāma-sūtra, as having written a separate work on one branch (called Vaisika) of the subject, at the instance of the dancing girls of Pataliputra. Dattaka may be placed in perhaps the 1st century A.D. (J.R.A.S. 1911, p. 183). Dattaka appears in Kannada as Jattaka. Thus the Hoyasala Prince Breyanga is described in Aṅgikere 102a as abala-jattaka or Jattaka to the weaker sex. Accordingly the Vṛtti that Mādhava II is said to have written should have been a brief commentary on the Vaisika portion of the Kāma-sūtra and not a treatise on the law of Adoption. Recently there has been discovered a Vṛtti or commentary on two Padas of the Dattakaśāstras (see Report of the Madras Oriental Manuscripts Library for 1916-1917 to 1918-1919, page 6)

Mādhava II was, according to various grants, succeeded by Harivarma. This is the name by which he is mentioned in the Tagadur copper-plates dated in Saka 188 (or 266 A.D.), in the Mudiyannur (Bāna) copper-plate grant dated in Saka 261 (or 338 A.D.) and in Kudlur historical personages because most of them are mentioned in lithic inscriptions

The following is a table of the Ganga kings of Mysore mentioned in copper plate grants with dates as mentioned in them and in lithic inscriptions. Dates from Copper Plate grants are noted as CP and those of Lithic Inscriptions as LI

Genealogical
Table of Ganga kings

in war, and having gained great wealth by the use of the bow. The Tanjore grant, already referred to (I A VIII 212), records a gift by him of the village of Oekodu, in the Maistur-nad Seventy (identified with Valakodu in the east of Mysore Taluk, near where Hanah, one of the boundary villages mentioned in the grant, still exists) under circumstances which recall to mind stories of religious disputations recorded by Hiuen-Tsang. A Buddhist disputant named Vādimadagajēdīa (literally, a rutting elephant as a disputant) in the pride of his learning alighted to the main door of the palace at Talavana-pura (i.e., Talikāḍ) a yati (a written palmyra leaf) as a challenge in which he asserted the claim that he was the foremost scholar in logic, grammar, and all other branches of learning. On this a Brahman named Mādava-bhātta put his pretensions to the proof before the king, and when the opponent denied the existence of the soul, established its existence, and with the elephant-goad his speech forced him to crouch down like a vanquished elephant. The king being pleased, gave the victorious Brahman adversely the title of Vāḍibhasmīha (a lion to the elephant disputant) and with it the Oekodu village. As Mr Rice remarks, whatever objection may be taken to this copper-plate inscription on palaeographical or other grounds, it must be admitted that "the details related in it are singularly in keeping with its professed period." With this story may be compared the dispute of Deva Bōdhisatva, the disciple of the famous Nāgārjuna, with the heretics of Vaisali and of Asvaghōṣa's dispute with a Brahman mentioned in Hiuen Tsang's travels in India (Si-yu-ki or Buddhist Records of the Western World, 97 and 100). As Hiuen-Tsang belongs to the 7th century A D, this mode of dispute seems to have continued in India even at the time of Hiuen Tsang's visit to it. The Tagadur grant (H C Mysore I, Nanjangud 122) records the gift of tions numbering 52 in all, which have been so far

Mr Rice in E I, XIV No 24 pages 337 to 339

PLATE INSCRIPTIONS

King or Ruler	Donor	Engraver	Remarks
7	8	9	10
Mādhava (II) Krishna varman Arivarman ...	Brāhman do ..	Sripala Mātrivarma
Harivarman ... Do ...	do .. Gavunda ..	Vijayaśarm Āchārya Nandivarma Āchārya.	...
Tadangala Mādhava (III) Mādhava varman Do	Gavunda .. Jain temple	Inscribed on back of Pl. 1 of this Bana grant and effaced Pl. 5 is blank. At first called the Haribara plates.
Mādhava (II); Sinhavarman Kongani varman (Avinlita) Kongani varman (Avinlita). Senior Queen	Buddhist .. Brāhman .. Jain temple ... Brāhman .. do	Charudatta ... Apepa ... Marishāna ... Papara ...	Pl. 2 missing A genuine Ganga grant of c. 475 (Tloel) ...
Kongani (Avinlita) Do .. Do ... Do (Durvi nita.) Do ..	do ... do ... Jain temple .. Brāhman ... do	Margi	Pl. 2 missing Pl. 5, may belong to another grant (see M.A.R. 1911 para 79) ...
Durvinlita .. Do	48 Brāhmana. 80 do ...	Kongani Pen dattara do ..	Grant by Akāla varaha a mantrin Pl. 5 missing At first called the Maddagiri plates.
Kongani vridha (Durvinlita). Durvinlita ...	Brāhman do
		Kongani Peru- dattakara.	...

personal strength and valour (Dodballapur 68) He married a sister of the Kadamba king Krishnavarma, and is described as the reviver of donations for long-ceased festivals of the gods and Brahman endowments. The Tagati grant of his, in an extraordinary jumble of alphabets, records a gift for bravery at Henguru (I A, VII 172 and H C VII Shikarpur 172). It is stated in this inscription that he forced his way into Henguru and rescued Rajamall's wife and guards. This professes to be dated in Saka ? 279 (= ? 359). Among his other grants are the Nonamangala grant (H C X Malur 73) dated in his 13th year to a Jain temple, the Melokote grant (MA R 1910) to a Buddhist Vihāra, and the Penunkonda grant (H I XIV No 24) to a Brahman. From the last of these, we learn that he was installed on the throne by the Pallava king Skandavarman and that he assumed the additional Pallava name of Simhavarmā. The Skandavarman mentioned in these plates has been identified with Skandavarman III, son of Simhavarmā I of the Sanskrit charters (see ante). The Ganga kings Madhava III and his predecessor Hativarma were apparently feudatories of the Pallavas. Accordingly the earliest time to which Madhava III can be assigned appears to be the middle of the 5th century A D, though he might have been ruling about 475 A.D., the date to which this Penunkonda grant has been assigned. A comparison of the genealogies furnished by the Penunkonda, the Chukuttur and Kondanjeruvu Plates suggest that Madhava III was the son of Vishnugopa, who was himself the son of Hativarma, and that Vishnugopa had two brothers (whether uterine or half, it cannot be said) named Simhavarma and Vinavarma. Yuvaraja These two are mentioned in the Chukuttur Plates. It is possible that Simhavarma of these plates ruled over a part of the country (See MA R 1924, Para 91). In the Shimoga stone inscription (Shimoga 4),

PLATE INSCRIPTIONS—contd

King or Ruler	Donee	Engraver	Remarks
7	8	9	10
Nava Kāma (Sivamāra.) Prithivi Kongani Sivamāra Nava kāma ..	? .. Brāhman .. do Vīśvakarma Āchārya. ...	Pl 3 and 5 missing Grant by request of the two sons of the Pallava Yuvardja Grant by Ereganga.
Prithivi Kongani (Sripurusha) Prithivi Kongani (Sripurusha) Sripurusha ..	do ... 12 Brāhmana. Brāhman	... Kunt Āchārya ... Vīśvakarma Āchārya	King has the title of Hanabhaṣana. ...
Prithivi Kongani Sripurusha ..	do	do	Ranavikramarasa (Vijayāditya), govern ing (? Keregod) add.
Do ..	do	Grant by Vijayāditya when at Asandi
Do ..	do ..	Vīśvakarma
Do ..	Jain temple ..	Vīśvakarma Āchārya.	At first called the Nagamangala plate.
Mārasimha Loka Trinētra Yuvardja. Mārasinga Breyappa Loka Trinētra Yuvardja. Jayatīja Dattiya.	do Brāhman .. Siva temple	do	With his permission grant by a Pallava The date is that of Rāshtrakūṭa Pra bhutavarsha Jagat- tunga.
Satyavākya Kongani varman Rājamalla Ranavikra mayya (Nītimārga I). Rājamalla Satyavākya. Rājamalla S tyavākya and Nītimārga (Breyappa)	Brāhman .. do Jain temple Brāhman ...	Madhurovaṣa. Marikēḥ Vīśvakarma Pl 1 and 3 missing

consternation of his attendants, he plunged into the river and crossed over in safety, though it was in full flood, thus acquiring the name of Churchnuvāyda Ganga. Both he and his son are said to have been like Manu in maintaining the castes and religious orders of the South. Five grants of his reign have been found of the 1st, 2nd, 25th, 29th and 36th years. The first and last are to Jain temples and the others to Brahmans. In 1 he is called Kongunivarma, in 3 Konkarnivarma, in 3 and 4 Kongani, and in 5 Kongani Avanita. The Srigunda stone (Chikmagalur 50) calls him Nirvinita. The Jain temples to which the grants were made were in the Punnad Ten Thousand and one of the grants was by the minister of Akalavarsha (a Rashtrakuta king). The Punnad Ten Thousand formed the southern portion of Mysore, and seems to correspond with the Padi-nad or Ten-nad country of later inscriptions. A grant of the Punnad Rajas, the date of which cannot be determined, has been found, from which their capital seems to have been Kittihapura. It gives the following succession of kings—Rashtravarma, his son Nagadatta, his son Bhu-jaga who married the daughter of Singavarma, their son Skandavarma, his son the Punnata Raja Ravadatta (1A, XII, 13, XVIII, 366). Punnad seems identical with the Pounnata of Ptolemy, where beryl was found. (Col Yule's Map of Ancient India. See Dr Smith's Atlas of Ancient Geography Qadiyur in Coimbatore district produced beryl—see 1A, V 237). The Jain grants are contained in the Nomanangala and the Mercara Plates. The Brahman grants are on the Singeri (which includes the grant of his viruddhu or senior queen), the Bangalore Residency and the Mallohalli Plates. The grant referred to in the Kondanjeruvu Plates is also to a Brahman donee. From Doddallapur 67, we may infer that 431 A D was the first of his year, but as this and Doddallapur 68 (both copper-plates) have been, in some quarters,

PLATE INSCRIPTIONS—concl'd

King or Ruler	Donee	Engraver	Remarks
7	8	9	10
Hōtara Nanniya (Ganga)	Jain temple	..	Date may be 936
Pelayira kantiyalita (7—Mushkara)	Brāhman ..	Not mentioned	Genuine
[[Ajama]] (or his brother Hōtara).	do ..	Vivakarmā chārya	Genuine (cf. Narasimha and Guttavādi plates).
Not known (middle plate missing)	Jain	..	The mixture of characters casts reasonable doubt on its genuineness—Nagari, Urañtha and Old Kannada characters
Sripurnaba and his son Sivamāra	do	Genuine
Harivarma	Brāhman ..	Vivakarmā chārya.	Suspicious
Narasimha.	Jain	..	Genuine.
Avinila.	Brāhman ..	Apāpa, lord of Bānapura.
Durvinila.	do ..	G. Ramesh chārya.
Narasimha I	do ..	Vivakarmā- chārya.	Suspicious.
Simhavarma, son of Krishna- varma	do ..	Apāpa, lord of Bānapura.	Genuine
Bhūvikrama.	Sādā chief Prabhumāra gavunda Bānavidyā dhara.	Ganganārayana chārya.	"
Sivamāra called Sivakumāra.	Jain ..	Not given.	..
Madhava varma.	Brāhman ..	Not given: Composer Sūmavarma of the confidential department.

grants of his belonging to his 3rd, 4th, 20th (2), 35th and 40th (2). These are the Bangalore Museum, Kadagattur, Uttanur (2), Mallahalli, Gummaredipura and Nallala Plates. All these record grants to Brahman donees. The name Durvita, which literally means "wicked" or "ill-behaved," is like, Avrita, explained in the Narasimhacharya plates of Sripurusha, as meaning "ill-behaved or wicked only in respect of Durvita Kali." A similar explanation is given in the Tagare Plates of Polavira (M.A.R. 1919-1920, Para 61 and M.A.R. 1917-1918, Para 74). Of these, the two Uttanur, the Gummaredipura and the Nallala grants have been declared as genuine (see M.A.R., 1915-1916, Paras 64-66, M.A.R. 1916-1917, Paras 75-76, M.A.R., 1911-12, Paras 65-66 and M.A.R. 1923-1924, Para 93). The first set of Uttanur Plates of this king (M.A.R. 1915-1916, Paras 64-66) give us a clue to his date. The numerical symbol used for the date yields the date Saka 400 or 478 A.D. (see M.A.R. 1923-1924, Para 69). As the grant is of his 20th year, his first regnal year should be set down at 458 A.D., which, judging from the date assigned to the Penukonda Plates, seems obviously out of the question. Mr. Narasimhachar assigns the Gummaredipura grant of this king to about 550 A.D., which seems nearer the mark (M.A.R. 1911-1912, Para 68). He thinks that the reference to Jayasimha in this grant is to the Chalukya king Jayasimha, grand-father of Pulakesi I, who is said to have been at war with the Pallavas and to have been eventually slain by a Pallava king. As this Jayasimhavalabha is described as the daughter's son of Durvita in this grant, this synchronism helps us to fix his date. His period may therefore be taken broadly, as suggested by Mr. Narasimhachar, as the first half of the 6th century A.D. Mr. Narasimhachar, however, in his remarks on the Kudur Plates of Marasimha III (M.A.R. 1920-21, Paras 58-59) has shifted Durvita to similar collateral line descended from Rāchamalla III is referred to in the undated Ichavādi lithic inscription which unfortunately is a great deal defaced and is therefore difficult to read. The main line however goes down practically in unbroken descent to something like 21 generations counted from Mādharva I which whenever it commenced, ended only about 1000 A D.

Shimoga 4 furnishes the genealogy of a later line of Ganga rulers. The descent of this line is traced through Marasimha I while additional information on certain of those mentioned in it are to be found in Shimoga 6 10 and 61. It may be remarked that the various steps from Mārasimha I to Garvada Ganga are not reconcilable with the descent as traced in the main line from Mārasimha I. secondly, after Halivanga alias Rakkasa Ganga there is a break in the table set out below. thirdly it is not stated how Barma Deva Bhujabala Ganga Peruvādi Deva was related to Halivanga and fourthly and lastly Hermasi Dēva alias Herma Māndhātā Bhōpa who was the last apparently of Barma Deva Bhujabala Ganga's line was according to Shimoga 64 the son in law of Eroyanga of the Hoysala line.

.

grant, Durvinita is referred to as endowed with the three constituents of regal power (prabhāsakti, mantvasakti and utsāhasakti, i.e., imperial power, power of discretion and power of active will). It was not alone by victories that he gained a name, for he was distinguished also as a scholar. He is said to have written a commentary on the 15th Sarga of the Kṛitānūjaya, the Sanskrit poem by Bhāravi. This Sarga is remarkable for being entirely composed in verbal puzzles and riddles. One stanza contains no consonant but n, with a single t at the end; in another, each half line read backwards is similar to the other half. The Avantisundarīkāvāsā, discovered by the Madras Oriental MSS Library (see Report for 1916-1917 to 1918-1919, page 69), mentions in its introductory chapter that Bhāravi stayed for some time in the court of Durvinita and that he was a contemporary of Vishnvardhana I, evidently the Eastern Chalukya king and of Simhavishnu, the Pallava king of Kānchi. If Bhāravi did stay, as stated in this work, then it is possible that Durvinita, who was a great Sanskrit scholar, might have exercised his skill in commenting on the 15th Sarga of his work, which is full of alliteration and other forms of verbal ornament. The story as told in this work has been thus summarized —

“In the city of Kānchi in the south of India ruled a king of the Pallavas named Simhavishnu who was a great patron of learning. One day a stranger appeared before him and recited a Sanskrit verse in praise of the Nārasmha incarnation of Viṣṇu. On hearing the lofty sentiments expressed in the verse, the king enquired of the stranger who the author of the verse was. He replied thus: ‘In the north-west there is a town named Anandapura, the crest-jewel of Ārya-dēśa, from which a family of Brāhmins of the Kausika-gotra migrated and settled at Achalāpura. Nārāyaṇaswāmī, a member of this family, had a son named Damōdara, who became a friend of Vishnvardhana. On one occasion he accompanied the king on a hunting expedition and while in the forest had to eat

The differences observable in regard to dates mentioned in the several copper plates and in the lithic inscriptions are in the present state of our knowledge hard to reconcile especially in the case of the early kings of the dynasty. The discovery hereafter of a greater number of lithic inscriptions of a contemporaneous character of the earlier kings might clear up the doubts and difficulties that now exist in this respect. The many new inscriptions both copper plate and lithic which have been unearthed in recent years encourage us to indulge in the hope that we have not yet exhausted this source of adding to our knowledge of these early kings. A systematic colligative survey of the State and the British Districts in which the ancient Gangas bore rule would perhaps yield satisfactory results in this regard. These new discoveries might disclose to us for instance more kings between Mādhava I and Mādhava II and between Mādhava II and Harivarman to enable us to bridge over the long hiatus of time that at present exists between these two sets of kings.

Reverend Sir,
I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th inst.

Leaving out of account the legendary kings up to Padmanābha we have to begin with Dadiga and Mādhava I. Mādhava I was the first king and his distinctive title is Kongunivarman, also called Kongolivarman, Kongonivarman and Konginivarman and in a few cases in the Tamil form Kookanivarman. He seems to have acquired this title by his conquest of Konkana on the West Coast. Subsequent kings appropriated the title who are also dubbed Dharma mahādhirāja or Dharma mahārājādhirāja. Mr Rice has tentatively assigned him to about 103 A.D. This date is based on the Kudlūpur stone inscription (EC Mysore I Nanjangud 10) dated in 1148 A.D. in the reign of the Hoysala king Narasimha I. Though dated in 1148 A.D. this inscription recites the fact that a grant of Andiyāla was made

Dadiga and Mādhava I

There is, in Mr Rice's opinion, a great probability that this Durvinita is the one named in Nripatunga's Kavi-rājanidiga among the distinguished early Kannada authors. If this surmise is confirmed more definitely, it will make Durvinita a great Kannada prose writer as well, thus rendering his many sided scholarship really worthy of admiration. The Gummaredippura Plates say of him that he was the son of Jyēshtha, that he was adorned with, among others, the title of Avantasthira-prajāliya, that he was equal to Krishna, the ornament of the Vrishni race and of his lineage, and that he was an abode of matchless strength, prowess, glory, modesty, learning and magnanimity. It states that the grant was made on the anniversary of his birthday in the 40th victorious year of his reign. This inscription also confirms what is stated in Doddallapur 68 and Tumkur 23 and in both the Uttanur Plates that Durvinita was the son of the daughter of Skandavarma (also called Skandavarma-durggāpirāya in the Bedinur Plates), the king of Punnata; that daughter's name is given as Jyēshtha. This princess, as of royal lineage, claimed, we are told in Doddallapur 68, the privilege of svayamvāra by choosing a husband for herself, though from her birth she had been intended by her father, on the advice of his guru, for the son of another. The Uttanur Plates describe him as resembling Vaisnavata Manu in the protection he afforded to the castes and religious orders and as fully able to protect the southern region, as kind to all, and as possessed of loyal subjects. In the Tagare grant of Polavira, he is called Nirvinita instead of Durvinita, while his father's name is correctly given as Avinita. The name Nirvinita occurs in the old Sirgunda stone inscription (E.C. VI, Chikmagalur 50) which has been assigned to about 500 A.D. In Polavira's grant the names Avinita and Nirvinita are explained by adding the prefixes ahita and an-narapa to them, thus giving us to

The following table of Ganga kings with dates has been worked out after a careful consideration of all the copper plate and lithic inscriptions so far published and is given here for purpose of ready reference. The data on which the succession and dates are based will be found in the text below —

	A D
Kenguriratha (Mādhava I)	? 700
Mādhava II	? 730
Hastama	? 730 (150)
Vishnupati	?
Tadavalla Mādhava Mādhava III	470 475
Vishita	? 470
Durvintha	? 550 600
Mulakara Makkara	? 550
Srivikrama	600
Bhadrakrama Srivallabha	? 600 670
Sivamāra I	670 713
Freeranga or Freyanga	Did not reign
Sripurusha Mottarasa	726 776
Sivamāra II Salpata	784 812
Mārasimha I (Durvintha II)	799 853
Dindiga or Pothivipati I	? 850
Mārasimha II
Pothivipati II	921
Nannija Ganga	921
Rājamalla I Satyavākya	817
Nitimārga I	853 860
Rājamalla Satyavākya II	870 907
Bātuga I	870 907
Freyappa, Nitimārga II	887 935
Narasimha Deva Satyavākya	920
Rājamalla Satyavākya III	920
Bātuga II	? 925 960
Marula Deva (contemporary of Rāshtrakūta Krishna III)	? 939 968
Narasimha III	961 974
Rājamalla Satyavākya IV	977
Rakkasa Ganga	981 1024
Arumuli Deva	Did not reign
Nitimārga III	989 999

Perankōvan and the grant of a nettar-patti in his name (M.A.R. 1916-1917, Para 77) As Mr Narasimhachar assigns the grant to the middle of the 7th century A.D., Srivikrama may be set down to about 650 A.D. or thereabouts. Either he or his son Bhuvikrama may be the Vikrama-Ganga mentioned in the Manne Plates of Rajamalla I dated in 828 A.D.

Bhuvikrama.

Srivikrama had two sons, who in turn succeeded him. Of them, the elder, Bhuvikrama, was the son of a daughter of a Chōla king, descended, we are told, from the family of Karikāla, reputed for the construction of embankments to the Cauvery. (Bedirur grant of Bhuvikrama, M.A.R. 1925, No 105) This reference to Karikāla Chōla is interesting as his construction of the embankments to the Cauvery has been hitherto known only from tradition. This is an epigraphical confirmation of the ancient tradition. He is described in the Kuligana grant of his brother Sivamara I that he was a skilful rider, beautiful in body and pleasing to the eye and hearts of beautiful women. He was apparently a great warrior, whose chest was, it is stated, marked with the scars of wounds inflicted by the tusks of elephants in countless battles. He defeated (?) conquered) the Pallava king Narasimhapotavarman in a great battle, and is said to have captured the whole of the Pallava kingdom. Some other details are furnished by H.C.III, Mandya 113 and H.C.XII, Tumkur 23. On account of his successes in war, he received the title of Srivallabha, and in H.C.III, Seringapatam 16, he is called Dugga. He is said to have made Manikuda—in the present Channarayana Taluk—the royal residence. From Mandya 113, we obtain the date 670 A.D. for the end of his reign. His Bedirur grant, dated in Saka 556 or A.D. 634, which has been described to be a genuine one, states that he fought a hundred battles with the Pallavas, whom he eventually

247 A D and 266 A D respectively. On linguistic and palaeographic grounds Mr Narasimhachar however suspects the genuineness of the record. Though the grant mentioned in it may be a spurious one the statements it makes about Mādhava I cannot be treated otherwise than as enshrining what was currently believed about the history of Mādhava I at the time the grant was made whenever it took place. In this sense, a spurious or forged grant has to be of necessity as near a genuine grant as may be possible if it is to carry weight as a document of title to the property mentioned in it. Apart from this aspect of the matter the statements this record makes about Mādhava I are mentioned in numerous other grants including the Kandasala copper plates of this very king (M.A.R. 1925 No 115) dated in the 9th year of his reign. Accordingly the statements of personal history it makes about Mādhava I may be accepted as what was currently believed to be true of him at the time the Nandi record came into existence. Both the Nandi and Kandasala plates refer to him as the son of Konganivarma and describe him as having obtained the honours of sovereignty only for the good of his subjects as a touchstone for testing gold—the learned and the poets—and as an active soldier who had sustained the family name for military prowess by putting down enemies by his own arms. From the words used in this inscription Mr Rice has suggested that he was not at all eager to fill a throne and that he occupied it only for the good government of his subjects. Whether this is so or not, there is little doubt that he held up to himself a high ideal of Government—the good of the ruled. This apparently was his political maxim. He was of a literary turn of mind for both these plates—and many others of a later date—mention that he was a poet and that he had improved his knowledge by acquaintance with the best principles of various sciences. He was, it under one Paddage, a subordinate of his. Also Saivism had about this time come to hold its own against the dominant Jain religion and the Kālamukhas were being patronised. As the 17th regnal year of Prabhūtavāsha Jayatunga falls in 810 A D, Jayateja may be set down to about the beginning of the 9th century and as such probably the contemporary of the Gangga king Prithvipati I of the main line.

Information is still meagre as to the attacks suffered by the Ganggas at the hands of neighbouring rulers. We have referred above to the Rashtrakuta invasion. During the 6th and 7th centuries, while the Ganggas were engaged in their conquests to the east and south, we hear of attacks on them in the north-west. The Kadamba king Virgēssavarma claims (I A VI 24) to have overthrown (utsadi) the lofty (tunga) Ganggas, which apparently indicates no more than some encroachment on their territory, as they were certainly not overthrown in the usual sense of that word. The more powerful Chālukyas, who were invading the South and subdued the Kadambas in the sixth century, naturally came into contact with the Ganggas. Thus Kirtivarma, who reigned from 566 to 597 A D, is said (I A XIX 17) to have inflicted damage (avamaidda) on them as well as on a number of other kings. And in about 608 A D the Gangga and Alupa kings (the latter belonging to South Kanara) are said (H I VI. 10) to have felt the highest pleasure in attending on Pulikeśi. In 694 A D, they are said (Davangere 66) to have been, along with the other principal kings of the South, brought into his service by Vinayāditya. But in this passage the Alupas and Ganggas are distinguished by the epithet manū, which means ancient, of long standing, and of original unminged descent,—unimpeachable testimony to their having been long established in their kingdoms, and that copper plates of Sala (?) 188 (or ? 266 A D) He is mentioned as Arivarma (Tamil form of Harivarma) in the Tanjore copper plate grant dated in Sala 168 or A.D 248 as Vijaya Krishna varma (Krishna being the same as Hari) in the Bendaganahalli copper plates dated in the first year of his reign and assigned to about 400 A D by Mr Narasimhachar and as Āryavarma in the Pennkonda copper plates assigned by Sir John Fleet to about 475 A.D. Of these different copper plate grants the Tagadur, Tanjore and Kādūr ones have been treated as spurious. The Pennkonda and Bendaganahalli plates have been accepted—the one by Sir John Fleet and the other by Mr Narasimhachar—as genuine from almost every point of view. The period of Harivarma will have to be assigned to a time somewhat anterior to 475 A D the probable date of the Pennkonda plates. These plates mention the fact that Harivarma was installed on the throne (abhiśhikṣita) by Simhavarma, the Indra (i.e. king) of Pallavae. Simhavarma I of the Pallava line commenced to rule about 488 A D (see ante). It follows from this that Harivarma should have been anointed king somewhere about the middle of the 5th century A D which if correct would bring the date of the Bendaganahalli grant of this king closer to that of the Pennkonda grant of Mādhava III with which it palaeographically linguistically and otherwise also agrees so well. As the Bendaganahalli grant is of the first year of his reign this disposal of the matter gives Harivarma sufficient time for his own rule and for the rule of his successors, Vishnugūpa and Prithviganga whom some accounts mention, before we reach to the time of Tandagāla Mādhava or Mādhava III the donor of the grant mentioned in the Pennkonda plates. Harivarma is stated to have removed the capital to Talkād situated on the Canavery in the South East of the Mysore District. He is commonly described as having employed elephants

Pallavādhirajas Beginning with Nanyangud 26 of this reign, which records a grant in the Punnad 6000, stone inscriptions become the general rule. A virgal at Bhaktarhalli, Hoskote Taluk, refers itself to Sivamāra. It mentions a Pallava incursion. This may have been a local raid. Mr Narasimhachar assigns it to 750 A D, but it may be more correctly set down to about 725 A D.

Mr Rice thinks that the Ereganga of the British Museum Plates (I. A XIV, 229) who is described as governing Torenad 500, the Kongalnad 2000, and the Male 1000, and who is stated to have made a grant to Vinadi and Kēsadi, the chief temple priests of Panekodupadi, may have been Sivamāra's son, though not so stated and unnamed in the genealogical lists. As the heir-apparent seems often to have been appointed governor of Kengalnad, along with other western provinces, he suggests that Ereganga may have been Sivamāra's son. He might have died before ascending the throne.

Ereganga, his unnamed son

Sripurusha

Sripurusha, the grand-son of Sivamāra I, seems to have succeeded him. As Sivamāra's son Ereganga is not mentioned in the genealogies, Mr. Rice has suggested that he might probably have died before his father (see above). Sripurusha's personal name was Mutārasa, though he is referred to by many different titles and appellations, e g, Mutāya, a variant of Mutārasa, Pritivi-kongani, Konkani-Mutārasa, Pernaṇadi, Sri-vallabha, Baddane, Bhimākopa and Ranabhayama. Of these, Pernaṇadi, wrested by him from the Pallavas and handed down to his descendants, seems to have implied supremacy. The Narasimharajapura Plates, held to be genuine by Mr Narasimhachar, are alone in describing him as the son of Sivulima, who according to the rest of the plates, is the father of Sivamāra, his (Sripurusha's) grand-father. The Narasimharajapura Plates, however,

Appogal village to a garunda (or farmer) who had made important captures in a battle at Henjeru (Hemavati). The Bendaganahalli plates mention a grant made by Krishnavarma of a village named karanra in the Paru vishaya (or Paruvī vishaya) which occurs in other inscriptions, including the Pennkonda Plates. Paruvī has been identified with modern Parigi 7 miles north of Hindapur in the Anantpur District well known for its capacious tank. It is mentioned in early inscriptions as the capital of Bānas (q v) and in the time of the Chola king Rajaraja I it was the chief place of the Paruvī nādu in the Nulambapadi district. The Kudlūr plates mention another grant of his to a Brahman Vedic and Vēdānta scholar. It is that of Bageyur in Badagadhe-nādo Three Hundred. The Kongu Chronicle abovenamed, also mentions a second grant of his at Tagadur (= modern Dharmapuri) in 289 A.D. to Brāhmanas for the worship of Mulaśāhāna Īsvara (I.A. I. 861). This alleged grant has not so far been confirmed.

Harivarman's son Vishnugōpa is as his predecessors Vishnugōpa are described as devoted to the worship of gurus cows and Brāhmanas. He was, according to the Bedirūr Plates, a meditator on the feet of Nārāyana (= Vishnu). His change of faith caused the five royal tokens given by Indra to vanish, as foretold in the original warning. In kingly policy he was, we are told the equal of Brihaspati and in valour equal to Sukra (= Indra). He must have lived to a great age as he is said to have retained his mental energy unimpaired to the end of life. (Dodballapur 67).

His son or grandson was Tadangāla Mādhava whose arms were grown stout and hard with athletic exercises. Of him it is said that he purchased his kingdom by his

Tadangāla Mādhava or Mādhava III.

however Madhava III is described as the grandson of Haravarina his father being Prithvi Ganga who could not have ruled. In the Melekote and Malur grants Madhava III appears as Madharavarina. If the former grant may be taken to be a genuine grant it is inferable that in the fifth century A D there were many resident Buddhists in the Ganga kingdom. This grant records a land grant to a Buddhastva apparently in favour of a Buddhist ribhira. In another part of the grant a hill or boulder known as Sukyanila for the Rock of Buddha) is mentioned as one of the boundaries of the land granted and it is specifically stated that the gold within the boundaries stated and the cloths covering the corpses in the cemetery were also included in the grant. While his grants show that he was tolerant to all the leading religions of his time it is said of him that he favoured the worship of Triambaka (Siva) and revived the donations for long-ceased festivals of the gods and Brahman endowments being dally eager to extricate the ox of merit from the thick mire of the Kaliyuga, in which it had sunk (See Kondanjeru Plates M.A.R. 1923 1924 Page 68 Bedur Plates, V.A.R. 1925 Page 87). He is described as having been over ready for battle and as skilled in the handling of the thirty two weapons. This and the similar grant abovementioned point to encounters with the Pallavas.

The son of Madhava III by the Kadamba princess Arinila was Avinila who was crowned while an infant in his mother's lap. He married the daughter of Skandavarma, Rājā of Punnād. In the Manne Plates of Rājamalla I dated in 828 A D. he is called Kaliganga and there is a distinct suggestion in them to his being crowned while still an infant. Of him it is related that on coming to the Canvory he heard a voice say sata jīri 'a prediction that he would live for a hundred years) on which to the in Saka 710 or 768 A.D., which would be the 62nd year of his reign (M.A.R. 1917-1918, Para 76). We have thus records of his, either copper-plate or lithic or both kinds of inscriptions, from his first to the 62nd regnal year. His date is absolutely fixed by the Javali Plates, which give Saka 672 (=A.D. 750) as his 25th year, confirmed by the Devanahalli plates of Saka 698 (=A.D. 776) as his 50th year, both verified by Dr Kielhorn and Sir John Fleet. These, combined with the Penukonda Plates, assigned to 475 A.D. by Sir John Fleet, serve to regulate the dates of the Ganga kings to the end of the 8th century A.D. Before 773 A.D., Stripurusha removed the royal residence to Manne or Manyapura, in the Nelmangala Taluk, about 30 miles north-west of Bangalore. Bannur seems to be called his town (Tirumakudalurapur 115) and his house was apparently situated there. Before he ascended the throne, he seems to have ruled over Kerekunda 300, and the Elengarnad 70, the Avarya-nad 30 and the Ponkunda 12 (E.C. IX, Hoskote 86 and E.C. X, Bowringpet 13). The latter calls him Madhava Muttaiasa and speaks of the army marching against Mahavali Banaiasa. A vijaya at Tattikallu in Mulbagal Taluk (M.A.R. 1923, Ins. 30, pages 52-53) refers to him as Prithvikongani Muttaiya and as ruling under the Banas. It is not dated, but as it mentions the Banas kings, a synchronism with the Banas kings is established by it. According to the Gudimallam inscriptions, Malli, or Jagadekammalla, was the Banas king under whom Stripurusha Muttaiasa held sway (E.I. XI. 222, I.A. 40, page 104). Maddagni 99 (E.C. XII) says that while Stripurusha was ruling, the Kattas—the Rasttrakutas rose up against Gangavadi. This is confirmed by three vijays at Hiregundagol, Tumkur District, in which certain heroes fell in a battle against Kannaiasa, or Krishna I (M.A.R. 1910-1911, para 74). Krishna I seems also to be referred to as Ballaha, but the Ballaha may be held to be spurious that date will have to be treated as doubtful. Moreover as pointed out by Mr Narasimha char the date of Doddballapur 67 has been based on a misreading of the inscription (V A R 1911 1912 Para 68) which cannot be sustained. Nor does it agree with the later date we have now to fix for Madhava III from the standpoint of the Ponnkonda Plates, which have been held to be genuine on all hands. In the Sringeri Plates he is described as the abode of heroism and in fame exceeding Indra and as unrivalled in managing elephants riding horses and wielding the bow as ever ready to protect his subjects and as in short a Yudhishthira of his age. Though Avinīta's chief queen is mentioned her name is not given in her grant. In the Narasimha rājapura Plates of King Śrīpuruṣa which though not dated are assigned to the 8th century and held to be genuine by Mr Narasimha char the name Avinīta (literally ill behaved) as applied to this king who is called only Konkanivarman in some of the grants is explained as meaning who was so only in respect of the hosts of ill behaved kings. According to Maḷār 72 it might be inferred he was brought up as a Jain, the learned Vijayakīrti being his preceptor. In Doddballapur 68, he is spoken of as first among the learned of unstinted liberality, and devoted to protecting the South in the maintenance of castes and religious order. In Doddballapur 67, he appears as the donor of a village to a Brāhman of Tippur in Doddballapur Taluk, with freedom from all the eighteen castes. He is, at this time represented as holding Brāhmanas in great respect and as being devoted to the worship of Hara (i.e. Śiva). This however did not interfere with making a grant to a Jain a little later. (Mercara Plates in Coorg Inscriptions, No 1)

Avinīta's son was Darvinīta one of the most interesting of the Ganga kings. There are seven copper plate Darvinīta.

The Narasimharajapura Plates, which give the title "Bhimakopa" to him, describe him as undisputed ruler of the whole earth, in whose battles the Goddess of Victory was bathed, we are told, in the blood of the elephants cut asunder with his sharp sword. (M A R 1919-1920, Paras 60-63) That is a contemporary estimate. The Keregodī-Rangapura Plates of Rajamalla II describe him in terms which picture to us his march to the battle. Raging with fury, we are told, at the head of battle, horrid with the assault of heroes, horses, men and groups of elephants, terrific in anger, a brilliant sun in illumining the clear firmament of the Gangga family, a terror to enemies. . . resplendent with excellent qualities in the assembly of kings, a crest-jewel of kings, such was Sri-purusha, whom the poets, we are informed, daily praised as Prajapati or Brahma, and the interior of whose palace echoed the sounds of the holy ceremonies accompanying the great gifts made by him every day (M A R. 1918-1919, Para 66) His extant grants to Brahman and Jain donees fully bear out this statement, as also his great martial qualities. The Gangga kingdom came to be called the Sri-vijaya or the prosperous kingdom during his time, because of the great prosperity it then attained to. Sri-purusha is said to have written a work on elephants, called Gaya-sastha. Apparently he was reckoned an authority in the matter of elephant warfare. He seems to have extended his kingdom towards the north by appropriating a part of what is now known as the eastern part of Bellary. (H C VI, Mudgere 36). This should have been accomplished about the 25th year of his reign or 751 A.D. A grant of his 50th year or 776 A.D. (H C VIII, Nagar 85) shows him making a grant for a Jain temple erected by Kandachchi, grand-daughter of Pallava-adhiraja and wife or Pararamagula, the Niggunda Raja, whose father Dundu is described as a confounder of the Bana family a slightly later date following the synchronism (Durvinita Vishnavardhana I (Eastern Chālukya) and Simhavishnu of the Pallava dynasty) suggested by the Arantsundari Kathāśāra. He has suggested that Durvinita's period may be taken to be between 605 to 650 A.D. This seems a date rather much too late for him though it is quite possible he might have lived quite up to the end of the 7th century A.D. This will agree with the dates of his successors arrived at independently. Several copper plates tell us that he was set aside from the succession to the throne by his father, on the advice of his guru in favour of another (apparently younger) son no doubt by a different mother. This action was apparently supported by the Kādavetti (or Pallava) and Vallova (or Rāshtrakūṭa) kings who (states Chikmagalur 50) placed the younger son on the Ganga throne. But Durvinita found means to defeat this conspiracy for the Gamma reddipura Plates tell us that Lokshmi (the goddess of Sovereignty) of her own accord came and embraced his broad chest. There is reason to believe that he may have allied himself with the Prince of the Chālukya dynasty who then first appeared in the south by giving him his daughter in marriage. The son by this union named Jayasimha Vallabha, was placed on the Pallava throne by Durvinita who had captured the Pallava king on the field of battle. He seems to have extended the Ganga dominion to the south and east, for he is said to have waged sanguinary wars for the possession of Anderi Alottār, (in the modern Colimbatores District), Porulare (? in Chingleput District), Pennagura (in Salem District) and other places and is described as ruler of the whole of Ponnad and Pannād as if he had annexed them (Tumkur 23). These were apparently fiercely fought battles for the Bedirur grant says of them that the number of those who fell in them was so great that it caused bewilderment to the fire of Yama. In the same

Sivamara in the battle of Kaggimogeyur, a place somewhere in Tumkur Taluk, not yet identified. (M A R. 1909-1910, Para 54) This fact is attested to by two vigils at Hingundagal, Tumkur Taluk (ibid.). As Siyagella and Sivamara both fought together against the Rashtrakutas, and Sivamara succeeded to the throne and not Siyagella, it might be presumed that Siyagella was a younger brother of Sivamara. Perhaps the genealogists omit him, because he did not actually ascend the throne, having been slain with Sivamara, thus making room for his other brother Vijayaditya. Sivamara II is referred to as Sivamara-Bhayaappa in a lithic inscription of Sripurusha's time at Kuppelalya, Magadi Taluk. He was at the time ruling over Kunigal-nad, the country round modern Kunigal (M A R. 1914-1915, Para 64). Since we have an inscription of the 62nd regnal year of Sripurusha or 788 A D and none, so far, after that, it is just possible that his son Sivamara II succeeded him about that year. Apparently the succession was disputed by Dugamara, but was opposed by Singapota, the Nalamba king (H C. XI, Challaikere 8). In Sivamara's reign the prosperity of the Gangas underwent a reverse, and they became subject to calamities which threatened the extinction of the Ganga power altogether. These arose from the Rashtrakutas, who had recently, under their king Krishna I, ousted the Western Chalukyas and established their own supremacy. Krishna's son Dhora, also called Dhruva, Nirupama, and Dharaavarsha, who had superseded his elder brother (owing to the latter's addiction to pleasure and indifference to his royal duties, H I 287), seized and imprisoned the king of the Gangas, who are expressly said (Nelamangala 61, H I VI 248) to have never been conquered by others. The motive for this harsh step may possibly have been that Dharaavarsha, having determined to set aside his elder son Kamabha or Stambha in favour of a younger son Govinda,—whom he animal flesh. To expiate this sin he set out on a pilgrimage and finally settled in the court of Durvinita. He is the author of this verse. On hearing this account the king desirous of seeing the poet invited him to his court. The poet caused great joy to the king by reciting his poems. The king gave him a respectable dwelling to live in and supplied all his wants.

Mr Narasimhachar remarks on this story thus —

This extract establishes the contemporaneity of the Pallava king Simhavishnu the Ganga king Durvinita and the Eastern Chālukya king Vishnvardhana (I). This connection of Durvinita with Bhāṛavi affords a clear explanation of the statement in most of the grants that Durvinita was the author of a commentary on the 16th sarga of Bhāṛavi's Kirātirjunga. The period of Durvinita according to the newly discovered work will thus be the first half of the 7th century. And this is exactly the period assigned to the Gummaredipura Plates of Durvinita by Dr Fleet on palaeographic grounds. Durvinita had a long reign of more than forty years his period may be taken to be 600 to 650.

But as suggested before, this is a date much too late for him—by at least half a century—though he might well have lived quite up to the end of the 7th century A.D. (see ante)

He is also said to have been himself the author of a Siddhānta, the name of a nyāsa on Pāṇini always attributed to the Jain grammarian Pūjyapāda. Possibly Pūjyapāda was his preceptor, as the latter's Jainendra belongs to the latter part of the 6th century A.D. (I 4 \LIII, 211) and he was probably a contemporary. Durvinita is besides said to have made a Sanskrit version of the Vaddakathā that is the Bṛhatkathā which is written in the Palsāchi dialect (Gummaredipura Plates, M.A.R. 1911-1912 Para 67 and Uttanur Plates, M.A.R. 1915-1916 Paras 65-66). This makes it clear that Durvinita was an earlier translator into Sanskrit of the Bṛhatkathā than either Sūmadhva or Kshēmaendra.

According to I.A. XVIII 309, his reign extended into that of the Rashtrakuta king Amoghavarsha, who came to the throne in 814 A.D. Sivamara Saigotta is there presented as his feudatory (the solitary instance in which the Gangas acknowledged an overlord), the crowning mentioned, and Sivamara is said to be ruling the Gangavadi Ninety-six Thousand up to Marandale as his boundary. This was the original northern limit of the kingdom and shows that the whole of his territory had been restored to him. He had erected and endowed a Jain temple at Kummadavada (now Kalbhavi in the Belgum District), this was perhaps the place of his confinement during his exile. On his death at Kagi-mogeyur (see ante), it would appear (I.A. XVIII 313) that Kambarasa, before mentioned, who followed him, maintained the endowment. Sivamara also built a basadi on the smaller hill at Sravana Belgola. As the inscription recording this fact is on a rock close to the north-west of the Chandrasaithaswami temple, it may be presumed, as suggested by Mr. Narasimhachar, that this is the basadi referred to in the inscription. A couple of virgals at Sankenahalli and Hengundagal in Tumkur Taluk record the death of his trusted warriors in a war against Balavemmarasa. This Balavemmarasa has been identified with Balavarma of the Chalukya dynasty mentioned in the Kadabab Plates (Gubbī 61) of 812 A.D. His name also occurs in some other epigraphs. (Maddegri 99 and Tipur 10, M.A.R. 1919-1910, Para 46) After the overthrow of the Chalukya power, he may have become a feudatory of the Rashtrakutas and fought on their behalf against the Gangas. Mahamahopadhyaya Haraprasada Sastri suggests that this Balavarma may be the Balavarma mentioned by Sankaracharya in his Bhāṣya IV, 3, 4, whom the great Acharya mentions as being near to him. If this identification proves acceptable, then we have a positive proof—which so far we have understand that the kings were wicked or ill behaved only to their enemies. The full names according to this grant would be Ahitavinīta and Arinaraṇa Nirvinīta. In the Manne grant of Rajarāja I dated in 828 A D Darvinīta is described as a Yudhishtira in virtuous conduct and an expert in the theory and practice of politics.

Darvinīta was succeeded by his son Moshkara or Mokkara of whom little is known. From the Tagara grant of Polavira it appears that Nirvinīta (as above the same as Darvinīta) had a son Polavira who made that grant. His name appears as Kantavinīta (probably meaning well behaved towards women) in it. Mr Nara Simhachar who thinks that this grant is a genuine one despite the fact that it is undated, suggests that Darvinīta had either two sons Moshkara and Polavira or that Moshkara was identical with Polavira. He assigns the grant to the middle of the 6th century A D which seems probable. Moshkara is said to have married the Sindhu Rāja's daughter (I.A. XIV 220). Savage kings are said to have rabbed against one another in paying homage at his feet. A Jaina (Ganga) temple (called Mokkara varati) was erected in his name at Lakshmiṣvara in the Miraj State in the Dharwar District. The erection of this memorial points to an extension of the Ganga kingdom in that direction. From this time the Gangas seem to have adhered more steadily to the Jain religion.

Moshkara's son was Srivikrama of whose reign a stone inscription has been found. He was the son by the Sindhu princess. Of him no particulars are recorded except that he was the abode of fourteen branches of learning and well versed in the science of politics in all its branches. The lithic inscription above referred to is a virgal recording a grant for the death of a hero.

the Yōga system of Patañjali, he next made a deep research into the methods of elephant management as expounded by the great yati 'born from the mouth of a female elephant,' that is, in the Pālākāpyam of Pālākāpya or Kārāyānubhū to which there is a commentary in Kanṇada—as the result of which he wrote his Gāyaśhikam, a poem of a high order, so unique in rhythm and expression that it recited before a dumb man it would enable him to recover his speech (see Nagar 35). This anticipates the 'visual instruction' which is now being used to teach dumb people. Mr Narsimhabachar thinks that Sivamāra's work on Gāyaśhikā (known as Sivamāra matha or Gāyaśhikā), which has not come down to us, may have been written in the Kanṇada language as H.C. VIII Nagar 35 affords some evidence for drawing this inference by the use of Kanṇada words in it (Kanṇadaka-kavi-charite, Edn 1924, I 17). A graphic description of his person and his rule is given in the Alur Plates of his son Mārasimha. As a contemporary document—it is dated in 799 A.D. and is admittedly a genuine grant from every point of view—it is of supreme value. His innumerable wars, his imprisonment, his personal qualities and characteristics, his administration, his bounties to Brahmins, his learning, his poetic talents and literary works, his patronage of poets, his devotion to Viṣṇu are all referred to in it in great detail, but without much exaggeration. The following is an extract from it, too interesting to be omitted —

"His son, with his two lotus feet decked with the garlands on the crowns of kings subdued by his valour, embraced by the goddess of victory forcibly dragged away by means of his sharp bright sword in his arm from hostile kings with whom she so long resided, with his pillar-like arm stretched red with drops of blood oozing from the temples of elephants of opposing hostile kings, split open in front of battle, having his enemies overthrown with showers of arrows shot from his vanquished at Vilanda. This grant is not to a Brahman or a Jain but to a feudatory of his a Sachchudra of the Banas known as Mahavirabhatta Vikramāditya garvnda. He was apparently a descendant of the Banas. The date of the grant is the 25th year of Bhūvikrama's reign corresponding to Saka 556. Accordingly he must have commenced to rule from about Saka 531 or 625 A.D. If that was his last year he must have ruled from about 625 A.D. to about 670 A.D.

Bhūvikrama was in the main Ganga line succeeded by his brother Sivamāra I. But he commenced a collateral line as well which is referred to in the Chikballapur Plates of Jayateja (MAH 1913 1914 Paras 59 61). Jayateja traces his descent from Srīvikrama and mentions amongst his ancestors after Srīvikrama Srīvallabha (i.e. Bhūvikrama) Kaunakari Rāja born in the race of Kannayya (? Kāuva yāna) Parmakulamahādhirāja Ajavarma entitled Kaduvishama Singadi Ajavarma his son Nipateja (probably Nripateja) and then himself as Nipateja's son. Jayateja's alternative name was Dattiya. The grant was made in the 17th regnal year of the Rāshtrakuta king Vṛttabhūja Prabhutavaraha Jagattunga, son of Dharāvaraha Kalivallabha Vena. The donor of the grant was Ratnavali the mother of Bānarasa Daddanaradhīpa and the beloved queen of Bana Vidyādhara rāja. The donor was Javara Dēva the chief disciple of the Kālamukha guru Kālasakti the head of the matha in the temple of Nandi who was to maintain it as a devabhōga in favour of the Siva temple which queen Ratnavali caused to be erected at Nandi. It is inferable from this grant that about the time it was made part of the Ganga kingdom had been overrun by the Rāshtrakutas and was actually in their possession. Jayateja was apparently a Rāshtrakuta feudatory and the Koyatur 12 000 in which Nandi was included was not only the most powerful in all regions but also the most widely spread in all quarters, he conquered by the showers of innumerable sharp arrows discharged by his aim, this king of excelling glory like the sun with his invincible rays dispelling the darkness, certain to raise, entered into his own sphere. He too was like Hari ever revered by devapatti (Brahmans, and Garuda), like the sun duly rising every day, like the world of serpents free from fear (or fearing Garuda), like the ocean unsoiled, though Duryōdhana (a strenuous fighter) yet appreciating the qualities of Arjuna (praised like Arjuna), though the ocean (commander of armies) yet not a refuge for water (fools), though the moon (of patient disposition) yet not united with spots. By the ornaments of the Pallava and Rashtrakuta, the crowned kings named Govindaraja and Nandivarma, was his head wound round with a white piece of cloth (a symbol of coronation with their own hands)."

It is collateral descendants

It will be seen that his defeat of Dhōra or Dhruva, the father of Govinda II, and his coronation by Govinda III himself and Nandivarma, the Gangga-Pallava king, are referred to in the above description. As the grant is dated from "the victorious camp" of Marasimha, it must have been issued shortly after a victory attained by him in battle. This camp might have been at Mudugundū, identified with the village of that name in the present Mandya Taluk.

Marasimha I,
799 A D —?
858 A D

Sivamaia Saigotta, though removed from his country and kept in confinement, never relinquished his claim to his kingdom, and in spite of Rashtrakuta viceroys appointed to govern it, made arrangements to maintain his rights. The grant mentioned in the Gangam Plates is said to have been made by the Pallava princes with his permission. He had two sons, Marasimha and Dindika entitled Prithuvipati I. The former was appointed Yuvavajya and as such was acting as the sovereign in 797 A D under the name Marasimha Breyappa with the title Lōka-Trinetra (Maune grant, E C IX, Nelamangala 60).

their ancestry could be traced back for a considerable period. It also seems to show that they were entitled to special consideration.

In the main Gango line Bhuvikrama was followed Sivamāra I by his brother Sivamāra I. He is mentioned as Sivamāra (also Avanimahendra Sibilra Vinlita Prithvikongani) in his Kulagana copper plates (V. A. R. 1925 No. 106) which might be assigned to about 725 A. D. For him we have besides the Hebbur copper plates (E. C. VII Tumkur 29) which might be set down to about 680 A. D. the Hallagere copper plate grant (F. C. III Mondya 118) of his 31st regnal year, dated in Saka 635 or A. D. 713, the British Museum grant (J. A. XIV 229) of about 720 A. D. and the Bhaktarahalli lithic inscription which might belong to about 725 A. D. (V. A. R. 1918 1919 Para 62). The donee of the Hebbur grant is not known as plates 3 and 6 are missing, while the donees of the rest of the grants are Brāhmins. In the Kulagana record a grant to a Jain temple is mentioned. In the Hebbur and British Museum grants Sivamāra receives the name of Navakama. The Kulagana grant characterises him as 'modest in behaviour and somansas Avani Mahendra' and terms him 'lord of the whole of Punanta and Pannata country'. In the Kargodi Ranganpura Plates of Rājamalla II he is described in eloquent terms as sishṭa priya and nara kama with the remark superadded that his form in destroying the hosts of his enemies was the theme of song. The title sishṭa priya (meaning 'beloved of the god') occurs in Mandya 118 (E. C. III) and is the anapa by which he describes and signs himself. According to this grant he had two Pallava princes in his charge perhaps as hostages or as their guardian which goes to confirm—writes Mr. Rice—the account of his elder brother's conquests. They were the sons of the Pallava Yuvarāja, who is not named, and are called thing, ruled from 794-814 A D. His son Amoghavarsha, who succeeded him ruled from 815-877 A D. We know that Amoghavarsha, was a contemporary of Rajamalla Satyavākya, the Gangga king who, we know, from the Manne copper-plates, began to rule in 816 A.D. The crowning of Sivamara II by Govinda III and the Gangga-Pallava king should, therefore, be presumed to have been completed, if not actually before 815 A D, at least about that date. As in the Alur grant of Mārasimha of 799 A.D Sivamara's coronation is already referred to as an accomplished fact, it must be set down to a date actually anterior to the date of that grant. If this be so, the description of Mārasimha in those plates as issuing the grant from his "victorious camps" shows that he was issued 269 above mentioned should be set down to a period anterior to the installation of Sivamara II by the Rāshtrakūta and Pallava-Gangga kings. If this be conceded, Sivamara should have died sometime later. It is possible that he died sometime after his coronation, say sometime about 815 A D, when he was still ruling (I A XVIII, 309) and was still a contemporary of the Rāshtrakūta king Amoghavarsha. All things considered, the year 817 A D seems as near a date as can be fixed for his death. That he was still alive about 797 A D may be inferred from Nelamangala 60, dated in that year, which describes Mārasimha, as only a Xuvarya, though he is, for the obvious reason that his father was in prison, represented as ruling the entire (akhandā) Ganggaman-dala, and decorating all the feudatories. Sivamara's death should accordingly have occurred sometime between 815 A D and 853 A D.

As Mārasimha I is represented as ruling from 797 A D to 853 A D., and as Vijayāditya's son Satyavākya Rajamalla was also ruling about Saka 750 or 828 A D.

Evidence of Partition of Gangga
Kingdom, 8th
century A D

Dindiga or Pritivipati I

Mārasimha's younger brother was apparently known as Dindiga and bore the title of Pritivipati or Priduvipati or Priduvayya which were probably the popular forms of that designation (see MA R. 1908-1909, Para 45 and 1909-1910, Para 55, see also M. E. R. 1913, Nos 326, 334 and 337 and para 16). Of him, we learn from the Udiyenduram plates (SI I II. 387). He is said to have rescued two chiefs, named Joriga and Nagadanta, one from Amoghavarsha, and the other from the jaws of death. He was wounded in a battle at Vambalguri, and sent a piece of bone taken from his wound to be cast into the Ganges. He witnessed the nivāna of the Jain acharya Arishtanemi on the Katavpra hill at Siavan-Belgola. He was present there with, it would appear, his queen Kampta (MA R. 1908-1909, Para 45). A hitic inscription at the Arkēsvara temple at Karshana-palle, Anantapur District, mentions a Durvinita as the elder brother of Pritivipati. This Durvinita was probably either Mārasimha I or another brother unnamed by the genealogists (M. E. R. 1913, No 326). He was next engaged in a great battle at Sripunambiyam (near Kumbhakonam) against the Pandya king Varaguna, in which, having made good his title of Aparajita (the unconquered), he lost his life. He had a son Mārasimha II, of whom we do not hear much. But he also had a daughter, who was married to the Bana king Bana-Vidyadhara Vikramāditya-Jayameu. Another wife of this king erected the Nandisvara temple at the northern foot of Nandidrug before 806 A.D.

Pritivipati
II

Mārasimha's son was Pritivipati II (Pritivipati) or Priduvipati and Priduvayya. He gained the support of the Cholas, and Virā-Nāyana or Parantaka I of that line, after uprooting the two Bana kings, bestowed upon him in 921 the title of Banadhivaya, together with the name Hastamalla. He is referred to in the Tatanakallu differ in other details also in matters genealogical (See V 4 L 1919 1920 Paras 61 62) For Srīpuruṣa we have numerous copper plate and lithic inscriptions. Among the former are the following —The Nandi Plates of his 3rd regnal year or A D 728 to a Brāhman donee (M A R 1013 1014) the Surgur grant to 12 Brahman donees (I C IV Heghaddavankote 4) which may be assigned to 730 A D Kondajji Agrahāra grant to a Brāhman donee (V A R 1907) in the 7th regnal year and falling in 743 A D Tavali grant to a Brāhman donee (I C VI Mudgere 30) dated in the 25th regnal year in Saka 672 or 750 A D Islāmpur grant to a Brāhman (I J XII 48) in the 30th regnal year or A D 756 Hosur grant to a Brahman donee (E C \ Goribidnur 47 and V J I 5 1878) dated in Saka 681 or A D 762 Devarahalli grant to a Jain temple (I C IV Nagamangala 85 and I A 11 15, 370) dated in the 50th regnal year in Saka 608 or 776 A D and Varasimharājapara grant to a Jain Chaityālaya (V A R 1910 1920) which might be set down to about 780 A D Of lithic inscriptions there are the following the Halkur one dated in Saka 710 or 788 A D and the Oddepatti one, dated in the 7th and 27th regnal years or 733 A D and 753 A D Apart from these three lithic inscriptions actually dated in the Saka era or regnal years there are many others giving no dates but clearly assignable to either about 750, 770 775, 780 or 788 A D (See Table) Tirumakudin Narasipur 1 (E C III) is a stone inscription at Talakāḍu (Talkād) which though not dated is of his first year and accordingly must fall in 726 A D Nagar 85 is of his 50th year or 776 A D Kolar 78 of his 27th year or 752 A D, is a stone inscription of his at Madivala (E C \) and Malbagal 80 of his 42nd year or 763 A D (E C \) We have only one stone inscription with a Saka date for him and that is the Halkar pillar like stone mentioned above, which is dated grand-daughter of Singapota, daughter of Pallavadhira's daughter, the younger sister of Nalambadhira and gave his own daughter Jayabde, the younger sister of Nithimaiga, to Nalambadhira. For, Amoghavarsha was evidently against the arrangement which had been made by his predecessor regarding the Gangga kingdom, and took advantage probably of the hostility and death of Sivamara, and appointed Kamabharsa again as its ruler but with all the Gangga titles as if the legitimate successor, but he evidently did not long survive. For we are told (H I VI, 25) that a chief named Bankesa was ordered by Amoghavarsha to uproot the lofty forest of fig trees—Gangavadi—difficult to cut down. He accordingly captured Kadalā (Kaidala near Tumkur), which was strongly fortified and defended. Having occupied that part of the country, he drove away the hostile lord of Talavanapura (the Gangga king of Talakad). He then sprang like a lion across the Cauvery, and shook the dominion of him who was even able to shake the world (meaning the Gangga). But at this point he was recalled by Amoghavarsha on account of some rebellion at home, which looks like an excuse for his having been forced to retire. But that he took Kaidala may be true, as Tumkur 9 and Nelamangala 84 show us a line of chiefs established there and at Sivaganga who claimed to be lords of Manyakhēta, the Rashtrakuta capital. All the same, the authority on which the above information is based (i.e., in the Konnur inscription, H I VI 25) has to be received with caution, in view of its spurious character. But the Keregodī-Rangapura Plates of Rajamalla II, which have been declared a genuine grant and may be assigned (the date on them is partially visible) to about 878 A D, confirm the recovery of the Gangga kingdom from the Rashtrakutas by Rajamalla I and the attempt made on it by Vankesa (i.e., Bankesa) above referred to (M A R. 1918-1919) Rajamalla I is described in this

Gōvinda II as well. The date of this fight is not known from any of the virgal inscriptions but it might be assigned to about 77, A.D. Śrīpuruṣha's general Siyagella figures in most of the battles fought in this war with the Rattas. He was the governor of Marugare nāḍa 300. Several of Siyagella's chief men appear to have fallen. One of these was the Mārūkode Annīyar (or Annīvar of the three umbrellas) and he was slain in the battle of Pinchannr. Two other virgals refer to the same battle (M.A.R. 1919-1920 Para 51). Another battle fought in this war was at Bāgeyur. In it fell a brother of Śrīrovaṃman described as a lion among Pandita, who is said to have been killed. Another who fell in this war is praised as a Rāma in war a terror to the hostile army and a Purandhara in valour. Unfortunately this hero's name is completely gone in the slab. Apparently Siyagella was one of the sons of Śrīpuruṣha (ibid Para 52). Three other virgals refer to this battle of Bageyur one of which describes Siyagella as an accomplished swordsman. Siyagella repaid the valourous deeds of his devoted dead soldiers by making land grants (volgalcha) in favour of their relations. Siyagella also distinguished himself in the war against the Pallavas. This war against the Pallavas appears to have been the chief military exploit of Śrīpuruṣha's reign. The war ended by the infliction of a crushing defeat on the Pallavas at Vilarde. In Nāgar 85 we read that Śrīpuruṣha slew the valiant Kādavetti (Pallava king) of Kānchi, captured his State umbrella and took away from him the title of Permānadi which is ever afterwards assumed by the Gangas and is often used alone to designate them. A virgal at Hirigundagal Tumkur Taluk tells us that Siyagella was at the time governor of Kesumannu nāḍ and that his trusted followers joined in the war but fell in it (M.A.R. 1919-1920 Paras 51-52). Śrīpuruṣha's great victory over the Pallava king seems to have won for him a great reputation.

as Karna in making gifts, as Sésa in bearing up the burden of the Earth, as Arjuna in war, as an ocean in profundity, as a powerful submarine fire in drying up the ocean of evil deeds of the Kali age, as a strong rampart of adamant in protecting refugees, as Brahma in maintaining (the world) " (MAH 1920-1921, Para 45). This is no doubt hyperbolic language, but the main idea underlying it that Mārasiṃha was a great ruler seems plain enough. He was undoubtedly possessed as much of talent and industry as of valour and truthfulness, which won for him the honoured surname of Satyavākya. Indeed, the Keregodu-Rangāpura grant praises him as excelling Dharmarāja, Subrahmanya and Viṣṇu in his truthfulness, valour and wealth (MAH 1918-1919, Para 66).

If the Maṇe plates of this king are genuine, and there is just a doubt about their authenticity, then Rājamālla I must have commenced his reign in 817 A.D. The grant is dated in Saka 750 (expressed in the words pañcāśad-uttamēśu saptasatēśu Sakavarṣe) in his 12th regnal year, which corresponds to 828 A.D. There is nothing inherently improbable about the date 817 A.D. for his first regnal year, on the other hand, there is every reason to believe, from other sources, that that might have been the first year of his reign. The grant mentioned in these plates was in favour of a Brahman Devāsarma, a Vaikhanasa, of the Kāśyapa-Gotra, for providing oblations, incense and lamps for the Sakti goddess of the name of Kīlābalaretti-bhātari (the goddess of the drawn sword) at the village of Doddavādi in the Manyavishaya, now represented by the village of Maṇe, in the Nelmangala Taluk. Maṇe was, as stated above, the capital of the Gangas. The mention of the Vaikhanasas in this inscription of early 9th century is of interest as showing their existence at that period. The person at whose request the grant was Sripurnasha had several sons by various mothers. The only names that can be cited for any of the latter are Vijaya mahadevi of the Chalukya (Chālukya) family (Islampur Plates, E 1 XII 49) and Vineyattin unnadi which seems more a descriptive than an actual name (Stone Inscription at Agara Yelandur Taluk M.A.R. 1916-1917 Para 78). The latter is described as the senior queen. She was apparently ruling over Malavellor apparently a part of what is now Mysore District (ibid). The eldest of the king's sons was Sivamāra also called Sivamar Ereyappa. He was governor of Kadavulur in the king's 28th year and at another time of Kunningal nād. A second son was Vijayaditya with the title Ranavikrama son of Vijayamahadevi. He was governor of Keregod nād, but in the king's 7th year and for at least 30 years of Asandinād where he seems to have left successors who were governing it under the early Hoyasalas. A third son Duggamāra or Duggamār Ereyappa was governor of Kovalāla nād but in the king's 42nd year not only of the Kovalāla nād Three-Hundred, but also of the Ganga Six Thousand. While he held this position the army was sent against Hampi, on the Tungabhadra in the north of the Bellary District. He was further governor of Panne nād Balattor nād the Pulvaki nād Thousand, the Mu nād Sixty and one or two other nāds whose names are not clear (see Kolar 6 Kadur 145 Srinivaspur 65, Mulbagal 80, Mulbagal 255 and Srinivaspur 57).

Sripurnasha appears to have had two other sons besides Siyagella above mentioned. Of these Sivamāra II surnamed Saigotta was one and Vijayāditya entitled Ranavikrama was the other. Of Siyagella we know he was a famous general under his father and the governor of Kesumannunād and took part with his trusted followers, in the war against the Rāshtrakutas. He eventually fell in that war along with his brother

Sivamāra II
surnamed Saigotta,
786-812 A.D.

enemies" at this battle. The Vallabha army is said to have been "terrible with towering elephants and horses" and commanded by many different royal chiefs. The place of the battle is given here as Rājāvādi and in the Keiegodi Plates as Rājāimund. Besides this victory, Nityārga is credited with the capture of Bānārās's Mahārājānād (E. C. X, Muibagal 228). This is called in another inscription (E. C. X, Chitāmani 30) as Māyāvādī 7,000, with Vallur as its capital. It was chiefly in the Cuddapah district. Kolar 79 shows that under Nityārga, the Nolaṃba-Pallava king Nolaṃbādhiyārga was ruling the Ganga 6000, and that the latter sent against Bānārās, a chief named Pomaḷa, who was slain in a battle at Mūnuggepadi. Nityārga was the donor of the grant to a Brāhman mentioned in the Gāligekere Plates (E. C. IV, Vedatoḷe 60) referred to above. It may be assigned to 860 A.D. From the Kūḍlūr grant, it might be inferred that Nityārga professed the Jain faith. His mind resembled, we are told, "a bee at the pair of lotus feet of the adorable Arhatbhātṭāka"—which is the usual poetic formula used for describing a royal Jain. He must be the Ereganga Permaḍi mentioned in the Hindupur (tank-bund Āṇṇāyā) temple lithic inscription which is dated (in words) in Saka 775 or 853 A.D. (M. E. R. 1913, List B No. 588; see also Paras 13 and 16). His feudatory the Nolaṃba king who ruled up to Kanchi is mentioned in it. At the head of the Doddabundi stone (E. C. III, T-Narsipur 91) is a rude but interesting bas-relief depicting Nityārga's death, the date of which event is 869 A.D. (For a description of this stone from the sculptural point of view, see Chapter V, ante). His son Rājamalla Satyavākya II was apparently present at his death-bed and is shown in the sculpture under the first of three umbrellas beginning from the left (ibid). One of the king's followers evinced his fidelity by being buried under him. A virgal at Aiyur, appointed gurardja or heir apparent and to ensure whose accession to the throne he even offered to abdicate — had it in his mind to compensate the former by giving him the Ganga kingdom. But another account (F I III 101) states that Ganga was one of the hostile kings whom Gōvinda brought into the country as an aid to himself. Hence the resentment against Ganga. In any case we find Kambharasa in Heggaddevankote 93 governing the Ninety six Thousand (a common designation of the Gaaga territory) under his father. In Sravana Belgola 24, where he is called Ranāvalāka Kambaiya he is said to be ruling the kingdom of the world and in 802 A D. was still in power (Nelamangala 61). After him in 812 A D., when his younger brother Govinda Prabhutavarsha was on the throne, we find (Gabbi 61) Chāki Raja was chief ruler (adhirāja) of the entire (asēsha) Ganga mandala. This is the latest date we have for the Rashtrakūta occupation. However Govinda either as seems likely on the death of his elder brother or moved by reasons of compassion or policy, released Ganga from his long and painful confinement, but owing to his hostility had again to confine him (E I VI 249). During this period of release may have occurred the victorious attack he made at Madagundur (Mandya Telek) on the Vallabha (or Rashtrakūta) army encamped there which may have been the cause of his being again consigned to prison. Eventually, however, Gōvinda not only reinstated him in his kingdom but took part in his coronation he and the Pallava (or Ganga Pallava) king Nandivarman binding the diadem on his brow with their own hands. (Nedatore 60 Nelamangala 60). It was no doubt Nandivarman's claim to Ganga descent which led to his being invited to join in the performance of this important act of state. The actual ceremony may perhaps not have been performed before. Kolar 281 and Goribidnur 54 show that Sivamaras was ruling and the Satanur virgal dated in his 29th regnal year (M.A.R. 1921-1922, Paras 37-8) If the Kulligere Malavalli Taluk) lithic inscription has been rightly assigned to him, we have also an inscription of his dated in his first regnal year (M.A.R. 1919-1920, Para 64) As the Bilur inscription is dated in his 18th regnal year, corresponding to Saka 809, the initial year of his reign should have been 870 A.D. He might be taken to have ascended the throne in 869-870 A.D. Under him ruled, as a feudatory, Nolambadhviraja, over the Gangga 6000, apparently the same person as ruled over it in his father's time (Mandya 13 dated in 895 A.D., also Kolar 79, and Talur stone inscription (M.A.R. 1909-1910, Para 61) An inscription of Rajamallu II has been found in North Arcot District. (E.I. IV, 140). He seems to have distinguished himself in a battle fought at Samiya, which appears probably by reason of a mislection as suggested by Mr Narasimhachar as Ramiya in the Gattavadi plates (Nanjangud 269) His Kelegodi-Rangapura plates and the Kudlur plates of Marasimha III describe the valour he displayed in the battle in practically identical terms. The latter record states —

"These are the Vangas, the Paundaras, the Magadha and Kosala kings, and those the Kalinga, Andhra, and Dravida kings, that were pierced by the weapons discharged by this king—thus did the people praise his valour in the Samiya battle"

"These are the hostile Vangas, the Paundaras, the Magadha and Kosala kings and these the Kalinga, Andhra, and Dravida kings, that were pierced by the weapons discharged by this king—thus did the people praise his valour in the Samiya battle"

The former grant says. —

Though the reference to the Vanga and other kings seems a poetical exaggeration, there can be no doubt that the personal bravery that Rajamallu II displayed at not had—of Senkaraçhāra's date. In that case Sankarācharya would be a contemporary of Sivamāra II (See M.A.R. 190-1911 Para 275)

Sivamāra's feudatory Vittarasa or Vishnu Rāja is mentioned in one of the Narasimharajapura Plates of Sivamāra where Vittarasa's genealogy is set out. He was apparently a chief of the Kadamba family (M.A.R. 1919-1920 para 63). Another plate of this grant refers to Vijayaśakti the father-in-law of Sivamāra who is termed illustrious, and to a grant to a charityālaya at Unlivalli (ibid).

The vicissitudes undergone by Sivamāra are referred to at length in several inscriptions. Nelainangale 60 (E.C. IV) and Kolar 90 (E.C. V) state that he was brought into a world of mingled troubles or placed in a world of endless calamities like matted hairs of top knots or twisted top knots. The Keregodī Rāngapurā grant of Rājemalla II refers to his struggles with the Rashtrakutas (Vellavas), and to the wounds received by him from the tusks of lusty elephants. We are told in rather realistic fashion that his anger in battle drove hostile kings in a moment into the mouth of Anteka (i.e., Yama) horrid to behold filled with turning entrails blood and flesh. With this description in view it will be agreed that he was quite appropriately styled 'Bhīmakūpa'. But he seems to have been a learned and accomplished man, supporter of the fine arts, builder of an ornamental bridge—the Kūlini river over which he built a bridge is to the north of Keregodī (see E.C. III Mandya 113 and M.A.R. 1906-1907 Page 4)—esteemed as a poet taking pleasure in poems in three languages (which these were is not stated) proficient in logic and philosophy skilled in all matters connected with the stage and drama and a special authority on the treatment of elephants and horses. His enforced leisure he spent in study. Having mastered the difficult Phanūsutamata, Rajamallā's younger brother Bütugēndra or Būtarasa was Tuvaiya in 870 A.D. (Nanjanguḍ 75) and was governing Kongal-nāḍ and Punaḍ. He was probably the donor of the grant recorded in Kereḡoḍi-Kaṅḡapūṇa plates above mentioned. These plates describe him briefly but expressively. They praise him as the "barasser of the Pallava family by his prowess" and state that he was surrounded by the army of subjugated enemies and was fond of his fourfold army. The Kudūṇur plates of Marasimha III describe him as the conqueror of the invincible Rajarāja, who cannot be identified, and as having been victorious over Mahēndra in Bīṇiyūr and Sūrūr. He is also stated to have taken part in the battle of Samiyya, and to have overcome the Kongas, who, it is said, resisted his tying up of the elephants, and who, in accordance with the ancient method mentioned in (?) Panchāvara captured, single-handed, hundreds of elephants which were difficult to catch. He is compared to Palakappa in his knowledge of the science of elephants and a Brahma in learning. His victory over Rajarāja is mentioned in Nanjanguḍ 269. The Mahēndra referred to must have been the Nolaṃba-Pallava king of that name. During his time the relations between the Rashtrakūṭas and the Gāṅgas underwent a great change, and they came to be on the most friendly terms. What led to this new policy is not clear, but the vigorous defence the Gāṅgas had made of their territory, and the victories they had gained over the Rashtrakūṭas, must have had some influence in deciding the latter to desist from their attacks. But this would hardly account for the intimacy which sprang up, and the interest which Amoghavarsha I, the Rashtrakūṭa king, displayed in the character of the Kāṇṇaḍa people and their language and literature. There must have been powerful reasons with which we are not acquainted. For Amoghavarsha I made a thorough study of Kāṇṇaḍa, which led him to

bent bow drawn as far as his ear having the sky filled with hundreds of banners declaring his victory in innumerable wars a king before whose rage the hostile kings go into the mouth of the god of death horrid to behold filled with turning entrails and streams of blood lighting up also the ten cardinal points with the glory of his fame as spotless as the rays of the moon desirous only of benefiting others without seeking any benefit himself having by his administration of justice rooted out the evil practices of the Kali age so skillful in the application of his own political theories as to bring shame to Brihaspati possessed of character like a stone pillar for the support of dharma destroyed by the myriad deceits of the host of evil kings having gratified the world of the twice born with his constant bestowal of gifts he whose donations free from all motives and beneficial to all the world exceeded the pouring forth of water by the regent elephants. Moreover by a band of idiots was he thrown in a place of endless calamity he was the supporter of fine arts engaged in doing good to the learned the true birth place of pure good qualities a leader of kings a poet—thus was he praised by experts in poetical composition A distinguished sailor able to reach the other shore of the unfordable ocean of Pāṇini's grammar possessed of firm intellect which is a touch stone to test the science of logic possessed of a thorough knowledge of the art of elephant training with which he put down the pride of those learned in that art endowed with profound knowledge in expounding the system of the great ascetic born from the mouth of a female elephant an expert in discussing the new enquiries into many subjects proposed by the learned perfect in the science of the management of horses an aun in causing to unfold the lotus garden of the science of archery possessed of intellect sharpened on account of his own creation of a new treatise on the various uses of the tusks of elephants the author of a work called Sēṭubandha gratifier of the learned an expert in the application of the principles of a dramatic composition of various kinds possessed of a beautiful form surpassing that of Cupid with his head purified by bowing at the lotus feet of Cupid's father (Viṣṇu) famous for victory over the Vallabha army consisting of the Rāshtrakūṭa, Chālokyā Haihaya and other brave leaders encamped at the village called Mndngundūr Dhora's cavalry former's 18th year was 887-888 A D (Coorg Inscriptions, No 2). Ereyappa was also known by the names of Nityayya (H C V, Arkalgud 26, 61), Satyavākya (Channarayapata 251) and Mahēndrantaka. The last of these was his distinctive title. He derived it by killing in battle, at a place not mentioned, Mahēndra, the Nolaṃba king. Mahēndra and his son Ayyappa, both styled Nolaṃbādhirāja, apparently exercised some authority in the Ganga kingdom (H C. II, Mandya 13 of 895; H.C XII, Maddur 52 of 897, H C III, Mandya 907 and H C VI, Kadur 67). His war with Mahēndra is confirmed by the Kudūr plates of Marasimha III (see below). He was also known as Komaravēdanga (M.A.H 1920-1921, Para 47) H C VI, Chikmagalur 129 describes an attack on the Ganga kingdom. In H C IV, Heggaḍḍevankote 103, Ereyappa appears as governing Nūgund and Navale-nad. In H C IV, Hunsur 92, we find him ruling over Kongalnad 8,000 and Būṭugēndra's queen ruling over Kurgal. In Nanyangud 130, we have the king (Rachamallā II), the queen and Ereyappa acting together. In other cases we find Rachamallā II and Ereyappa acting together, as in Nanyangud 139, which is dated in Rachamallā's 22nd year. Perhaps the queen was now dead. In an inscription of Rachamallā II dated in his 29th regnal year, we have mention of Ereyappa's son (H C IX, Kanakan-halli 48). Shimmoga 96 shows Ereyappa reigning as supreme, and his son Būṭuga under him governing the Mandah nad. Bangalore 83 (H C IX) and Kanakan-halli 5 (H C IX, M.F.H 1921-1922, Para 39) are also of his reign, and Channapata 48 and 161 (H C IX) may also belong to it. A lithic inscription of his, giving the Saka date 857, year Vyaya or 935 A D, has been found on one of the steps of the canal in front of the Gnapathi temple at Talkad. It refers to the repair of a tank by the Mahanagara (M.A.H 1911-1912, Para 74). The Freya mentioned in the inscription on a beam of the

For Mārasimha we have the Manno grant to a Jain temple (E C I \ Nelamangala 60) dated in Saka 710 or 707 A D referred to above the Ganjam grant to Brāhmaṇa donee (E C IV Srīngapatam 160) which has been assigned to Circa 800 A D for it also refers to him as Yurādya the inscription on the stone pillar at Fruva Brahmadēva temple at Sravann Belgola is assignable to about the same period (M.A.J. 1908-1909, Para 50) the Alūr copper plate grant dated in Saka 721 in the 3rd regnal year or 799 A.D. which shows he should have commenced to rule about 707 A D (M.A.J. 1023 1024 No 80 Pages 72 70) the Vijayapura lithic inscription which might be set down to 800 A D and the lithic inscription at the Āṇjanāya temple on the tank bank at Hindupur which is dated (in letters) in Saka 775 or 853 A D (M.E.R. 1013 Para 16) While the Alūr copper plate grant which has been declared genuine fixes his first regnal year at 787 A D the Hindupur lithic inscription if it is set down to Mārasimha would give the latest known year of his reign as 853 A D But it is doubtful if the Hindupur lithic inscription refers to Mārasimha I Though it refers to Ereganga Permānadi, his identification is not complete Moreover there is nothing to show that Mārasimha lived beyond 800 A D to which the Ganjam copper plate may be assigned Then again if we accept this identification, it would be rather difficult to reconcile it with what is mentioned in the Gattavādi plates (E C XII Supplement Nanjangud 269) which contain the statement that Sivamāra gave charge of his kingdom to his own younger brother Vijayāditya who, like Bharata knowing the earth (or land) to be his older brother's wife, refrained from enjoying her (as his own) It is probable that Mārasimha I predeceased Sivamāra. When actually Sivamāra died is not known The Rāshtrakuta king Gōvinda III who released him and eventually reinstated him on the

A virgal in the Nāgēśvara temple at Begūr, Bangalōre Taluk, refers to the battle of Bengalūnu (or Bangalōre) and to the death at it of a servant of Nāgattara, one of the chiefs of Nītimārga II, whose death is recorded in Bangalōre 83. Nāgattara's death and the sculptural representation of his admission to Heaven are shown in the Begūr stone, now in the Bangalōre Museum (H. G. IX, Bangalōre 83, Frontispiece. See also MAH 1906, Para 21 H. I. VI 46). This stone gives an account of a battle at Tumbepadi between Nāgattara (here called a chief of Ereyappa) and the Nolaṃba king Bira-Mahēndra, in which the former fell, bravely fighting. "When the battle was losing ground," we are told, he went "close up among the elephants, he slew and died." A true hero, in whose memory a Kalad, consisting of twelve villages, called Bempur Twelve, was made, and his son Truga installed chief in his place by Ereyappa (see ante Chapter V, Sculpture and Painting). A graphic description of the war with Mahēndra is given in the Kudūr plates of Marasimha III, grandson of Nītimārga II. Nītimārga's personal part in the battle which ended Mahēndra's life is thus described in it—"In a battle field which was soaked with the blood issuing from the elephants falling under the stroke of his sword like mountains struck by the thunderbolt of Indra, and in which demons and prāchias closely followed dancing headless trunks amidst the roar of goblins, the sky and the earth became as it were Pāpānasa through showers of blood. In that battle he slew Mahēndra as Indra Bala, and capturing speedily Sūtur, Nādagani, Midige, Sūlisailēndra, the lofty Tipperu, Penjuru and other impregnable fortresses, brought down the pride of their owners." Where this great battle was actually fought is not mentioned, that it cannot have been at Penjuru seems inferable from the fact that it was only one of the places that was captured in the war, after the bloody (see second set of Manne Plates) we have to presume they ruled over different parts of the Gangā kingdom. This might well have been so as the troubles in the kingdom during Sivamara's time should have necessitated a virtual partition in the rulership to secure stability in its different parts. The simultaneous ruling seems otherwise impossible of satisfactory explanation.

Mārasimha was according to the Alūr grant a good soldier a just administrator and a virtuous king. He destroyed his enemies we are told by the stroke of the sharp sword he held in his arm. It is clear he took a personal part in the work of the day. He gained lasting fame by his deeds. He was it is stated a skillful rider and had it would seem valiant soldiers to ensure his safety. He was it would appear foremost among those who understood and practised the science of politics. A fact specially mentioned of him is that he refused to impose heavy taxes on his subjects and that he was kind of good habits and administered justice according to the laws of polity. The grant says — Beholding the brilliance of his qualities the world forgot the glory of Maou and other sixteen emperors the flames of his ardour burn like a submarine fire in the ocean mind of the peoples even at a distance. He was like Rama not merely in front of battle but also with regard to the honour he showed to others wives. His gifts were many and generous and he shunned we are told, as shameful not only a victory gained by treachery but also the winning of heaven by dying on the battle. Of him it is summed up — A man of wide fame, joy of all world was Mārasimha. If over and over what is said of him in this grant is true Mārasimha should have impressed his subjects as a particularly lovable sovereign who, if his life had been cast on quieter days, would have shone even brighter as a king and as a man.

As this has been declared a genuine grant, there ought to be little hesitation in accepting its description of him, apart from poetical exaggeration. It speaks of him, as "a treasury of speech" and praises him as a great soldier, fearless in battle. (His part in the war against Mahēndra has been given above). He was, we are told, a Bhārata in the arts of singing, instrumental music and dancing and in minor arts as well. He was also, it would appear, an authority to great grammarians, which would show the profundity of his learning. He was a "walker in the path of politics" (i.e., morality) and possessed apparently "charming qualities" which endeared him to his subjects and feudatories. There is hardly any doubt that he was also a Jain by religion.

It was during the reign of Nītimārga II that the Cholas suddenly uprooted the Bānas Pārāṇṭaka, the Chola king, claims in an inscription dated in 921 A.D. (S.I. I II, 387) to have conferred the Bāna sovereignty on the Ganga Prince Pṛithivīpati II, entitled Hastimalla, grandson of Dindīka alias Pṛithivīpati II. (See above and H. I. IV 225). Hastimalla should accordingly have been a contemporary of Nītimārga II and ruled over a part of the Ganga kingdom, probably the portion round about the present Kolar District. He might have ruled as a prince of the royal blood or as a feudatory of the ruling king. Among the other feudatories of the Gangas of this period may be mentioned the line of chiefs known as the Sakaras, i.e., of the Sakara or Sagarā lineage. Dīyābbē, daughter of Nūleyābbē, describes herself in an inscription dated in 886 A.D. and engraved in the middle sluice of the tank at Bevur, Channarayana Taluk, as of "the glorious Sakaras". She built the sluice, which shows that the tank at Bevur is a work of the 9th century (M.A.R. 1908-1909, Paras 58 and 66) Manaleira, described in the Atkur inscription (Mandya 41) dated in 950 A.D. as the servant of Butuga, the son of lithic inscription which might be assigned to 918 A D (M A R 1925 No 86 page 76) and in the Sīlapuram lithic inscription (M A R 1913 No 345 in Siva temple at Sīlapuram in Anantapur District) in which he is given the alternative names of Kannarādēva and Ganga raiyar. The land granted by him to the temple at Sīlapuram consisted of a field named Pattavādīpatti, evidently called after Buddhavādī (i.e., Buddha) and others (ibid para 16). Prithivīpati II was first the subordinate of the Chōla king Parantaka I and subsequently of the Rāshtrakuta Krishna III. His titles of Bānādhirāja and Kannarādēva are thus easily understood. The Tātanakallu inscription states that there was an invasion of the Ganga kingdom in the reign of Prithivīpati V by the Nolamba prince Vīra Nolamba son of Ayappa (918-929 A D M A R 1925 No 86). This was probably more in the nature of a raid than an actual invasion.

His son Nanniya Ganga named Anni fought in the army of Vīra Nolamba against the Santara king (near Goribidnur) and having slain the enemy and delivered his head and shield to Nolamba died of his wounds.

Nanniya
Ganga

The genealogists prominently mention after Sivamara Rājamalla Satyavākya Pormanadi as his successor in the main Ganga line. He was the son of Vijayāditya. He married a Pallava princess. He probably came to the throne in or about 817 A D. The Rājamalla is often mentioned as Rāchamalla. Both Rājamalla and Satya vākya are titles borne by all the Ganga kings who came after him. Rājamalla is said to have rescued his country from the Rāshtrakutas which they had held too long as Vishnu in the form of a Boar rescued the Earth from the infernal regions (EC IV Yedatore 60). He thus established his independence. He married the grant as having been born of Vijayāditya for the benefit of the world like the moon from the ocean that his glory was sung and admired by all the world that he heroically worked for and successfully took possession of the sovereignty that had been lost in the less skillful hands of Sivamāra to the Rashtrakutas that he bore 'the great burden of the earth, of which only a bit was in the possession of Vankāsa and that the country at last rested for a while in peace His fame liberality, valour just rule intelligence righteous conduct generosity towards fallen foes his constant flow of gifts modesty prowess and other personal virtues are there praised and the interesting statement is then made (in this grant) that he 'without superseding his father (guru) established his rule in king Rana Vikrama's (i.e. Vijayaditya's) country and was content with the position of heir apparent and that he subsequently had himself anointed to the throne and crowned It would seem as though he was primarily and personally responsible for the wresting of the kingdom from the Rashtrakutas that such wresting took place while yet his father was alive that though he was the person who successfully drove the Rashtrakuta usurpers out he still recognized his father's claim as sovereign that he was content to act as heir apparent during his father's lifetime and that he subsequently (meaning thereby after his death) anointed himself to the throne His success, however, was not a wholly complete one for the grant acknowledges that Bankāsa had 'a bit (lesam bhu vana) of territory yet under his control but his power was apparently wholly broken for we are told that the troubled earth had some rest in his reign The grant speaks of Rājamalla as eclipsing the intelligence of Brihaspati by his skill in politics The Kndlur grant of Mārasimha III, dated in 963 A.D. declared to be a genuine grant says of him that people describe (him) is possible that Rāchamalla's descendants bore rule over part of the present Shimoga District, where this slab is found, though it is rather curious why in an inscription of Būṭuga, surnamed Nanniya Gangga, the descendants of Rāchamalla III should be mentioned and not his own. It is only fair to add that the inscription is a badly damaged one and is quite illegible in parts. The inscription is not dated, or the dated part of it has been lost. We note in this inscription the great-grandson of Rāchamalla III, Saigotta. Rāchamalla and Būṭuga's grandson Rakkasa Gangga are mentioned in it. The latter is said to have made a gift of wet lands to the temple built by Nanniya-Gangga, his grand-father. From this it might be inferred that Nanniya Gangga lived to a fairly long age. An exploit of Saigotta. Rāchamalla seems also mentioned in it. It is said he caught hold of an elephant with his left hand and kept it at bay. As the exploit is mentioned in the inscription after his name, it might perhaps be set down to him.

Rājamalla
Satyavākya I

Būṭuga II, who fought and slew Rāchamalla III, next ascended the throne. He was also known as Būṭayya and by his distinctive titles of Nanniya Gangga, Gangga Nāyana and Gangga Gangēya. The date of his accession may be approximately set down to about 925 A.D. (see ante) The Kudlur plates of his son, Marasimha III, state that he was "possessed of wealth" ('territorial and other) acquired by his own arm," which is doubtless a suggestive reference to the bloody revolution he effected in his own favour. How this was brought about is not clear from the inscriptions so far found. But there is some room for the inference that he was helped in bringing it about by the Rashtrakuta king Boddaga or Amoghavarsha II. There was at about this time a renewed friendship between the Gangas and the Rashtrakutas. A sort of offensive and defensive alliance seems to have been entered

Būṭuga II, Būṭayya, entitled Nanniya
Gangga, Nāyana,
Gangga
may be approximately set down to about 925 A.D. (see ante) The Kudlur plates of his son, Marasimha III, state that he was "possessed of wealth" ('territorial and other) acquired by his own arm," which is doubtless a suggestive reference to the bloody revolution he effected in his own favour. How this was brought about is not clear from the inscriptions so far found. But there is some room for the inference that he was helped in bringing it about by the Rashtrakuta king Boddaga or Amoghavarsha II. There was at about this time a renewed friendship between the Gangas and the Rashtrakutas. A sort of offensive and defensive alliance seems to have been entered made was one Mahendra said to be a prince of the Ganga lineage. He is said to have set up the image of the goddess at the village of Doddavatti. Who this Mahendraraja was and whether he was related in any way to Rajamalla I himself is difficult to determine. He was probably one of Rajamalla's generals.

Rajamalla I was also the founder of the Jaina cave at Vallimalai in the present North Arcot District at which the inscription consists of two Kānda verses written in Grantha characters. (EJ IV 140)

Rajamalla I was succeeded by his son entitled Niti Nitimarga I marga I which name became a honorific designation of his successors. His real name was Ereyanga or Ere-ganga Dēva and his other titles were Ranavikramayya (EO IV, Lodatore 60 see also Keregodī Rangāpura Plates of Rajamalla II, M.A.R. 1918 1919 Para 07) and Permānadi (Aigur stone inscription see M.A.R. 1909 1910, Para 60). The Rāshtrakutas still showed signs of disturbing the peace of the kingdom. Nitimarga seems to have gained a great victory over their (Vallabha) army at Rājaramndn which is to the north of the Kolar District. (EO IV Supplement Nanjangud 269 & Kolar 90). The Keregodī Rangāpura Plates of his son Rājamalla II state that he obtained this victory "with ease" and that the Vallabha army was commanded by a combination of kings of different ruling dynasties, some of which seem to have been added for poetical effect and no more. The Kndlur grant of Mārasimha III dated in 982 A.D. furnishes the further information that the battle was fought in the rainy season and that it was a terrible one accompanied with initial rain-drops of arrows shot from the bow, lightning of fierce swords, dark clouds of infuriated elephants, high winds of horses, and streams of blood. This grant also reiterates the fact that Nitimarga defeated "with ease his powerful maiden Speech, according to the prescribed rites at Tripuri. The fierce Būṭuga, conqueror of the host of his enemies, who though his valour ranked first in the enumeration of kings—on Bāddegga going to heaven to seize the sovereignty of Indra, i.e., on the death of Bāddegga, took elephants, horses, white umbrellas and the throne from the possession of Lallēya and gave them to king Kṛṣṇa. Further, from this fierce king Gaṅga-Gaṅgēya, did not Kakka-Rāja, lord of Achaḷapura, enter the mouth of Yama? did not Dantivarma, named Bijja, obtain in war the state of living in the forest (otherwise, had he not to flee back to his Vanavāsi)? did not Ajā-varma, Lord of Sāntala (? the Sāntaras) become quieted? did not Damarī, Lord of Nūṅguṅṅṛi, obtain the breaking of his pride? and did not Nāgavarma tremble with fear? Having conquered king Rājāditya, who was proud of his array of elephants, having driven out Hmaganduga from (his) country, and having burnt Tāṃjapuri, Nāḷikēlo and other fortresses, this Gaṅga Nārāyaṇa gave to Kṛṣṇa, lordly elephants, horses and great wealth.”

Many of the details above mentioned of Būṭuga II are also enumerated in his Sudi plates dated in Saka 860 or 938-939 A.D., which record a grant to a Jain temple (H I III, 164). These plates have been declared spurious, on what appear to Mr. Narasimhaśaṅkar (M A H 1920-1921, Para 55) “very weak grounds.” In these plates Achaḷapura is mentioned as Aichapura, probably a slip on the part of the engraver, while Nāḷikēlo of the Kūḍiṇ grant is correctly given in the Sudi plates as Nāḷikōte. The capture of Tāṃjapuri is also mentioned in the Karṇāḍ plates of Kṛṣṇa III (H I 8280). The Atukūr stone inscription, dated in A.D. 872 or 950 (now in the Bangalore Museum), also refers to the same event and to Būṭuga’s slaying of Rājāditya. (H C III Mādya 41) Kṛṣṇa III is called in it “the supreme lord, supreme reversible one” and “the illustrious Kāṃara-dēva” and Closepet Taluk, refers to the same incident (M.A.R. 1909 1910 Para 60) The inscription at its top refers to Nitimarga's death like T Narasipura 91, but the sculptures on the stone are only a standing figure of a man armed with a bow and a sword and a number of horses to the right. The inscription records that when Nitimarga ascended the heaven (agga or ararga), one Nāgayya son of Mādavayya, caused to be constructed a tank apparently as a memorial of the event. The date is not mentioned but as we know (see below) his son Rājamalla II was crowned king in 869 870 A.D. Nitimarga must be presumed to have died in 869 A.D. His younger sister Jayabbe was married to the Nolamba Pallava king Nolambādhirāja who was Polalchorn Nolamba (E.C. XII, Sima 24 86). Whether he may have been the Nolamba king who ruled up to Kāuchī as mentioned in the Hindupur inscription referred to above it is not possible at present to determine.

Nitimarga was succeeded by his older son Rājamalla Satyavākya II. For him we have the Gattivādipura and the Narasapur copper plates the former dated in Saka 826 or 904 A.D. and the latter in Saka 824 or 903 A.D. (E.C. XII, Nanjangud 269 E.C. X, Kolar 90). We have also the Koregodī Rangāpura copper plate grant which has an incomplete Saka date on it but which may be assigned to about 878 A.D. (M.A.R. 1918-1919 Paras 64-68). Besides we have a number of undated virgals of his time (see e.g. M.A.R. 1918-1919 Para 69). Also the Bilur stone inscription dated in his 18th regnal year in Saka 809 or 888 A.D. (Coorg Inscriptions No 2) the Kunche lithic inscription dated in the 3rd year of his reign though no Saka date is given the Kabbalu virgal dated in his 15th regnal year (M.A.R. 1909 1910 Para 57) the Tallur stone inscription dated in the 27th year of his reign (M.A.R. 1909 1910, Para 61).

Rājamalla
Satyavākya II
870 A.D. 907
A.D.

The words rendered into "he split in two the skull of the elephant the fort of Chola" of the original text may be translated, as follows —

"Cholana-kōte yemba sindhivada sragānam brve poydam"

Which shows that either the elephant on which Rajaditya rode on the battle-field was either called by the name of "Cholana-kōte," literally meaning "Chola's fort," or it was so well protected that it looked like his fort, and that it was killed by Manālāra by a blow which split in twain its skull. As we know that Būṭuga killed Rajaditya in single combat from his elephant, it follows that while his ally Manālāra killed the elephant, he himself felled down its royal occupant. This brings us to a mistaken translation of the words in the original text of this inscription (visu-gēye Kallānāḡu suruṅ urdu kādā kondu, which was rendered by "stealthily stabbed him with a dagger and fought and killed him") which suggested treachery on the part of Būṭuga in killing his opponent Rajaditya. Mr. Narasimhachar has conclusively proved (see M.A.R. 1910-1911, Para 77 and plate containing a reproduction of a virgal at Nerāḡe, Arisikere Taluk, which illustrates this sort of warfare) that this translation is based on a misapprehension of both the text of the inscription and its meaning and that there was no treachery on Būṭuga's part in killing Rajaditya as he said. The words visu-gēye-kallānāḡu are really visuḡe Kallānāḡu, which means "the howdah having become the battle-field," i.e., the fight was between the occupants of the elephants, in other words, a single combat between them, from their positions on their respective elephants. Būṭuga pleased with the great part played in this battle by Manālāra "for standing before him and slaying," as the inscription puts it, conferred on him for the maintenance of his sword the Atukur 12 and Kadivū of Belvola

this battle should have highly impressed his contemporaries. A fragmentary cīrgal at Chelur in Bagepalli Taluk refers to another battle fought during his reign. It was at a place called Gongur and the name of Nonchakamooda son of Sri Rāchamalla is referred to in it. This is probably an unnamed son of Rājamalla II. (M.A.R. 1920-1921 Para 40). The Bilur grant of 888 A.D. records a gift of twelve villages on the Peddoregare (Lakshmanatirtha) by the king to a Jain priest for the benefit of the Satyavākya Jain temple of the Panne Kadanga in Coorg. His Narasapur grant of 903 A.D. is also to a Jain. It is possible that Rājamalla II was like his father a Jain in his faith. His tolerance however is shown by his grants to Brāhmins as well following the one recorded in the Gattavāḍipur plates (E.C. VII, Nanjangud 269). He seems to have encouraged his subjects by bestowing on them marks of royal favour. Thus an undated lithic inscription of his soned at Kolar Lakkuoda forest in the Kiggatnād, in Coorg records to his bindlog of the Permanadi patta on the son of a gavunda or farmer and the fixing of the land rent and rice dues in permanence for the estate of Kalnād granted to him. The patta was a golden band or ribbon to be worn on the forehead inscribed with some title of honour in this case that of the king. It was a symbol of royalty and also conferred as a mark of royal favour. (Coorg Inscriptions No. 8). Rājamalla II was contemporary with Alfred the Great of England, who was also called the Truth teller, an English Satyavākya. The Keregodī Raṅgāpura plates describe him as adorned with good qualities and the virtues of Māndhātṛi and other ancient kings and as the illuminator of his family. Rājamalla II seems to have died at a place called Kombale from hiccupping owing it is said, to phlegm sticking in his throat. (E.C. V Arkalgod 5 and 27). Certain devoted men committed themselves to death in the fire through sorrow for his decease (ibid).

Butuga II left two sons and a daughter. Of these, the elder son and the daughter were children by Kēvaki, the Rāshtrakūta princess. The daughter was married to the son of the Rāshtrakūta king Kṛishna III (son of Amoghavarsha II), and became the mother of Indra Rāja, the last of the Rāshtrakūtas. Mr Rice suggests that H. C. V, Mangarabad 67, may be a memorial of her. If so, her name was Kundana-Sōmidēvi. The Kūdiar plates state that Marula-Dēva's other names were Pūnaseya-Ganga and Kāliyuga-Bhīma. It also records the fact that he married the daughter of Kṛishna, apparently the Rāshtrakūta king. According to the Hebbal inscription of Mārasimha III her name was Bṛyabbe. This would mean that Kṛishna III not only took his sister's daughter in marriage to his own son but also gave his own daughter in marriage to her son. It is further stated that Marula-Dēva obtained from the "affectionate" Rāshtrakūta king "an umbrella called Madanavātā, never obtained by any other king." The gift is also mentioned in Nagai 35 (H. C. VIII). He is also described as a devout Jain and possessed of exceptional skill in politics. He was apparently of a religious turn of mind, seeing that his mind is said to have been attached to "final beatitude," for which reason, we are told, he was known as Ganga-martānda. He was possibly a poet as his poetry is said to have been praised "by great poets." As he is described in this grant as "prince," and as no grants of any kind are forthcoming in his name or mentioning his name, it is possible he did not reign and possibly died without ascending the throne.

His younger brother Mārasimha III seems to have actually succeeded his father on the Ganga throne. He was the donor of the Kūdiar plates to a great Jain scholar of his times. It is dated in Saka 884 or A. D.

Marula Dēva,
Pūnaseya-Ganga,
Kāliyuga-
Bhīma

Mārasimha
III, Guttīya-Ganga,
Nolamban-taka, 961-974
A. D.

write in it his work called Karirājamārga in composing which he may have been aided by a poet named Srīvijaya. In this he expresses his admiration for both the country and its inhabitants, and must have discovered that he was mistaken in the opinion he had previously formed of them. According to both the plates above referred to Butugēndra was surnamed Gnnaduttaranga and married to Ahbalabba daughter of the Vallabha (i.e. Rāshtrakūta) king Amoghavarsha I. She is called Chandrabhalabba in the Gattavadi plates and Chaudrabhalabba in the Kudlur plates of Mārasimha III. The latter describe her as a handsome limbed beautiful lady, the outcome of many blessings, the source of the channel of good fortune etc. and as versed in dancing and other accomplishments. Butugēndra is also spoken of as a devout Jain and as one who was possessed of truthful speech and conduct as enjoined by the purport of all sciences. His hereditary Rangapura plates record the grant of a village for the renovation of an Īvara temple at Alūr in Nagara Viśhaya to Nūtrasivācharya, disciple of Sakari (i.e., Sahakari) Bhattaraka who was of the line of Pura Saivism devoted to Tripurahara Siva. Apparently he was a Kālamukha ascetic which is evidence of the existence of that sect in the State in the 9th century A.D.

Butugēndra must have died before his elder brother the king (Rājamalla II) as Ereganga, his son by Ahbalabba, became Yuvarāja (E.C. III Seringapatam 147). Rājamalla II associated Ereganga with himself in the government and crowned him under the name of Ereyappa (Nanjangud 269). His being crowned as Ereyappa by his uncle Rājamalla II is testified to by the Kudlur plates of Mārasimha III (see M.A.R. 1920-1921 Para 47). The coronation should have taken place about 887 A.D. as E.C. V Arkalgud makes Satyavākya's 87th year correspond with Ereyappa's 21st year and the

Ereyappa or Nitimārga II:
887-935 A.D.

Guttiga-Ganga (the range of Gutti), Chalal-uttaranga (the intel of firmness of character), Mandalika Trinētra (a Siva among chieftains), Ganga-Vidyādhara, Ganga-Kandarpa, Ganga-Vajra and Gangava-svga (the lion of the Ganges) From an inscription of Karagada of 971 (see MAH 1911, P 37), we learn that the battle with Rājāditya was for the possession of the Uchchangri fort The Kūdūr plates of Mārasimha, of 963, state that Krishna III, when setting out on an expedition to the north to conquer Asvapath, himself performed the ceremony of crowning Mārasimha as the ruler of Gangapadi. (MAH 1921, P 26)

There seems, on the whole, little or no exaggeration in this record, for most of the statements made in it are corroborated from independent sources, notably by the Kūdūr plates, which also furnish a few personal touches He was, it says, celebrated for the strength of his arm and was in his boyhood like a young lion created for breaking the pride of the elephants, his enemies When he prepared himself for war, his enemies, it would appear, desined his alliance He was, we are told, respectful to gurus and obedient to teachers By his learning he was like a prodigy in the midst of the learned He was, it is mentioned, an expert in grammar, logic, philosophy and literature and was skilful in the management of horses and elephants He patronised poets and in truthfulness was like Yudhishtira His good government was, it is added, the theme of praise of the four castes and orders and was regulated by his "remarkable intellect matured by an investigation of all the Itihāsas and Purānas" Apparently, he had studied the science of politics as set down by Chānakya and others He is described as a devout Jain, "who washed out all taints with the water of the daily bath of Jina" These plates confirm the statement that the Rāstākuta king Krishna III (better known as Akālavarsha III) crowned Gaddebasava temple at Chikka Hannasoge Yedatore Taluk has been identified with Eroyappa alias Nitimarga II. This inscription refers to the setting up of a nivādhī or tombstone for a Jaino teacher named Elachārya who it is said subsisted on water for one month and expired by samādhi after the fast of eight days known as Ashṭipacasa (M.A.R. 1913-1914, Para 63). The Permādi referred to in a lithic inscription at Dammehalli, Turuvekere Sub-taluk which refers to a cattle raid in the 7th or 8th year of his reign has been identified with Nitimarga II (M.A.R. 1915-1916, Para 68). The inscription on a slab built into the roof of the Sūmāśvara temple at Mndahalli, Nonjangnd Taluk mentioning batrākya Permānadi is probably his. It is dated in his 12th regnal year. Another to the left of Toremaru in the same taluk is dated in the cyclo year Pingala which corresponds to 897 A.D. The latter is a vīrgal which refers to a cattle-raid. Another vīrgal at Buraganahalli, Koratagere Sub-taluk refers to an incursion and states that by the order of the king (who is referred to as Permādi) and Indara the younger brother of the great queen certain warriors fought and fell at the siege of Gelanjanur (M.A.R. 1917-1918, Para 78). This siege must have been one of the incidents of the war with the Rāshtrakutas mentioned below.

During the reign of Nitimarga II the trouble from the Rāshtrakutas did not wholly cease, though it had considerably abated. A vīrgal at Karhal, Nagamaugala Taluk (M.A.R. 1914-1916, Para 65) and Bangalore 83 and 87 record conflicts during his reign with Ballaha's army, the Ballaha being the Rāshtrakuta king Krishna II. Another vīrgal at this place, assignable to the same period has at its base a rather strange figure sculpture. It consists of the figures of two men represented as carrying a corpse. Apparently this represents the burial of one of the chiefs who fell in this war (ibid. Para 90).

(see H C III, Mandya 11) by making his howdah his battlefield and killing from it, in single combat, with a dagger, his opponent. A virgal that is to be seen at Nealige graphically depicts this heroic feat (see ibid, plate V facing page 88). The Nolaamba chiefs mentioned are Kattannemalla, Uttiga, Nohpa and Chattiya. The donors of the gift are mentioned as Chagiyabbarasi and Butuga, but who these were it is not possible to say. If the Siavana Belgola epitaph and the Kudlur plates are to be believed, there seems to have been a general massacre of "all the Nolaambas" in the war of extirpation that Maasimha led against them. Three of the princes seem, however, to have escaped the general massacre. (see ante Nolaamba-Pallavas) Maasimha's conquest of the Nolaamba-Pallavas falls into the reign of Indra, the son of Vira Mahendra of that dynasty. His conquest of them was, it has been shown (see ante), more nominal than real for we find them in 985 A D ruling over Nolaamba-vadi 36 000 (H C X, Srivastasi 59). His capture of Uchchangi fort mentioned in the Siavana Belgola inscriptions, however, is confirmed by a lithic inscription at Karagada, Belur Taluk, dated in 971 A.D., recording a grant by him in favour of a hero Bhasa Gavunda, who is said to have fought and fallen in that exploit. (M A R. 1910-1911, Para 77). As this grant should have been made immediately after the event, it seems reasonable to infer that the fight for the possession of this fortress took place in 971 A D. The Uchchangi fort, which is spoken of as a hill-fort and is said to have been "reduced to powder" by Maasimha, may be identified with the Uchchangi or Uchchangidurga near Molakalmuru and not the well-known one south of Bellary.

Of the grants of Maasimha III, we have, besides the Kudlur one to one Vadighangala Bhatta, an eminent scholar and grammarian, others in the Dharmar district, made in 968 A D (I.A. VII, 101, 112). There is a battle had been victoriously won by him. The reference to the battle of Bangalore in the cirgūl mentioned above shows the high antiquity of Bangalore. Its existence goes back to at least the time of Nitimārga II or about 890 A.D.

Nitimārga II was joint donor with Rajamalla II of the grant conveyed by the Gattavadipur plates dated in Saka 826 or 901 A.D. (E.C. VII Nanjangud 269). A great minister of his is mentioned in a mutilated inscription on the doorway of the Iruve Brahmadeva pillar at Sravana Belgola. A son of this great minister was probably Narasinga mentioned in that inscription. Nāgarvarma this unnamed great minister's son in law committed according to this inscription sallekhana at this temple (U.A.R. 1904 1907 Para. 39). A Narasinga is mentioned in the spurious Sudi plates of Bātuga the son of Nitimārga II (F.I. VII Appx. 21). But he can not be identified with this minister Narasinga. Another minister of his was Govindara mentioned in several records (U.A.R. 1911 1912 Para. 74 and 1912 1913 Para. 57). A still another minister named Dharaṇa is referred to in a cirgūl (E.C. IV Yedatore 31 revised—see U.A.R. 1912 1913 Para. 57). This minister is compared to Māndhātā and there is reference to a battle that was fought at Hagiya between the Gangas and some other power in which king Nitimārga II took part (ibid). A fourth minister of his was apparently Pehavva who is described as the minister for peace and war in F.C. VI, Chikmagalur 9 as revised (U.A.R. 1915 1916 Para. 68). He is there said to have joined with two others in the excavation of a tank and the erection of a sluice for it. The Permanadi mentioned in this and in E.C. VI Chikmagalur 8 (as revised) have been identified with Nitimārga II (ibid).

We get a few glimpses of the personality of Nitimārga II from the Kudlur plates of Marasimha III his grandson

after his wars, a year or two of peaceful life, which he devoted to the performance of religious duties and pious acts including the building of bridges. The date of his death is given in the Melagani inscription (H. C. X, Mulbagal 84) as Saka 864, Bhava or 974 A.D. He appears to have been a good and popular ruler, with martial instincts well developed in him but not wholly overcome by them. His love of religion, learning, piety and the animal world, as typified by the cow, indicate the general bent of his mind. We might well believe the composer of the Kudini plates when he says that Mrasimha delighted in doing good to others and when he praises his renunciation of other's women and wealth, his love for hearing stories of the good, his aversion in the matter of giving ear to evil report regarding the good, his intention in worshipping Jinēsvara, his diligence in making gifts to sages and Brahmins, his full consciousness in protecting refugees, and his faculty for remembering the good done to him. His prowess and piety alike seem to have left their mark on his people, who celebrated them in songs. He impresses the reader of his life to-day as a firm but not a relentless man, great in war, but greater still in the moral field. His spoken word was, we are told, as a written bond. The poet who composed the fine Śiavana Belgola epitaph writes "Has he promised you any gift? Yes, it is already in your hands. Can the promise of Gangga-chūḍāmani ever fail?" No wonder this verse is quoted by Nāgavarma and Kēśirāja in their respective works. The Gangga kingdom, during his reign, extended as far as the Krishna and included the Nolambavāḍi 32,000, the Gangavāḍi 96,000, the Bapaḥase 12,000, the Sāntalige 1,000, and other provinces whose names cannot be made out. (H. I IV, 352)

Nitimarga II was also of the same lineage. He must be the one mentioned in the Atukur inscription (Mandya 46).

Nitimarga II appears to have married more than one lady. The Boraganhalli riṅgal referred to above refers to his elder queen (Vahāderi) the name is either lost or unreadable (See M.A.R. 1917-1918 Para 78). The term Mahāderi (or pattamahāderi as it is sometimes expressed) predicates the existence of other queens who were junior to her. In the Kudlur plates of Nārasimha III grandson of Nitimarga II mention is made of his queen (Dēryām) Jakāmba and describes her as the daughter of king Vijjala of the pure Chālokya family. As she is described as merely dēryām she has to be distinguished from Vahāderi of the Boraganhalli riṅgal. The Kudlur plates however do not mention any other queen of Nitimarga II. It sets out the names of three of his sons—Narasimha Deva, Rajamalla and Butuga—and describes Rajamalla as the younger brother of Narasimha and Butuga as the younger brother of Rajamalla. It is difficult in the face of this specific description to suggest that Rajamalla and Butuga were sons of Nitimarga II by different mothers as proposed by Mr. Rice in the last edition of this work as also in F.C. III Introd. 5. In the absence of any definite information it has to be presumed that the Mahāderi mentioned in the Boraganhalli inscription was either identical with the Chālukya princess or if a different queen died issueless. Nitimarga II seems to have had besides his three sons named above a daughter named Pāmbabbe who was apparently the elder sister of Butuga. She married Immadi Dhōra but became a widow. After leading an ascetic life of thirty years she died in 971 A.D.

Of the three sons of Nitimarga II the first to ascend the throne was Narasimha Deva who was the eldest. This intelligent prince we are told in the Kudlur plates learnt at his early age the science of politics.

Narasimha-Deva entitled Satyavākya
and Bhavedanga
920 A.D.

Tala (E I V, 372) In EC XI, Hrinur I, Panchala-Deva is called a mahā-sāmantādhipati or great feudal chief. An attempt was also made by a Gangga named Mdu-Rachayya, who took the titles Chaladunka-Ganga and Gangarabanta, to seize the Gangga throne. This Mdu-Rachayya had killed Nagarama, the younger brother of Chāmundā Rāya. Chāmundā Rāya, both to avenge his brother's death and to prevent the usurpation, slew in battle Mdu-Rachayya, and obtained the title of Samara-Prasurama (EC II, Sravana Belgola, New Edn No 281-Old Edn. 109, also Intro. 45). Before the battle, Bāgiya (or Bōyiga), prince Rakkasa's guardian, when the battle proved unfavourable, sent him away to a place of safety and rushed in heroically to meet his own death. As the composer of Sravana Belgola 138 (Old Edn 60) puts it, Bōyiga, "putting to flight amidst the praise of his own and the hostile armies, the horsemen that eagerly came to fight, charged fiercely into the enemy's troops, and when he saw his own army retreating, he went back, and inspiring courage, marched with it on horse-back, fell upon the enemy's force, cut it down and acquired renown." The greatness of his prowess was praised even by the enemy's troops. "Let the people die," the writer adds, "like Bōyiga, having displayed the greatness of their valour." Sravana Belgola (New Edn.) No 139 (Old Edn No 61) mentions a Bāyika, whom Mr. Rice identifies, (Mysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions, 65, footnote) with the Bōyiga of No. 138 (Old Edn. No 60). If this identification is correct, Bōyiga was married to Jayabbe, and had by her two sons and a daughter Saviyabbe, who is praised as a great śiṣṭa or lay disciple. Mr. Narasimhaiah sets down Sravana Belgola 138 and 139 to about 940 and 950, but as suggested by Mr. Rice, they seem to refer to the time of Rachamalla IV and the quelling of Mdu Rachayya's attempted usurpation. Rakkasaman, the prince, saved

61 (E C V) we find Rachamalla making a grant in 920 A D. Hole-Narasipur 14 (E C V) refers perhaps to his queen and Tiptur 10 (E C VII) of Kachcheva Ganga's 3rd year also refers to him. Heggaddevankote 11b (F C IV) apparently refers to a proposed division of the kingdom between himself and his brother Butuga. But the Atmakûr stone inscription (F C III Mandya 41) dated in Saka 872 the cyclic year Saumya (=950 A D) informs us that Butuga slew Rachamalla after a fight and took possession of Gangavadi 96 000. When this event actually occurred is not known. As there are no records of him after his third regnal year it is probable his reign was a short though an eventful one. His supersession by his brother might perhaps be set down to about the close of the first quarter of the 10th century.

The story of the succession of the descendants of Rachamalla III is told in a fragmentary inscription found by the side of a temple in ruins in the jungle to the west of the village of Ichavâdi in the Shimoga hobli (M A J 1923 No 118). The inscription is of the time of Butuga, Râjamalla's youngest brother who is mentioned in it with his queen both of whom make a grant to the Jaina teacher mentioned in it. In this inscription Râjamalla's relationship to Butuga is stated to be that of a brother and Butuga himself is given the title of Nanniya Ganga which is probably only another form of Ganga Narâyana mentioned for him in the Kudlur grant of Mârasimha III. The Ganga descent is traced from Butugendra son of Nitimârga I then his son Ereyappa is mentioned next his son Râchamalla then his son Yereyanga next his son whose name is lost in the inscription but he may be the Narasinga-Satyavâkya-Vira Vedanga, who is described in E I III 183, as a son of Ereyappa and father of Râchamalla, next mentioned then his son Saigotta Râchamalla (See Table). It

His descendants and their
succession

Uchchangi By this exploit, he obtained the title of Ranayangasungu. He also seems to have slain Tribhuvana in the fort of Bagayū and occupied it. Who this person was is not clear, but it is possible he was connected with the Pandyas of Uchchangi. He also won victories over Raja, Bāsa, Sivara and Kūnarka in the fort of king Kāma, who has not so far been identified. He seems to have had many titles (a list of them is given in his Purāna), but the most important of them was Satyudhisthina, which he got from his never telling an untruth even in jest. Chāmunḍa Rāya was, besides, a Kānada author. He wrote the Chāmunḍa Rāya Purāna already mentioned, about the year 978 A.D. It gives an account, mostly in prose, of the twenty-four Trithankaras, or Jain saints. He is, however, best remembered by his sacred erections at Sravana Belgola, among which are Chāmunḍarāya-basti on the smaller hill (Sravana Belgola No. 122) and the colossal image of Gommatēsvara on the larger hill (Ibid 145, 176 and 179, also see Nos 234 and 254). The date of the execution of this remarkable monument and object of work was about 983 A.D. In daring conception and gigantic dimensions, it is without a rival in India (see ante Chapter V, Sculpture and Painting). The name of Rāchamalla IV, during whose reign it was completed, is as much connected with it as that of his minister Chāmunḍa Rāya, whose piety and religious zeal conceived it. Rāchamalla's war accountant Subhakarāyā is mentioned in Sravana Belgola 154 (wrongly assigned to Rāchamalla III in M A H 1908-1909, Para 63 but correctly to Rāchamalla IV in H C II Sravana Belgola, Introduction 46). Apparently he seems to have visited Sravana Belgola on behalf of his royal master. As his official designation is given, it might be taken that the visit was paid during the life-time of Rāchamalla. In that case, the date of the inscription should be much earlier than 1000 A.D.,

into between Butuga and Am̃ghavaraha II. The alliance was sealed by Am̃ghavaraha II giving his daughter Revaka (or Revakanimada) entitled Chāgavedāngī in marriage to Butuga (F I IV 350 also Kudlur plates in V 4 R 1920-1921 Para 49) with a dowry (F C III Int 41 and E I III 17a) of the Biligera 300 the Belvala 300 the Kishkād 70 and the Bagenad 70 (provinces in the present Dharwar Belgaum and the Bijapur Districts). On the death of Baddega Butuga assisted his son Krishna (or Kannara) III in securing the throne from an usurper named Lalliya. When in 949 A.D. Krishna was at war with the Chola king Rajaditya Butuga rendered him a great service by killing the latter in a single combat on his elephant at a place called Takkōlam near Arkānam. He followed up this exploit by besieging the Chola capitals of Tanjore and Kānchi and burnt Nalkoto as well. For his important service Kannara made over to Butuga the Banavase 12,000 province represented by the present Shimoga and North Kanara Districts (E C III Mandya 41). Butuga also may have been assisted at about this time, in gaining his own throne by Krishna who (E I IV, 249) claims to have planted in Gangapāṭi as in a garden the pure tree Bhutarya having uprooted the poisonous tree Rāchamalla. Rāchamalla's slaying and supersession should have accordingly, occurred some time prior to 950 A.D. Among other exploits, Butuga is said (E O VIII Nagar 35) to have taken Chitrakuta by assault, and conquered the Seven Mālavas the boundaries of which he marked out with stones, and gave the country the name Mālava Ganga. The Kudlur plates of Mārasimha III give a short but graphic description of his marriage and martial achievements, which has the additional merit of throwing light on his activities far and near. This grant says that Butuga went to king Baddega in the Dahala country (Chēdi or Bandal khand), and then married his daughter along with the question This inference is supported by the fact that Rakasa Gangā's niece (younger brother's daughter) Chātālā-Dēvi was married in about 1040 A D to a Kādavetti (Nagar 35, dated in 1077 A D). The grant, in which Rakasa-Gangā's name and titles are fully set out, is a private one recording the gift of a land for the tank built by one Govaiasibhātāka, apparently a Jain ascetic, said to be renowned for the practice of aśtāṅga-yōga Rakasa-Gangā was the patron of the Kannada poet Nāgavarma, the first of that name, author of Chhandombuddhi, who, in the introduction to his work, has verses relating to himself, beginning Aśaṁ-rakṣaṅgaṅgaṁ As Mr Rice has pointed out (Coorg Inscriptions, page 10, fn 1), these verses though found in several palm-leaf copies of the work, are omitted in the Rev H Kittel's well-known edition of it (Nāgavarma's Canarese Poems), though referred to in his Kannada-English Dictionary under Gangā and Ajitasena.

From Nagar 35 (E C. VIII) it would appear that Rakasa-Gangā adopted the daughters and son of his younger brother Aṁṁūḷi-Dēva. The latter was named Rājya Vidyādhara. Apparently Aṁṁūḷi-Dēva died while Rakasa-Gangā was still ruling. His son, Vidyādhara, may have also died before Rakasa-Gangā, as the latter is represented as taking special interest in his nieces

It is not so far known how long Rakasa-Gangā ruled or when he died. The latest date we have for him is 1021 A D. We have a reference to a Gangā king Nīṁṁāṅga in Channarayana 10 (E C. IV) dated in 999, in which he makes a grant along with a Nolaṁba-Pallava princess, described as the elder sister of Nolaṁba Mr Rice suggests that it is possible that Chikmagalur 3 (E C. VI), which is dated in the 6th reign of a Nīṁṁāṅga Rāchamalla 3 of this king's time, as the date,

1021 A D
1021 A D
1021 A D
1021 A D

Amūḷi
1021 A D

he is described as ' having without fear come against the Chōla Rājāditya. The large Leiden grant refers to the heroic Rājāditya's death and states that he was killed being pierced in the heart while seated on the back of a lordly elephant by the fall of their (Krishna's arms) sharp arrows. Butuga was, in this war against Tanjore helped by one Maṇālāra who is described as ' the boon lord of Valabhi which has been identified by Mr. Rice with the celebrated place of that name in Kathiawād in Gujarat (F C III Introd G). T. Narsimha 102 (F C III) refers to a similar boon lord of Valabhi entitled the supreme king of the broad white silk flag. The presence of such men in the army may have as suggested by Mr. Rice led to the expedition against Gujarat in the next reign. The Maṇālāra of the Atukur stone had for his title Sagara Trinētra and was it would appear a wonder in laughter (in battle) and in war an only Sudraka the reference being to the alleged royal author of the Vricchakaṭika one of the more famous Sanskrit dramas, assigned to the 6th century A.D. Maṇālāra according to the Atukur stone did the greatest slaughter in the field of battle the ' Chōla (king) himself being witness. How he deserved the title of Sūdraka is thus explained in the verses on the stone —

When the four fold armies of the Chōla came against him in force, and he putting them to flight pursued close after and falling upon them was slaying—not one among the braves who said I will stop him or any boasting warrior did we see Chōla himself being witness only his slaughter did we behold who as if thus saying did not admire the Sagara Trinētra?

The king was at his back the enemy's force opposing him in front (yot) in this (crisis) all who hated him were plunged into shame. Saying I will stay no longer—like a lion Hari and Bira Lakshmi being his aid he split in two the skull of the elephant the fort of Chōla—the only Sudraka in war

The story of Rajendra-Chola's conquest of the Gangamandala belongs to Chola history rather than to the Gangas. It ought to suffice here to state that the Cholas, who had been victorious all over the east of the peninsula, taking possession of Kanchi, the capital of the Pallavas, and reducing to submission the Eastern Chalukyas, with whom were allied the Rashtrakutas and the Gangas, now penetrated to Mysore. E. C. IX Hoskote III shows the Chola king Rajaraja-Deva ruling in the east of the State in 997 A.D. His son Rajendra-Chola captured Talakad by 1004 A.D. and the Gangas, which had ruled Mysore for nine centuries, was brought to an end. A little record in undoubtedly Gangas characters, dated in that very year (1004 A.D.), to be seen under a tree to the east of Rannipur, Channarayana Taluk, is characteristically silent as to the reigning sovereign of the time. It testifies to the troubled conditions prevailing during the period. (M. A. R. 1907-1908, Para 35 and plate opposite to page 8). Similarly the stone inscription now at the Commissioner's Office at Mercara (Coorg 5) dated in Saka 921, cyclic year Sarvar, or 1000 A.D., is silent as to the name of the ruling sovereign, though it falls into the last years of the Gangas period.

The Gangas, however, do not disappear from history. Driven from their kingdom, they took refuge with the Chalukyas and with the Hoyasalas, who were destined to succeed to their dominion in Mysore, and attained to positions of the highest honour under both. A Gangas princess was married to the Western Chalukya king Somesvara I (1042-1068 A.D.), and became the mother of the kings Somesvara II (1068-1076 A.D.) and his celebrated brother Vikramaditya (1076-1126 A.D.). Shikaripur 83 of 1058 A.D. and Shikaripur 152 of 1060 A.D. show that Vikramaditya assumed all the Gangas titles, was at Balligave (Balligama) ruling over Gangavadi,

Rajendra-
Chola's conquest

Later
Gangas

On the same occasion as he was departing homeward Krishna III asked Manālāra to ask him any boon he wanted. As became a true soldier Manālāra asked saying — As a mark of your good favour, grant me kaḷi — apparently a hound — and he received it. The hound unfortunately when set after a big boar the boar and the hound as the inscription says died together. Manālāra set up a stone for it in Atokur in front of the Challesvara temple and granted a piece of land for its maintenance. The inscription adds that if the priest who manages the temple if he enjoys the land, and does not perform worship to the stone will be guilty of the sins that the hound had committed. (See for further description of the sculpture on this stone, Chapter V ante Sculpture and Painting) There is a lithic inscription of Butuga with the title Ganga Gāogṛyaood Joyaduttaranga, of Daugur in Molvalli Taluk recording a Kuladittu. It is dated in A D 960 or twenty two years later than the Sodi grant (M.A.R. 1919 1920 Para 65). The Andagave Kollur virgal dated in Saka 866 cyclic year Krodhi, corresponding to 944 A D., falls into the same reign and may belong to it. (Coorg Inscriptions, No 28). It is a fragmentary inscription and is a memorial of self sacrifice. The Ichavādi stone grant in Shimoga District records a gift of wet lands by him (as Nanniya Ganga) and his queen to a Jain priest in favour of a basadi constructed by him (M.A.R. 1928 No 118). If the Kudlur plates may be believed, Butuga should have been as great in religious warfare as in the political. It would appear he was well versed in Jain philosophy and worsted a Buddhist controversialist in what appears to have been an open debate. To quote the rather flowery language of the grant he cleft open the frontal globes of the lordly elephants the arrogant false disputants of the ākāntamatha (Buddhism) with the thunderbolts, the arguments based on the scriptures.

of Palukosu, of the Kateya-sūtra, in order to provide for the worship and offerings to (the god) Paramāśvara. The grant was apparently made at the instance of Navanitesvara of Sripavata, and was written by Utnna Srikhandi. An inscription of the Eastern Gangga king Mahāraja Indravarma Dēva is also known (M E R 1918, Appendix A No 9). It is assigned by Mr. H. Krishna Sastri to the 9th century A D. The king is described as a devotee of the god Gōkarnēśvara, residing in the Mahēndra mountain. According to the inscriptions, Nagar 35, Shivoga 10, 4 and 64, the progenitor of the Kalinga Gangas was Bhagadatta, between whom and his brother Sridatta, their father Vishnugupta divided his dominions, giving Kalinga to the former, and the ancestral kingdom with the elephant, to the latter.

Their Grants
and Genealogy

A number of their early inscriptions have been found (I A, XIII, XIV, XVIII, E I, III, 17, 220), all issued from Kalinga-nagara (Gangjam district), and dated in the years of the Gangga family (Ganggya-vamsa-samvatsara), and is not yet determined. Among them are a Dēvendravarma in 51, in 183 and in 254. But the first and third were sons of Anantavarma, and the second a son of Gunārvava. They were therefore different from the one mentioned in copper-plate grant numbered Bangalore 140, above referred to. The date 254 is supposed to be equivalent to about 774 A.D. The kings profess to be worshippers of the god Gōkarnēśvara on the Mahēndra mountain (in Gangjam district), and rulers over the whole of Kalinga. Arranging the grants conjecturally, guided by the years and relationships given, we obtain the following list —

Anantavarma	51	Anantavarma	254
Dēvendravarma	51	Rājēndravarma	304
Satyavarma	91, 128, 146	Apantavarma
Indravarma		Vajrabas
Rājēndravarma
Dēvendravarma

962 and has been pronounced a genuine grant. Of him we have a long account in J C II (Inscriptions at Srirangapatna) new Edn No. 9 old Edn No. 150 both of his achievements and of his death in 974 A.D. at Bankāpur by the Jain title of Sallekhana or religious starvation. It states that Marasurha became known as the king of the Gurjars by his conquest of the northern region for the 13th Kāka king Krishna III that he broke the pride of Alla a powerful opponent of Krishna III dispersed the bands of the Kirtas dwelling on the skirts of the Vindhya forests that he protected the army of the emperor (Krishna III) at Manyakheta (Malik-d in the Nalanda Dominions) that he performed the anointment of the 14th Kāka king Indra IV that he defeated Vajjala the younger brother of Patalamalla that he captured all the possessions including jewels elephants etc., of the ruler of the Vanavasi country that he received obeisance from the members of the Matura family (J C VI 4 and 5) that he destroyed all the Nolamba kings in war which circumstance gave him the distinctive title Nolambakulintaka or a Yama to the Nolamba family that he took the hill fort of Uchchangi which had proved impregnable even to Kādavatti that he killed the Sabara leader Naraga that he defeated the Chālukya prince Rājaditya that he fought and conquered in battles on the banks of the Tapi at Manyakheta at Gonur at Uchchangi in the Banavasi country and at the fortress of Pabhase and that he maintained the doctrine of Jina and erected basadis and manastambhas at various places. The record closes with the statement that he relinquished the sovereignty and keeping the vow of sallekhana for three days in the presence of Ajita bhattacharya died at Bankāpur (in 974). A good number of titles is applied to him among which may be mentioned Ganga-chūdāmani (the crest jewel of the Ganga), Nolambāntaka (destroyer of the Nolambas) ruled over the Kalingas, nominating his brother Dhanarnava as his successor

Of the line of kings so established some grants have been discovered, and the following is the list of the kings, with the number of years each is said to have ruled (E I IV, 186).—

Kāmalaksha	95	Vijayaditya (III)	15
Kāmalaksha (I)	10	Kāmalaksha (III)	19
Kāmalaksha (II)	20	Gundanna	27
Kāmalaksha	6	Kāmalaksha	15

Instead of the above, two grants have Vijayaditya (III)
40 (or 44), while Gundanna is said to have ruled 3 years, and Kāmalaksha IV 35, Vijayaditya (V) is also given 33 years

Kāmalaksha	12	Gundanna (II)	1
Gundanna (I)	7	Madhu Kāmalaksha (VI)	19
Kāmalaksha (IV)	3	Vijayaditya (V) (crowned)	20
Vijayaditya	1	in 1019	8
Vijayaditya (IV)	35	Rajaraja	8
Kāmalaksha (V)	6	Chola (crowned in 1078)	1

Vijayaditya V, married Vijaya-mahadevi of the Vaidumbā family. His son was Rajaraja, who is said to have defeated the Dramilas, wedded Rajasundari, daughter of the Chola king Rajendra-Chola, and saved the aged Vijayaditya from falling into the power of the Cholas, by upholding his authority in the west. Rajaraja's son Anantavarman or Chola-Ganga was anointed king of Trikalinga in 1078 A D, and reinstated the fallen lord of Utkala (Orissa) in the east, and the sinking lord of Vengi in the west. Grants of his have been found dated in 1081, 1118 and 1135 A D (loc cit). To the reign of Anantavarman Chola-Ganga of this dynasty (1078-1142
A D) must be assigned inscription No 827 of Appendix A of M E R 1918 (Para 18). The record is of the 15th regnal year, or A D 1093. It is a Telugu inscription
A copper-plate of the Eastern Ganga king Devendra-varman, son of Gunavarman, is known (M E R 1913, Para 63 and E I XIII, No 19). It is dated in the year 195

him king of Gangavādi and gives many—rather poetical—reasons why he performed the ceremony ending with the declaration that he did so because he (Mārasimha) was like himself (i.e. Krishna) able to bear up the burden of his kingdom. Mārasimha's other names were Guttiva Ganga and Nalambāntaka. It is clear from the inscription quoted that he was an active ally of Krishna III on whose behalf he led an expedition into Gujrat. He also fought against the Western Chālukya prince Rājāditya, who it is suggested had made, through anger a brave declaration of war at a great festival of victory put down Naraga a bandit chief who had gained such renown as to be looked upon as either Yama Ravana or Sisupala and who had his stronghold in the present Chitaldrug District, and whose head, we are told fell with the greatest ease into the hand of the servants of Gangachūdāmani and brought the Nalamba family to an end. On account of this last act he has the distinctive title of Nalambāntaka or Nalambakulantaka Dēva (which full name occurs in E C III T Narasimh 69) i.e., the Yama to the Nalambas or the destroyer of the Nalambas. The Nalambas it would appear misbehaved themselves through self conceit owing to the arrogance of the strength of arm of hundreds of princes and the pride of troops of elephants. This conquest of the Nalambas should have been accomplished after the death of Krishna III for we have evidence to believe that the Nalamba Pallavas were his allies in his conquest of the South as far as Rāmōsvaram (E I IV 280 and ante under Nalamba Pallavas). From a lithic inscription at Novaligo Arsikore Taluk dated in 971 A.D. in Mārasimha's reign it might be inferred that the fight which preceded this conquest should have taken place in or about that year (M A R 1910-1911 Para 77). For this inscription actually records a grant in favour of one Amāvāsya who repeated the exploit of Bātuga II

the Yelamanda plates of the time of the Ganga king Anantavarman (H C III, 17) whose inscription is dated in the 304th year of the Gangāya era. The characters of both these inscriptions belong to the 9th century A D. Combining the genealogy of these two grants, Mr. Krishna Sastri has deduced three successive steps in the succession of this dynasty—Maharaja Rajendravarmā; his son Anantavarman (304th year), and his son Rajendravarmā (342nd year). A copper-plate grant of Maharaja Devendravarmā, son of Rajendravarmā, has also been registered (M E R 1924, Appendix A No 2). It purports to be dated in the Gangāya era 101. But as the record is a much damaged one and the date cannot be said to be certain, Mr. Krishna Sastri is inclined to think that the date 101 is a mistake for 310 of the Gangāya era. This king is identical with the Devendravarmā, son of Rajendravarmā, who issued the undated copper grant No. 7 of 1918-1919 (M E R 1919, Page 15). Both these grants have been composed and engraved by identical persons. Mr. Krishna Sastri suggests, after considering other possibilities, that the Devendravarmā of this grant might have been the second son of Maharaja Rajendravarmā and the younger brother of Maharaja Anantavarman of the Gangāya year 304 above mentioned. In this case, the date of this grant, which is doubtfully given as 110 of the Gangāya era ought to be taken to be 310 of the same era. In this case the Maharaja Devendravarmā of this grant may be identical with the king of that name, who is mentioned as the father of Satyavarmā of the Gangāya era 351 (Kielhorn's List of Northern Inscriptions, No. 684). The succession, then, would be as follows as suggested by Mr. Krishna Sastri—Maharaja Rajendravarmā, then his son Maharaja Anantavarman of the year 301, next his brother Maharaja Devendravarmā of the present grant, his date being 310 of the Gangāya era (110 being corrected), then his nephew lithic inscription of his dated in the first year of his coronation (971 A D) on a cirgal in front of the travellers bungalow at Nagamangala (V.A.R. 1914 1915 Para 67) The yantrakal at Hebbatta Srivastapur Taluk containing a Sarvatobhadra verse in 32 small squares is an interesting record of his reign (See V.A.R. 1916 17, Para 80 also Plate VI facing page 40) It records the rather important remark that Sri Marasimha did good to the cattle It has on its front face a circular diagram with 17 syllables inserted in the interstices in the middle and the syllable hrim repeated 12 times around Below the diagram is the remark above referred to that the stone called locally go-kal was set up by Marasimha for the benefit of the cattle The Sarvatobhadra is on the back of the stone but the meaning of the verse is not known It has, however been made out that it (the verse) refers to cow herds milk and the protection of cows The curious double cirgal at Niduvani Hole Narsipur Taluk dated in 970 A D also belongs to his reign though there is no reference to him on it (V.A.R. 1912 1913 Para 58)

Marasimha III appears to have promoted the coronation of his nephew Indra Raja IV in an attempt to maintain the Rāshtrakuta power (E.C. II Sravana Belgola New Edn 59) But his attempt was shattered by the Chālukyas beyond recovery in 973 A D and Indra Rāja starved himself to death by the Jain rite of sallekhana at Sravana Belgola in 982 A D (E.C. II, Sravana Belgola, New Edn No 193—Old Edn 57)

Marasimha appears to have retired to Bankāpur in or about 973 A D to end his days in religious exercises at the feet of Ajitasena, and died after observing the vow for three days in 974 A D His retirement from sovereignty however did not take place until he had carried out works of piety such as the erection of basadis (Jain temples) and mānastambhas (pavilioned pillars) referred to in his Sravana Belgola epitaph Apparently he had Devendravarma of the 254th year of the Gangēya era (I A XVIII 145) But since he is not referred to as a member of the Kadamba family, we are not in a position to trace this political relationship between the Gangas and the Kadambas to this early period Mr Krishna Sastri thinks that it is probable that this earlier Dharmakhadin, the maternal uncle of Devendravarma, was an ancestor of the Dharmakhadin of this grant (No 12 of Table A of 1917-18), in which case the Kadambas will have to be viewed not only as the subordinates of the Eastern Gangas as in the time of Virabhadra but also as having been matrimonially allied to them from earlier times That there was matrimonial alliance between the Gangas and the Kadambas is known (H C IV, 186) This relationship between the Eastern Gangas and the Kadambas would appear to have begun only a generation previous to Virabhadra, whose mother was the Vaidumba princess Vijayamahadevi (see ante).

Another copper-plate grant of king Anantavarma Virabhadra, above mentioned (M E R 1925, Appendix A, No 5) is known It gives the genealogy of the family from Guamaharava to Anantavarma Virabhadra, who was crowned in Saka 960 and is dated in Saka 982 or 1060 A D, and records the gift of a village to a Vaisya, who re-giants the greater portion of it to a number of Brahmins (ibid para 6) The genealogy traced in this grant is the same as that given in H C IV, 186. A copper-plate grant, registered as No 6 in M E R 1925, Appendix A, is a palimpsest of which the earlier rubbed out grant is that of this self-same Virabhadra, who was crowned in Saka 960, while the fresh inscription engraved on it is that of Choda-Ganga, who, the inscription states, was crowned in Saka 999 It gives as usual the names of all the kings from Guamaharava, with the lengths of their reigns In repeating the names of kings up to Virabhadra, who was crowned in Saka 960, it states that

Of these, Rāchamalla Satyavākya was the eldest and he succeeded his father on the Ganga throne. His other name was Jagadūkaṁbira (Śravana Belgola 201). There are only a few inscriptions of this king and all of them are on stone. One of these epigraphs, a worn one is at Kudurā, Chamrajaagar Taluk, of which the date (only partly visible) seems to be Saka 900 or 978 A D (M.A.R. 1916 1917 Para 81) Nanjangud 183 (E.C. III), dated in Saka 899 cyclic year Istara or A D 977, belongs to his reign. It is a lithic inscription found near a pond at Dodda Honima and records the grant of a whole lordship in favour of one Kachi Bhata, disciple of Bala Sakti Bhata. It provides among other things for the distribution of food to people and incidentally testifies to the existence of Sakti worship in the Ganga kingdom in the 10th century. Then we have another at Peggur in Coorg dated in Saka 899 or 977 A D (Inscriptions in Coorg No 4). The latter records a gift of a village to a priest. It mentions Rāchamalla IV and his younger brother Rakkasa Ganga, whom it styles annana banta or elder brother's warrior. Rakkasa Ganga was at the time governor of the country round Beddoregaru, another name for Lakshmanatirtha, which is locally known as the big river. Rāchamalla IV does not appear to have had an accession to his father's throne. There are references to attempted usurpations at the time. The exact details are not known but it is clear that advantage was taken of either the disturbed position of the country or of the comparative youthfulness of Rāchamalla and his brothers to effect more than one petty revolution. But Taila surnamed Āhavamalla the founder of the restored Chalukya line, and Ohāmunda Rāya the Minister who had acted under Mārasimha III, successively thwarted the design. A certain Pāṇchāla-Dēva with the Ganga titles set himself up as independent ruler in 975 A D but was killed in battle by the Chōldeva king.

called Nagara in later inscriptions found in the vicinity. M.C. IV. 188) But it has been doubted whether this Nagara, the modern Mukhalingsan, is the same as Kalinganagara of the earlier copper-plate grants. (see M.E.R. 1925, para 8). Further in this grant, the name of the grandson of Kaminava III is given as Potankusa, instead of Jitankusa in the Viragapata plates (see table above). Vajrahasa, again, is given in this grant, a reign of 33 years instead of 30 years, as in the Viragapata plates (see above table). Then, Kajaraja, his son, is allotted 8 years in this grant as in the Viragapata plates. He is said to have defeated the Dramilas (i.e., Tamils, probably the Cholas) in war and to have wedded Rajasundari, the daughter of their king, evidently Kājendra Chola, as stated in copper-plate No. 6 above-mentioned. This Rajaraja is also stated to have saved the Chola King Vijayaditya, who may be the same as the Eastern Chālukya Vijayaditya VII, king of Vengi (I. 4. XX 283)

The Period of
their Rule

The total of the years assigned to the reigns of these kings comes to about 350, which, deducted from 1078, the date of Chola-Ganga's accession, brings us to 728, and this is near about the period estimated for the later of the early kings previously mentioned. It is also the period in the annals of the Mysore Gangas where we find a break in the list, filled up by an alleged Prithvipati, a word merely meaning king, who had a son Marasimha, of whom nothing more is heard. Putting these coincidences together, we are tempted to suppose that Kāmārnava, with his brother Maasimha and the others who gave up their kingdom in Mysore to a relative and went forth from Kolār to found another in Kalinga where a branch of the family had already been ruling for centuries, may possibly have been sons of the missing king who died in battle.

by B viga is actually mentioned in Sravana Belgola 134. These inscriptions should accordingly belong to about 977 A D.

Chāmunda Rāya who thus quelled the rebellion was the minister and general of Rachamalla IV. He was perhaps one of the greatest ministers known to Ganga history. In the Jain religion his name stands high and is referred to in several inscriptions as merely Rāya. A twelfth century inscription of the time of Hoysala Narasimha I (Sravana Belgola 315, dated in 1159 A D) praises him as one of the chief promoters of the Jain religion and classes him with Ganga Rāya minister of Vishnuvardhana and Hulla minister of Narasimha I. The story of his achievements and pious deeds is told in a few inscriptions found in Sravana Belgola and in a work of his own. In T Narapur 69 we are told that he was the son of Mahābalayya who is praised in several lines as a virtuous and able man. Mahābalayya's father was G vindaṁayya and brother Iṣvaraṁya. The brothers G vindaṁayya and Iṣvaraṁya were it would appear like Bhīma and Arjuna. These two are said to have served under Nolaṁbakulantaka Deva which is Narasimha III. From Sravana Belgola 281 and his work Chāmunda Rāya Purāṇa we learn that Chāmundaṛaya belonged to the Brahma kshatra race. He at first was told frustrated the desire of King Chaladanka Ganga to seize the Ganga throne. When Rachamalla joined Indra IV the Rashtrakūṭa king in his war against Vajjala-deva brother of Patilamalla Chāmunda Rāya as the general of Rachamalla, routed and put to flight the hostile forces. Chāmunda Rāya took part in the war against the Nolamba Pallavas and beat them on the plain of Gōṇḍr and won the title of Vīra mārtaṇḍa. He also defeated Ranasinga (or Ranarangasinga) and took the hill fort of Uchchangī. Ranarangasinga was apparently a title of Rājāditya the Pāṇḍya king of

Chola-Gangas
in Ceylon and East Mysore

Certain other references to kings of the same connection may here be pointed out. The existence of constant intercourse between Kalinga and Ceylon from the earliest times is well known, and we find a Chola-Ganga from Kalinga ruling in Ceylon in 1196 A D (Rhys Davids, Nussumata Orientalia). There was also a line of Chola-Gangas in the east of Mysore in the thirteenth century. But it is not a little singular that we find a Karnātaka dynasty set up in distant Nepal apparently in 1097 which was presumably of Ganga origin. The founder, Nanya Dēva (perhaps Naniya Dēva), came from the south. He was succeeded by Ganga Dēva and four others, the last of whom removed the capital to Katmandu, where the line came to an end (Ins from Nepal, by Dr G Bühler).

Ganga Raja
of Ummattur

Not yet, however, have we done with the Gangas, for at about the time that their Orissa sovereignty came to an end, or the first part of the sixteenth century, a Ganga Raja of Ummattur returned to the scene of their former dominion, and established a principality at Sivasamudram, the island at the falls of the Cauvery, not far from Talkad. He having assumed independence and claimed Penukonda, Krishna Raja, the Vijayanagar king, led in 1511 A D one of his earliest expeditions against him and captured his fort and took Seringapatam (H I VII 18). Ganga Raja, after a prosperous reign, was succeeded by his son Nandi Raja, who, to atone for some ceremonial offence, leaped into the cataraict at Ganga Chukki on horseback with his wife. His son, Ganga Raja II, enlarged the city greatly, and lived with much splendour. His two daughters were married, one to the chief of Kilmale, near Satyagala, the other to the chief of Nagariakere, near Maddur. These marriages were very unhappy, for the pride of the ladies gave their husbands constant disgust, and they were continually to which date it has been assigned by Mr Narasimhachar (Sravana Belgola Page 77) I C III 2 Narsipur 69 which has been assigned to about 980 A.D., gives the genealogy of Chaminunda Rava and says that he performed many works of merit in the land he governed. From his Purāna we learn that he was a devout Jain and that his guru was Ajitasena the same great saint at Bankapur before whom Murasimha III performed sallekhana. Chaminunda Rava's son Jinodavana was likewise a lay disciple of this saint and built a temple at Sravana Belgola (Sravana Belgola No 121)

Rakkasa Ganga Rāchamalla succeeded his elder brother. As stated above he has been described as annana banta in Sravana Belgola 138 and in Coorg 4. Probably he served as a general in the army of Rāchamalla IV. We have a record of his reign in EC V Srinivāsa pur 59. In this a feudatory of his is mentioned as ruling the Holambavādi 32 000. A lithic grant of his reign has also been found at Hale Budanur, Mandya Taluk but it is undated (M A R 1909 1910 Para 62). But it has on another side an inscription of the 18th regnal year of Rājendra Chōla (i.e. 1024 A.D.) who according to an inscription at Belatur conquered the Ganga country prior to 1033 A.D. (E I IV 216). As the inscription of Rakkasa-Ganga is in identical characters as the one of Rājendra Chōla the inference has to be drawn that the whole forms one inscription and Rakkasa Ganga acknowledges the suzerainty of Rājendra Chōla. But, as has been pointed out by Mr Narasimhachar the period of Rakkasa Ganga is according to Coorg Inscriptions No 4 dated in 977 A.D. earlier by nearly thirty years than that of Rājendra Chōla. As no other Rakkasa Ganga is known so far to Ganga history it has to be presumed that Rakkasa Ganga lived on to at least 1024 A.D. the date of the grant in

Rakkasa
Ganga
Rāchamalla
977-1024 A.D.

but the Pallavas effectually opposed them and the invader was slain, as previously related. His successor, however, defeated the Pallavas and then formed an alliance with them, confirmed by his marriage with a Pallava princess in the sixth century, Pulakesi whose chief city was apparently Indukanta (supposed to be Ajanta or some neighbouring place), wrested Vatapi (the modern Badami in Bijapur district) from the Pallavas and made it his capital. His son Kirtivarma subdued the Mauryas (descendants of the ancient Mauryas of Pataliputra), ruling in the Konkan, and the Kadambas of Banavasi. Another son, Mangalesa, conquered the Kalachuryas. The Alivas, who ruled in Tulava or South Kanara, were also at the same time overcome, and the next king, Pulakesi II, came into contact with the Gangas, as there appears to have been a Jain temple erected in his name to Puligere (Taksashmesvara in Dharwar District). There are inscriptions of theirs at Kig in the Western Ghats in Koppa taluk, and at Mangalore. In about 617 the Chalukyas separated into two branches, of which the Eastern Chalukyas made Vengi (near Billore in the Godavari district), taken from the Pallavas, and subsequently Rajamahendri (Rajahmundry), their capital, while the Western Chalukyas, with whom Mysore is chiefly concerned, continued to rule from Vatapi and eventually from Kalyana (in the Nizam's Dominions, about 100 miles west by north of Hyderabad).

Their Origin
and Descent

The Chalukyas were of the Soma-vamsa or lunar line. They profess to be of the Manavya-gotra and Haritiputras, sons of Hariti, nourished by the Seven Mothers. The Varaha Boar was the principal emblem on their signet, obtained from Bhagavan Narayana (Vishnu), but their insignia included a peacock fan, an ankusa or elephant goad, a golden sceptre, and other symbols. The Western Chalukyas are styled the Satyashraya kula, from the

with a slight correction will work out according to Dr Kielhorn as either 989 or 992 A.D. How this Nitimarga Rāchamalla was exactly related to Rakkasa Ganga is not known. Nor is it clear if he may be identified with Rakkasa Ganga himself the terms Nitimarga and Rāchamalla being treated as mere titles in case such identification can be justified. Whether the Ganga Permānadi mentioned in EC III Mandya 78 also refers to the same king (Nitimarga Rāchamalla), it is difficult to say. He is described in this inscription as ruling over karnāta. The Saka date is given as 944 but the cyclic year has been set down as Durmakhi which Mr. Rico suggests is a mistake for Durmati (see FC III, Mandya 79 footnote 1). Saka 944 corresponds to 1022 A.D. It is accordingly possible that the Ganga Permānadi mentioned in this inscription refers to Rakkasa Ganga himself as we know from the Hale Budanur inscription also found in Mandya Taluk that he lived down to 1024 A.D. and acknowledges the suzerainty of Rajendra Chōla. He and not Nitimarga Rāchamalla, (as suggested by Mr. Rico in his Uysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions p. 48) must be the Ganga Rāja under whom Talkad the Ganga capital was lost. The concluding part of Mandya 78 (which is to be seen on a stone behind the Durga Dēvi temple on the tank bund at Belur in Kottati hobli, Mandya Taluk) itself seems to support this inference. It says that Pergado Hāsam built a new Jina temple in whose favour a grant is recorded in it at the place of his sovereign's government (i.e. Talkad) in order that long life might ensue to Permānadi. He also seems to have caused steps to be cut to the deep tank of Balora katta (apparently the Belur where the inscription is found) and had the embankment built and provided a sluice to it and granted a kolaga of land under it to the Jaina temple he built at the capital.

may have been but a sequel of the contests between Seleucide and Arsacide on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates. If, however, the theory of the foreign origin of the Pallavas has to be given up (see ante Pallavas), this derivation is in danger of losing the weight that might otherwise attach to it

The following is a table of the Early Chalkyas down to the rise to power of the Rashtrakutas. This table is mainly based on Dr Kjelhorn's list (H C VIII, App II). A full account of the Chalkyas down to 1123 A.D., including their rise, their eclipse by the Rashtrakutas, and their revival is given in H C. XI Davanagere I.

Their Succession List

Jayasimha, ? Vijayaditya
Rajasimha, Kanaraga, ? Vishunuvardhana
Pulakesi I, Satyasraya, Kanavalkrama, Vallabha 650 A D
Kirtivarma I, Vallabha, Kanaparalkrama, etc, 666 667, 698
Mangalasa, Vallabha, Kanavalkrama, etc, 697, 601-2
Pulakesi II, Vallabha, Satyasraya, etc, 606, 612, 634 (Crowned 609)
(Subversion of Chalkyas by the Pallava King Narasimha Vakrama 'Thirteen years' interruption of Chalkya Rule 642 to 666)
Adityavarma
Chandraditya, 655
Vikramaditya I, Vallabha, Satyasraya, etc, 655, 659
Vijayaditya, Satyasraya 696, 699, 700, 705, 709
Kirtivarma II, Nripasimharaja, etc, 746, 764, 767.
(In 768 A D, the Rashtrakutas subverted the Chalkya power and the main dynasty became extinct until revived at about the close of the 10th century A D)

Jayasimha and his successors

Jayasimha is said to have defeated and destroyed Indra, the son of Krishna, the Rashtrakuta or Ratta king. He himself, however, was slain in an encounter with Trilochana Pallava. His queen, then pregnant, fled and took refuge with a Brahman called Vishnu Somayaji, in whose house she gave birth to Rajasimha. On growing up to man's estate, he renewed the contest with the Pallavas, in which he was successful, and Banavāsi Sāntalige and Nolembhorādī provinces under his father Āhavamalla (see E C VII) Probably the Chōlas themselves followed the usual practice of recognising members of the old dynasty as local rulers. Thus a fragmentary riṅgal of bichirāḷḷ Malagale Mysore Taluk which appears to be dated in 1014 A D., mentions a Permādi and records the death of some one in battle (M. A. R. 1919 1920 Para 66). He was probably a local ruler of the defunct dynasty. Similarly, Shimoga 4 (E C VII) furnishes the genealogy of a later line of Gangas whose descent is traced from Mūrasimho I. Additional information about this line is given in Shimoga 6, 10 and 64 (see ante). Gangas were also in authority in the Kolar District during the Chōla occupation and were also trusted officers of the Hoysalas. It was a descendant of the Gangas the Hoysala general Ganga Rāja that recovered Tolkāḍ from the Chōlas (E C III Malavalli 81) in 1116 A D under Vishnuvardhana who then drove the Chōlas out of Mysore.

But the principal revival of their power as independent rulers was in Orissa or rather in Ganjam and Vizagapatam districts, in alliance with the Chōlas. We have already had occasion to mention the Kallinga Gangas.

EASTERN OANGAR

Of this line of rulers there is only one inscription, Bangalore 140. It is a copper plate received by Mr Rice from the Inam Commissioner's Office and edited by him in E C III Bangalore District. It is not dated but probably belongs to about 700 A D and records a grant by Dēvendravarma son of Rājēndravarma, made, from his residence of Kalīṅga-nagara (Ganjam district). He was a worshipper of the god Gōkarnasvāmī of the Mahēndra mountain (Ganjam district). The king being in good health commands the house holders of the Sīdhata village and its neighborhood in Vorahavartani that the village has been granted to Ratuka, a resident

Their Inscriptions in Mysore.

in 615 A D the separate line of Eastern Chalukyas, who remained in power in the Vengi and Rajamahendri country till 1070 A D, when they were absorbed into the Chola family (M E R 1908)

For convenience of further reference the list of Eastern Chalukyas is here inserted, as given by Sir John Fleet (I A, XX, 283), who has gone very fully into details in various preceding articles —

615-688	Rudra Vishnuvardhana I
668	Jayasimha
668	Indra Bhattarakas (seven days)
672	Vishnuvardhana II
696	Mangalavaraja
709	Jayasimha II
709	Kokkila (six months)
746	Vishnuvardhana III
764	Vijayaditya Bhattaraka
799	Vishnuvardhana IV
848	Vijayaditya II Narendravarma
844	Kali Vishnuvardhana V
888	Gunaka Vijayaditya III
918	Chalukya Bhima I
918	Kollabhiganda Vijayaditya IV (six months)
918	Melambu
926	Amma I, Vishnuvardhana VI, Raja Mahendra
926	Beta Vijayaditya V (fifteen days)
926	Tadapa (one month)
926	Vikramaditya II (eleven months)
927	Bhima II (eight months)
984	Rudrabharmalla
984	Chalukya Bhima III, Vishnuvardhana VII,
945	Gunda Mahendra, m Lokamahadevi
970	Amma II, Vijayaditya VI, Raja Mahendra
978	Danurava
1003-1016	(Interregnum of thirty years)
1016	Saktyavarma
1022	Vimaladitya, m Kundava Mahadevi of the Chola family

Pulakesi II
 In the Taming
 Description
 of his Rule

Pulakesi II ascended the Chalukya throne in 608 A D and was crowned king in 609 A D. As a great conqueror, he subdued all the neighbouring nations with- in the first twenty years of his rule. His most notable victory was over Harshavardhana or Siladitya, king of Kanakubja or Kanauj, the most powerful monarch in northern India. By this conquest, about 620 A D, he

Last of Eastern Chalukya
 Kings

On the other hand a very full and circumstantial genealogy of Kalinga Ganga is given in a later grant of 1118 from Viragapattani in which quite different names appear (except Vajrahasta) but of course it is possible they may be the same kings under other titles (I A XVIII 165). The line is here traced from the god Vishnu through Yayati and Turvasu who is said to have obtained from the Ganga the son Gangulya who was the progenitor of the Ganga kings (see ante). Gangulya it says, was succeeded by eighteen kings most of whose names seem purely mythical down to Kālāhala who is said to have built the city named Kālāhala (Kolar) in the great Gangavadi country —

Virachita		Pratapa (Dharmapala)
Namohitya		Pritikrit
Namoditya	}	Jaya Jna
Pratapa		Jaya Jna (II)
Nama		Jitavirya
Amradatta		Vrihadbraja
Karāṅga		Prasalla (Iragalla)
Chitrāmbara	}	Kālāhala
Sāradbraja		Vivekama (II)

After his son Virachana II and eighty more kings not named and probably imaginary had held Kālāhala there arose in that line Virasimha who had five sons Kāmār nava Dānār nava Gunār nava Mār nava and Vajrahasta. (For a grant of the time of Vajrahasta issued from Kalinga nagara see EJ III 220). The first of these giving over his own territory to his paternal uncle (not named) set out with his brothers to conquer the earth and coming to the Mahēndra mountain worshipped Gōkarnasvami, and obtained the crest of a bull and the symbols of sovereignty. He and his brothers subdued Balāditya who had grown sick of war and took possession of the (three) Kalingas. Giving Ambavādi to the third brother Sōda or Seda to the fourth, and Kantaka to the fifth Kāmār nava, with his capital at Jantavra treats his neighbours with contempt. He is of the Kshatriya caste and his name is Pulakēsi (Pu-lo-ki-she). His plans and undertakings are widespread, and his beneficent actions are felt over a great distance. At the present time Śilāditya Mahārāja has conquered the nations from east to west and carried his arms to remote districts, but the people of this country alone have not submitted to him. He has gathered troops from the five Indies, and summoned the best leaders from all countries, and himself gone at the head of his army to punish and subdue this people, but he has not yet conquered their troops. So much for their habits. The men are fond of learning and study both heretical and orthodox (books). There are about 100 saṅghāṇas with 500 or so priests. They practise both the Great and Small Vehicle. There are about 100 Devas, temples, in which very many heretics of different persuasions live" (Beal's Sri-yu-ki, II, 256). Hsien Tsang apparently visited in person the Ajanta cave temples and the beautiful frescoes that are to be seen in them. He writes —

"On the eastern frontier of the country is a great mountain with towering crags and continuous stretch of piled-up rocks and scarpèd precipice. In this there is a saṅghāṇa constructed in a dark valley. Its lofty halls and deep sides stretch though the (or open into the) face of the rocks. Storey above storey they are backed into the crag and face the valley (water course) "

This is, so far as it goes, an approximately correct description of the rock temples at Ajanta in the Indhyādrī range of hills, cut in the lofty and almost perpendicular rocks that hem in a wild secluded glen (Hergusson and Burgess, Cave Temples, 280-347, Archæological Survey of India, IV 43-59). Hsien Tsang states that this "convent" was built by Aihāt Achāra, whose of the Ganga era, both in words and in numerical symbols. This era is specifically called the Kalingāśoka era which is perhaps the actual form by which the Gangāya era was known. It records a grant to a Brāhman donee at Frandapalli which has been identified by Mr H. Krishna Sastri with Frandapada whose chief Dūmana was captured and liberated by the Gupta king Samudragupta in or about the 4th century A.D. The writer of this grant seems to have been—judging from his name—a brother of the writer of the Chiencole plates of Devendravarman (J. C. III, 170). Another grant of Maharaja Devendravarman son of Guṇārṇava the same king who issued the above mentioned grant of the 105th year has been found. It is dated in the 18th year of the 'glorious reign' i.e. the Gangāya era (Appendix A No 1 of 1920-21 M.E.R. 1921 Para 21). It records a grant of a village to the king's guru Patanga Sīvācharya. A grant of his son Anantavarman has also been found. He is described as the son of Devendravarman (V.E.R. 1921, Appendix A No 2 for 1920-21 and Para 22) identified with the king of that name who is mentioned in copper plate grant No 8 of 1918-1919 which is undated (M.E.R. 1919, Appendix A No 8). Palaeographically both agree. From No 2 of Appendix A of 1920-21 it is inferred that Anantavarman had a brother Jayavarman. The grant records a gift to one Viṣṇu Sōmācharya described as an eminent Veda and Vēdānta scholar. Another copper plate grant No 13 of Appendix R of 1917-1918 records the grant of a village by Rājendravarman son of Mahārāja Anantavarman of the Ganga family (M.E.R. 1918 Para 16). The grant was issued from Kalinga nagara. The grant is like those of the earlier kings and is dated in the prosperous year of the rule of the Gangāya family (Gāṅgāya vamsa--pravardhamāna--vijayardhya samvatsara). The year is the 342nd of the Gāṅgāya era. Palaeographically it is described as resembling plateau, east of Bednore (See J R A S, New Series, VI, 267) Assuming thus that the reference is to Banavasi, the following description of the country and the people, as observed by Hiuen Tsiang, (Beal, II 253-255) ought to prove interesting —

"This country is about 5000 li in circuit The capital is 3000 li or so round The land is rich and fertile, it is regularly cultivated, and produces large crops The climate is hot, the disposition of the people ardent and quick Their complexion is black, and their manners fierce and uncivilized. They love learning, and esteem virtue and talent There are about 100 sanghānams, with some 10,000 priests (followers). They study both the Great and the Little Vehicle. They also highly reverence the Devas, and there are several hundred temples in which many sectaries dwell together

"By the side of the royal place is a great sanghāvāna with some 300 priests, who are all men of distinction This convent has a great vihāra, a hundred feet and more in height. In it is a precious stupa belonging to Sarvāsthāsiddha, (Vibh, tsai-i-shing) the prince It is somewhat less than two feet in height and is ornamented with gems and precious stones. It is kept in a jewelled casket On fast-days it is brought out and placed on a high throne They offer to it flowers and incense, on which occasions it is lit up with radiance

"By the side of the city is a great sanghāvāna in which is a vihāra about 50 feet high In this is a figure of Mātariya Bodhisattva carved out of sandalwood It is about ten feet high This also on fast-days reflects a bright light It is the work of the Arhat Wen-pi-i (Srutavimsatikoti) "To the north of the city not far is a forest of Ula trees about 30 li round The leaves (of this tree) are long and broad, their colour shining and glistening In all the countries of India these leaves are everywhere used for writing on In the forest is a stupa Here the four former Buddhas sat down and walked for exercise, and traces of them still remain. Beside this is a stupa containing the bequeathed relics of the Arhat Srutavimsatikoti

"Not far to the east of the city is a stupa which has sunk down into the ground from its foundations, but is still about thirty feet high The old tradition says, in this stupa is a

(brother's son) Maharajendra Rajendrarvarman of the Gāṅgava year 312 and finally his nephew by Satva varman son of Dvindravarman of the 310th year. A copper plate grant of Mahārāja Indrarvarman son of Dānarava has been registered by the Andras I pigraphy Department (V.F.R. 1924 Appendix A No 1). It is dated in the Gāṅgava era 151 and gives the latest known date to this king. A grant of his of the Gāṅgava year 149 has been published in F.I. XIV 369. The writer of both these grants was one and the same person. Mr. Krishna Sastri has also attempted to trace the connection if any between the kings of this dynasty whose names end in varman and those whose names end in arnara. The details furnished by the records so far found are so meagre that this is well nigh an impossible task in the present state of our knowledge of these kings. It may however be noted that the earlier varman kings called themselves lords of Kalinga while the later kings called themselves lords of Trikalinga (V.F.R. 1918 Para 16). Another inscription No 12 of Appendix A of 1917-1918 belongs to king Anantavarman of this family. It is dated in Saka 976 expressed by a chronogram and in the 15th year. It has been attributed by Mr. Krishna Sastri to Vajrahasta of this dynasty whose coronation took place in Saka 980 (E.I. IV, 193). Vajrahasta of this family had also the surname Anantavarman (F.I. IX 95). Mr. Krishna Sastri states that the writing very closely resembles that of a record of this king dated in Saka 967 (E.I. XI 147). The donor is described as of the Kadamba (i.e. Kadamba) family. The connection of the Kadambas with the Ganga kings is known to us from the Parlakimidi plates of Vajrahasti (E.I. III 222) where a certain Ugrakṣīdirāja the ornament of the spotless family of the Kadambas figures as an official. A certain Dharmakṣīdin is referred to as the maternal uncle of the early king Mahārāja another name of Pulakesi II (Ibid VIII, 89 ; IX, 304). It seems certain that after the death of Pulakesi II, the Pallavas attacked and inflicted severe losses on the Chālukyas, driving them out of some of their recently acquired possessions in the south

Vikramāditya I

Vikramāditya I restored the power of the Chālukyas. Riding to battle on his splendid charger Chitrakūṭha, he was victorious over Pandyas, Chōla, Kēraḷa and Kālābhra, all of whom may have aided the Pallavas in their late hostilities. But his greatest achievement was the capture in 674 A D of Kānchi and forcing the Pallava king, "who had never bowed to any other man," to kiss his feet with his crown. A copper-plate grant of his records the grant of a village in the present Madakṣina Taluk (Anantapur District), thus indicating that his dominion extended as far as the present Anantapur District. (Bombay Gazetteer I, n. 363)

Vinayāditya

Vinayāditya, his son, captured and destroyed the army of Trairāya Pallava, the king of Kānchi, was served by the Pallava, Kālābhra, Kēraḷa, Hābhaya, Vīla, Mālava, Chōla and Pandyas kings, as well as by the Alivas and Gangas, and levying tribute from the rulers of Kāvēra, Pārasika, Sīmahā (Ceylon) and other islands, churned the king of all the north and seized the Paṭidhvaja (an arrangement of flags which seems to have been a recognized Jaina symbol of supreme sovereignty, I. A, XIV, 104). During his reign, a branch of the Chālukya dynasty was established at Gujaraṭ, which, in the next century, offered stout resistance to Arab invaders. A grant of Vinayāditya mentions his victorious camp at Paṇṇāṭṭha, ie, Hāmpa, in the Bellary District. (Bombay Gazetteer I n 363)

A copper-plate grant of his has been found at Dayyāṇḍine Adoni Taluk, dated Saka 614 expired, he was succeeded by Rajaraja who married Rajasundari the daughter of the great Chola Emperor Rajendra Chola I. His son was Anantavarman Choda Ganga the donor of the grant who was crowned in Saka 999 or 1077 A.D. The grant itself was made in Saka 1003 or 1111 A.D. and is in favour of 100 Brahmans of various gotras.

The copper plate grant registered as No. 7 in M.E.R. 1925 Appendix A is also of one Choda Ganga and records a regrant of the grant mentioned in No. 6 referred to above. It is dated in Saka 1031, or 1112 A.D. It gives the full mythical genealogy of the family from god Vishnu to Virasimha as in the Vizagapatam plates (I.A. XVIII 105 mentioned above) and then sets out the historical portion, which is as given in F.C. IV 186. It refers to Dantapura (the Jantavara of the Vizagapatam plates) from which several of the later grants of this dynasty were issued (see E.I. VI 148 quoted above). This appears to have been the first capital of the Gangas after their conquest of the Kalinga country. Jantavara seems to be another form of the name Dantavara and seems to have given the name Jantārunḍu to the surrounding district. (see M.E.R. 1906 No. 306 1899 Nos. 283 251 and 246). According to one authority this tract is even now popularly called by this name (M.E.R. 1925 Para 8). The name of the king defeated by Kāmarnava before capturing the Kalingas appears here as Sabaraditya instead of Baladitya (see above). The district given by Kāmarnava to his younger brother was it would appear from the present grant Kantakavartani. This is confirmed by the Vizagapatam plates, where the full name appears. Kāmarnava II the son of Dāmarnava is said to have constructed a new city called Nagara and made it his capital building therein the temple of Madukēvara. This new city has been identified with the present town of Mukhallugam from the existence of the temple of Madhukēvara in it and from the place being up Pandya, Chola, Kerala, Kalabhra and other kings, set up a pillar of victory on the shore of the southern ocean. His queen, Iṣṭakamahādevī, of the Haihaya family, caused a temple at Pattadakal to be erected in commemoration of his having three times defeated the Pallavas (See ante Pallavas)

II
Kirtivarma

His son Kirtivarma II, while yet Yuvarya under his father, obtained permission to make another expedition against the Pallava king whom he drove to take refuge in a hill fort, and dispersing his army, plundered his treasures. While the Western Chalukyas had thus been engaged at a distance, in the south-eastern direction of Kānchi, in destroying the power of the Pallavas, their other old enemies, the Rashtrakutas, nearer home, had been watching for the opportunity to free themselves. In this they were successful, under their kings Dantidurga and Krishna. The main dynasty of the Western Chalukyas for about two centuries from this time disappears from view. Kings of their line named Kirtivarma, Talapa, Bhima and Ayyana, who is said to have married a daughter of the Rashtrakuta king Krishna, are named as ruling in succession, but the accounts are doubtful.

Early Chalukyas in Mysore State

An inscription on a virgal recently found at Gadde-mane, Sagai hobli, in old Kanṇada characters, assignable to the 7th century A D, suggests that the rule of Harshavardhana Śilāditya extended as far as Shimoga. (M A R. 1923, No. 72). It records the death of Śilāditya's commander while repelling an invasion of one Mahendra, identified with Mahēndravarmā I of the Pallava line (see ante Pallavas). The earliest Chalukya inscriptions in Mysore are of the time of Puṣyakeśi II (entitled Satyāśraya), the greatest of the early Western Chalukya line, of about A D, 640. Shimoga 10 is a

Two inscriptions in Chiknavakanahalli taluk (F C Ch la Ganga in Mysore VII Chiknavakanahalli 29 and 30) say that Chāma Deva eldest son of Oda rayendra (or great king of Orissa) Ch la Ganga was born in the Hejjaji Twelve of the Kadnur Seventy (both in Dodballapur taluk). The Ganga kings of Orissa or Kalinga also called Gajapati or elephant lords, beginning with Chōla Gango held the sovereignty of that country down to 1511 soon after which it fell a prey to the Muhamminadans. Of these kings Ananga Bhima Deva (1175-1202) was a great ruler and made a survey of his whole kingdom measuring it with reeds. He also built the present temple of Jagannath. Another king of interest was Piroshōttama Deva (1470-1501). He sought in marriage the daughter of the king of Hānchi famed for her beauty. But on the ground of his performing the office of sweeper to Jagannath his suit was rejected. He therefore attacked Hānchi and was at first repulsed. At length he captured it and took the princess prisoner who he vowed in revenge should be married to a sweeper. The minister charged with the execution of this order kept the girl in concealment until the festival of Jagannath at which the king was accustomed to sweep the ground before the god and while he was engaged in that act placed her beside him and they were married. The reign of Pratāpa Rodra (1501-1532) is remarkable for the reformation of the Vaishnava religion by the preaching of Chaitanya whose views the king finally adopted and Buddhism to which he had previously inclined was banished the country. Pratāpa Rodra is said to have extended his conquests southwards as far as Cape Comorin and his name occurs in many local traditions in the east of Mysore. We also find that his son Virabhadra was invested with the Government of Male Bennur (Davangere taluk) by Krishna Raya of Vijayanagar.

upbraided for not living in equal splendour with their father in law. They therefore united to attack Siva samudra and humble Ganga Rāja. The siege had lasted twelve years without their having been able to penetrate to the island when they found means to corrupt the Dalavayi or minister of Ganga Rāja. This traitor removed the guards from the only ford and thus permitted the enemy to surprise the place while he endeavoured to engage his master's attention at a game of chess. The shouts of the soldiers at length reaching their ears the prince started up from the game. The Dalavayi, who wished him to fall alive into the hands of his sons in law, endeavoured to persuade him that the noise arose merely from children at play, but the Rāja having drawn his sword first killed all his women and children, and then rushing into the midst of his enemies fought until he procured an honourable death. The sons in law, on seeing this were struck with horror and immediately threw themselves into the cataract at Gagana Chukka, and their example was followed by their wives whose arrogance had been the cause of such disasters.

Jagadōva Rājā of Channapatna and Sriranga Rāja of Talkād the two most powerful of the neighbouring Pālegars then came and removed all the people and wealth of the place.

The Chalukyas next claim our attention. This power CHALUKYAS ful line of kings was in the ascendant throughout the north west of Mysore and the Bombay and Hyderabad districts beyond, from the fifth to the eighth century and from the latter part of the tenth to that of the twelfth. Their first appearance south of the Nerbudda was in the fourth century previous to which they are said to have had fifty nine predecessors on the throne of Ayūdhya but of these nothing is known. On their entering the Dekhan they overcame the Rashtrakutas, who performed the horse sacrifice. His son was Kirtivarma I, who overcame the kings of Vanavasi (the Kadambas) and others. His son Satyasraya defeated Harsahavardhana (king of Kanayākhya or Kanoy), the warlike lord of all the north, and thus acquired the title of Paramēśvara. His son Vikramāditya I Satyasraya subdued the Pandya, Chōla, Kēṛṇa, Kālābhṛta (who are mentioned in the Velvikudi plates as having gained possession of the Pandya country in about the seventh century, and appear to have belonged to Southern India, M A R 1908, Para 25, page 65) and other kings, and forced (the Pallava), the king of Kānchi who had bowed to no other, to kiss his feet with his crown. His son Vinayāditya Satyasraya quelled the power of the three kingdoms of the South—Chōla, Pandya and Chēra—and of the king of Kānchi, and levied tribute from the rulers of Kāvēra, Pārasika, Sindhala (Ceylon), and other islands. He also, by conquering all the kings of the north, acquired the pāli-dhvaṇa and all other signs of supreme power. His son Vijayāditya Satyasraya uprooted the enemies still left in the south, and fought for his father in the north, gaining, besides the pāli-dhvaṇa, the emblems of the Ganga and Yamuna. He was by some means taken prisoner, but escaped, and thus averted the danger of anarchy in his own country. His son was Vikramāditya II Satyasraya, who resolved to uproot the Pallavas, by nature the enemies of his family. Marching with great speed into the Tundaka-vishaya (Tondamandalā), he inflicted a crushing defeat on the Pallava king Nandipōtavarma, who fled, leaving to the conqueror his special trumpet, drum, flag and other trophies. Vikramāditya then entered Kānchi in triumph, but spared the city, relieved the destitute, and presented heaps of gold to the Rājāsindhavaras and other temples which Narasimhapōtavarma had formerly erected (see ante, Pallavas). He then burnt up Pandya, Chōla, name of the first king of this branch. The titles on their inscriptions which are very numerous in Mysore especially in the north west are nearly invariably as follows — Samastabhuranāśraya, Sri prithvī vallabha Mahārājādhirāja Paramesvara Paramabhattāraka Satyāśrayakula tilaka Chālukyābharana

Although the above details appear very circumstantial the account of the origin of the Chālukyas is evidently Puranic and the real source from which they sprang is far from clear. They are stated to have miraculously sprung from the moisture or water in the hollowed palm (chuluka chulaka) of Hariti's hand (E C VI Davangere 41). According to another account from the libation to the gods poured from his goblet (chulka, chuluka chaluka) by Hariti. These stories seem evidently invented from the name. Dr Hoernle says — 'Despite the attempted Sanskrit derivation of the genealogists I would suggest that the name (Chulukya) is not a Sanskrit word at all but of foreign (Gujarati or Hindu) origin' (J R A S 1905 page 12). He adds that it may be from a Turki root chap gallop chapdul a plundering raid a charge of cavalry (?). Sir Vincent Smith in his Early History of India 440 writes citing the Bombay Gazetteer I i 1274 — 'The name (Pala kēsin) occurs in a Chapa genealogy which is the only instance known to (Sir John) Fleet of its occurrence outside the Chālukya family. This fact supports Jackson's view that the Solankis or Chālukyas were connected with the Gujars of whom the Chapas were a branch. Mr Rice suggested in the last edition of this work that the name Chālukya bears a suggestive resemblance to the Greek name Selenkeia and if the Pallavas were really of Parthian connection as their name would imply we have a plausible explanation of the inveterate hatred which inscriptions admit to have existed between the two and their prolonged struggles records), we may perhaps presume that it was made on the return journey. It is possible that Kirtivarma II was the chief general in the war with the Pallava king. A point of minor interest in connection with this grant is its date, which somewhat unsettles the date of the Këndu and Vokalei plates. If Saka 671 expired in the 4th regnal year of Kirtivarma II, as stated in these plates, Saka 672 expired ought to be the 5th year, not the 6th as given in the Këndu plates; while Saka 679 expired ought to be the 12th year, not the 11th as stated in the Vokalei plates.

Minor Branch
of Early
Chalukyas

Apparently there was a minor branch of the early Chalukyas in rule in Mysore. An inscription on a stone built into the wall of the kitchen in the Rama temple at Kudlur, records a grant to a Jaina temple. It must, therefore, have been brought from an older temple existing not far away from it. It refers to a private grant to an eastern basadi, situated on the bank of some river, in the reign of a Ranapākrasa, who, from the characters of the epigraph, has been assigned to about the 8th century A.D. This king has not been identified though Ranaraga, Ranaparāhina and Ranaraya have been known as the titles of some of the early Chalukya kings, Ranapāka has not been. There is, however, a Ranapāra Gāṇḍa mentioned in Sivana Belgola 35 (=old Edn 24) on the Chikabetta, as making a grant, with certain others, during the reign of a Ranavāloka Srikambayya, who is described as the son of a person to whom are given the usual Chalukya titles, but whose name is not mentioned. He is termed the sāmantādhipati. As the name of the father is not given, it may be presumed he belonged to the troublesome period posterior to the fall of the dynasty and anterior to the emergence of the revived Chalukyas. (M.H.R. 1908-1909, Para 53).

married a princess of that race. Pulakesi I was the most powerful of the early kings. He made himself master of the town of Vatapi the modern Badami in the Bijapur district about 500 A.D. At first a petty ruler of a small principality he soon claimed universal dominion as is evidenced by the horse sacrifice he performed. His eldest son Kirtivarma I subdued the Nalas, the Mambas and the Kadambas. Sir John Fleet has associated these three dynasties with the sovereignty of the Honkan during the middle of the 6th century A.D. (Bombay Gazetteer I 12-17). They were among the early opponents to the expansion of the Chālukya dominion. Sir John was inclined to think that the territory of the Nalas lay in the direction of Bellary and Hurnool (ibid I 25). A dynasty of Nalas appears to have ruled in the Kalinga country (Kalamanchili Kalinga and Madhya Kalinga) as a few of their copper plate grants have been found there (V.F.R. 1909 pages 105-106). Probably a branch of this dynasty on the loss of their territory through the expansion of the Chalukyas into it settled in the present Mysore Agency. A little grant of this branch dated in the 12th regnal year of king Bhavadatta in archaic Telugu characters and Sanskrit language (of about the 6th century A.D.) has been found at Podāgada hill (V.F.R. 1921-1922 Para I Page 96). Mangalasa, his younger brother conquered the island called Revati-dvīpa and the Matangas also the Kalachurya king Buddha son of Sankaragana the spoils taken from whom he gave to the temple of Makutēśvara near Badāmi. He attempted to establish his own son in the succession, but Pulakēsi II, the elder son of Kirtivarma obtained the throne.

Pulakesi a younger brother Vishnuvardhana, surnamed Kumbha was on the capture of Vēngi in 611 A.D. from the Pallavas, apportioned its governor. He there founded

Founding of Eastern Chālukya
Empire

records), we may perhaps presume that it was made on the return journey. It is possible that Kirtivarma II was the chief general in the war with the Pallava king. A point of minor interest in connection with this grant is its date, which somewhat unsettles the date of the Kendu and Vokkalai plates. If Saka 671 expired as the 4th regnal year of Kirtivarma II, as stated in these plates, Saka 672 expired ought to be the 5th year, not the 6th as given in the Kendu plates, while Saka 679 expired ought to be the 12th year, not the 11th as stated in the Vokkalai plates.

Minor Branch
of Early
Chalukyas

Apparently there was a minor branch of the early Chalukyas in rule in Mysore. An inscription on a stone built into the wall of the kitchen in the Rama temple at Kudlur, records a grant to a Jaina temple. It must, therefore, have been brought from an older temple existing not far away from it. It refers to a private grant to an eastern vasadi, situated on the bank of some river, in the reign of a Ranapākarsa, who, from the characters of the epigraph, has been assigned to about the 8th century A.D. This king has not been identified though Ranaraga, Ranaparākrama and Ranavarsika have been known as the titles of some of the early Chalukya kings, Ranapāka has not been. There is, however, a Ranapāra Gramuda mentioned in Sivana Belgola 35 (=old Hdn 24) on the Chikabetta, as making a grant, with certain others, during the reign of a Ranavāloka Strikambayya, who is described as the son of a person to whom are given the usual Chalukya titles, but whose name is not mentioned. He is termed the śamantādhipati. As the name of the father is not given, it may be presumed he belonged to the troubled period posterior to the fall of the dynasty and anterior to the emergence of the revived Chalukyas (M.H.R. 1908-1909, Para 53).

obtained the title of Paramāśvara or supreme lord ever after borne by the Chātukyas. The Chinese pilgrim Hsien Tsang has given interesting accounts of both Harshavardhana and Pulakati and of their times. Of Pulakati kingdom which he visited in 631 A.D. he says — This country is about 5000 li in circuit. The capital borders on the west on a great river. It is about 20 li round. The soil is rich and fertile. It is regularly cultivated and very productive. The climate is hot. The disposition of the people is honest and simple. They are tall of stature and of a stern vindictive character. To their benefactors they are grateful, to their enemies relentless. If they are insulted they will risk their life to avenge themselves. If they are asked to help one in distress they will forget themselves in their haste to render assistance. If they are going to seek revenge they first give their enemy warning, then each being armed they attack each other with lances (spears). When one turns to flee the other pursues him but they do not kill a man who is down (a person who submits). If a general loses a battle they do not inflict punishment but present him with woman's clothes and so he is driven to seek death for himself. The country provides for a band of champions to the number of several hundreds. Each time they are about to engage in conflict they intoxicate themselves with wine and then one man with lance in hand will meet ten thousand and challenge them in fight. If one of these champions meets a man and kills him, the laws of the country do not punish him. Every time they go forth they beat drums before them. Moreover they inebriate many hundred heads of elephants and taking them out to fight, they themselves first drink their wine and then rushing forward in mass they trample everything down so that no enemy can stand before them. The king, in consequence of his possessing these men and elephants, the first is mentioned in Mysore 35 as Gavilabbasari, while that of the last was Jatave. Mr. Narasimhachar has, however, explained this seeming discrepancy by suggesting that king Naisinga had two wives. Next, as regards Durga and Goggi, they appear to have been contemporaries, as one of them (Durga) is referred to as making grants in favour of the servants of the other (Goggi). Mysore 36 (as revised) records a grant by Goggi, described as Mahāsāmantā, born of the Chalukya family, and a tenacious striker in favour of Nannikartara Bhatāia, to the temple of Būṭēsvara. Nannikartara was the head of the religious establishment (sthāna) at this temple, and to whom another grant is recorded as from Srimat Goggi, in H C Mysore 37. At Varaha, where this record is found, there are, besides seven virgals, five of which are Mysore 41 to 35 (as revised). These record grants to heroes who fell in a battle (see Mysore 44) between Polukēsi (another form of Pulakēsi) and Būḍiga. It is not known who this Polukēsi was, but he might, as suggested by Mr. Rice (H C III, Introd. 6) be identified with Satyāsraya, the son of Talai II of the revived Chalukya line (973 A D). There is no evidence to show that he was known as Polukēsi, but as this was the name of the first Satyāsraya of the original Chalukya dynasty, his name-sake of the revived dynasty might have borne the name. If that is so, the reference would imply that the Chalukyas who had recently been successful in overthrowing the Rashtrakutas and recovering their lost power, sought also to subdue the Gangas, who were the allies of the Rashtrakutas (see ante Gangas). The Būḍiga against whom Pulakēsi is said to have fought should in that case, be identified with Būḍiga II, the Ganga king, who was better known as Nanni Ganga, the brother-in-law of the Rashtrakuta king Krishna III (He cannot be Būḍiga I, son of Nithimarga I, as suggested by Mr. Narasimhachar in M A R 1916, Para 72, as in story he gives at some length. He describes him as a man of Western India who built the sangharāma in honour of his mother. Of the famous paintings he says —

On the four sides of the vihāra on the stone walls are painted different scenes in the life of Tathāgata's preparatory life as Bodhisattva the wondrous signs of good fortune which attended his acquirement of the holy fruit (of a Buddha) and the spiritual manifestations accompanying his Virṛāṇa. These scenes have been cut out with the greatest accuracy and fineness. On the outside of the gate of the Sanghārāma, on the north and south side at the right hand end and the left there is a stone elephant. The common report says that sometimes these elephants utter a great cry and the earth shakes throughout.

This seems to refer to two alto-relievo that were sculptured on the front before Cave V but which are now scarcely recognizable. (See Fergusson and Burgess Cave Temples 300). Though some of his measurements are apparently from popular report it is clear Hsien Tsiang visited the Caves and stayed at them as personal touches in the description amply testify to. Palakka's capital was at the time at a place which has been identified with Nāsik.

The city he calls Konkanapura which he visited may probably be according to Mr Rice Kupana (now Kupai) in the extreme south west of the Nizam's dominions, or Kakanur close to it. F. de St Martin, however would identify it with Banavās as the place is said to be in Southern India and as it is said that the pilgrim went north westwards after leaving Dravida. (See Memoir 401). Though Ānegondi and Gūlkonda have been suggested as the places referred to by Hsien Tsiang St Martin's suggestion seems to be the most probable. Fergusson nearly agrees with him when he takes the pilgrim from Negapatam to the centre of the Mysore

Identification
of Konkanapura with Banavāl.

Meanwhile our attention must be directed to the power which superseded them and which played an important part in Mysore during their eclipse, as testified by inscriptions throughout the northern and middle parts. This was the Rashtrakutas or Rattas, connected perhaps with the Rajput Rathors, and supposed to be represented by the modern Reddis. Sir R. G. Bhandarkar suggests that the Rashtrakuta family was in all likelihood the main branch of the race of Kshatriyas named Rattas who gave their name to the county of Mahārāshtra, and were found in it even in the times of Asoka, the Maurya. The Rashtrakutas were the real native rulers of the county, and were sometimes eclipsed by enterprising princes of foreign origin, such as the Satavāhanas and the Chalukyas who established themselves in the Deccan and exercised supreme sovereignty, but were never extirpated (Early History of the Dekkan, 62). Mr. Bunnell was inclined to identify the Rashtrakutas with the Reddis of South India, but Sir John Fleet has observed against this view that no trace of the Rashtrakutas has been found in Southern India and that they seem to have been of Northern origin. Mr. Pathak, arguing from the fact that the name Rashtrakuta occurs as a surname among the Mahatta families of to-day, states that the Rashtrakutas belonged to the same caste as Sivaji who founded the Marhatta Empire (See Kavayadnyangra, Intro 829). They may have existed in the Dekkan from very early times. Their territory at the period of which we are writing is often referred to as Rattavadi, in Tamil Irattapadi, a seven and a half lakh country, and their capital, at first Mayūrakhandi (Morkhand in Nasik District) was, early in the ninth century, at Manyakhēta (Malkhed in the Nizam's dominions, about ninety miles west by south of Hyderabad). The earliest decided mention of them describes Indra, the son of Krishna, as overcome by the relief of Tathāgata and on religious days (help days) it exhibits a miraculous light. In old days when Tathāgata was in the world he preached in this place and exhibited his miraculous powers and converted a multitude of men.

"Out far to the south west of the city is a stupā about a hundred feet high which was built by Aśoka. Here the Arhat Śrutasīmha exhibited great miraculous powers and converted a great many people. By the side of it is a śrādhastūpa of which only the foundations remain. This was built by the fore-named Arhat.

Arab annals moreover as pointed out by Dr Irgos can state that Pulakesi exchanged presents and letters with Khosru II of Persia and the Persian Embassy is held to be represented in a large fresco painting (in Cave No I) at Ajanta (J. A. S., XI 15). Khosru II received the complimentary Embassy sent to him in the 32nd year of his reign in A.D. 62, 662. Pulakesi however, was defeated in battle in 612 A.D. by Narasimha varman the Pallava king who invaded his capital in a war that lasted for many years and plundered it and perhaps even put Pulakesi to death. (See ante Pallavas). The Chālokyas thus temporarily disappear from history for a period of 13 years the history of which is not by any means clear. The dominion of Pulakesi II while it lasted included the present Bellary District for we have mention of the grant by him of the village of Horugodo in it (M.F.R. 1904 Appendix B No 61). Before Vikramāditya I came to the throne in 655 A.D., there were his brothers Ādityavarman and Chandrāditya. One inscription of the former is known (I. I., XI 66) but the latter is represented only by grants made by his queen Vijaya mahādēvi or Vijaya bhattarika (Ibid VII, 163 VIII 273). She may therefore, have been a widow at the time and regent for a son who did not survive. Mr Rice has also found a grant in Goribidnur Taluk by Ambarā a son or daughter of Satyāśraya Kalka I) His son was Indva II (or Indva II). His son was Dantidurga, also known as Dantivarma, Khadga-valoka and Vairamēgha. The last name is mentioned in the Kadaba Plates and supported by an inscription in the present North Arcot District (ASI 1903-1904) Vairamēgha is mentioned in the hymns of one of the Vaisnava Alvars. Dantidurga has also been identified with Sahastunga, to whom Akalanika-Dēva, the great Jain guru, describes the greatness of his own learning (Srivana Belgola, new Edn, 67, dated in 1129 A.D.)

India II is said to have married a Chalukya princess, but Dantidurga, who either left no heir or left sons who were incompetent to wield the sceptre, and Krishna I, his uncle, who theretofore came to the throne after him, were successful in overcoming the Chalukyas and establishing the supremacy of the Rashtrakutas. For Krishna, we have two inscriptions of his reign dated in Saka 690 and 694, or A.D. 768 and 772. The beautiful monolithic cave temple at Ellōra, famous as the Kailāsa temple, was erected by Krishna I (EC XII, Gubbī 61). The Badami Plates of Kaiṣarāja record its construction by him (IA XII, 229). It has been described as "the most marvellous architectural feat in India," and is by far the most extensive of rock-cut shrines known to the Dekhan. It was intended by Krishna I to rival the temple of the same name at Kānchi. It has been described at length by Burgess and Fergusson (Cave Temples and A.S.W.I, V) and more recently by Mr. E. B. Havell (in his work A Handbook of Indian Art, 79-86). Mr. Havell writes at page 79 —

"The Kailāsa temple was commenced by Krishna I, of the Rashtrakuta dynasty, about A.D. 760, to glorify his Ishvadevata, or patron deity, who had helped him to victory and given him supreme sovereignty over the Dekhan. How long it took to complete this stupendous sculpture, history does not record, the main part of it probably occupied most of the two 12th year of reign current. The grant was made when the king was camping at Talayakhūta grāma near to the north bank of the river Tagara. Sir John Fleet has identified Tagara with Ter. Mr H K Sastri identifies Talayakhūta with modern Thairkēdda on the north bank of the river Ter (Thairva). The plates are very carelessly executed and mistakes in the grant portion are numerous. They record a land grant to four Brāhmins (U E R 1916 Para 39). A Sanskrit copper plate grant of his (No 12 of Appendix A, M F R 1906 dated in Saka 520 or 508 A D) cyclic year Kālayukta has also been found. It is open to grave objections and as such seems wholly valueless.

Vikramāditya a son Vijayāditya completed the conquests of the two preceding reigns both in the south and the north and in addition to the Palidhrāja gained the Gaṅga and Yamuna Dhvajās which had been possessions of the Guptas. A spurious copper plate grant of his dated in Saka 512 cyclic year Sādhārana, is referred to in U E R 1918 Appendix No 3. It is a century too early for him. Its mistake in language and differences in genealogy show that it is a spurious grant. Its genealogy resembles No 12 Appendix of M F R 1906.

There has recently been found a mutilated inscribed slab of his reign lying on the bank of the Pennār at Dānavalapādu in Cuddapah District. It mentions one Bhupāditya.

His son Vikramāditya II gained in 740 A D an important victory in the Tundaka province (Tondamandala) over the Pallava king Nandipūtavarman whom he put to flight and capturing all the royal insignia made a triumphal entry into Kauchi which he refrained from plundering but presented gifts of gold to the Rāja śimbhūśvara and other temples. He then, after withering Vijayāditya.

Vikramāditya II.

himself (H.C XII, Gubb¹ 61, E I IV, 332) Describing the temple, it says that it seemed —

“As if formed from the best essence of the three worlds, like the birth of a fourth world, or as if erected in a hundred Kṛta-vuṣas, or the collection of his fame, was his splendid (temple),—the clouds swollen by the fragrant smoke arising from the burning of alooe wood, in the lofty region occupied by Siddhas, moistened with showers of sweet perfumed waters its courtyards From the desire that such might not be obtained in a future age has Bhava become manifest, methinks, in order that it may be permanent and that another Kalpa should not arise Like clusters of stars the bright lamps he placed on its pinnacles deceived the people of the city, making them doubt whether it was night or whether the day had dawned ‘I am its support and yet it grows beyond me. this is too much’—thus saying, perhaps to provide room for it was the earth made wide of old methinks The sun, through fear of moving through the upper regions covered up with a thousand flags, under pretence of seeing his reflection in the jewelled floor, having descended and shining low as if in obedience through reverence for Parameśvara, the peacocks, hearing with delight the sounds of the beaten drums and thinking that the rainy season had commenced, beginning to rejoice and dance, the young women of the city, with their minds transfixed by the movements of moon-faced girls displaying with the sprouts of their hands and sentiments of love and passion which animate beautiful maidens to dalliance at twilight, the line of a hundred munis who had traversed all the ocean of the Siddhanta—such was the temple, called Kanēśvara after his own name”

Govinda II,
776-779 A D

Krishna I was succeeded by Govinda II He appears to have ascended the throne between Saka 602 and 701 or 770 and 779 A D (A.S W I 1903-1904, Page 60). Inscriptions found in this State and elsewhere show that he was sought to be superseded by his brother Dhruva (Dhruva or Dhārvaśta) on the ground of his neglecting the kingly duties to sensual pleasures (E I IV, 287; Karhad Plates, E I V 188, and the Deoli Plates E. I.

fragment containing only his name. But Goribidnur 48 is on copper plates recording a grant by him to Brahmins in the Konikal vishaya. It begins with the mention of Pulakesi I surnamed Ranavikrama who performed the horse sacrifice. It then passes on to Satyasraya (Pulakesi II), the conqueror of Harshavardhana. The grant was made when the king was at the Sangama tirtha and on the application of his beloved daughter called in his or her own language (śīa bhāṣaya though it is not clear what language is meant) Ambara. Sagar 79 is of the time of Vikramāditya I, about 659 A.D. Then we have Shikarpur 154 of about 680 A.D. when Vinayāditya Rājāsraya was ruling and Pogilli Sūndraka Mahārāja was a governor under him over Nāyerkhanda (Nagarikhanda or the present Shikarpur Taluk). Davangere 66 the Harihara plates are of 694 A.D. the 14th year of Vinayāditya and so far contain information similar to that in the Vokkaleri Plates. Kolar 63 (see below) but with fewer details. A grant was made in the Vanavāsi country to a Brāhman while the king was in camp near Harishaputra (Harihara). Then come the Sorab plates of the same king issued by him in his 11th regnal year corresponding to Saka 614 (or A.D. 692) from his victorious camp at Chitrakūṭa in the Toranāra Vishaya granting a village near Vijayantipura. Banavāsi (E O VIII Sorab 571). Next follows the 11th inscription E C VIII Shikarpur 278 of about 700 A.D. in the reign of Vijayāditya Satyasraya in which the Senavara king acknowledges Satyasraya's suzerainty.

But the most important of all is Kolar 68, the Vokkaleri Plates dated in 757 A.D. These plates contain a variety of historical information of the highest value, and their publication by Mr. Rice in 1879 first opened the eyes of scholars to the true significance of the Pallavas then scarcely known even by name. The plates begin with an account of the Chalukyas and mention first Pulakesi etc The reason for his supersession has been suggested above The Manne Plates of his son Govinda III, dated in Saka 724 or 802 A.D., justify his supersession by stating that Unkshini (i.e., the goddess of sovereignty) was "free from blame," "though she had passed over the elder (brother)," and they do not, in fact, treat him as having ruled over the Rāshtrakūṭa kingdom They pass on from Krishna I to Dhola (i.e. Dhruva) mentioning the supersession of his elder brother Govinda II but without actually mentioning the latter's name. (E.C. IX, Nelamangala 61) But the story of Govinda II indulging in sensual pleasures and neglecting his sovereign duties are rather discounted by the Rāṭhah grant of 794 A.D. (E.I. III, 104) nearer to his own time, which says that he brought in the hostile Malava and other kings to help him against his brother. It is further stated that he was joined by the kings of Kānchi, Gangā and Vēṅgi Nevertheless Dhruva managed to defeat him and drove these enemies away on the east and north He then took possession of the whole kingdom, "leaping over" his elder brother.

Dhruva appears to have been a somewhat crafty, though a capable and warlike prince He continued the aggressive wars of his predecessors The Manne Plates give an interesting account of his wars. Hemming in between his own force on the one side and the sea on the other, he obtained, we are told, from the Pallava a tribute of huge elephants and defeated Vatsa Rāja, the Gujara king of Bhinnal, who had despoiled the Gauda kingdom and of its king of his only pair of two white umbrellas, and took away these self-same umbrellas from him He drove Vatsa Rāja into the impassable desert of Maru (Marwar) His fame spread by the daring deeds of his well-disciplined (it is called "unequaled") army and he is thus said to have brought the glory of

Character of Dhruva, supersession
of Kambha

fragment containing only his name. But Goribidnur 48 is on copper plates recording a grant by him to Brāhmanas in the Konikal viśhaya. It begins with the mention of Pulakēśi I surnamed Ranavikrama who performed the horse sacrifice. It then passes on to Satyaśraya (Pulakēśi II) the conqueror of Harshavardhana. The grant was made when the king was at the Sangama tirtha and on the application of his beloved daughter, called in his or her own language (śīa bhāṣā) though it is not clear what language is meant) Amborā. Sagar 79 is of the time of Vikramāditya I, about 659 A. D. Then we have Shikarpar 154 of about 680 A. D. when Vinavāditya Rājāśraya was ruling and Pogilli Sendrakā Mahārāja was a governor under him over Nayerkhanda (Nūgarkhanda or the present Shikarpar Taluk). Davangere 66 the Harihara plates are of 694 A. D. the 14th year of Vinavāditya and so far contain information similar to that in the Vokkaleri Plates. Kolar 63 (see below) but with fewer details. A grant was made in the Vanavāsi country to a Brāhman while the king was in camp near Harishapara (Harihara). Then come the Sorab plates of the same king issued by him in his 11th regnal year corresponding to Saka 614 (or A. D. 692), from his victorious camp at Chitrasēdu in the Toranāra Viśhaya granting a village near Vijayantipara. Banavāsi (E. C. VIII Sorab 571). Next follows the lithic inscription E. C. VIII, Shikarpar 278 of about 700 A. D. in the reign of Vijayaditya Satyāśraya in which the Senavara king acknowledges Satyāśraya's suzerainty.

But the most important of all is Kolar 63 the Vokkaleri Plates dated in 757 A. D. These plates contain a variety of historical information of the highest value and their publication by Mr. Rice in 1879 first opened the eyes of scholars to the true significance of the Pallavas, then scarcely known even by name. The plates begin with an account of the Chalukyas and mention first Pulakēśi viceroys of Gangavadi. He is mentioned by the name of Rāṇavāloka Kambhaya in an inscription at Sravana Belgola (Sravana Belgola, New Edn 35-old Edn 24) which records a gift by a certain Manasiya's queen at the concluding of her vow of silence owing to sickness. Dhruva apparently determined on superseding—as he had himself done his elder brother—his elder son, the Kambha above referred to, in favour of a younger son, subsequently Govinda III, whom he appointed Kuvaiḍya or heir-apparent. It is possible, as Mr Rice has suggested (Mysore and Coorg from Inscriptions, 40), Dhruva might have imprisoned Sivamara II for so long with a view to compensate his elder son Kambha for his supersession by conferring on him the Gangav kingdom. Such a design is not irreconcilable with the character of Dhruva as we know it. The supersession of his elder son by his younger son was on account of the latter's splendid form ("more than human form," it is said in the Mane Plates) and superior abilities (enough "to deliver the three worlds from disorder even as Krishna," we are told, in the same plates). To ensure his younger son's accession to the throne, Dhruva even offered to abdicate. But, we learn from the Mane Plates, where the statement is recorded, that Govinda dutifully declined the offer, saying that his father's sovereignty should continue, he being content with the (inviolable) status of Xuvaraja. Kambha, however, did not accept his supersession quietly. When on the death of his father, his younger brother ascended the throne, Kambha, at the head of a confederacy of twelve kings, raised up a powerful rebellion against him. Govinda III, his younger brother, however, suppressed this in the end, as stated in the Mane Plates, and Kambha appears to have submitted to him and was entrusted with authority under him. This is testified to by the Mane Plates, which refer to Kambha as Saucha-Kambha and speak of Keralo Kalabhira and other kings and set up a pillar of victory on the shore of the southern ocean. His son Kirtivarman II Satyāśrava when only Yuvardja, obtained permission to again attack the king of Kāuchi and forced him to take refuge in a hill fort, capturing his elephants, rubies and gold which he delivered to his father. On succeeding to the throne he made a grant to Brāhmins in the Panungal vishaya (Haugal in Dharwar).

The Aiuuli Plates of Kirtivarman II dated in 740 A D., five in number throw some additional light on Kirtivarman's successes. (M F R 1908 1909 Paras 49 50). Though in regard to information about the genealogy of the dynasty and of the kings mentioned in them, these plates agree with what is contained in the Volkelūri and Kendur Plates (Kolar 63 and EJ LX 200) of the same king they differ in some important details. An important variation consists in the use of the word samarpita for prāpta before sārvabhaumopadaś in line 58 of the grant. As these plates are the earliest in point of time being dated in the 4th regnal year of Kirtivarman the variations seen in the later records should as suggested by Mr. Narasimhaachar, be taken to have been introduced from after the 4th regnal year. He also suggests that the word samarpita has to be constructed with pitre that goes before and this leads us to infer that it was Kirtivarman II who procured the position of a universal sovereign (sārvabhauma) for his father by inflicting a severe defeat on the Pallava king Nandipūtavarman who had already prepared himself for a second battle with his father. The word ittham used in this grant before Kramēna shows that this defeat of Nandipūtavarman was the means by which the universal sovereignty referred to was secured for his father. As the grant is dated in Saka 671 expired, at the victorious camp Nelavodige on the Bhīmarati, at the request of a Śēodraka chief Nāgasakti (hitherto unknown from other Nelamangala 61, and M.A.R. 1913-1914, Paras 68-70 and Plates XIII a and b). Of these Manne, dated in Saka 724 or A.D. 802, is the earliest, the Nandi grant belongs to 806 A.D., the Wani to 807 A.D., the Radhanpur to 808 A.D., and the Kadaba to 812 A.D. The last four were issued from his victorious camp Mayurkhandi, where he was in residence (identified with Mörkhand in the present Nasik District) while the first was issued from Manne in Nelamangala Taluk, where his victorious camp was pitched at the time. From this statement it would follow that Govinda was actually at Manne, or Manyapura, about 812 A.D. All these plates bear eloquent testimony to the energetic character of his rule. In them are recounted his military exploits—his driving away Gujjara and receiving the submission of Malasarva on the Vindhya mountains. Also, how he broke up the confederacy of the twelve kings his brother formed against him, how he imprisoned and set at liberty the Ganga king Sivamara II and how again he swiftly seized and imprisoned him, on his showing a tendency to return to hostility. "Foremost among the merciful," as the Manne Plates call him, he eventually replaced him on the throne of his ancestors binding the diadem on his brow with his own hands, in conjunction with the Ganga-Pallava king Nandivarma. After his Vindhyan campaign, he seems to have passed the rainy season at Sribhavana, and then marched south and encamped on the Tungabhadra. His camp here, as we know (see I.A. XI, 1926) was at the Ramesvara tritha. This is an island in the Tungabhadra, a few miles north of the junction of the Tungga and the Bhadra in the Shimoga District. Here Govinda is said to have had some sport in spearing bears and renewed a grant originally made by the Chalukya king Kirtivarma. This is the island of Ramesvara or Ramasthala referred to as Kurva, 5 miles from Honnali in E.C. VII, Honnali 8 and 9, dated in

There is some evidence to believe that during the period of the subsidence of the Chalukya power at their ancient capital of Bādāmi there was a main branch of that dynasty established at Varuṇa, in the present Varahod hobli a few miles to the S W of Mysore. This place both from the inscriptions and the remains found in it, seems to have been their capital in the 9th century A.D. The chiefs mentioned in the inscriptions copied here are Narasiṅga Durga and Goggi (see EC III 35 37 and 41 15 VA R 1907 1908 Paras 33 34 MA R 1908-1909 Para 34 and 1910, Paras 70 72, and Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola 152). Of these Narasiṅga is probably identical with the Chalukya chief Narasiṅgaya mentioned in the lithic inscription at Kukkurhalli near Mysore. It records the grant of a village to the Narasiṅgēśvara temple erected by him. The temple was apparently named after himself the grant itself being for his own merit. He is among other things said to be entitled to the five big drums and is described as a mahāśālmanta having the original boar as his crest a spotless Mahēśvara, an Arjuna among the Chalukyas and first to strike in battle. According to EC III Mysore 35 his wife was Gāvilahbarasi. Mr Narasimhachar has provisionally identified him with the Chalukya chief Narasiṃha father of Arikēsari the patron of the Kannada poet Pampa, who wrote the Vikramārjunaviṇaya in A.D. 941. Pampa mentions two Narasiṃhas in the genealogy he furnishes, the second of these the father of Arikēsari having the name of Narasiṅga as well. He describes the latter as a great warrior as having excelled Arjuna in prowess (Vikramārjunaviṇaya I 36). The title of Udara Mahēśvara appears in this work as one of the titles of Arikēsari. These facts seem to give point to the proposed identification of Narasiṅga of Mysore 35 and the Narasiṃhayya of the Kukkurhalli inscriptions with the second Narasiṃha of Pampa. But the wife of

Branch of Chalukyas at Varuṇa, S W
of Mysore

his sons, another being Sankaraganna, at whose request the grant mentioned in the Chamarajanager Plates seems to have been made (see ante). Chāki-Rāja seems to have been closely connected by marriage with the old—and defunct—Chalukya family, as the Kadaba Plates, above referred to, mention his sister's son Vimalāditya, whose descent is traced through Yasovarma, his father, and Balavarma, his grand-father, to the Chalukya family. Apparently they were scions of the Chalukya dynasty who took service under Chāki-Rāja, the Rashtrakūta viceroy in Gangavādi. Vimalāditya was the governor of the Kunigal-desa. He was, it appears, suffering from the evil influence of Saturn, which was removed by a Jain saint named Arka Kīrti, to whom he made, with the sanction of Govinda III, the grant of a village named Jalamaṅgalaṃ (identified with a village of the same name in the present Closepet Taluk, about 20 miles south-east of Kunigal) in the Idugur vishaya, which is perhaps named after the village of Idugur, in the present Gubbī Taluk, midway between Kunigal and Kadaba, at which latter place the plates named after it were found, when digging the foundation for a bridge (H C XII, Gubbī 61, Text, Page 49). A point worthy of note about Arka Kīrti is that he is said to have belonged to the sect of Yapaniyas, who are described as a Jain un-orthodox sect, who had the appearance of Digambaras, but followed observances of the Svētāmbaras. This sect is said to have existed from the 5th to 12th century A D in the west of the Dekhan, from Kolhapur down to Mysore (H I IV, 338-339). Chāki-Rāja seems to have been the last of the Rashtrakūta viceroys in Gangavādi 96,000. Sivama II had been restored to his throne as his kingdom had become a "sub-missive country," to use the expressive phrase of the Mane Plates (H C VII, Nelamangala 61). The Mane Plates, which record this fact, being dated in 802 A D.,

There is some evidence to believe that during the period of the subsidence of the Chalukya power, at their ancient capital of Bādami there was a main branch of that dynasty established at Varuna in the present Varahod hobli a few miles to the S W of Mysore. This place both from the inscriptions and the remains found in it seems to have been their capital in the 9th century A.D. The chiefs mentioned in the inscriptions copied here are Narasinga Durga and Gogga (see E C III 35 37 and 41 45 M A R 1907 1908 Paras 33 34 M A R 1908-1909 Para 54 and 1916 Paras 70 72 and Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola 152). Of these Narasinga is probably identical with the Chalukya chief Narasingayya mentioned in the lithic inscription at Kukkurhalli near Mysore. It records the grant of a village to the Narasingēsvara temple erected by him. The temple was apparently named after himself the grant itself being for his own merit. He is among other things said to be entitled to the five big drums and is described as a mahāsāmanta having the original boar as his crest a spotless Mahēsvara an Arjuna among the Chalukyas and first to strike in battle. According to E C III Mysore 35 his wife was Gāvilahbarasi. Mr Narasimhachar has provisionally identified him with the Chalukya chief Narasimha father of Arikēsari the patron of the Kannada poet Pampa, who wrote the Vikramārjunaviyaya in A.D. 941. Pampa mentions two Narasimhas in the genealogy he furnishes, the second of these the father of Arikēsari having the name of Narasinga as well. He describes the latter as a great warrior as having excelled Arjuna in prowess (Vikramārjunaviyaya I. 36). The title of Udara Mahēsvara appears in this work as one of the titles of Arikēsari. These facts seem to give point to the proposed identification of Narasinga of Mysore 35 and the Narasimhayya of the Kukkurhalli inscriptions with the second Narasimha of Pampa. But the wife of

Branch of Chalukyas at Varuna, S W
of Mysore

Chapter above referred to They show that the art of beautification in Rashtrakuta times was not restricted to the capital but extended also to the provinces

The Banavasi governor Rajaditya mentioned above is, in Soab 22, entitled Rajaparamesvara, indicating that he was of royal blood He was apparently a Nolamba-Pallava prince called Nolambaraditya Under him, ruling the Aluvakhanda 6,000, (modern South Kanara), was Chitravahana, who turned a rebel. This provoked a war on the part of Nolambaraditya—called also Koli-Pallava-Nolamba—who directed a chief named Kakarasa to attack him A desperate fight ensued, in which apparently Chitravahana was overpowered. The virata on which this inscription is found gives a most graphic description of this "exciting battle" where bow closed with bow and horse with horse. The Koli-Pallava-Nolamba of this inscription is probably the Koliyavasa—also there called Koli-Nolambadhiraja—and his son Nijapata 160) Mr Rice suggests that they may have been State prisoners in the hands of the Gangas, and liberated by the Rashtrakutas, who appointed Koli as a governor

Amoghavarsha, who succeeded Govinda III, had a long reign of not less than 62 years Among his other names were Nripatunga, and Atisaya-dhaval Many titles are ascribed to him in his work Kavijayantya among which are Nitimantara, Nitya-malla Vallabha and Kirtakritya-malla-vallabha The Navasari grant gives him the further title of Vira-Naraina, because he retrieved the fortunes of the family, which had suffered reverses at the hands of the Chalukyas, just as Vishnu had lifted up the Earth which had sunk in the ocean Shikarpur 283 (H C VII), an undated lithic inscription, gives him both the names of Nripatunga and

Amoghavarsha
I 816-878
Nripatunga, Atisayadhaval

that as there would be a difference in time of at least three-quarters of a century between Butura I and Ishak a moment of time may be found which will prevent their fighting with each other as mentioned in the latter inscription. Mr. Huce seems inclined to this identification (J. C. III. Introd. 6). In this war the Chalukyas of Varuna seem to have fought on the side of the Gangas against the revived Chalukya under Tailasa, which seems natural when we recall the fact that the latter might well have been looked on by them at Varuna as mere nominees of the old Chalukya power to which they themselves possibly laid claim. The story at Varuna numbered Mysore 44 refers to the death of a revenge son of Takannavahana a retainer of Ganga and mentions the significant fact that he killed the horseman of Pulakasa's consort and fell. Apparently Pulakasa was encamped with his family and the attempt was probably made to defeat not only the Gangas the allies of the Rāshtrakutas but also to root out possible claimants to the Chalukya power in those at Varuna. Mysore 12 and 36 record gifts to the god Butuvata which was probably set up in memory of Butura II after his death. It was perhaps Gogga daughter who became the wife of Dhilama, one of the Yadava Kings of Devagiri (see Kannarese Dynasties 514). An inscription on the Chikkabetta at Sravasa Belgola names a chief Gogga with the epithet Chagabhnakshana-chakrararti. The inscription is on a rock in front of the Iruebrahmadesva temple. This Gogga is probably identical with the Chalukya Mahāsāmanta of Varuna above named. He possibly died after the usual fast on the rock in front of the Iruebrahmadesva temple. To about the same period as that of Gogga might belong a fragmentary lithic inscription at Bevrur Channapatna Taluk which appears to record a grant to a member of the Kālamukha sect (J. A. S. 1908-9, Para 54).

been helped by the Lata (Southern Gujarāt) and other chiefs. This decisive battle may be set down to some year anterior to 869 A.D., when Nitimarga I died (See ante, Gangas). This practically ended in the diving out of the Rashtrakutas from the Gangavadi 96,000 But the Rashtrakutas still continued to hold the Banavasi province, which they had taken over from the Chalukyas. Its boundaries, however, did not extend beyond the Tungabhadra. From Honnali 13, dated in this reign in Saka 792 (or A.D. 870), we note that one Indra was governing it. (H.C. VII). According to an inscription at Kumsi, the same ruler, India (spelt Indara) was still governing the Banavasi province in Saka 799 or A.D. 876 (H.C. VIII, Sorab 85).

Amoghavarsa next tried a different policy with the Gangas. He gave up his animosity in favour of alliances. For we find his daughter Chandrababbe was bestowed in marriage on Butuga, the Gangga Yuvaraja who, according to H.C. III, Nanyangud, was, in 870 A.D. ruling over the Kongal-nad and Punnad, while Sankha, another daughter, was given to the Gangga-Pallava king Nandi-varma. From the Kavirajamarga, the earliest known work on metrical composition in Kannada, which we owe to him, we learn that he came to entertain the highest admiration for the Kannada people and country, their language and literature. This work is written in Kannada verse and in it he gives a glowing account of the country and of the culture of the people, as the following quotations from it will show —

"The region which extends from the Cauvery to the Godavari is the country in which Kannada is spoken, the most beautiful land in the circle of the earth. . . . Apt are the people of that land in speaking as if accustomed to verse, and in understanding it when spoken clever in truth are they for they are ripely skilled in the usages of poetry.

His Policy towards the Gangas

early Chalukya king Jayasimha and coins supposed to belong to this Krishna have been found on the Konkani side. Then we have a Gōvinda repulsed by Pulakasi I. But the connected table of kings is as follows —

A.D.

Danti varma I
Indra I	—
Gōvinda I
Kakka I or h. V. I	— — —
Indra II	— —
Dantidurga I (Dantivarma Khadjavalāha V. Ira- māgha)	— 301
Krishna I (Kannara Akilavarsha Subbalunga)	40
Gōvinda II (Pratāparādhya)	— 3 —
Indra III (Dharmasraddha Nivartana Dharmavar- sha)	— 40
Kakka II (Kakka) Rajavahika	— 402 407
Gōvinda III (Prabhavarsha Subbalunga) or Gōvinda IV	— 401 404 404, 812, 814-815
Amoghavarsha I (Nripatunga)	815 877-878
Krishna II (Kannara Akilavarsha Subbalunga)	900 902-11
Indra III (Nitya varsha) or Vijayabha	912 911 916
Amoghavarsha II or Kundakavali	916-17
Gōvinda IV (Goffiga, Sovarnavarsha, etc.)	— 917 918-33
Amoghavarsha III (Uddiga Gabbhendra etc.)	— 913
Krishna III (Kannara Akilavarsha)	910 910-66
Khattila (Nitya varsha)	— 917 911
Kakka II (Kakka) or Amoghavarsha IV (Nripatunga)	972 976
Indra IV	— Died 982

(Restoration of Chalukya under T. H. 973 A.D.)

These kings very commonly had the title Iallabha taken from the Chalukyas. In its Prakrit form of Ballaba, which is often used alone in their inscriptions in Mysore without any name it furnishes the key by which to identify the powerful dynasty called Balharas by Arab travellers of the tenth century and described by them as ruling from Mankir (Mānyakheta)

The First Kings of the Dynasty

Of the first few kings Dantivarma, Indra I and Gōvinda I hardly anything definite is known. The Kadamba Plates (E.C. VII, Gubbali 61) dated in A.D. 812 in the reign of Gōvinda III begin with Kakka I (or

Krishna I
700 A.D.

reflect his religious faith. In the prasaṁsā of the Uttara-purāṇa, written by Guṇabhadra, (898 A.D.), we are told that he was the disciple of Jinasena, the well-known Jaina author of the (Sanskrit work) Adi-purāṇa, who bears testimony to the fact in the Pāṇḍvābhīyudaya. There are also references to Amoghavarsha in the Jayādhanvālā-tika, in Virāṇḍavīrya's Garvāśāstrasaṅgraha, in the Saddharmasūtra and in the Saddharmasūtra. Besides the Kaṇvaśāstrīya, he wrote a Sanskrit work called Prasādhita-śāstrīya, discovered some thirty years ago by Mr. Pathak. In the concluding verse of this work, Amoghavarsha is mentioned as its author. This is a very popular work, which has been published many times over in Bombay. Though it has been variously attributed to Saṅkarācārya, Saṅkarāṇḍa and one Vimala, a Svētāmbara writer, Mr. Pathak has conclusively proved that it is a work of Amoghavarsha, which is confirmed by a Tibetan translation of it discovered by Shieffer in which the author is represented to have been a king and his Tibetan name, as re-translated into Sanskrit by the same scholar, is Amoghodaya, which obviously stands for Amoghavarsha. This work was composed between Saka 797-799 (or A.D. 875-879). According to the final verse of this work, he seems to have voluntarily abdicated the throne. This event may be set down to about 875 A.D. The title of his work Kaṇvaśāstrīya means that it is the path indicated by the king of poets, (or the poet among kings, for there is an obvious pun here on the name). In verse III 230, we read that the knowledge contained in it is a ship which safely carries a high-souled person across the ocean of Kannada poetry. Its alternative name is Nripātunga-dēvaśāstrīya, or the path indicated by king Nripātunga, Nripātunga being one of the names of Amoghavarsha. The work is of great literary interest, for it mentions many Kannada authors, anterior to the

and a half centuries the dynasty lasted and some of the accessories were added later. Krishna's capital was at Bādāmi so the choice of the Pattadakal temple as a model was a natural one. Technically the Kailāsa temple is almost unique among the great rock-cut monuments of India for instead of making a horizontal excavation into a hill side as was the case at Ajantā or carving detached masses of rock as at Māmallapuram Krishna's master masons cut down into the sloping hill side from above quarrying a pit varying in depth from 160 feet to about 60 feet and leaving in the middle of it a detached mass of rock from which they sculptured a full sized double storied temple—solid at the base but with the first floor completed internally and externally—cimāna or shrine 96 feet in height and the assembly hall about 53 feet square with sixteen sculptured pillars arranged in groups of four to support the solid mass of rock. The three sides of the deep pit which formed the temple courtyard were subsequently carved into pillared cloisters which provided a richly sculptured procession path and a series of splendid chapels from whose dimly lit recesses Siva's snow-white palace could be seen glittering in the sunlight for the sculpture as usual was finished with a fine coat of highly polished olānam.

Mr Havell adds that this marvellous temple remained the chief centre of Siva worship in the Dekhan until the 13th century and its design remained for all time a perfect model of a Sivalaya. He also suggests that the design of all the great temples of Southern India is always based upon the Kailāsa type, even when Viṣṇu instead of Siva is worshipped as in the Vāikuntha Perumāḷ temple at Conjeeveram and the Vittalaśvāmi temple at Vijayanagar with variations dictated by the necessities of the site or other practical considerations. It is all but certain that the temple referred to in the Kadamba Plates of Gōvinda III dated in 812 A D is this one. It furnishes the interesting information that it was dedicated to God Kannēśvara (or Kṛishnēśvara) after whom Bankāpur was named Though the works of these authors have not so far been discovered, the fact that they were extremely popular during Amoghavarsha's time shows not only that Kanada was highly cultivated at the time but also that it possessed a considerable literature during the Rāshṭrakūṭa period. Amoghavarsha's work Kaavyāmaṇḍī itself bears eloquent testimony to this fact, for it treats, in the three parts into which it is divided, first with the faults in poetry, secondly with Saḍālakāṇḍas, and thirdly and lastly with Aṭhālakāṇḍas. Such a treatment of Kanada's literature would have been wholly unnecessary unless there was a large existent literature to require it. This work besides shows, quite independently of his other work Prasūttaiyatnāvalī, that Amoghavarsha possessed a scholar's knowledge in Sanskrit. He mentions among other writers, Bāṇa and his two works, Harsha-charita and Kādambarī, which he praises as masterpieces of Sanskrit prose, Guṇasūri, who is not otherwise known, Nāyana, who is mentioned by Sūmadēva in his Vasastilakā, Bhāravi, Kālidāsa and Māgha. Bhāravi and Kālidāsa are mentioned in the Aihole inscription (I A VIII), while the reference to Māgha, the author of Sisupāla-vadhā in the Kaavyāmaṇḍī is the earliest reference we have for him in literature. The Kaavyāmaṇḍī is largely based on Dandi's Kāvyādhārasya, from which literal translations are given, thus showing, as actually declared by him, that Dandi was already an eminently old authority on poetics. There is internal evidence in this work that not only Jainism but also Buddhism still flourished in the land during Amoghavarsha's time. (Pāṭhaḥ, Kaavyāmaṇḍī Intro. 14). Sir John Fleet has suggested that Kaavyāmaṇḍī was the work of a poet resident at Amoghavarsha's Court and not of Amoghavarsha himself. There is some evidence in the work itself to support this suggestion.

IV 193) Govinda seems to have obtained the aid of Sivamam Saigotta the Ganga king of the time whom Dhruva by way of revenge seized and threw into prison (E I III 104 and see also ante Ganga). The earliest Rashtrakuta inscriptions in Mysore are to be seen in the Chitaldrug District (I C VI Chitaldrug District, Challakere 33 and 34). These refer to Govinda II who is referred to in them by the titles of Jagattinga Prabhutavarsha Pratapavaloka Srivallabha—some of them apparently borrowed from the Chalukyas, whom the Rashtrakutas supplanted. In Challakere 34, he is called the son of Akalavarsha a title of Krishna I. He has been identified by Mr. Rice with the king Vallabha mentioned as ruling over the South in the Jain Haricamsa, composed in Sala 705 or 783 A.D. as the son of Krishna (I) entitled Akalavarsha. (FC VI Introd 8 and Mysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions 68). But as the name given is Vallabha the king referred to may be as well Dhruva who was also known by the title of Srivallabha borrowed from the Chalukyas the more so as there is no independent epigraphic evidence to show that Govinda ruled beyond 770 A.D. In the inscriptions above mentioned it is seen that Govinda had as feudatories under him the son and grandson of the Nalamba Pallava king Sinhapōta (Paramāśvara Pallavadi and his son Pallava Malla). This Sinhapōta was contemporary with the Ganga king Sivamam Saigatta. (EC VI Challakere 8)

The reign of Govinda II was however cut short by his supersession by his younger brother Dhruva called also Nirupama, Srivallabha and Dharāvarsha the last of which would seem to be the proper name to designate him as it is in keeping with the names of his predecessors Akalavarsha and Prabhutavarsha and of his successors Prabhutavarsha (Govinda III) and Amoghavarsha

Dhruva
Dharāvarsha
780 A.D.

Smith, ETC, Edn 1924, 445-446) As stated above, he abdicated the throne in favour of his son, Krishna II, and appears to have spent the remainder of his life in literary and religious pursuits As he is known to have ruled for over sixty years, he should have been somewhere about 80 years of age when he retired from the throne The actual date of his death is not known He was apparently liberal in his patronage of Digambara Jainism, which, under great gurus like Jinashēna, his own teacher, and others made considerable progress in Mysore and Western India and checked incidentally the growth of Buddhism in that region While his military activities show him to have been a politic ruler of marked abilities, his literary leanings indicate that he was possessed of a certain amount of culture which should have endeared him to his subjects.

Krishna II
880 911 A D

Antoghavarsha I appears to have left two sons, Krishna II and Duddaya, the latter of whom is known from a recently found lithic inscription (ASI 1912, 34) Krishna II succeeded him on the throne He was also known by the names of Kanpara II and Akalavarsha He married a Haribaya princess belonging to the Kalachurya family, who was the daughter of the king of Chedi The earliest inscription we have of him is a lithic one dated in Saka 809, or A D 889, which records a private grant (HC XI, Davanagere 17) He was contemporarily with the Bana king Vikramāditya II, who reigned about Saka 820 or A D 898 (MHR 1920, Part II, Para 5). He has been identified with the Krishna to whom the Jain disputant Paravādinalla gave the derivation of his name (Srivana Belgola 67) Another inscription that mentions him is HC XI, Jagalur 19, dated in Saka 829 (in words) cyclic year Prabhava corresponding to 907 A D, and is on a virakal which refers to a fight between the Gangas and the Nolambas

Krita yuga into the kali and won the title of kali Vallabha, i.e. the conqueror of kali. Apparently his restoration of the Gauda kingdom against the ravages of Vatsa Rija profoundly impressed his contemporaries as the act of a selfless and righteous ruler (E C IX Nalamangala 61 and J R A S 1909 255). The title Virupama (which means the incomparable) perhaps also shows the esteem in which he was held in his own times. This title is mentioned in the Manno Plates. It is under that name—of Virupama—he appears in a recently discovered copper plate grant of the Silahara Mahā samanta Chhadvadeva. (I S H I 1920 1925). The Kadaba Plates of G vinda III dated in 812 A.D. refer to an unnamed battle in which Dhruva very nearly lost the day. We are informed that when this battle was fought on the banks of some river fortune being sickle his elephants and boats were scattered by the rough waves and his mind was agitated—even then though united his enemies forsaking their kingdom and being defeated in battle fled distracted of their own accord to the region. There are however no particulars by which this event can be identified. These same plates tell us that his fame burst into all the points of the compass and that from satisfying the people with the unceasing showers of his daily gifts was he called Dhruvaraha and from being dear to all the world Vallabha. His invasion of the Ganga kingdom which had so far been never conquered and his imprisonment of its ruler Sivamara Saigotta disturbed the even tenor of the Ganga sovereignty. The country was placed under the rule of a foreign prince who we see from E C IV Heggadādēvankūte 93 was Kambharasa who is represented in it as ruling over the Gangavadi 96 000.

This was Dhruva's eldest son Kambha entitled Ranāvalōka. He was apparently the first Rāshtrakūta. Kambha her own heroic bravery." She was faithful to her faith, freed herself from the entanglement of the chain of desire and died in Saka 840, Cyclic year Bahudhanya, or 918 A D.
602—307 A.D.

Another inscription mentioning his suzerainty is Shikarpur 284, dated in Saka 825 or A D 902, which records the construction of a tank and a temple at Kattamara in the rule of Vikramāditya Santara. (H. C. VII) Some lithic inscriptions mentioning his suzerainty have been found in Sorab and Nagar Taluks (H. C. VIII, Sorab 546, 91 and 88, and Nagar 23) Of these Sorab 546 appears to be dated in Saka 820 or A D, 898, Sorab 88 in Saka 835, Cyclic year Piyāpati or 913 A D., and Sorab 91 is undated Sorab 88 mentions Kali-vattaras as the governor of Banavasi and adds he had slain the Kadamba Hativamsa and occupied the fort in peace This, however, was not to the liking of the Nāḍ-gavunda, of Jiddavahige 70, who prepared to go to Gangavadi, apparently to secure help against the resident local Rāshtrakūṭa governor, Kalivattaras He was, however, stopped from proceeding from beyond Kumsi, where he was effectually waylaid and stopped by Kalivattaras's dependents It would seem to follow from this inscription that the Gangā kingdom was recognized as an independent State at the time. But this cannot have been the case as a lithic inscription at Chikā-Sāraṅgi, which is dated in 903 A D in this reign, states that the Praçhanda dandadhyaḅa Dampayya, who is described as bearing the burden of the whole kingdom, was stationed at Maṇne, the old Gangā capital, as the general of all the South This leads to the reasonable conclusion that the Gangas had virtually become the feudatories of the Rāshtrakūṭas since the restoration of Sivamara II Even Maṇasimha, in 971 A D is mentioned as a feudatory of Khotiga, son of Kishna III (I. A. XII

His suzerainty over Banavasi

his rule over Gangavādi under the suzerainty of his younger brother. These plates however do not contain the last reference to him. The available part of his Chāmarajanaḥ plates, whose date is curiously worded in Saka 730 omitting the hundreds and corresponding to A D 807 recognise the suzerainty of his brother over him and show him with his victorious camp at Talkād (U. I R 1919 1920 Para 69). He is there represented as making a grant at the request of his son Saukaraganna to a Jain baṭi at Talkād built by Srivijaya Ilāja a mahā sāmanta of his brother. He is the same person at whose request we are told in the Manne Plates of 802 A D that Kambha made a similar grant to another baṭi built by him at Manne. Kambha's death may have been the occasion that led Govinda III to mercifully release Sivamāra II the Gaṅga king ' from the burden of his cruel chains and send him to his own submissive country. But he in his pride as the Manne Plates graphically put it showing a return of hostility before the brow was wrinkled in a frown, was again subdued and easily bound.

Gōvinda III son of Dhruva was perhaps the greatest of the Rāshtrakūta line. He was a powerful ruler and made himself felt throughout his dominions from the Vindhya and Malva on the north to Kanchi in the South. His personal rule extended to the banks of the Tungabhadra, while he made his younger brother Indra the founder of the Gujarāt branch the hereditary viceroy of that Province. The Manne Plates state that while he was king the Rāshtrakutas had no rivals just as the Yādavas had none from the birth of Kṛṣṇa. There are five sets of copper plate grants relating to his rule which are nearly all similar in their contents. These are the Rādhanpur Wani Manu, Nandi and the Kadaba Plates. (IA VI, 59 EI VI, 242 IA VI 157 EO IX

Gōvinda III
798-815 A D

must have been a literary man, for his Kannda poetry is good. An inscription of his at Kudatani in the Bellary District, dated in Saka 842, cyclic year Vikrama (or A.D. 920) is four years later than his Hattimattur inscription and mentions the family of the Chalukya chief, Balavarman and his son Dasavarma (MHR 1904, Appendix B, No 17). This shows that the Chalukyas continued to occupy a subordinate position during the period of Rashtrakuta supremacy.

If the lithic inscription recently found at Madageri, in Bairakur hobli, which refers to an Indradeva as ruling over the Elath, may be assigned to this king, it would lead to the inference that during his reign the Gangas continued as the feudatories of the Rashtrakutas (M & R, 1924, No. 70).

Indra III was succeeded by his elder son Amoghavarsha II, but he seems to have been superseded by his younger brother Govinda IV. Chitaldrug 76, which gives a genealogy of the Rashtrakuta kings, passes over the name of Amoghavarsha II altogether.

In describing Govinda IV, it says that he was celebrated like his father. It credits him with defeating the Pallava king, i.e., the Nolamba-Pallava king, probably Ayyappa-Nanniga. It is said that he was so liberal with his donations that the was called Suvarnavasha (literally raining gold). A lithic inscription (EC XI, Davanagere 119) which is dated in Saka 852 (in words), cyclic year 1171, corresponding to A.D. 930, acknowledges his suzerainty over Kadambahge 1,000. This province seems to have been continuously under Rashtrakuta occupation since the time of its original conquest from the early Chalukyas. About this time one Barddhega was its governor. This inscription, found on a stone, near the Isvara temple at Nandigudi, is interesting

Govinda IV,
Gopika, Suvarna
varsha, 918
921 A.D.

Amoghavar
sha II, 916-917
A.D.

1228 A D and 1557 A D 'At a glance from his eyes the Pallava king sent through his ministers, the tribute due in full The Pallava king referred to has been identified with Dantiga the ruler of Kānchi (See SI Palaeography, 117 IA XI 126 and FO IX Introd 12) Dantiga appears to have made his last stand with his whole army at the battle of Chikuraniboravi, in which Gōvinda's general Siruguppa fought heroically and fell This is attested to by a pillar set up at Hinhidn, Ālur Taluk Bellary District (M F R 1916, Appendix B No 562) As the inscription is dated in the 4th year the battle must have been fought in or about 797 A D The Vengi king, when sent for through a messenger, performed we are told his services without intermission by his own wish, and built for Gōvinda 'an outer wall lofty as the sky of marvellous splendour with the constellations around its head like a garland of pearls What is exactly referred to by this description is not clear though it might refer to some works of fortification which the Vengi king made himself responsible for and carried out apparently at Manyakhēta Who this Vengi king was, it is not stated Mr Rice has identified him with the Eastern Chālukya king Vijayaditya Narendra Mrigaraja The Nandi Plates refer to a grant by Ratnāvali (also called Mānikabbe) to Īśvaradāsa head of the sthāna (or religious establishment) at Nandi who is said to be the wife of Bānavidyādhara and daughter of Indapparasā, identified with Indra the younger brother of Gōvinda III the founder of the Gurjara branch She is said to have founded the temple at Nandi (M A R 1913-1914 Paras 68-69) a statement confirmed by the Chikballapur Plates of Jayatīja who belonged to a collateral branch of the Ganga line (M A R 1913 1914, Paras 59 61 and see ante Gangas)

In the Gangavādi 96,000 Kambharnsa appears to have been succeeded by Chāki Rāja, who was probably one of up to the sea." It is dated in Saka 852, cyclic year Khava, or A D 930. His Maha-samanta, Kannara, is mentioned in it as governing over the province of Sindavadi 1,000. (M E R. 1916, Appendix B No. 512) This feudatory Kannara and his Jaina queen Chandiyabbe are referred to in an inscription found at Halabaiavi, Adoni Taluk, Bellary District, dated in Saka 854, or 932 A D, where however the king is named Nityavarsha (M E R 1916, Appendix B No 540) As Nityavarsha did not begin his rule until long after Krishna III, whose reign extended twenty years after the last regnal year of Amoghavarsha III, Nityavarsha must be treated, in this instance, as a title of Govinda IV as it was of his father Indra III (M E R. 1916, Part II, Para 38)

As Govinda IV left no children, he was succeeded by his paternal uncle Baddega or Amoghavarsha III He is probably the Gabhindra mentioned in the genealogical list set out in a lithic inscription (at the Kallisvara temple at Isamudra, Barmasagara hobli) dated in his reign in Saka 859, cyclic year Hevulambu or 937 A D. (H C XI, Chitaldrug 76) In this and in Chitaldrug 77, dated in Saka 861, cyclic year Vikarn or A.D. 839, the Rashtrakuta suzerainty over Kadambahge appears to have continued uninterrupted during this reign as well According to these two inscriptions, the local Rashtrakuta governor was Mahasamanta Kannarasa (or Kanna). He is represented in rather hyperbolic terms as possessed of "stores and treasures" and a standing army of "the thousand force and others, putting down the evil and upholding all." In Chitaldrug 77, above quoted, we have an instance of a land grant to the head of a religious establishment (Balachandra Deva, connected with the Bhogesvara temple at Isamudra referred to above), for not only repairing the temple and maintaining ascetics, but also for the benefit of students reading in the matha

it has to be presumed that Sivamara II though nominally restored had not secured full rights of sovereignty in his kingdom until a little after 812 A D the date of the Kadaba grant which definitely states that he was Adhirāja (viceroy) of the entire Ganga 96 000 As no records have been found attesting to Rashtrakuta domination in the country after that date (812 A D) the date of the Kadaba plates, it has to be reckoned as the latest date we have for the Rashtrakuta occupation of Gangavadi This is confirmed by the specific statement in the Galigekere Plates (F C IV Vedatore 60) that Rāchamalla I, who succeeded to the throne in 817 A D established his independence of the Rashtrakutas As Hari in the form of the Boar rescued the Earth from Pātala (the infernal regions) we are told Rāchamalla seeing that the earth (the Ganga kingdom) had been for a long time seized by the Rashtrakutas rescued the land and took possession of it (See ante Ganga) This event however falls into the reign of Aṅgavarsha I the next king During his reign the Banavāsī 12 000 continued under his suzerainty A number of lithic inscriptions in Sorab Taluk attest to this fact (E C VIII Sorab 1, 9 10 and 22) They are dated from 797 to 800 A D From these we learn that during his reign Banavāsī, up to the ocean was about 800 A D being ruled over by one Rājādityarasa (Sorab 10) He seems to have been preceded in the office of governor by Madanāgarasa (Sorab 1) But in Sorab 9 we have a reference to Eroyammarasa as ruling Banavāsī nād It is difficult to reconcile these different names, as the inscriptions are undated Sorab 1 is on a vīṭakāl at Māvali This vīṭakāl will be found referred to in Chapter V ante (Sculpture and Painting) Sorab 9 also found at Māvali refers to the grant of a thousand cows gifts of virgins and the setting up of swings The sculptural peculiarities of this stone are referred to in the inscription is dated in the 22nd year of the reign of Krishna III. It is possible that this was another name of the mother-queen Krishna seems to have been married to a Gangga princess, who is called Gangamadēvi, (i.e., Gangamahādēvi) in an inscription dated in his 19th regnal year (M.E.R. 1908, Appendix B No. 65). He himself is called in this record and in another dated in 952 A.D. (E.C. VII 195) Prithvīgāṅgārāyār. The same queen is called in an inscription at Solapuram, near Vellore, as Kamaṅkamaṅār, and is described as the daughter of Vamaṅkōvārāyār Orīyūr-Adīyār and queen of Prithvīgāṅgārāyār. (M.E.R. 1908, Part II Para 88). Krishna, it would appear, had a rival to the throne in one Lalīyā, whom he defeated with the aid of his brother-in-law Būṭuga, the Gangga king (see ante Gangas). Būṭuga also assisted him in his war against the Chōla king Rājāditya, son of Parāṇṭaka I. Būṭuga greatly distinguished himself in this war by engaging in a single combat with Rājāditya, from over the elephant he was riding and killing him in the most heroic fashion. This was in 949 A.D. (E.I. VII, 194). It has been conclusively proved now that there was no treachery whatever on his part in doing this act (see ante Gangas). The battle at which Rājāditya fell was fought at Takolam near Arkonam. Krishna rewarded his brother-in-law's active co-operation and help by adding to his domains the Bāṇavāsī 12,000, which brought the Gangga boundary nearer to the Krishna. (E.C. III, Mādya 41). Probably, Krishna III, in return, helped Būṭuga to gain his own throne, superseding the claims of his elder brother Rāchamalla. (E.I. IV, 249). Būṭuga's daughter was also married to Krishna's son, thus bringing closer together the two families. (Srivāna Belgola, New Edn 133-Old Edn 57) The war with the Chōlas ended, and Krishna apparently became master of the South, probably up to Tanjore. Hence the title of Amoghavarsha In Honnali 18 dated in Saka 792 (or A D 870), he is given the name of Mārasatyō (E C VII) His time was largely occupied by wars for a time at least with the Western Gangas on the one side and with the Eastern Chalukyas of Vengi He appears to have transferred his capitol from Nāsik to Manyakhata identified with the present Malkhad (or Melker) in the Nizam's Dominions and the Mankir of the Arab writers (See Deoli Plates E I IV, 193) The town had been long in existence as it is mentioned in the Prameyākamala mārtunda of Prabhāchandra who preceded Jina the guru of Amoghavarsha But as the Karhad and Wardha grants state that Amoghavarsha made Manva khēta superior to the capital of Indra it might be inferred that he beautified it and made it his chief capital He defeated the Eastern Chalukyas who made peace with him at Vinguvalli He befriended Kapardi of the Silāhāra family, and presented to him the Konkan Amoghavarsha attempted to recover the lost Ganga kingdom by sending a chief named Bankēsa to reconquer it This attempt, however failed and the Ganga king is described as being able to shake the world This is fully confirmed by the Keregūdi Rangapur Plates of Rajamalla II, which state that Rajamalla I recovered the kingdom which had been lost by the unskilful hand of Sivamāra II and that only a bit of the kingdom was in the possession of Bankēsa, the Rāshtrakuta general (M.A.R. 1918-1919 Para 66 and ante Gangas)

Amoghavarsha also fought against the Ganga king Prithvipati I Nitimarga I the successor of Rajamalla I, inflicted a crushing defeat on the Rashtrakuta army at Rājārāmadu in the north of the present Kolar District The Keregūdi Rangapur Plates describe it as a 'terrible battle' at which the Rashtrakutas and their allies suffered heavy losses. Amoghavarsha seems to have

His war
against the Gangas.

his management seems to have flourished, so much so that we see gifts to it recorded by Krishna's mother and by one of the merchants attached to Krishna's camp. A grant by the latter is dated in the 18th regnal year and by the former in the 22nd. The merchant is described as one belonging to Manyakhēta, the Rāshtrakūta capital (M E R 1913 Appendix B Nos 181, 177 and 179) According to the Karhād grant, Krishna III is said to have taken a large number of people with him into the Chōla country when he invaded it (H I IV 281)

One effect of the successful termination of the war against the Chōla king was the establishment of the Rāshtrakūta supremacy over a part of South India. Several inscriptions found in the present Madras, Chingleput, North Arcot and South Arcot Districts show that his over-lordship in this territory was recognized as a fact. These record gifts by some of his chiefs, who to judge from their names, were probably southern in origin. An inscription of his at Bīrahmadēsam in the North Arcot District is dated in his 17th regnal year

Rāshtrakūta
supremacy over Southern India

Vaidumbas as Fendatories

The Vaidumbas appear to have been the feudatories of Krishna III Sankaradeva and Srikantha, sons of Tiruvaiyan, recognize his suzerainty in inscriptions dated in his 22nd and 25th regnal years (M E R 1906. Appendix B Nos 742 and 743) Undated inscriptions found in the modern Cuddapah District indicate his sway over it (M E R 1906, Appendix B No. 36, M E R 1905, Part II, Para 28) Similarly inscriptions found in the Bellary District show that it was part of the Rāshtrakūta kingdom at the time. Some of the inscriptions in the latter district show that Śiva worship was triumphant at the time in and around modern Bellary District. There were Chālukya feudatories governing parts of this district, then called the Kōgaḷi 500 and the Mādavādī 140.

without giving themselves up to its study. Not only students but others are all skillful in their speech, and know how to teach wisdom to young children and words to the deaf.

The region between the Cauvery and the Gōdavari includes a considerable part of country which is now regarded as a purely Mahratta country. But there is enough evidence both from the large number of Kannada inscriptions found in Sholapur Town and District and from the literature preserved in the Jain Mutt at Kolhapur that in the 9th century Kannada was spoken over a great part of the present Mahratta country and that it has had to yield its place to the encroaching Mahratta idiom since the rise of the Mahratta Empire (Pathak Introduction to Kavirājamārga). What is more the Kavirājamārga itself bears testimony to the fact (see I 37) that in the 9th century the Kannada spoken at Kisuvalol (modern Pattadakal in Bijapur District), Kopara (Koppala between Gadag and Bellary) Paregera (modern Lakshmīsvara in the Dhārwar District) and Onkuda (or Okkanda in the Belgaum District) was considered the pure well of Kannada undiluted. These places being thus situated in the Bijapur and Dhārwar Districts it is clear that Kannada as spoken in them should have been considered the purest in Amoghavarsha's time. This opinion of his is confirmed by Pampa who in 941 A.D. professes to write in the pithy Kannada of Puligere by which he meant the language or current at Lakshmīsvara one part of which town still goes by the name of Pulikar or Hnikar (Kavirājamārga Intro. 18).

Amoghavarsha appears to have professed the Jain religion quite unlike the other kings of the Rāshtrakuta line who were devout worshippers of Śiva. There are some verses in his work Kavirājamārga in praise of Jina (I 84 114 and III 5) which may be taken to

His Religion
and literary works

one Divyalinga Bhalaia, is interesting for the fact that part of the lands gifted lay in "the Lōkayata city of Gundēri of the Kūravādi 300". The stone bearing this inscription is in the Kalla-Khambadahalu in the boundary of Gundēri and Malēnahalli. The Gundēri referred to as a Lōkayata city is still in existence. The Lōkayatās were a sect of athiests who followed the doctrines of Chāvāka. Mādhavāchārya reviews their system in the opening chapter of his work the Sarvadarśana Saṅgraha.

As regards Gangavādi 96,000, it is clear from Holalkere 88, which may be assigned to 965 A D and which recognizes the suzerainty of Krishna III, that Mārasimha Permādi (Mārasimha II) was ruling over it as a feudatory of Krishna Mārasimha III was the son and successor of Būtuga.

In the Sorab Taluk of Shimoga District, we have a number of inscriptions belonging to Krishna's reign. Despite its gift to the Gangga king, Banavasi 12,000 appears to have come under Rāshtrakūta rule, if indeed it was ever transferred to the Gangas. The statement of Mādya 41 in this regard has apparently to be treated with caution. We have, in fact, numerous inscriptions, ranging from 938 A D to 965 A D, i e, from about the beginning of Krishna's reign to practically its end, attesting to Rāshtrakūta rule over this province. In 938 A D, one Māchayāsas was the officer governing it on behalf of Krishna III. About 941 A D, the province was apparently divided into two parts, over one of which Sāmanta Kalavittāsa was governing. Similarly, we find one Galavēndra ruling over part of it about 951 A D. But in an inscription dated in 954 A D, we see it recorded that the burden of Banavasi 12,000 was on Kalavittāsa's son Rāsana. Apparently the division

Suzerainty
over Banavasi

Gangas as feudatories of
Krishna III

royal author whose works have not come down to us. Among the best prose writers are included Vimalōdaya, Nāgarjuna, Jayabandhu and Durvinita. It cannot be stated whether the Nāgarjuna mentioned is the same as the great Buddhist scholar who has been described as resident in 'South or n India' by Hsien Tsing (S. yu li II 97). He was also a poet and composed a work called Sahśrīd lēka which he dedicated to his patron Sadvala, king of Southern Kōśala (I tsing K IV Ful 5 b) or he may be as suggested by Mr. Narasimhachar the alchemist Nāgarjuna referred to in the Rājvalīkathē or the Nāgarjuna mentioned as the author of a medical treatise named Nāgarjuna kalśha Puta or again the Nāgarjuna praised in the Nandī sūtras and the Avasyaka sūtras. Durvinita must be the Ganga king. Vimalachandra is mentioned in an inscription at Sravana Belgola while nothing is known of Vimalōdaya and Jayabandhu. Among the best poets referred to by him as being read and admired in his own time are Śrīvijaya, Kaviśvara, Pandita-chandra and Lōkapāla. The first of these is mentioned in an inscription at Sravana Belgola (Sravana Belgola 67) though it is doubtful if the reference in the inscription is to him (see R. Narasimhachar's Karnātaka Kavicharite Edn. 1924 13-14) and by Kēsirāja and Mangarasa. Kaviśvara has been identified by Mr. Pathak with Kaviparamēśvati, who is also spoken of as Kaviparamēśvara in the prasasti of the Uttarapurāṇa and in the Chāmunda Rāja purāṇa. The last named work attributes to him the authorship of Jinadharmadīpakāśhataka from which it quotes certain Sanskrit verses. It has been suggested that Pandita-chandra may be the Chandrabhatta mentioned by Kēsirāja and praised by Durgasimha, a contemporary of the Chalukya king Jagadēkamalla II. Mr. Rice would identify Lōkapāla with Lōhāditya the son of Bankarasa of the Challa Kētana family after Pandayya's wife was a Jaina lady named Jakki Sundari, who built a basadi, to which a grant was made by Pandayya. As Pandayya is called the "Chalukya Omicent," he may be taken to have been connected with the ancient Chalukya dynasty.

During Khotiga's time, a part of Banavasi 12,000 appears to have been governed by Gabbindra, who was in power under Krishna III as well (H.C. VIII, Sorab 531, dated in 967 A.D.).

There is reason to believe that Khotiga was a Jain by religion, unlike his brother and mother, who appear to have been devout Saivas. He caused, according to an inscription found at Danavallapadu, in the Guddapah District, a pedestal to be made for the bathing ceremony of a Jaina saint named Santi. This pedestal is in front of a Jaina image in a ruined Jaina temple at that place. From the inscriptions and Jaina inscriptions found at the place, it should have been in older days a place held sacred by Jinas.

Kakkala-
Dēva, Amoghavar-
sha IV, Nripatunga
Kakka II,
972-977 A.D.

* Kakka II, also called Kakkala-Dēva, the next king, proved to be the last of the Rashtrakuta line. He appears to have been a nephew of Khotiga. For him, we have a few inscriptions in the Sorab Taluk. One dated in 972 A.D. records that a certain Chhattayya was governing the Banavasi 12,000. Another, dated in 973 A.D., gives the name Kakkala-Dēva, and records the continuance of Chhattayya's rule over Banavasi. A third, undated but assigned by Mr. Rice to 991 A.D., but may be 20 years earlier, refers to Kakka as the ruling sovereign and mentions a grant of 24 thera dramas to one Ketaga, who gave up his life in order that the local governor, one Sāthivama, may have a son (H.C. VIII, Sorab 479; also see Sorab 531, 455, 457 and 454) (For drama see ante Chapter IV, Nunismatics).

Mr Narasimhachar has also drawn prominent attention to this view and supports it by quotations from the work itself. The author mentions in the colophons the name of Srivijaya and that suggestively us its author. But there are two objections to this view one being that Srivijaya is quoted in the work itself as an ancient author and that Srivijaya may be as suggested by Mr Pathak a name of Nripatunga himself. This view would be correct if Durgasimha (about 1145 A.D.) means the Kavirūjamārga when he speaks of Srivijaya Kavimar gam. This title, however has not been confirmed in any of the inscriptions so far published nor is it even mentioned in this work. But we know Srivallabha is a title which the Ikshtrakutas appropriated to themselves from the Chalukyas and it is a question if Srivijaya is used in place of Srivallabha. Besides the words Nripatungadēcānumatam appa Kavirūjamārga which have been held to be equivalent to saying that the work was written according to the views or on the direction of Nripatunga may as suggested by Mr Pathak be held to mean only that the work is intended only to express the author's approval of those views of his predecessors whom he has named and which he summarises in his own work. There are also numerous passages (e.g. III 2 II 27 I. 147 and I 24) which distinctly ascribe the work to Amoghavarsha and to Atisaya Dhavala his other name.

Amoghavarsha seems to have obtained to something more than a mere local reputation. Chitaldrug 76 and 49 (E.C. XI) term him the celebrated in the world. He has been identified with the long lived Balhara of the merchant Sulaiman (A.D. 851) who reckoned him to be fourth of the great kings of the world the other three being the Khalifa of Baghdad the Emperor of China and the Emperor of Constantinople (Sir Vincent

His trans-Indian reputation

place (Sivana Belgola 133) praises his wonderful skill in horsemanship and describes him as great in war as in liberality. It speaks of him also as one devoted to truth, indeed as one who had resolved never to tell a lie and never did utter one. He was apparently a devout Jain and married to the daughter of a chief named Rajachudaman, of whom nothing is known. Indra's epitaph (part of which is repeated in an inscription at Hemavati, E C XII, Sina 27) shows him to have been a lovable prince born in times least propitious to his talents and character.

The earliest inscription we have for Talila II is Sorab 445 (E C VIII), but it is unfortunately undated. As it, however, describes him as a Mahamandalesvara, it is possible he was only a local ruler under the Rashtrakuta king of the time. It might, therefore, be assigned as Mr Rice does, to about 975 A.D. There is indeed an inscription of Talila's father Vikramaditya dated in Saka 893 (or A.D. 971) which gives him the full regnal titles (E C XI, Chitaldrug 25). This would seem to be a case of coming events casting their shadows before, if the inscription is to be relied upon as a contemporaneous record. In Sorab 530, however, he is given the full royal titles of "Prithvi Vallabha," "Maharajadhiraja," etc., and is called Narmada Talappa Deva. It is dated in Saka 903 or A.D. 980. From these inscriptions, it might perhaps be inferred that Talila effected the revolution sometime between 975 and 980 A.D. As there are, however, inscriptions recognizing Kakka's rule even in 976 A.D., and Talila is a full blown ruler in 980 A.D., Talila's victory over Kakka may be set down to 977-978 A.D., a date which may be taken as near the approximate date as might be fixed for it, in the present state of our knowledge. Indra IV apparently did not desire to survive the loss of his kingdom long after Talila's victory and died in 782 A.D. With Talila's success, we enter on the history of the Revolution of Talila II, 978

A.D.

To his reign too must be attributed the lithic inscriptions numbered Devanahalli 42 and 43 (F C IX) which refer themselves to an Akalavarsha's suzerainty and Hoskote 12 (F C IX) which mentions Krishna II under the name of Karmadivarsa a form of Kannara or Kandhara. From these inscriptions it seems as though Salve 300 Kunigal 500 and Ponnād 70 were under Rashtrakuta suzerainty during the reign of Krishna II. He seems to have been engaged in constant wars with the Eastern Chalukyas. In F C XI, Chitaldrug 76 he is said to have attacked and slain a Pandya identified by Mr Rice with a Pandya of Uchehangri in Molkalmuru Taluk (E C VI Introd 8). A lithic inscription at Manchela Bellary District dated in Saka 815 (or A D 803) refers to his Mahāsāmanta Matyenanna as ruling the Sindavadi 1000 (M.E.R. 1916 Appendix B No 542). During his reign Banavāsi 30 000 continued under Rashtrakuta suzerainty. In 902 A D—according to a lithic record in front of the ruined Basavanna temple at Bandalike Shikarpur Taluk—we note that it was being governed by the Mahāsāmanta Lokatōyarsa son of Bankōyarsa. From Shikarpur 219 (E C VII) dated in Saka 834 (in words) or A D 911 we learn that it was being governed by one Kalivattarasa. We have the interesting information from this lithic record to be seen at the entrance of the basti at Bandalike that acting under Kalivattarasa's orders one Sattarasa Nagārjuna the Nāl-garunda of Nāgarakhanda 70 fell on which the office was bestowed by the king on his widow Jakkīyabbe. She seems to have held it with great credit for seven years, rejoicing in her beauty until incapacitated by some bodily ailment on which she resigned everything to her daughter and reaching Bandalike she expired in performance of (Jaina) vows. She is described as being skilled for good government and though a woman she protected her charge well 'in the pride of

255) Consequently, the statement that the Kalbhavi inscription presents the only instance of the recognition of an overlord seems untenable (See Rice Mysore and Coorg from Inscriptions 71 f n) Apparently Dampaiya the commander-in-chief above referred to had under him another commander named Durvinlta nrasa (designated Dandanāyaka) He may be identical with the Durvinlta mentioned in Maddagiri 27 39 and 42 along with his brother Bātuga as fighting against Nolambas. The period of these Maddagiri records is given as about 950 A D but they may be earlier by at least 20 years (U.A.R. 1909 1910, Para 65)

Indra III, son of Krishna II succeeded him In Chitaldrug 76 (E.C. \I) it is said that he slew Vira the reference being not clear Like his predecessor Gōvinda III (Sir Vincent Smith E.H.I. 395) he carried on warfare with Kanauj He took Kanauj in 916 A D and this proved the beginning of the end of that Empire (Cambay Plates E.I. VII 86) Mahipāla was temporarily deprived of his throne and Surasabtra was lost to him with the other outlying provinces Indra, however could not hold Kanauj indefinitely Mahipāla recovered his capital with the aid of the Chandēl king and other allies (E.I. I 121) Chitaldrug 76 in describing him says that on account of his valour he was considered the brave hero of the Kali age. A general of his was Srīvijaya mentioned in an inscription at Dana valapādn, Cuddapah District (M.E.R. 1906 Appendix B of 1905 No 388) He is described as a 'matchless poet, anupama kavī This must be different from the Srīvijaya mentioned in the Kavirājamārga who must have lived a century earlier (I.A. XXXIII. 270) It might perhaps be inferred from this inscription that Indra III was a Jain in faith We are told that the prasasti was composed by the general's accountant The accountant

Indra III
912 916 A.D

Of the manner in which Talia II regained the lost kingdom, after a lapse of about two centuries and a quarter, we have more than one graphic description in the inscriptions so far discovered. Davangere I has been referred to above. Shikarpur 125 (E.C. VII) says — "The earth and the crown having fallen into the hands of the Rattas, he drove the kings of the Ratta kingdom before him, put them down and overwhelmed them, this millstone (ghuratta) to the Rattas, and took possession of the crown of the Chalukya kingdom." His father Vikramāditya is referred to in Chitaldrug 25, (E.C. XI) dated 971 A.D., and given the usual royal titles, but, as already remarked, it is difficult to assert if it is a contemporary epigraph. While Davangere I gives some part in the attempt to Kirtivarmān III, it gives no prominence to Vikramāditya. As Kirtivarmān is, according to it, removed by five generations from Talia II, he cannot be connected with the revolution effected by Talia II. Talia ruled for 24 years and was a contemporary of the Chola king Rajaraja the Great and of the Sinda king Pulikā. His capital was Kalyāna (or sometimes Kalyāni) in the present Nizam's Dominions. He married Jakkabbe, daughter of Kakka II, the Rashtrakuta king whom he had subverted. He is described in Shikarpur 125 as eager for war with Chola and a terror to him. If the early Chalukyas had been largely occupied in the south in wars against the Pallavas, whose power they ultimately broke, the kings of the restored Chalukyas had to engage themselves in that quarter in struggles with the Cholas. The thirty years' period of 973 to 1003 A.D., during which the Eastern Chalukya kingdom of Vengi was without a ruler, seems to have been a time when the Cholas had overrun the country, having first acquired the territories of the Pallavas, including the city of Kanchi, their ancient capital. We accordingly find Talapāra described as full of desire to because it records, like the Doddahundi stone (F C III Narsipur 91) a grant to a person who became a kīl-gunthe i.e., one who to prove his personal loyalty to his feudal lord or superior allowed himself to be buried in under him i.e. in a pit underneath him. Kīl gunthe (or kīl gunte) literally means an under pit, i.e. a pit for the servant below the pit prepared for the master (See Rice in F C VI Trans 73)

During his reign the Śāntalige 1000 appears to have continued under his sovereignty though there are a couple of inscriptions (EC VII Shikarpur 194 and 322) both dated in Sala 858 cyclic year Manmatha (or A D 935) which do not recognize the suzerainty. Both these inscriptions refer to one Pergado Paliyamma described as a Maha amātya (or Prime Minister) and the equal of Brihaspati. Apparently he affected independence about this time. Among the benefits of his vigorous administration was the construction of the big tank at Tānagunda (Sīhanogundūr) in 935 A D. He made grants of land for its maintenance and for the offerings of the god to be kept up perpetually in his name (Shikarpur 194). In the other inscription (Shikarpur 322) the construction of the tank is again mentioned but the additional fact is recorded that Paliyamma made over the tank to the people of the town and they agreed to the payment of certain annual dues to it.

His Suzerainty
over Śāntalige

The Banavāsī 12000 however continued under the sovereignty of Gōvinda IV, called Suvarnavarsha in the three inscriptions Honnali 21 to 23 (EC VII) all of which are dated in Sala 857 or A D 934. One Santara, described as a Rāma in energy (in war) was its governor at the time.

Gōvinda IV is described in an inscription found at Doddimakala, Adōni Taluk, Bellary District, as 'ruling

Extent of his Kingdom.

Taila II patronised the Kannada poet Kaviratna, who is probably identical with the pilgrim whose name is found engraved on the Chikkabetta at Sravana Belgola (Siavana Belgola 449). Kaviratna wrote the Ajītapūrāna in 993 A D and received from Taila II the title of Kavichakravarti (See M.A.R. 1908-1909, para 47 and Inscriptions at Sravana Belgola, Intro. 76, where Taila III is a ship for Taila II)

According to some inscriptions, Taila II had two sons Satyāsraya and Dasavarma (Davangere I), according to others Dasavarma was not his brother, but his son. However that may be, Satyāsraya succeeded Taila II on the Chalukya throne. He is also known as Sattiga or Sattiga in inscriptions. There are only one or two inscriptions of his in this State. In (H.C.VI) Mudgere II he is referred to under the title of Irivabedanga. There is, indeed, a great paucity of inscriptions of his period, due probably to the Chola conquest of Gangavadi and Nolaṃbavadi. It was during his reign and that of his successor Vikramaditya V that the Cholas under Rājaraṣa I became supreme in Southern India. Rājaraṣa claims to have conquered Gangavadi, and the Nolaṃbapadi (Nolaṃbavadi) 32,000. The Chola occupation of Gangavadi is borne out by a considerable number of records found in this State. The conquest of Nolaṃbavadi took place in A D 998-999, in the first two years of Satyāsraya's reign. A second invasion of the Chalukya possessions seems to have been undertaken by Rājaraṣa. The defeat of Satyāsraya which is reported in the Leyden grant and in one of the Tanjore inscriptions was apparently the result of this invasion. The same event is alluded to in the historical introduction prefixed to the epigraphs of this Chola king by the statement that he conquered the seven and a half lakṣas of Irattapadi, i.e., the Western Chalukya Empire. This conquest is

Satyāsraya, (Irivabedanga)
997-1009 A D

and for the boy students (vidyārthi māniyarggam) who are specially mentioned

Amoghavarsha's relations with the Gaugas appear to have been cordial. He gave his daughter Rēvaka in marriage to Butaga the then reigning Gauga king (E I IV 350), together with a dowry of territory of the Gauga kingdom (see ante Gaugas)

Amoghavarsha III was succeeded by his eldest son Krishna III. For him we have numerous lithic inscriptions in the State. They are mostly to be found in the Shimoga and Chitaldrug Districts with a few in the Bangalore District and a reference in a Ganga inscription in the Mysore District. A literary reference to him is to be found in Sūmadēva Suri's Yasastilaka Champu which refers to him as ruling at Melyāti in Saka 881 or A.D. 959 (M.A.R. 1926, Page 13). In an epigraph found at Sūlapuram near Vellore dated in Saka 875 or A.D. 952 he is, under the name of Prithvigangaraiyar said to have been governing Kalledappur Maryāda (E.I. VII 195). Whether the Melyāti of the Yasastilaka is identical with the Maryāda of this inscription remains to be settled.

Krishna III
(Kannara, Akilavaraba)
940-960 A.D.

Krishna III was undoubtedly a warlike prince. His numerous inscriptions found mainly in the central districts of Madras Presidency and the Mysore State show him to have been a personality to reckon with in his days. He must have been both active and intrepid and not quite unwilling also to use likely persons at different courts in his own interests. His mother was according to the Karhād grant Kundakadēvi the daughter of the Haihaya King Yavarāja (E.I. IV 218). But in an inscription found at Tiruvorriyūr, near Madras recording a gift of hers, her name is given as Pulaichchirāni (M.E.R. 1918 Appendix B No 170). This

His character and conquests

she was the same as Vridhimaabharasi mentioned in the Gombali inscription referred to below is difficult to determine. The latter is also said to have been a daughter of Satyasriya and to have married Irva-

Nolambadhariya (see below)
 During Satvasriya's time, the Western Chalukyas, however, retained Banavasi, which was about 1002 A.D., under the rule of Bhimaraja. (H.C. VII. 71) This inscription, is, as pointed out by Mr. Rice, (ibid) peculiar in several respects and is not free from doubt or difficulty. The name appears as Satyāśraya for Satyāriya; instead of calling Kulatilaka, it has Kulatilaka, thus converting the personal name into a family name, the Saka dating 934 (A.D. 1012) and the cyclic year Subha-Saka do not agree, though Subhakarit was Saka 924 (1102 A.D.), which is well within Satyasriya's reign. Satyasriya is also referred to as the ruling sovereign in Sorab 385 and 386 dated in 1004 A.D. (H.C. VIII)

Satyasriya's son Kundanarasa, appears to have been governor of Banavasi and Satalige about 1012 A.D., probably succeeding in that office Bhima Raja (H.C. VII Shikarpur 287). His seat of Government was at Balpura or Belgam (Shikarpur 125) This prince of the royal blood seems to have retained this position till the accession of Somesvara I, i.e., during a period of about 30 years. He is also called Kunda Raja and Kundaka Raja (Shikarpur 307 and 9). The inscription dated in 1012 A.D., referred to above, is interesting as referring to a charity, which became incapable of being carried out. The case, it would appear, presented a predicament, which it says was like the suit in the Bhāta, in which the well belonged to one man, the pot to another, and the rope to a third. The person entrusted with execution of the charity was unable to raise the water to the rice land, so that it bore no crop,

His son,
 Kundanarasa,
 Governor of Banavasi etc
 Provinces,
 1012-1042
 A.D.

Krishna III in several of his inscriptions as he 'who took Kachchi and Tanjai : e Kanchi and Tanjore. As the death of Rājāditya in battle took place in 949 A D, it is likely that it took place about the tenth year of his reign

In this warfare against the Chōla king Krishna III appears to have been helped by a Kērala chief who afterwards became known as Chaturānana Pandita. He was apparently a great favourite of Krishna III. It is stated in an inscription at Tiruvorriyūr, that as a youth learned in all the sciences he emigrated to the Chōla court and sought service under king Rājāditya. He soon became an intimate friend and subordinate of his. Though he was always near that king he did not however (so goes the inscription) die with him on the battle field. Aggrieved that he had thus done a deed inconsistent with the nature of his caste family father and master Chaturānana resigned the world, bathed in the waters of the Ganges, entered the order of the Sanyāsins at Ādhigrāma (Tiruvorriyūr), received initiation at the hands of Niranjana guru and thereafter becoming the chief of that matha greatly improved the temple. This narrative of his life history, in an inscription set up by himself would seem to imply some remorse on the part of Chaturānana for something done by him which he should have later thought was highly improper on his part. If he did not act exactly as a spy he should have come very near it to discard worldly life and become a sanyāsin. Krishna III perhaps followed the policy laid down by Chānakya in the Arthasāstra in regard to winning over the friends of foreign kings (see Artha Sāstra Chapter XIV). The inscription in which these details occur is of the 20th year of Krishna's reign. Chaturānana's gift was one of money and consisted of 100 nishkas of pure gold. The temple at Tiruvorriyūr under

His Kērala ally
Chaturānana Pandita.

Kundamarasa was far away in Mysore. Shikarpur 125 seems to throw some faint light on this matter. It states that Kundamarasa was ruling over Banavasi and other provinces with both rights (ubhaya samyad) as far as the Western Ocean. This would suggest that he ruled not only by virtue of position as governor but also by virtue of his sovereign right. He is still styled Mahamanda-teswara in an inscription dated in 1019 A.D., in which Jayasinha (son of Vikrama) is mentioned as the ruling Chalukya king (H.C.VII Shikarpur 125). Apparently he had been superseded by his cousin Vikrama. Dasa-varma's another son, Binayita, is mentioned in (H.C.XI) Jagati 13, which has been assigned to about 1010 A.D. As he is specifically mentioned as Dasavarmarasa's son, there can, it may be presumed, be no mistake about it. He was apparently a local ruler in North-West Mysore, under his cousin Kundamarasa. Of Vikramaditya V, however, we have only very few inscriptions, due probably to the incursion of the Cholas into the Chalukya territories, as mentioned above. Sir John Fleet has published a copper-plate grant of his from Kauthem (I.A. XVI 15-24). A damaged and mutilated lithic inscription of his has also been traced at Gonahalu in the Adoni Taluk. It seems to be dated in Saka 936, (or A.D. 1014) though the last figure is a doubtful rendering (M.E.H. 1923, Appendix B No 722). If this reading is accepted, his reign would be increased by two years beyond the latest date assigned to him by Sir John Fleet (Bombay Gazetteer I in 428). This record mentions a subordinate of Vikramaditya V named Nalambadhira, who has been identified with the Nalamba Pallava prince Iriva-Nalambadhira, also called Ghatteya-Ankataka, who in A.D. 1010-1011 was governing the Nolambavadi 32,000 and other Provinces under Vikramaditya V. He is said to have married a daughter of Satyasaya, who accordingly was a cousin

(M.E.R., 1904 Appendix B Nos 75 and 100, dated in Saka 868 and Saka 878 or 940 and 956 A.D.) This would indicate that in Krishna's time, Chalukyas acted as subordinate officers under the Rāshtrakūṭas. In one or two inscriptions in this district dated in Saka 870 (948 A.D.) and in 888 (=965 A.D.) Krishna III is called Akālavarsha Chalakenallata apparently implying that he claimed to be both Chālukya sovereign and ruler of Lāta or southern Gujaraṭ.

A number of inscriptions belonging to his reign dated from 941 to 965 A.D. and found in the Chitaldrug District make mention of Kannaiya's governorship of Kadambalige (i.e., ancient Kadamba territory). Of this Kannaiya we have a few inscriptions. His mother Polegabbe was apparently a widow, given to fasting and purified by bathing in the Ganges (E.C.V. Holalkere 30). Kannaiya's brother in law was Gaggi whose genealogy tracing his descent from the Chalukya king Vikramāditya is given in Chitaldrug 41 (E.C.V.). Krishna III is referred to in these inscriptions as the supreme sovereign and Chitaldrug 49, dated in 947 A.D. says that he was devoted to dharma. He is said in Chitaldrug 76, dated in Saka 869 or A.D. 937, to have excelled in his virtues the son of Dharma Rāghava Dillpa and Māndhata. As this praise occurs in an inscription of his father Amoghavarsha III it may perhaps be inferred that he had already distinguished himself both as a soldier and as a ruler.

Sudrakayya seems to have succeeded Kannaiya in the Kadambalige governorship. He is called in Holalkere 28 dated in 967 A.D. Mahāsāmanta champion over fleeing armies, master of Āndhra mandala and bhujanga (i.e. paramour or lord) of Ujjeni. A grant of his in favour of the god of the Sīditāsvara temple built by one Sīdilanka Kama dated in 967 A.D., and made to

Suzerainty
over Kadambalige

(E. C. IX Bangalore 142) Jayasimha is stated in Shikaripuri 136 (E. C. VII) to be known as Nalamba-Pallava Perumānadi, being the son of a Pallava Princess. The Chola occupation of Nalambavadi was probably ended by him, in or about 1018 A.D. In Shikaripuri 125, dated in 1019 A.D., (E. C. VII), we are told that he caused the lotus king Bhōja to shut up and was a lion to the elephant Rājendra-Chōla. If that be so, is it too much to call him Rājādhirāja? asks the poet who composed the inscription. The statement in this inscription that he "chastised" the Chōlas may not be altogether a poetical exaggeration as we find his inscriptions in Nalambavadi proper. An inscription of his reign dated in 540, or A.D. 1018, has been found at Bagali in the Bellary District, while others have been traced at Kurugodu in the same district. Another inscription of his at Bagali is dated in 1035-1036, those at Kurugodu are dated in 1027-8 and 1030-31. These refer to his feudatory who was governing a good part of the Bellary District and the Mysore State (M. H. R. Appendix No. 87 etc. of 1904). Rājendra-Chōla's claim to success over Jayasimha should, in view of the existence of these lithic inscriptions, be treated as his referring to some temporary advantage he gained over his adversary. An inscription of Jayasimha, dated in 1021 A.D., at Hire Megulageri in Harpanhalli Taluk, gives his full name and refers to his maḥāsāmantadhipati Dandamayaka Polamayya. On the other hand, in this very year, 1021 A.D., Jayasimha is said in Chōla inscriptions to have turned his back at Musanagi (possibly Uchhanagi as Mr. Rice suggests, but more probably Maski) and by 1026 Rājendra-Chōla is said to have taken Irattapadi 7½ lakhs country from Jayasimha. This seems, from other inscriptions testifying to him Chālukya rule in it, an exaggeration. Another refers to a subordinate of his called Jagadekammalla Nalamba-Pallava-Perumānadi was a temporary one. In the same year Mchivarisa was acting once again. Javanaisa occupied the position in 955 A D. About 960 A D Gabbindara came into office. In 965 A D, Javanaisa returned to the post (J C VIII Sorab 203 216 210, 474 and 202). In the Shikarpar and Shmoga Taluka, we have mention of Krishna III on a couple of Pratalas. One of the is Shikarpur 183 whose date is not readable but may be about 950 A D and Shmoga 22 dated in Sala 855 or A D 962 963. There can be little doubt that practically over the whole of the present Chitaldrug and Shmoga Districts, Rāshtrakuta rule continued unabated during the reign of Krishna III.

Krishna III appears to have died in Sala 859 cyclic year Ashvina, or A D 966 and was succeeded by (his brother) Khottiga. This is now definitely ascertained by a lithic record found at Holagallu in the Bellary District (M E R 1914, Appendix B No 236). He appears to have had a quiet rule. Records of his time have been found at Bāgali and Kudatani in the Bellary District. Those at Kadatani and Adaragauchi are dated in Sala 893 or A D 971 2, while the one at Bāgali is dated in Sala 894 or 972 A D. The latter mentions the Ganga feudatory of Khottiga (M E R 1901, Appendix B Nos 44 and 79). He is also referred to in a few inscriptions found in the Chitaldrug District. Of these (E C VI) Chitaldrug 50 dated in 968 A D is the first in point of time. He is spoken of in it as Nityavarsha Deva and described as an energetic warrior with his capital at Māyakhūta. He is also recognized as the overlord of the Kadambaliga 1 000 which was governed in his name by one Paadayya. In Chitaldrug 74 dated in 968 A D Nityavarsha is also called Khottiga Deva and the additional information is given that Pandayya or Paadiga as it calls him, was the son of Goggi previously mentioned

Khottiga, Nityavarsha
967 971 A D

daily routine of their administration. Numerous inscriptions in Sorab and Sagar Taluks testify to this fact though there were the usual cattle raids in which men engaged themselves in rescuing their cattle. There is also a statement in an inscription dated in the reign of Vikramāditya VI that the mukhāsāmantas and mandalikas proved hostile to him and that he was saved from their treachery by Dandanatha Kālidāsa his chief minister (M & R 1914 1915, Para 71). This has not been confirmed by any contemporary inscriptions found so far. It is stated that the treachery was such that the kingdom was about to slip away from Jayasimha's hands and that the credit of having saved and secured it to Jayasimha, just as a ship about to sink being tossed by the waves is saved by means of an anchor belongs to none other than Kālidāsa. (See below reign of Vikramāditya VI). A virakala dated in 1015 A.D. seems to refer to a time anterior to the accession of Jayasimha. (Sorab 16). Others referring to him are Sorab 43 and 48 both assignable to 1018 A.D., the latter of which refers to one Gorava as the local ruler of Banavāsi. Sorab 28 bearing date 1023 A.D. refers to Kṇḍaḍṇaśaśi (i.e. Kṇḍamarasa's) rule over Banavāsi. Sagar 7 dated 1025 also refers to him while Sorab 213, dated in 1029, A.D. refers to Kṇḍamarasa's son Ariya Singa Dēva and to his rule over Banavāsi. Then we have a series of five virakalas (Sorab 60-64) all dated in 1032 A.D. in Jayasimha's reign. Sorab 191 also dated in 1032 A.D. refers to Brahma Deva and his rule over Banavāsi 12,000. He was probably another son of Kṇḍamarasa. Sorab 184 assignable to 1033 A.D. and dated in Jayasimha's reign refers to Alayya as ruling over Banavāsi 12,000. Alayya may have been still another son of Kṇḍamarasa. Sorab 72 refers to the 14th year of Jayasimha, and couples the cyclic year Śrīmukha with it. If so it must fall in 1032 A.D. and not in 1034 A.D. to which Mr Rice

We have also a couple of inscriptions referring to Hakka's rule in the inscriptions found in the Chitaldrug District (F. C. VI). In Davangere 102 dated in 976 A. D., he is described as ruling as far as the ocean. Kadambaliga was during his reign still being governed by Pandavya. This however is the last we hear of independent Rashtrakuta rule in Mysore. In Holalkere 85 dated in 977 A. D., we have no suzerain recognized though the local chief's name—Arabalava—is given. This indicates the troublous nature of the times which ended in the Chalukya revolution effected under the leadership of Taila II.

The immediate cause of the fall of the Rashtrakuta kingdom is not known. But the feeble rulers who succeeded Krishna III perhaps provided ample scope for the ambitious designs of Taila II a scion of the old Chalukya stock who at a convenient opportunity subverted the kingdom. When exactly this subversion took place is not known. As there are inscriptions recognizing the suzerainty of Hakka up to 976 A. D. the event could not have occurred till that year. Before then somewhere about 973 A. D. when the Ganga king Narasimha III abdicated and retired to Bankapur, Indra IV was crowned by him (Narasimha) as the Rashtrakuta king. Indra IV was the grandson of Krishna III. Krishna's son named son having married a daughter of Dutuga and was apparently considered the rightful heir to the throne. But Khottiga succeeded Krishna III and he in turn was succeeded by Hakka II. Narasimha's attempt has accordingly to be set down as an attempt to assert the superior claim of Indra IV. These internal dissensions should have given an opportunity to Taila II to prosecute his own aims. The attempt of Narasimha to prop up the right of Indra IV having proved futile the latter retired to Sravasa Belgala and there starved himself to death by the Jainas of sallekhana in 982 A. D. An inscription at that

Indra IV
died 972 A. D.

presence of god Mallikārjuna there to the Kālāmukha teacher Surasvara Pandita Dōva (V.L.R. 1923 Appendix B 677 at Kottapalle Kurnool District). This queen is mentioned in a record of Tilavalli dated in 1053-1054 in the Dhārwar District and noticed by Sir John Fleet (Bombay Gazetteer I, 438). She seems to have lived down to 1058-1059 A.D. the date of the Kottapalle grant. The influence of the Kālāmukha ascetics, which was apparently on the increase during the preceding reigns, continued in this reign as well. They seem to have had some influence in checking the growth of Jainism since they appear to have claimed adherents from the royal household itself.

There are inscriptions of this king ranging from 1042 A.D. the year of his coronation to 1068 A.D. both in the Mysore State and outside it. The period of his rule was one of continual warfare against the Cholas who would judging from their own inscriptions appear to have been trying to recover Nolambavadi and other provinces which had been overrun by the Cholas during the time of Rājaraṣa I and Rājendra Chola I. The Chōla kings Rājādhirāja (1018-1053) Rājendra Dōva (1052-62) and Virarajendra I (1062-1069) claim to have defeated Sōmēśvara I. Rājādhirāja boasts of having burnt the palace at the Chālukya (provincial) capital Kampili. Rājendra Dōva to have advanced with his elder brother (i.e. Rājādhirāja I) and to have planted a pillar of victory at Kollaparam and Virarajendra to have defeated Āhavamalla (i.e. Sōmēśvara I) five times. Of Rājendra Chōla's success over Sōmēśvara I there is farther confirmation from an inscription of Rājendra's 10th regnal year at Tereyur (Maddur 76) dated in 1061 A.D. In it Rājendra's victory is described in vivid colours—how he advanced with his allies adorned with bows, on Kollapura (Kolhāpar) how he showered cruel arrows on Āhavamalla's elephants forehead his revived dynasty of Chālukyas which like the one it supplanted, lasted for about two centuries and a quarter

The fall of the Rāshtrakūtas followed not long after by that of the Gangas before the invading hosts of the Chōlas meant a great blow to the Jain faith. With rare exceptions the Ganga kings were Jains by religion and though most of the Rāshtrakūta kings were Saivas some appear to have been Jains. But the disappearance of these two dynasties did not for the time being affect the Jain religion though the Saiva faith was competing with it for supremacy.

Simultaneous Fall of Rāshtrakūtas and Gangas

It was during the time of the Rāshtrakūtas that the Muhammadans of Sind first got into friendly relations with the Hindus of Western India. Sind had been conquered by Muhammad son of Kāsim early in the 8th century. For nearly a century thereafter they had been opposed by the Gurjara kings of Bhīmal whose territory lay to the east of the Arab kingdom. The Rāshtrakūta kings, being at war with the Gurjara kings cultivated friendship with the Arabs of Sind. One result of this new policy was that Arab merchants and travellers began to visit Western India some of whom beginning with the merchant Sulaimān (9th century) have left a record of what they saw (Elliot History of India I). These writers call the Rāshtrakūta kings Balhārā a corruption of Vallabha and Ballaha which was a title of the Rāshtrakūta kings and of their predecessors the Chālukyas, and state that they were the greatest amongst the sovereigns of India. Sir Vincent Smith remarks that this tribute of honour to Rāshtrakūta rule is well justified by the achievements of this dynasty. He adds that the Kailāsa temple is one of the wonders of the world a work of which any nation might be proud and an honour to the king under whose patronage it was executed (E.H.I., New Edition 447).

Arab tribute to Rāshtra-kūta Rule

in commemorating the conquests of Vira Ballala refers to the fort of Uchchang, which he says was considered impregnable. (Karnataka Haricharite new Edition 269) That the Cholas were defeated is also confirmed by (E C VII) Shikarpur 118 dated in 1031 A.D. in the reign of Somāvara I. In recounting his conquests it is there stated that in the middle of battle the Chola king exhausted his valour and died. This must be a reference to the death of Rajādhiraja. Rajādhiraja's claim to victory over Somāvara I is made in Devanahalli 75 (E C IX) dated in 1061 A.D. must therefore be set down as a reference to some temporary though none the less brilliant success obtained during the long warfare that subsisted between the two dynasties throughout his reign. This inscription of Rajādhiraja particularly mentions with evident pride to the terror caused by his forces even to Īhavamallo and how the army of the latter and his confederates Gandappayan and Ganga dharan were destroyed with their elephants and how also his chief generals of great strength Aikkā Vijayādittan Sangappayan and others retreated like cowards. It also mentions how large numbers of elephants horses and gold were easily captured and how 'kollipakkai of the enemies was destroyed by fire. Kollipake frequently referred to in inscriptions, as 'the door of the South' has been identified with Kolpuk in the present Nizam's Dominions. The Vijayādittan of Devanahalli 75 above quoted may be the Vishnuvardhana Vijayāditya who was in charge of Kogali and other provinces (M.E.R. 1919 Appendix B No 278). He appeared to have retrieved the fortunes of the Chalukyas in some war anterior to 1065 A.D. the date of that inscription. The reference may be to the battle of Koppam, which Sir John Fleet has, it may be added identified with Khidrapur (near which the site of the battle has to be located) 30 married a daughter of the Rashtrakuta king Krishna) and Vikramaditya IV (who married Bonthā dēvi daughter of king Lakshmana of the Chedi or Kalachurva family). One Chalukya named Jayasimha fled to Anhilvāra in Gujārāt the court of Bhaja Rāja the last of the Sauras. Here his son Māla Rāja married the daughter of Bhaja Rāja and in 931 A.D. succeeded the latter on the throne the Salic law being set aside in his favour. He ruled at Anhilvāra for fifty-eight years, and his descendants occupied the throne of that country with great glory till 1145 A.D.

Meanwhile Tailapa the son of Vikramaditya above mentioned defeated the Rashtrakutas in the person of the king Hakkala and retrieved the Chalukya fortunes. Davangere I states that he cut down the two war pillars (rana stambha) that had been erected by the Rashtrakuta king Hakkala and as the original Boar raised up the earth which had been submerged in the ocean he raised up the fortune of the Chalukya family which had been submerged by the sands of the Rashtrakutas. He succeeded to the throne in 973 A.D. and transmitted to his posterity a kingdom which increased in splendour and prosperity under each succeeding reign for nearly 230 years. The following is a list of the kings for this period —

	A.D.
Talla II (Ormed) Talla Khavasmalla)	973—997
Satyakaya, (Iriv bedanga, Sattiga etc.)	997—1006
Vikramāditya V (Tribhuvanasmalla)	1007—1014
Ayyan II	1014
Jayasimha II (JagadKamalla)	1015—1018
Somdevara I (Trailokyasmalla, Khavasmalla etc.) ...	1018—1068
Somdevara II (Bhuvanaskamalla)	1068—1076
Vikramāditya VI (Vikramāśka Tribhuvanasmalla Permañ)	1076—1127
Somdevara III (Bhulokamalla)	1127—1136
Perma—Jagad kamalla II	1136—1151
Talla III
Tallapa, Trailokyasmalla	1151—1163
(Kalachurya usurpation
Talla III ruled over only a part of his kingdom till 1163 A.D.)	1166—1183
JagadKamalla III	1163—1181
Somdevara IV (Tribhuvanasmalla etc.)	1181—65
He ruled at different times and places	—Circa 1220

namo Tribhuvanainalla Deva without any indication of the ruling king—refers apparently to the same Chola king when it refers in its historical introduction to king Ahavamalla (i.e. Somesvara I) slaying with invincible courage the warlike Chola. This is confirmed by an inscription at Annigeri in Dhārwar which states that the wicked Chōla (Rājādhiraja), who had abandoned the religious observance of his family penetrated the Belvola country and burnt the Jain temples erected there (by the Ganga king) Ganga Perinādi, but that he eventually yielded his head to (the Chalukya king) Somesvara in battle and forfeited his life. (Fleet Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, 441) On the other hand as we have seen above a Chālukya inscription in Mysore (EC VII Shikarpur 118) dated in 1031 A D—within two years after the battle—states that the Chohika (or Chola king) valiantly fell on the battle field (The actual words used are thacāṅganadol Chōlikan ammi Sattan See EC VII Text No 118, page 157) It is interesting to note that this inscription records the founding of a temple by Sōvi Setti the Vaddavayarahāri or senior merchant of Baligami and the setting up of a linga in the name of the king—at Baligami the capital of the Banavāsī province—which he called by the name of Abhinava Sōmesvara Dēva and endowed it with lands for conducting the daily worship.

In the above quoted inscription, there are references to the warfare carried on by Sōmesvara I against other kings north and south such as the Kallingas Pāṇchālas Magadhas, Mālavas Keralas and the Nepālas. The Seven Mālavas the Seven Konkannas and the Seven Males are also referred to as having been conquered by him. But these seem poetical exaggerations the more so as several of these exploits are mentioned in connection with some of his predecessors as well.

fight with the Chola Rāja and as being a destroying fire to the Chōlas. Taila as king is represented by a few lithic inscriptions in this State. Channagiri 7 dated in Saka 914, cyclic year Vandana or A D 992, is of his reign. It is a rīrakal badly defaced (EC VII) Shikarpur 170 (EC VII) dated in Saka 919 or A D 997 refers to Banavāsi and other provinces in Mysore being under the rule of Bhīmarasa. Davangere 114 dated in Saka 914 or A D 992 is also of his reign (EC XI). It refers to the rule of Kadambalige under Jatarasa the Sinda chief. Besides the provinces of Banavāsi and Kadambalige in the present Mysore State Taila II seems to have ruled over Kogali 500 and the adjoining country forming the present Adoni Taluk of Bellary District. In Taila's time Āryavarman was its governor (VER 1904 Para 17 also see Appendix No 81 of 1904 dated in A D 987-988). Ādityavarman took his place in 992-993 A D (ibid No 86 of 1904) probably Ādityavarman preceded him in the governorship of Banavāsi as he is in this inscription (ibid No 86 of 1904) called Lord of Banavāsi. This Ādityavarman was apparently a scion of the Kadamba family who had taken service under the Chālukyas (ibid). Taila should have been an active and ambitious sovereign. He not only recovered the dominions of his forefathers in Mysore but also Lāta (Southern Gujarāt) whose ruler Bairappa was directed by him to attack Mula Rāja, above named. A good part of Taila's time was taken up in fighting Munja the Paramara Rāja of Dhara, who professes to have won six victories over him. But on the seventh occasion, Munja who had crossed the Gōdāvari, was defeated, captured and eventually put to death. This happened about 995 A D (EI : 222-228 Fleet Dynasties of Kanarese Districts in Bombay Gazetteer I ii 482, Bhandarkar Early History of Dekkan ibid 214).

the following year describes him in eulogistic terms as lord of Banavāsī pura a brave at the Courts of three kings, making sport of Konkana a wild fire to Kanagile vāda thruster aside of Kannama, Bhavavalla Deva's Hanuman Jagadaka dani, etc. The splendour of his elephants and horses moved to jealousy it is remarked the Gurjara Chera Chola and other kings. He erected in 1017 A.D. the fine monolithic pillar called the Ganda bherunda at Balagauri which has an inscription at its base. The pillar has mounted on it the image of Bhārunda-vara in human form with double eagle's head (See Chapter V ante, Sculpture and Painting). He himself is called (in Shikarpur 120 dated in 1018 A.D.) Gandubhērunda and a bhērunda pole, perhaps the length of the pillar was (as suggested by Mr. Rice) established as a measure for land. Chamunda Rava—also apparently called Chāmunda Nayaka—was acting as ruler of Banavāsī in 1003 A.D. (Shikarpur 83).

Sōmēśvara's son by the Pallava wife is referred to in lithic records found at Hogali and in the Mysore State. In Honnali 107 and 119 dated in 1018 and 1054 A.D. we have mention of Trailokyamalla Nanni Nolamba Pallava Perumanadi Deva as Governor of Hogali 500 and other Provinces. In these two inscriptions he is described as 'Pallavanvaya, boon lord of Kanchipura, and 'glory of the Pallava kula'. In the inscriptions found at Hogali and near about, he is described as ruling over that and other Provinces. In a record dated in 1055 A.D., is mentioned a gift by a Jaina teacher to a basti built by Durvinīta. The basti referred to is the one at Hogali itself, where the slab is found. The Durvinīta referred to was possibly the Ganga king of that name. (M.E.R. 1901 Para 17 Appendix B Nos 93 64 and 65 of 1904). An inscription dated in Saka 988 (A.D. 1061) and not Saka 903 as stated in M.E.R. 1920 Appendix B No 710 at Kanchagara Belagalla in Bellary District, this mentioned first in inscriptions of his 22nd year corresponding to A D 1007 1008. The defeat of Satvāśraya and the conquest of the Western Chālnukya dominions should therefore have taken place in or about A D 1007 1008. An inscription of Satvāśraya at Hottur in the Dharwār district dated in A D 1007 1008 of which Sir John Fleet has given an abstract in the Bombay Gazetteer i. ii 433, admits that the Chōla king called Narmadī Chōla collecting a force numbering 900 000

pillaged the whole country, slaughtered the women, the children and the Brāhmins and took the girls to wife destroyed their caste. Apparently there had been a great fall since the Pallava days in the observation of the laws of warfare set down by Vāman. However that be, Western Chālnukya power was not established again in Nolambavādi until the accession in 1018 A D of Jagadkainalla Jayasimha, or a few years earlier. Jayasimha's inscriptions have been found at Bāgali and Anrūgōdī. One at the former place is dated in 1018 A D and another in 1035 1036 A D one at Anrūgōdī is dated in 1027 8 A D and another in 1030 1031 A D. The Chōla king Rājendra Chōla son of Rājaraṣa I claims to have overcome Jayasimha and to have conquered his dominions, while Jayasimha calls himself 'the lion of the elephant Rājendra Chōla' (See M E R Para 17 Appendix B Inscriptions Nos. 37 64 65 93 and 87). Satvāśraya was probably Jain by religion for his Guru is said to have been the Jain teacher Vimalachandra whose death by Sanyāsana is recorded in E C VI Mudgere 11. He seems to have had a daughter named Pampā Dēvi (by his wife Ambikā Dēvi) who is referred to in an inscription dated in Saka 919 or A D 997 in which the king is referred to as Chālnukya Permānadi, which must have been one of his titles (E C IV Hassanr 50). She is said to have been married to the Pallava King Iriva Nalambādhirāja (Fleet Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts 428). Whether

A.D.) in the Gudihaḥ inscription (M.E.R. 1919 Appendix B No. 278 dated in 1065 A.D.), and in the Harkanal inscription dated in 1066 A.D., all above referred to, he is spoken of without any mention of his relationship as son while in the last of these he is termed a worshipper of the lotus feet of Somēśvara I. It has been suggested that he was not a son of Somēśvara as suggested by Sir John Fleet but only an Eastern Chālukya prince in the service of the Western Chālukyas (M.E.R. 1925 Part II Para 3). In support of this inference it has been stated that Bilhana in his Vikramāditya Churita has mentioned only three sons of Somēśvara I and has omitted all reference to this Vijayāditya his alleged fourth son and that there are not wanting instances where subordinates and kinsmen have called themselves sons of kings. (E.I. V 26 E.C. \ Kolar 102.) It is quite possible that Vijayāditya was a favourite and successful general of Somēśvara and perhaps, was treated with special honours. He may have been connected chiefly with the Eastern Chālukyas, who were at the time under the nominal suzerainty of the Cholas. But it must at the same time, be confessed that the relationship of son so specifically and repeatedly mentioned in certain of the inscriptions quoted above seems to leave the impression that he was actually another son of Somēśvara I and that he greatly distinguished himself in war and was specially honoured by his father for his services. Vijayāditya a mahāsamanādhīpatiḥ Dandanāyaka Dēvapayya is mentioned in the Harkanhol inscription and in Davangere 11, dated 1066 A.D., where he is described as the Dandanāyaka for peace and war. Another feudatory of Somēśvara was Gandarādityorasa who is described as lord of Mahāśmatipura and ruler of Madhyadēsa, in charge of Sindovādi 1000 and other provinces in 1047 A.D. (M.E.R. 1920 Appendix B 1919 No 711)

he sent for his son in law who expended the money on it and restored the work of merit (E C VII 287) The other inscription referring to Kanda Raja (E C VII 307 dated in 1016 A D) quotes an oft recurring text — By these two (classes of) men only is the disc of the sun burst through the sanyāsi absorbed in yoga and he who dies facing the foe in battle In another inscription dated in 1017 A D Kundamarasa is described as a Mari to the Tivulas and Sattigas hatta i.e. death to the Tigulas (or Chūlas) and maintainer of the obstinacy (obstinate enmity) of his father Satyāśraya towards them (E C VII Shikarpur 285) In Shikarpur 125 of 1019 A D he is also called Sattiga's Chattani or Satyāśraya a chief man or principal agent (E C VII)

Dasavarma the younger brother of Satyāśraya does not appear to have ruled His wife was Bhagvavati (E C XI Davangere 1) or Bhagala Dēvi Dasavarma.

Dasavarma's son was Vikrama or Vikramaditya V surnamed Tribhuvanamalla According to Davangere I he was called Vikrama because he was 'possessed of a character for valour (Vikrama) This inscription also states that he succeeded his uncle (Jyēshtha pitrī) on the Chalukya throne Vikramāditya V
Vikrama
Tribhuvana
malla,
1007-1018 A.D.

The circumstances under which Satyāśraya's own son Kundamarasa above named who seems to have spent his whole life time as governor of Banavāsī and other provinces in Mysore did not succeed to the throne, seems nowhere explained in the extant inscriptions. Even Davangere I which contains the longest genealogy of the entire dynasty from the early Chalukyas does not mention more than that Vikramaditya succeeded his most noble uncle Probably he was too close to his uncle to be brushed aside easily more especially as His supersession of Kundamarasa.

a true servant in war in revenue accounts in sport in accomplishments and was liked as much by subjects as by foreigners. He was governor of Banavāsi in 1066 A.D. (Shikarpur 10) and was still occupying that post in 1068 A.D. (Shikarpur 136). Chamundaraya was another. Though Somesvara was probably at first a Jain by religion, he seems to have been later a Saivite. Some at least of Somesvara's wives were either of the Saivite or Vaiṣṇavite persuasion. According to Sravana Belgola 67, dated in 1129 A.D., Swāmi a Jaina teacher is said to have been honoured with the title of Sabda Chatur mukha by him at his Court. Buddhism also appears to have claimed some adherents at the time. In fact it seems to have been still flourishing as a living religion in Banavāsi. Somesvara's great minister Dandanayaka Rupahattaya, who was in charge of the principal taxes and the eighteen agrahāras, we are told in Shikarpur 170 dated in 1065 A.D., a lithic inscription still to be seen at Baligami established the Jayanti Banddha Vihara at that place and made grants for it and for the worship of Tārā Bhāgavatī and of the gods Kṛṣṇa Lokeshvara and Banddha-Deva with all their attendant gods and for distribution of food to the Yoginis Kusalis (both apparently women) and sanyāsīs. The site of this Vihāra is still pointed out and the image of Tārā Bhāgavatī is still to be found at the place though somewhat mutilated. (See ante Chapter V Sculpture and Painting for description etc., of same). The image of Tārā Bhāgavatī appears to have been made, according to Shikarpur 160 dated in 1067 A.D. by Nāgīyakka wife of the Nād pergade, Sahavasi Hampa Chatti. She is described as belonging to the Bappura family no doubt the same, as suggested by Mr. Rice, as the Batpura family from which the Chālukya Pulakṣi obtained his wife in 550 A.D. and the Adimahā Bappūra Vamsa to which Satyākaraya Dhruva Indravarma the Chālukya governor at Rūvatidvīpa sister of Vikramāditya V (ibid 332) The Gonahaln inscription above referred to, gives the name of this princess as Vriddimahbarasi. The relationship suggests that the Western Chalukyas strengthened their hold on Nolambavadi by marital alliances (M.E.R. 1023 Para 22) Vikramāditya is also mentioned as the ruling sovereign in Sorab 381, dated in about 1010 A.D. and in Sorab 471 dated in 1012 A.D. In the former Senavarasa is said to be governing the Banavasi 12 000 and in the latter Chattya Deva is represented as its governor.

Ayyana II, also called Ayyanavya Kshitisvara next ascended the throne. It has been suggested that he would not have been called Kshitisvara unless he had actually ruled (V.F.R. 1925 Para 3). His name appears in the list of Chalukyan kings given by eight different inscriptions (e.g. Shikarpur 130 dated 1075 A.D. See I.A.L. VII 287). He is also referred to in an inscription of Vikramāditya VI found at Halyam in the Kudligi Taluk of Bellary District (V.E.R. 1925, Appendix B No 310). It is by a slip referred to as No 315 in the Report proper (Part II Para 3). No epigraphs, however, that are directly referable to his reign have yet been found. This fact has been accounted for by supposing that his rule might have been a short and an uneventful one. This suggestion necessarily rules out the inference that he did not reign at all. (Fleet loc cit 435)

Ayyana II
1014 A.D.

Jayasimha II surnamed Jagadekamalla, brother of Vikramāditya V is better known as a ruler. Sir John Fleet has noticed the Mirāj copper plate grant of his time (J.A. VIII 10 23). The Bangalore Museum Plates of Viru-Nolamba Chakravarti (of Chalukya-kula) dated in Saka 906 has been assigned by Mr. Rice to this king as he had that title. Saka 906 Tārana, the alleged date of the grant is a mistake for Saka 906 Tārana.

Jayasimha II
Jagadeka
malla.
1018-1042 A.D.

called Hoyasala Deva. If Vishnuvardhana Vijayaditya who is styled the lord of Vengi, was really another of his sons, as suggested by Sir John Elliot (see above) he would be his fourth son. As we have seen above he was ruling over Nolambavadi 32 000. In 1063 and 1065 A.D. he was still occupying that position (E.C. VII Sira 18 and Davangere III) with the seat of his government at Hampi (E.C. VI Molakalmuru 29). His second son Vikramāditya, who is given all the Ganga titles was ruling in Balligavo as Viceroy in 1058 A.D. over the Banavasi, Sántaligo and Nolambavadi provinces and had his residence at Balligavo (Shikarpur 93). Two years later he was ruling over Gangavadi (Shikarpur 152 152 and Davangere 140).

Sōmēśvara I was succeeded by his eldest son Somēśvara II surnamed Bhuvanaikamalla. The exact date of his accession is given in Shikarpur 130 as Salā 990 cycle year Kilaka 7th day of Vaisakha Suddha under the star Ijya (Pushya) on Friday, the sun being fully in the sign of Cancer corresponding to 11th April 1068. From this it follows that he assumed the throne fourteen days after his father's tragic death. There are inscriptions of his reign in the State dating from 1068 A.D. the first year of his reign, to 1076 A.D. which is his last year (E.C. VIII Sorab 315). These inscriptions are mostly to be found in Sorab and Shikarpur Taluks. An inscription of his dated in 1068-1069 A.D. Kilaka the year of his accession, has been found at Chinna Tumbalam in the Bellary District (M.E.R. 1916 Part II Para 41). Another of the same year has been found at Bāgalī in the same District (M.E.R. 1904 Pages 9-10 See No. 103 of 1904). He was a Ganga on his mother's side and had as minister the powerful Ganga prince Udayāditya as also Lakshma, who was a trusted servant of his father. Immediately on his ascending the

Somēśvara
(Bhuvanaikamalla)
1068-1076 A.D.

This probably refers to Udayāditya who was in charge of Nolambavādi 92 000, Kadambalige 1 000 and other Provinces in Saka 955 and 959 or A.D. 1031 and 1037. In 1032 A.D. Jayasimha was enjoying sports at Ptagiri identified with Yātagiri in the Nizams Dominions. (E.C. VII Shikarpor 20a) In 1036 A.D., he was according to Shikarpor 126 (F.C. VII) at Pottalakere identified with Dannāyakannakere in the Bellary District. Two inscriptions of the same year have been found at Oravavi in the Bellary Taluk. In these also he is represented as ruling from (his temporary head-quarters) Pottalakere (M.F.R. 1914 Appendix B Nos. 200 and 201). These two inscriptions seem to be identical in character and record that one Udayādityadeva of the Pallava lineage the lord of Kāncīpura as he is called made a grant to three Brāhmins who had placed the limbs of Nalamba Mahādēvi in the Ganges. Apparently they had carried her bones to Benares and thrown them there in the Ganges thus evidencing to the ancient character of this custom still in vogue. Evidently this queen Nalamba Mahādēvi, who died in Saka 958 Dhātri (A.D. 1036-1037) was the mother of Devalamahādēvi queen of Jayasimha II. Sir John Fleet mentions only one queen of Jayasimha II viz, Soggaladēvi, who is supposed to have converted the king from Jainism to the Saiva faith. While at Pottalakere a grant was made by Jayasimha (Shikarpor 126) to Vādi Rodraganna (or Lakulīśvara Pandita) for repairs to the famous temple of Panchalinga at Balhigavi (E.C. VII Shikarpor 126). He apparently belonged to the Kālā moksha sect of the Pāsupata school whose original founder Lakulīśa has been referred to the 1st Century A.D. (J.Bo. R.A.S. XXII 152 J.R.A.S. 1907 419). The grant was for carrying out worship and for food and cloths for the students and ascetics free of all taxes. The chief Udayāditya of the Pallava family referred to above,

Ganga Mandalika, undoubtedly the trusted servant as he is called Udayāditya. (Shikarpur 136) Udayāditya continued as governor of Gangavadi Banavasi and Santalige provinces from 1070 A.D to 1075 A.D and had the seat of his government at Baligami (Shikarpur 109 and 130) Somēśvara himself had his chief residence at Bankāpur (Shikarpur 129, 128) His brother Jayasimha was in A.D 1068 governing the Kogali 500 which means the greater part of modern Bellary District (M.E.R 1901 Appendix No 103 of 1901) That he was also governing a good part of North West Mysore as well is established by his Jatinga Rāmesvara inscription (E.I IV 214) About 1068 A.D he also seems to have been ruling over the Nolambavadi 32 000 and the Sindavadi 1,000 with his capital at Hampali (M.E.R 1916, Part II, Para 41) He is called in this inscription Nolamba Pallava Permadi-Jayasimha Deva while Shikarpur 136 gives for him the very shortened name of Singa Even in 1072 and 1074 A.D, he was still ruling over Nolambavadi (Fleet, Bombay Gazetteer i ii 443 and E.C VI Chitaldrug 82) Of Udayāditya, we have a few interesting particulars in one or two inscriptions. One of the earliest inscriptions referring to him is Davangere 70 dated in 1035 A.D in the reign of Jayasimha II where he is styled an ornament of Pallava kula and boon lord of Kānchipura. Davangere 11 dated in 1066 A.D, however mentions a Udayāditya Nāyaka, who probably was quite another person as no titles are given him in it. But there is no doubt whatever that the Dandanāyaka and senior minister Udayāditya mentioned as ruling over Banavasi nād in Sorab 274 dated in 1070 A.D and Sorab 299 and Nagar 30, both dated in 1074 A.D is identical with this Mahāsamanta Udayāditya. According to Shikarpur 109, dated in 1070 A.D he was a Ganga prince of royal blood who is described as mahārājādhirāja paramēśvara boon lord of Kūlālapura, lord of Nandagiri assigns it tentatively Sorab 557, dated in 1040 A D., also records a grant in Jayasimha's reign but the name of the ruler of Banavāsī referred to in it cannot be read out In 1042 A D, we have notices of certain Chōla chiefs connected with Iṅgōla-Dēva ruling as feudatories under Jayasimha in the north of the present Sina Taluk (E C XII Sina 40, 37 and 25) About the same time, we have in Davangere 159, which is much defaced, Chālukya-Ganga-Permānadī ruling over Nolambavādī 36,000 and some Nāyaka governing Kadambalige With this we reach the last year of Jayasimha's twenty-four years' reign He was originally a Jain like his forbears and honoured Jain teachers In Sravana Belgola 67, dated in 1129 A D, we have mention made of the Jain saint Vādnāja, who is said to have acquired fame in the Chālukya capital and to have been honoured by Jayasimha II In Sravana Belgola 69, which might be assigned to about 1100 A D, a Mallikāmōda Santīsa is referred to as a god at whose feet Gunachandra worshipped. This god must have been set up by or after Jayasimha II, whose title was Mallikamōda. (M A R 1916, pages 46-47)

Sōmēsvara I, Trailōkya-
malla,
Āhavamalla
1042-1068

Jayasimha's son, Sōmēsvara I, next came to the throne He was crowned king in Saka 966, cyclic year Tāriana, or A D 1044-1045 At the time of his accession, he was apparently ruler of Pottalakere and a grant was made by a chief named Pallarasa, a subordinate of Udayāditya to mark the happy occasion Sōmēsvara I seems to have been better known by the name of Trailokyamalla Nannī-Nolambādhnāja or Trailōkyamalla simply and Āhavamalla Shikarpur 110 suggests that he was known by the latter title because he was "the celebrated master of victory won in war" (āhava) His chief queen was Mailaladēvi, who appears to have visited Srīsaila in A D 1058-1059 and to have made gifts in the

to the god Ramesvara of agrahāra Bhattara Poovar. The grant in the case consisted of the proceeds of the tax on marriage pandals of Lppattu Vokkolu (or seventy families) and on looking glasses of the dancing girls, which throws some light on the sources of revenue about the middle of the 11th century A D (Shikarpur 29). About 1075 Udayaditya was still in high favour as head jewel of chieftains and mahārājadhīraja Paramesvara. He obtained a grant in that year for a new Jain basadi erected at Bahgāmi (Shikarpur 221). In the same year the Mandali 1 000 and the eighteen agraharas were added to his charge (Shikarpur 130). In 1075 A D he is spoken of in even more complimentary language and is said to have spoken and moved away the neighbouring Chera Chola Pāndya Pallava and other kings from whom he is said to have taken tribute. He is also said to have extended his territory as far as the four oceans and accomplished the desire to be a great conqueror. Whatever his success over other kings, it might perhaps be conceded that he should have done something effective to check the Chola aggression which reared its head once again at the onset of the reign of Somēsvara II.

Another equally important functionary at the court of Somēsvara II was Lakshmana already mentioned. He had seen service as we have seen under Somēsvara's father and as such is described as having belonged to two reigns in both of which he had won high praise. In Shikarpur 136 we see him as the chief mayor of the palace. He was given the full and dignified rank of coming next after those of royal blood. Many exploits are attributed to him—the treading down of Konkan the driving back of the seven Konkanas and the uprooting of the seven Malū—hint these seem poetical exaggerations as they are seen attributed to most of the Chālukya kings. He is called Rājadandagūpāla and as being feared by the own shoulders and broad chest, and killed the mandalika Sōkan and other princes and caused Āhavamalla to plunge into the Western Ocean, capturing seventy-five elephants of the bhadra species including Sattarubhayankara and Karābattīra, camels and his queens. The immediate cause of the war seems to have been a predatory Chōla raid. In 1039 A D, the Chōlas, under Rājādhirāja, are said to have burnt Kampili, identified with Kampili in Bellary District, the provincial capital, of the Chālukyas. To avenge this, a war seems to have commenced. This occurred while Jayasīma II was still on the Chālukya throne. On the accession of Sōmēsvara I, about 1042 A D, he was exposed to a formidable invasion by the Chōlas in which they burnt Pulikesa Nagar (Lakshmēsvara in Dhārwā District) and destroyed its ancient Jain temples. That Sōmēsvara I was also taking retaliatory measures is borne out by the fact that Vishnuvardhana Vijayāditya who was in charge of Kogali 500, and other adjacent provinces and Kadambalige 1000 was, in Saka 987 (A D 1065), encamped at Arasiyakere on his way to the conquest of the south under the orders of the king (M E R 1919 Appendix B No 278 of 1918). Another inscription dated in Saka 986 (A D 1064) states that Vishnuvardhana was ruling Nolambavādi 32,000. He is here given the titles of Āhavamalla-nankikara, Vēṅgimandalēsvara and Chālukya Mānikya (Ibid Appendix B No 286 of 1918). Uchchangidurga in Harpanhalli Taluk was the capital of Nolambavādi 32,000 at the time and was the seat of the Pāndya feudatories of the later Western Chālukyas. It must have been a powerful stronghold, for a mutilated lithic inscription lying down to its north (ibid No 284 of 1918), states that it withstood attack for 12 years (?) and finally fell into the hands of one Mādava of the Yādava family and a Sāmanta of Ballāla (i.e. Chālukya king). Rudrabhatta, the author of Jagannātha Vijaya, inscriptions of this period. Several teachers of note are also referred to in them, some of them being represented as founders of temples dedicated to the worship of Siva. Among these the foremost was the great Rajoguru Sarvēśvara Sakti Dēva who is referred to in E C VIII Sorab 278 dated in 1070 A D. He is styled Ekkatīsamoya Chakravartī priest of seventy seven temples Sarvēśvara Sakti Deva and is described as ruling in peace the kingdom of penance (tapo rūjyam). He belonged to the famous agrahāra of Kuppattur and was the head of the Ananta kūtī bhuvanēśa temple. A grant in his favour is recorded in the above quoted inscription and it is stated that the grant was made by Dandanāyaka Udayaditya in the presence of the Emperor Sōmēśvara. Sōmēśvara also gifted for the decorations of the God for the great illuminating and the great ceremonies vessels cloths and a village and directed that the 1000 (Brāhmanas) and Udayāditya should maintain them. Another was Lōkanātha Pandita who is mentioned in Sorab 249 dated in 1065 A D. He also belonged to Kuppattur and was, according to it, a devotee of the lotus feet of Hara, proficient in logic politics, dramas music and the arts. Ono Chandrabhūshana Pandita is also mentioned. He appears to have been well versed in logic and other sciences. (M.E.R. 1916 Part II Para 41). A grant is also recorded in favour of a certain Nārāyanadeva for vidyadāna i.e., for imparting education which seems to have been held in high esteem (ibid). A grant is made to one Purnānanda bhuttāraka the chief priest of Balagāmi in 1075 (Shikarpur 130).

Sōmēśvara II is mentioned in Chōla inscriptions as having been defeated by Virarājendra driven out of the Kannada country and deprived of his dignity as heir apparent which was conferred on his younger brother Vikramāditya VI, as the latter had in the meanwhile,

Sōmēśvara dethroned
ment.

miles east by south of Kolhāpur, where there is a well-known temple of "Koppēsvara" on the "great river" or Krishna (Fleet, E I XII 298) Sir John Fleet is, however, wrong in dating the battle "shortly before the 20th January 1060" (Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, 441) Kielhorn has determined it as 1052 A D. It was apparently a decisive battle. After that we do not hear for a time of Chōla attempts against Sōmēsvara I, who is described in Shikarpur 167, dated in 1067, A D, as ruling "free from all enemies as far as the elephants at the points of the compass." This inference seems safe, despite the boast of Rājēndia Dēva that though his brother lay dead on the field at this battle, he himself was severely wounded and several of his principal leaders were lost, he continued to slay many of the Chālukya princes and made Āhavamalla flee in terror (E C IX Bangalore 108, E C. X Mulbagal 107 dated in 1057 A D, and E C X Kolār 107, dated in 1054 A D). This would mean that the reverses sustained in 1046 A D. were made good six years later in 1052 A D, by one of the same generals who had lost the day previously and was consequently put in charge of Nolambavādī 32,000 with enhanced territory, powers, and even titles. Bearing this in mind, it is possible to understand the titles of Āhavamalla-Nankara and Chālukya Mānikya assumed by Vijayāditya in the inscription mentioned in M E R 1919 (Appendix B No 286) above referred to. If the identification of this battle where Vijayāditya won such a signal victory over the Chōlas is correct, then the credit that has been usually allowed to Sōmēsvara for it should be shared by him with his able general Rājādhirāja, as mentioned in Shikarpur 118, dated in 1054 A D "fell in the middle of the battle exhausted in valour and died." Sorab 325 (E C XIII), an inscription assigned by Mr Rice to 1178 A D but is more correctly to be referred to A D 1118—the source of the error being the mere signal service he had thus rendered to the ruling king. It is probably the revolt of his brother Vikrama referred to by Bilhana in his poem and narrated at some length below. It is probably also this revolt that induced Sōmesvara II to leave the home or northern provinces with Kalyana as capital to his brother Vikrama and himself to settle down at Bankāpur. However this may be an epigraphic record dated in 1098 A.D. found at Gadag states that after Sōmesvara II had enjoyed the sovereignty for a time he became intoxicated with pride and neglected the sufferings of his subjects, whereupon Vikramaditya being virtuously minded punished or confined him and became king. Another inscription found at the temple of Kalinga at Kalige in the Nizām's Dominions adds that Vikramaditya by the strength of his own arm seized in battle the sovereignty of Sōmesvara while it was still of no long duration and made himself emperor (Fleet Bombay Gazetteer I ii 444). As these particulars are mentioned in inscriptions of Vikramāditya dated in his own reign they may be taken to represent his version of the dispute whatever it was between the two brothers. Seeing that Vikramaditya quarrelled in turn with his younger brother Jayasimha we may not be far wrong if we inferred that he might have been as much at fault as his brother Sōmesvara in the dissensions that arose between them. What became ultimately of Sōmesvara is not known. Perhaps he died in prison. In the absence of direct evidence on the point, it is difficult to state how long this dispute lasted between the brothers though from the Kalinga inscription it is inferable that it started early in life. But Bilhana's narrative seems clearly to refer to two different incidents, one which ended with his giving up the pursuit of his two brothers Vikrama and Jayasimha and another which ended in his capture and imprisonment. While the former might have ended from his being driven from

The Sāntara kings seem to have acknowledged Sōmēśvara's suzerainty (See E C VIII Nagar 47, dated in 1062 A D) Vīra-Sāntara-Dēva is said to have freed Sāntalige 1000 from those who had no claim to it and made them powerless and being free from all troubles, was ruling in his own capital, Pombuchcha. Apparently the Sāntara country had been made part of the Chālukya dominions some years before, for we see two Chālukya princes, Bijjarasa and Gōna Rāja, ruling over it in 1042 A.D. (E C VIII Sagar 109 bis) The Sāntaras seem to have regained their territories about 1062 A D , though subject to the suzerainty of the Chālukyas as indicated in Nagar 47. Vīra Sāntara was probably the chief who won back his ancestors' kingdom. He seems to have built many Jain temples. His wife Chāgala Dēvi also built a temple, dedicated a basadi in her own name—Chāgalēśvara—and performed the mahādāna, and gave many gifts to Brāhmans, virgins, gold, etc. She was evidently far famed for her liberality. Through her, apparently, her mother Arasikabbe also rose to fame. Vīra Sāntara's mahapradhāna was Brahmādhruāja Kālidāsa. (Nagar 47)

About his rule over his several provinces, there is, however, something to be said. Among these were Banavāsī and Sāntalige, Kadambalige, Nolambavādī 32,000, Kogalī and Sindavādī, etc. Banavāsī and Sāntalige were under a governor in 1046 A D., who is called the "guardian of Kollipāke," which is termed as before mentioned, "the door of the south." The governor, in 1046, A.D., was Singanna Dēvarasa, who is styled mahimandalēśvara of these provinces and of the country as far as the western ocean. He repaired the temple of the goddess Bhagavatī Balliyabbe near Baligāmi and endowed it. (Shikarpur 323) In the same year, Chāmunda-rāyarasa was appointed governor of Banavāsī and other provinces as well (Shikarpur 160) An inscription of his younger brother Jayasimha III who he considered could not be safely left near the king. Somavara sent forces in pursuit to bring the brothers back. But he was unsuccessful and at last desisted from the attempt. Vikramaditya went on to the Tungabhadra from where he had gained so many important victories chiefly against the Cholas and other powers south of the Tungabhadra that his brother moved by jealousy sent forces into the Banavasi country (Shimoga district) to seize him but Vikrama destroyed them. He seems however to have taken the precaution of strengthening himself by alliances for he married his daughter to Jayasimha king of the Kadambas whose capital was then at Goa and formed a friendship with his former enemy the Chola Raja receiving a Chola princess in marriage. This Chola king has been indentified with Rajakesarivarman otherwise known as Virajajendraditya I (c. 1111-1131-1132). The Chola king died soon after and his kingdom was thrown into a state of anarchy. On hearing this Vikrama, who was still tarrying on the Tungabhadra at once started for the south in order to place his wife's brother (probably Adhirajendraditya alias Parakesarivarman V.E.R. 1692 Page 5) on the throne. He entered Kanchi and put down the rebels there then he did the same at Gangakundla (Gangaikondacholapuram in the north east of Trichinopoly District) and re-established the Chola power. But not long after his return he learned that his brother in law had lost his life in a fresh rebellion and that Rajsaga the lord of Vengi had taken possession of the throne of Kanchi. This Raja was probably the Eastern Chalukya king Kulothunga Chola deva I whose original appellation was Rajendra Chola. (Fleet Ibid 443). Vikrama at once prepared to march himself against the usurper but the latter opened negotiations with Somavara who, thinking a favourable opportunity had offered itself for the prince's wife is mentioned as Dharevala Dēvi, who is represented in it as making gifts to certain Vishnu temples

As to Nolambavādi 32,000, it is stated in an inscription at Halkanhal, Bellary District, dated in Saka 988 (A D 1066) that it was under the governorship of Vishnuvardhana Mahārāja Vijayādityadēva. (M E.R. 1925 Appendix B, 322). He was evidently the same general mentioned in Dēvanhalli 75 and M E.R. 1919, Appendix B, No 278, who retrieved the Chālukya fortunes at the battle of Koppam (see above). He must also be the Vishnuvardhana Mahārāja Vijayāditya mentioned in Channagiri 18, dated in 1063 A D (E C VII). In this inscription, the fact is mentioned that he had made an expedition to the south and was in camp at Mudukakere, when he sanctioned a grant in favour of the Mallikārjuna temple there. In some inscriptions he is specially termed "Āhavamalla's warrior," etc (See Davangere 11, dated in 1066 A D). In this latter inscription, he is called the plunderer of foreign countries, a rampart to the camp, a sun of heroism and the piercer of the hearts of hostile king's sons. He is described in the Halkanhal inscription as Vēngimandalēsvara or lord of Vēngi, which would show prima facie that he was either an Eastern Chālukyan prince or had some control or dominion over that province. In Molakalmuru 29, dated in Saka 986, cyclic year Krōdhi 1064 A D, he is designated "Sri Trailōkyamalla-Chakravartīya magam" i.e., son of the Emperor Trailōkyamalla. In Davangere 11, dated in 1066 A D, he is again called "his son" (tan nandanam) and entitled "Chālukya ruby." In this inscription, he is also called "his father's garland" (ayyana dande) and "warder" (dandi). Sir John Fleet also refers to two other inscriptions of this local chief in which he is described as the son (tanaya, nandana) of Trailōkyamalla, while in Devanhalli 75 (dated in 1046 large army advanced to the Krishna Vikrama being forced in self defence to take the field against him a battle was fought in which Jayasinha was defeated and taken prisoner. The remainder of Vikrama's reign seems to have been peaceful with the exception of an expedition in 1081 A D against Kunchi and the Pallavas and one north of the Narmada in 1083 A D. But towards the close he was invaded by the Hoysala king who was driven back by his general, Achyuta Dēva. In his celebrated law book the Mitākshara Vijnanesvara who lived at Kalyana at this period says 'There has not been there is not and there will not be on the surface of the earth a city like Kalyāna and never was a monarch like the prosperous Vikramarka seen or heard of' (Bhandarkar Early History of the Dehkan)

Such is the story told from literary and other works of Vikramāditya VI. We may now turn to the evidence afforded by the inscriptions copper plate and lithic of his period. There are numerous lithic inscriptions referring to him in the Chitaldrug Shimoga Kadur and Hassan districts. In the first two of the districts mentioned his governors were administering the provinces that formed part of the Chālnkya empire of his time while in the Kadur and Hassan districts the inscriptions mention him only as the overlord of the ruling Hoysala kings. Of the numerous inscriptions belonging to his reign in these districts the name commonly given to him is Tribhuvanamalla. In only one inscription occurring in the Shimoga district he is called by the name of Vikramāditya-Dēva (E O VIII, Sorab 442 which might be assigned to about A D 1100). In another undated inscription not assignable to about 1106 A.D. occurring in the Hassan district he is mentioned as Tribhuvanamalla Chālukya Vikrama. (E O V Channarayana 169). In an inscription occurring in the Tumkur district (E O XII

Story of his reign

Sindavādi seems to have formed one of the Eastern provinces of the Western Chālukya Empire. A part of it was modern Adōni and the adjoining country, forming a sub-division, as it were, of 500 villages in Sindavādi Viśhaya 1000. The capital of this Kogali 500 as it was called, is stated to have been Tumbalum, a village about 8 miles due west of Adōni, which is still full of ancient remains. Nolamba-Pallava Permādi, already named, (see also M E R 1916, Part II, Para 40) was its governor in 1054 A D (M E R 1916, Appendix B 1915, No 489). According to two inscriptions, dated in 1052 A D and 1054 A D, his proper name seems to have been Vīra-Nolamba Ghattidēva (ibid and No 561). In 1044 A D before his success in the Chōla war, he appears to have been ruling over the districts of Kadambalige 1000, Kogali, 500 etc. (M E R 1919, Para 30).

In 1051 A D, according to Holalkere 65, (E C. XI) Sōmēsvara appears to have visited Bandanikke, and in 1054 A D. (M E R 1916, Appendix B No 561) to have been at Kampili, the capital of the Sindavādi province on the Tungabhadra and to have made gifts to shrines there. Another of his provincial capitals was at Koluva (M E R 1924, Para II, Para 5, inscription dated 1058-1059 A D.) Among the other feudatories of Sōmēsvara was Kateya Nāgayarasa of the Mayūra-varma family ruling over Kadambalige 1,000 in 1052 A.D.

Sōmēsvara I seems to have been, judging from the inscriptions of his reign, both an energetic and a warlike prince. His struggle against the Chōlas appears to have been both steady and manly and bore fruit. He seems to have been well served both by his sons and by his generals, of whom Vijayāditya was, perhaps, the greatest. He had also a notable master of the robes in Lakshma or Lakshmana, to whom he is said to have given rank next to the royal princes, and entrusted him with the government of the Banavāsi province. He is said to have been the Saka and Chalukya Vikrama eras are given work out correctly. As Pingala is said to be the 2nd regnal year the cyclic year Nala should have been his first regnal year and this corresponds to Saka Samvat 990.

There is one inscription of his dated in Saka 990 cyclic year Pramādīcha or A D 1071 (E C Chitaldrug 82) in which he is given the full Chalukya royal titles and in which his brother Jayasimha III is described as Chālukya adiklunjarām and innanissimam phrases which show that he was the Chalukya regent in the Banavāsī area and that he enjoyed his brother's unbounded confidence. Apparently this inscription should be taken as belonging to the period when the rupture between Vikrama and his elder brother Somesvara was already complete. In the light of this inscription this period might have to be set down at about 1073-1074 A D. Jayasimha III was, as we have seen before, governor of Nolambavādi and other places in 1068 and 1072 A D. He was still in that province in 1074 A D and if we are to believe this inscription (Chitaldrug 82) he held Banavāsī in 1074 A D as the agent of Vikrama and not of Somesvara II. Vikrama having apparently declared war by about that year against Somesvara II. Vikramārka himself was, according to an inscription at Niralgī in the Hangal Taluk Dhārwar District, dated in 1074 A D cyclic year Īnanda Mahāmāandalēśvara (or governor) of Banavāsī and requested Somēśvara II at Banāknr to make a grant. As Chitaldrug 82 is dated in 1074 A D cyclic year Pramādīcha and the Niralgī record in 1074 A D cyclic year Īnanda it stands to reason that the final difference between the two brothers Somēśvara and Vikramārka should have occurred between these two cyclic years.

Vikramāditya
y a Governor ship of Banavāsī

Among the first public acts of Vikramāditya's reign was his proclamation of the Chālukya Vikrama kāla or

Founding of the Chālukya- Vikrama-Era.

in 611 A D , belonged Nāgiyakka seems to have been living in 1078 A D , according to Shikarpur 108, in which inscription she is designated savasi of the Bauddhavihāra, exactly like her husband in the inscription of 1067 A D . Apparently both husband and wife were lay devotees of the Buddhist Vihāra, and it seems probable from Shikarpur 108, that the wife survived the husband. From the nature of the image of Tārā-Bhagavatī installed at Baligami, it might be inferred that the form of Buddhism prevalent in the Banavāsī country about this time—11th century A.D.—was the Mahāyāna (For further particulars see ante Chapter V)

Sōmēsvāra, if he did not actually found Kalyāna, identified with his dynasty as their capital, seems to have made it a great and renowned city of India. He appears to have been moving freely about his dominions and the fact that he died far away from his own seat of Government shows that he held his position as ruler in high esteem and did not mind the inconveniences incidental to kingly office. Sōmēsvāra I seems to have married at least three wives. His chief queen was, as above stated, Mailāla-dēvi, a Ganga princess, by whom he had two sons, who succeeded him, and who assume all the Ganga titles of Kongunivarma Satyavākya Perimādi. He must also have had, as we have seen, a Pallava wife, his son by whom, Jayasimha, usually styled Jayasimha III, takes the Pallava and Nolamba titles. He is probably the person referred to in Davangere 133 and in Chitaldrug 82, dated in 1071 and 1074 A D and described as ruling over Kadambalige 1,000 and Kogali. He also had a wife of the Hoysala family, though no issue of this marriage is recorded (E.C. VII Honnali, dated in 1055 A D). She made a grant in that year for a tīrta which a Gauda of Onnali (Honnali) had established on the Tungabhadra. She was then in residence at Kalyāna, the royal capital. She is styled the senior queen in this inscription and Para 15) It does not appear to have survived beyond his reign. Two inscriptions dated in this era both in the 8th year are known. (M.E.R. 1920 Appendix B Nos 693 and 699)

Vikramaditya appears to have ruled from Kalyāṇa his principal capital. Other subsidiary (or provincial) capitals are also known. One of these was Nādiviyappayana vidu somewhere near the frontier between the north-east part of the Bijāpur district and the Nizām's Dominions where according to the Wadogeri inscriptions, he was ruling in 1077 A.D. Itagiri or Yatagiri in the Nizām's Dominions not far away from Malkhed Vijayapura modern Bijapur Mannayakera and Vikramapura identified with Arasibidi in the Bijapur district. According to Bilhana Vikramāditya is said to have beautified and enlarged the last of these capitals by building grand temples and palaces in them. (See Fleet ibid. 450) He seems to have had a southern capital or two, one probably at Baligāmi and another at Gōvindavādi identified with Gōvindavādo in the Rāyadrug taluk where he had a provincial residence in 1073-1074 A.D. (M.E.R. 1924 Para 5)

Vikramāditya's Capitals.

During the long reign of 51 years Vikramāditya's Rule seems to have maintained his kingdom free from foreign aggression and except for the rebellion of his younger brother Joyasimha referred to below also from internal dissensions. His administration of the different provinces seems to have been on the traditional lines though apparently somewhat stricter. The existence of different capitals and the personal residence of the sovereign at several of these at different times shows that Vikramāditya frequently toured his dominions and halted for considerable periods of a time in them. For instance the name of his capital Nādiviyappayana-vidu throne, he had to contend against a Chōla invasion. A vivid picture is drawn for us of Chōla ambitions on the Chālukya dominions at this time, in Shikaripur 136 dated in the very year of the enthronement of Sōmēsvara II. Here is an extract from it, which cannot be improved —

“At that juncture—saying ‘A new reign’, (a kingdom) fit for a hero, this is the time to invade it, I surround Gutti and besiege it,” in this pride, Chōlika, with an immense army, laid seige and was doing immense damage. On hearing which, he said “March,” and when the cavalry force which was sent came into contact, in a fierce battle which gave him no rest, Vīra-Chōla, showed his back to king Sōmēsvara’s army and fled.”

This prompt reply struck terror, we are told, into the minds of the evil-doers and enemies soon turned into friends. The Vīra-Chōla referred to in the above quoted inscription should have been Vīrarājēndra Chōla I, who began to rule from 1063 A D. He was also known as Vīra Chōla and Kasikāla Chōla, and was a younger brother of Rājēndra-Dēva. As we have seen above, Vīrarājēndra is one of those who boasts to have defeated Sōmēsvara I five times. Apparently he tried once again immediately after Sōmēsvara’s death, when he thought the opportunity a good one, but was beaten back by Sōmēsvara II. The Gutti referred to may be Chandragutti, in the Sorab Taluk of Shimoga District.

During his rule of eight years, the Chālukya kingdom seems to have had some peace. The incessant warfare of the previous reign had had some effect on the Chōlas. Nor was the lesson lost on Sōmēsvara II himself. He appears to have formed three provinces, extending from coast to coast, to prevent Chōla aggression. These were Banavāsī, Nolamba-Sindavādī, and a third one extending from Alampurā (? Alamparva in the present South Arcot District). These three provinces he placed under three Viceroys Lakshmana, Vikrama-Nolamba and the

Tribhuvanamalla Pandya Deva who is described as the defeater of the designs of Rājga Chōla. He is spoken of as governing the Nolambavādi 32 000 Similarly in Shikarpur 137, dated in 1114 A D we have a reference to the Chōla king losing his territories and holding his ears. The recently discovered Nilgunda copper plate grant of this king throws additional light on this conquest of the Cholas. This grant is dated in the 12th and the 48th years of the Chulukya Vikrama era and as such belongs to 1087 1088 and 1129 1124 A D (ME R 1913 Part II Para 48). A passage of some interest in this grant is the one which refers to Vikramāditya VI as Chālukya Rama who with his younger brother is stated to have gone like the Epic hero Rāma to recover (Sita) the prosperous royalty of the Vallabha (i.e. the Chālukya) kings born of (his father) Janaka and on the side of the sea, to have received homage from the Drāvīda king who had fled for refuge from (his) country of many sides i.e. a country which was in a state of revolt. It is inferable from this passage that the Chālukyas had lost a good part of their territory which was recovered by Vikramāditya VI. The two grants mentioned in the plates were made by the king to certain immigrant Brahmins from the Dravida (i.e. Chōla) country who had settled in Vikkige 70—a district included in the Kogali 500. When the first grant was made Vikramāditya in 1087 1088 A D was at Kalyāna and when the second was made he was at Joyuti pura (i.e. Banavāsī). The first included Nilagunda, identified with the place of that name in the Harpanhalli Taluk Bellary District. The first grant was made at the request of Palota-Pāndya, the governor of Nolambavādi 32 000 evidently the same chief who is mentioned as Palanta Pāndya in EC VI Davangere 39 as the successor to the Chālukya and Chōla kings and their kingdoms. His grandson Rāya-Pandya called Tribhuvanamalla Rāya-Pandya is described as the right and other Ganga titles, and seems to have at first held the governorship of Gangavāḍi, then also of Banavāsī 12,000 and the Sāntalige 1,000. He was of "Brahma-Kshatriya heroic descent." He seems to have had a beautiful, accomplished and gifted lady, named Lachchala-Dēvi for his wife. In Shikarpur 110, also dated in 1070 A.D., he is spoken of as the destroyer of the valour of his enemies and distinguished by the title of "Bhuvanaika-Vīra," and "Emperor of all Brāhmans," probably because he was of Brahma-Kshatriya descent. In Shikarpur 129, dated in 1071 A.D., he is entitled mahāsāmantādhipati mahāprachanda dandanāyaka, chief over the property of the court, and as senior minister for war and peace. In business, he is described as a yōgandyāna and as the raiser of the Chālukya kingdom. He must have been noted for his personal valour, for he is spoken of as "pre-eminent in valour" and "unassisted hero." Though tolerant to the Jain faith (see Shikarpur 221), he was evidently a great devotee of Śiva, for with the consent of his sovereign, he made a grant to the temple of Hanuṣāditya and the matha attached to it at Baligāmi. The gift was conveyed by washing the feet of Gunagalla Yōgi, the great Advaita luminary who was at the head of the matha. Gunagalla Yōgi is praised as the embodiment of learning, as having conquered the spirit and as one who had attained mukti (bliss) by his pre-eminent learning and austerities. He was evidently a great exponent of the Advaita doctrine, and seems to have been considered as second to none in ascetic greatness. He is said to have built as many as five temples, three of them in Baligāmi, all dedicated to Śiva and at Kuruvatī, he is said to have created the Siddhatṛitha. He is called in the inscription Gunagalla Nāgavalmāchārya and his effigy is among the sculptures at the head of the stone with his name over it. In 1074 A.D., Udayāditya made by order of the senior queen, a grant Sindhu Turushka etc. (Holalkara 25 Davangere 3 Shikarpur 121 and 137) There appears to be much poetical exaggeration in this description of his conquests. His conquest of the Cholas is referred in some cases as the conquest of the Dramilas (Davangere 3 and Holalkara 25). His conquest of the Dramilas (Tamil or Cholas) and Pāñchalas is also referred to in an inscription at Yerabalu (in the Harpanhalli Taluk) dated in Chālukya Vikrama year 17 or 1122 A.D. (M.E.R. 1919 Appendix B No 215 of 1918). This inscription registers a grant in the governorship of Vira Pāndya over Nolambavadi 32 000 within which the Harpanhalli Taluk was also included at the time. From an inscription at Kuruvatti also in the same taluk dated in his 27th year (or 1102 A.D.) we find Vikramaditya though far away at his imperial capital of Kalyana chastising his own subordinate a certain Mannaya Boppaya who capturing a place called Gandarādityanaholalu had plundered private property and killed Brāhmanas. Vikramaditya ordered him to forfeit all claims for the Mannaya of the village. The complaint in this case was it may be added, preferred by the Vakajanās of the agrahāra of the Gandarādityana holalu a Chaturvednuangalam. The king also took from Boppaya that he and his successors should secede from the government of the holalu. He did so we are told, in the presence of the 32 000 representatives of the Bonnavuru 12 Nigunda 2, etc. and drank water at the temple of Tripurāntakadēva. (M.E.R. 1919 Appendix B No 214 of 1918). This shows in an unmistakable form the strength of Vikramaditya's provincial administration. It is to be remembered however that Nolambavadi was the battle ground of the Chālukyas and Chōlas and that it was in Vikramaditya's time that the final expulsion of the Chōlas from that area had taken place with the aid, apparently of the Uchchangi Pāndyas under the leadership of hill chiefs and as combining in himself the chief heroic characters of the Rāmāyana and the Bhāṛata. He is, what is noteworthy, described as being indispensable to the Chlāukya kingdom, and as such granted royal dignities confirmed by a royal charter engraved on copper-plates. Apparently he was held in the highest esteem by Sōmesvara II—very much more than even by Sōmēsvara I. His minister and chief treasurer was Sāntinātha, (not Sōmanātha as stated by a slip in E C VII Introd. 21,) who was a Jain and a most distinguished poet. Sāntinātha was known by the title of Sarasvatī-mukha-mukura and was the author of Sukumāra-charita. (Shikarpur 136 and Narasimhachar's Karnāṭaka Kavi Charite, new edition, 83) He is described as possessed of an unsullied fame and his work Sukumāra-charite is said to be “filled with beautiful taste, with imagination and with truthful description.” It is also said of him that he accumulated jewels but instead of hiding them in a corner, used them for the relief of the distressed. He persuaded Lakhma to build of stone, the Mallikamōḍa-Sāntinātha basadi at Baligrāma, which was at the time of wood, and in doing so, set up, he says, a stone pillar at the principal entrance, recounting all his names and titles. As Mallikamōḍa was a title of Jayasimha II, it is possible that the God in the original temple was either set up by him or named after him, as was common in those days.

Sōmēsvara an upholder of Saiva faith

Sōmēsvara II was apparently a faithful follower of the Saiva faith. It is frequently said of him in inscriptions that “his head (was) as the lotus feet of Śiva” (Shikarpur 110-130). During his period, the Kālāmukha ascetics had perhaps reached the height of their popularity in the land, eclipsing to some extent the Jains on the one side and the waning Buddhists on the other. Many grants in their favour are recorded in the after Vikrama Chola must have reconquered his northern dominions. For two inscriptions of his reign at Chehrulu and Nidubrolu are dated 1127 and 1130 A.D. (see M.E.R. 1903 also S.I.I. III 180). Apparently the conquest of Vengi in 1127 A.D. by Vikrama Chola was not left unnoticed by Vikramāditya VI. Some inscriptions of his at Tripurantakara in the present Kurnool District throw light on the reprisals he adopted on Vengi. An inscription of his 31st year (M.E.R. 1906 Appendix B No. 258 of 1906) or 1127 A.D. mentions an officer of his named Anantapala and his nephew Gōvindarasa the latter of whom is described as the son of one Krishnarāja and as the governor of Kondapalli 300 at the time. This Gōvindarasa identified with Gōvindarāja of the Ahlur inscriptions (E.I.V. 215) claims to have burnt Bengipura (i.e. Vengipura) to have defeated a prince whose name is not given at Jananathapura and to have conquered Gonka. Perhaps this refers to an encounter with the Eastern Chōlās and their Velanadu feudatories. The success if any of Gōvindarasa was of an ephemeral character for we have evidence of Vikrama Chola's re-occupation of his northern dominions in an inscription of 1145 A.D. at Nidubrolu (see above). The campaign against the Chōlās which ended in these encounters is possibly the one which is referred to by Bilhana as having occurred in Vikramāditya's reign after a long time of peace (Vikramānkaḍḍa Charita Introduction 44). The Chōlās—apparently he means the Eastern Chālokyas—again became proud and insolent and that Vikramāditya marched on Kāंची and took the City that he resided himself there for some time and then returned to the capital. Sir John Fleet has suggested that this campaign was responsible for the many inscriptions referring themselves to his (Vikramāditya's) reign at Draksharama and other places in the Godāvāri, Cuddapah and Kurnool Districts outside the limits of married a Chōla princess (M.E.R. 1904, Para 17). There is no mention of this in the many inscriptions of Sōmēsvāra found in this State, though there is confirmation of his marriage with the Chōla princess from Bilhana's poem Vikramāṅka Dēva Charita. Apparently after his defeat in the initial year of his reign, Viṅarājēndia never seems to have come in the way of Sōmēsvāra II, whose new territorial arrangements, as we have seen, were such that Chōla aggression was altogether impossible.

Somēsvāra's
death

Sōmēsvāra seems to have died in or about 1076 A.D., though we have so far no direct mention as to when or where his death occurred. He seems to have been a quiet and unostentatious ruler, though politic and determined to a degree in his administration. The kingdom seems to have enjoyed the blessings of peace and gave apparently abundant opportunities for building temples and basadis and providing for their maintenance. Sōmēsvāra seems to have favoured Bankapūr as his residence, for many inscriptions mention it as the place from where he ruled his kingdom. His arrangements for its internal administration seem to have been well conceived, for they put down aggression on the one side and helped towards the realization of a higher life for his subjects on the other. About the close of his reign, he probably had some trouble from his immediate younger brother Vikrama, as he certainly seems to have had at the outset of his reign, but the information available is too meagre to warrant any definite conclusion. In Shikarpur 129, dated in 1071 A.D., Udayāditya is called Chālukya rājya samuddharana, &c., the raiser of the Chālukya kingdom. It is possible that he proved himself useful in nipping in the bud some incipient revolt. In the same inscription, he is termed āsthāna vastu nāyakam, chief over the property of the Court, a position he possibly owed to the

Mahādīmanṭa Satyadeva, with the title of Lord of Maṭṭi, the least of towns who in A.D. 1031-1034 was governing in the neighbourhood of Gobhor in the Vāṭma & Dominions the Mahādīmanṭa Kāṣṭhīyānīkarava, of the Jīmatavāhuna line age and the Khachara race who in A.D. 1034-1036 was governing the Banavāsi twelve hundred and forty the Mahādīmanṭa Dhādībhāṣaka or Dhādībhāṇḍaka, described as born in the great Rashtrakūṭa lineage who in A.D. 1037 was governing in the neighbourhood of Sitabaldī near Nāgpur in the Central Provinces the Mahāmāndalīkārava Kannakāṭra II., of the Ratta family who in A.D. 1037-1038 was ruling at Saṇḍattī the Mahāmāndalīkārava Śāntīvarman II. of the family of Hanḡal who in A.D. 1038-1039 was ruling the Banavāsi twelve thousand and the Panuṅgal five hundred the Pergade Chaugadevaṃya, who in the same year was managing the vaddararūla and other taxes of the Banavāsi twelve thousand the Mahādīmanṭadhipati and Mahāmāndalīkāravadhipati Anantadeva of the Śilāhara family who was ruling in the Konkan in A.D. 1038 the Mahāmāndalīkārava Kartavīrya II. of the Ratta family who in A.D. 1038-1039 was ruling at Saṇḍattī the Mahāpradhāna Itahpurādhyakṣha Heri Lalā Kannala sandhivigrahin and Manerergade the Dandandyaḡa Bhīvanayya on behalf of whom the Mahāpradhāna and Dandandyaḡa Padmanābhayya was governing the Banavāsi twelve thousand in A.D. 1038 the Mahāmāndalīkārava Guvala i.e. Guhalla, of the family of the Kādambas of Goa who in A.D. 1038-1039 at his capital of Gova, i.e. Goa, was ruling the Palasige twelve thousand the Mahāpradhāna and Dandandyaḡa Padmanābhayya, who in the same year was governing the Banavāsi twelve thousand the Mahāpradhāna Banasaregade and Dandandyaḡa Anantapāṭayya also styled Mahāsamantadhipati who was ruling the Belvola three hundred and the Pullegere three hundred in A.D. 1100-1101 and the same districts with the Banavāsi twelve thousand and with the management of the Vaddararūla and pejṇunka taxes in A.D. 1102-1103 and 1107-1108 and is also described in A.D. 1103-1104 as managing the pannaya tax of the whole of the seven and a half lakh country the Mahāpradhāna and Dandandyaḡa Bhīvanayya, who in A.D. 1102-1103 was governing the Palasige twelve thousand, and was managing the pannaya tax of the seven and a half lakh country the Dandandyaḡa

Kalyāna to Bankapūr, the latter should have occurred about 1076 A D, up to which there are inscriptions of his reign. This is entirely in keeping with what Bilhana says about the later events taking place just before the coronation of Vikramāditya VI. Eastern Chālukya records show that Rājiga Kulōttunga-Choladēva annexed the Chōla dominions in his first regnal year, i e, 1063 A D. From this it would clearly seem to follow that the war in connection with the first part of the narrative and the war which ended in Sōmēśvara's imprisonment have been mixed up by Bilhana. The date of the earlier part too cannot be fixed at 1063 A D, the date of the conquest of the Chōla country by the Eastern Chālukya Kulōttunga Chōla I, for it is too early for Sōmēśvara II, who is said to have aided Kulōttunga against his brother Vikrama. Sir John Fleet suggests that this might not have really happened before 1076 A D (Bombay Gazetteer I n. 445).

Vikramāditya
VI, 1076 112?
A D (Vikramārka, Vikramānka, Purnādī, Tribhuvanamahalla)

If Bilhana may be believed, Vikrama in or about 1076 A D expelled his brother, seized the throne and became one of the most powerful of the Chālukya monarchs. He set aside (literally rubbed it out as schoolboys rub out the figures they write in the sand) the Saka era, and from his accession established the Chālukya Vikrama era, which continued in use as long as the Chālukyas were in power. Many interesting particulars regarding him are contained in Bilhana's poem on his history (Vikramānka-Dēva Charita, published by Dr G. Bühler in Bombay). Bilhana says that for some time Vikrama and his brother Sōmēśvara II lived in friendly intercourse at Kalyāna, the younger duly honoring the elder as the chief of his house and his king. Sōmēśvara, it is said, however fell into evil courses, and even tried to do harm to his brother. Thereupon, it is added, Vikrama left Kalyāna, taking with him all his followers and also hundred-and-forty in A D 1121-1122 the Mahāmandalēśvara Tribhuvanamalla Pāndya Dēva who in the same year was ruling the Nolambavādī thirty-two-thousand the Mahāmandalēśvara Acha or Achugi of the Śinda family, who in A D 1123-1123 was ruling the Kiskad seventy and the Mahāmandalēśvara Jayakēśin II of the family of the Īadāmbas of Goa who in A D 1125-1126 was ruling the Konkana nine-hundred the Palasigo twelve-thousand the Payva or Hayva five hundred and the Kavaddivpa lakh and a quarter. One of the most interesting of the records is the Dambal inscription of A D 1095 which records grants made to vihāras of Buddha and Ārya Tara Dēvi at that town and thus shows that Buddhism still held a place in the Kanarasa country as late as the end of the eleventh century A D. A record of A D 1088-1089 speaks of Vikramāditya VI crossing the Narmada, and conquering kings on the other side of that river. And another of A D 1098, shows that then again he was in the northern part of the kingdom on the banks of the Narmada. (Dombay Gazetteer 450-3)

Some of the above mentioned are referred to in other inscriptions found in this State and the adjacent districts of Madras Presidency. Kaliga or Kaliyammārassa who held the title of 'the must elephant of Chandaladēvi' one of the queens of Vikramāditya was according to an inscription dated in 1093 A D at Chinna Tumbalam in the Bellary District ordered from his charge of Panungal 500 to the governorship of the Southern Country. He appears to have built a temple at Chinna Tumbala dedicated to Sūmēśvaradēva for which he the chief Pottipi Chōla Mahārāja Ghattayanna and the mahā-jana of Tumbala made grants. Another inscription found at the same place and dated 1079 A.D. mentions Mahāmandalēśvara Joyimmarassa who was ruling the Sindavadi 1000. A tank named after him as Joyigusamudra seems to have been constructed somewhere near Tumbalam. Mahāmandalēśvara Jogimayya mentioned in an inscription at the Bhūgēśvara temple at Rāmadurga destruction of his hated brother, eagerly entered into the alliance. He followed so closely on Vikrama's march to the south, that when the latter came up with Rājiga's army, Sōmēsvara's forces were encamped not far off in his rear. A terrible battle ensued, in which victory was declared for Vikrama, Rājiga fled and Sōmēsvara was taken prisoner. The narrative adds that Vikramāditya at first intended to restore his brother to liberty and to the throne. But eventually he decided otherwise, had himself proclaimed king, and then appointing his younger brother, Jayasimha, in the government of Banavāsī, proceeded to Kalyāna and established himself there. Vikrama appears to have been greatly assisted in his attempt against his brother Sōmēsvara II by the Yādava prince Seuna (Seunachandīa II), mentioned in the Vratakhanda of Hēmādri (Bhandarkar, Early History of Dekhan in the Bombay Gazetteer I ii 234). Seuna is there represented to have saved Paramardidēva, i.e., Vikramāditya VI, who is styled a "luminary of the Chālukya family," from a coalition of his enemies and to have placed him on the throne of Kalyāna. The coalition referred to must be the pact between Kulōttunga-Chōla and Sōmēsvara II, whose dates are consistent with the statement of Hēmādri. He there heard that a svayamvara was proclaimed for Chandīalēkha or Chandala-dēvi, daughter of the Silahara prince of Karahata, and possessed of marvellous beauty. He also ascertained that the lady, on hearing of his valiant exploits, had fallen in love with him, and therefore hastened to the festival, where he was chosen as the bridegroom from among the 'assembled princes of Ayōdhya, Chēdi, Kanyākubja, Kālīnjara, Mālava, Gurjara, etc., who though filled with anger at the result, were restrained from violence through fear of the great Chālukya (the names of five other wives of his occur in inscriptions). Next year his brother Jayasimha rebelled, and collecting a sturdy soldiers (the hero) that cut off the heads of the Dravida mandalikis (i.e., the chiefs of Dravidas) the destroyer of Pallikata and the terror of the Gurjara. The first two epithets clearly show that he took part in the campaign against the Cholas and had exhibited personal bravery in it. (See V F R 1910 Part II Para 12 and inscriptions quoted in it). Another Mahā mandulīśvara Kesavaśvami Devaśvami is mentioned in an inscription in the Kesavaśvami temple at Holalkonde Bellary District. He is described as belonging to the solar race and the Kāśyapa-gotra and as bearing the title of "lord of Mirajekoharipura, i.e. lord of Miraj (Miraj) and Gokaripura (Gokak)". He is said to have had his capital at Holalkonde where the inscription is found. As the inscription is dated in the 50th (Chalukya) Vikrama year he ought to have been governing the Miraj and Gokak country about 1125-1126 A.D. or about the close of the reign of Vikramāditya VI (V F R 1920 Para 15 also Appdx. B No 708).

References to his Feudatories.

Some notable Brāhman ministers of Vikramāditya VI are also referred to in his inscriptions. One of the most powerful of these was Raviga Dandanatha or Raviyona-Bhatta. In an inscription found in the Kesavaśvami temple at Huvimahadagalli Bellary District dated in 1090 A.D. he is described as having been at the very root of Vikramāditya's administration and to have conquered the Seven Mālavas. Rebbaṇubbo or Rebballadevi the wife of this (Brāhman) military officer, was a native of Huvimahadagalli. She built there a temple dedicated to Kesavaśvami, to which she made gifts of land. Other grants were also made to it by Tribhuvonamallu Vira Pāndya Dēva, the local ruler at the request of her husband. An inscription dated in 1110-1111 A.D., found at Nilgundo, Harpanhalli Taluk refers to Dandanāyaka Muddarasa, another chief minister of

Vikramāditya
Ministers
and Generals.

Tiptur 105), dated in Saka 1000, cyclic year Kālayukta or A D 1078), which includes also a grant in the Chālukya-Vikrama year 31, cyclic year Sarvajitu (or A D 1107), he is called Tribhuvanamalla Permādi-Dēva. Permādi-Dēva is perhaps the Paramaididēva, the name given to Vikramāditya in the Vratakhanda of Hēmādri. (See also Fleet, 446) There are inscriptions of his reign from 1076 A D to 1126 A.D., i.e., from the first year of his reign to his 51st year. A few of these mention his regnal years. Others are dated either in the Saka or in the Chālukya-Vikrama or in, as in some cases, both these eras. The following are a few of the inscriptions in the eras mentioned found in the Mysore State and in some of the Madras border districts —

- Chālukya-Vikrama 4=1079 A D (M E R 1914)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 6=1081 A D (Saka date also given)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 9=1084 A D (Saka date also given
E C VIII Sorab 235 and 236)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 12=1087 A D (M E R 1913)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 13=1088-9 A D (Saka date also given)
(E C VIII Sorab 388)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 21=1097 A D (M A R 1913-14)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 22=1099 A D (E C V Belur 200)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 25=1100 A D (Saka date also given)
(E C VI Kadur 164)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 31=1106 A D (E C XII Tiptur 105)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 37=1112 A D (Saka date also given)
(E C VIII Sorab 327)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 41=1116-17 A D (E C V Belur 116)
(M A R 1914)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 47=1122 A D (M E R 1906 and 1918)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 48=1123 A D (M A R 1913)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 50=1125 6 A.D. (M E R 1920) (E C VIII Sorab 1126, M E R 1920)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 51=1126 27 A D (M E R 1918)
 Chālukya-Vikrama 51, Cyclic year Parabhava, the latest date now available for him (M E R 1906—Appdx B of 1905 No 258 Ins at Tripurāntakēśvara temple, Tripurāntakam, Kurnool District)

As 1076 A D. is called his 2nd regnal year (E C VIII 172), we may take it that he was crowned king in 1075-1076 A D. Taking the year 1075 A D, as his first regnal year, the dates of the inscriptions in which both and Mandalikas he was about to lose it. Thus Kālidāsa I his son Madhusudana and his son Kālidāsa II seem to have successively served Jayasimha II Somaśvara I and Vikramāditya VI in the post of chief minister. Kālidāsa I appears to have founded the agrahāra of Nāgavāvi (modern Nagei in the Nizāms Dominions) for 400 Brāhmanas well versed in the Vēdas and obtained a copper grant for it from king Jayasimha II. Nāgavāvi is described as the capital of the Eyalu 300 of the Kuntale country. His son Madhusudana apparently beautified the agrahāra by building in it a temple called Kataka Kamalarka in honour of the Trinurtis the Rāmēśvara temple with the Rāmātirta and the Madhusudana temple so named after himself adorned with fowels figures towers gold finials touching the clouds dancing balls golden garuda pillars gateways of three storys lofty enclosures rooms for lodging ekadandis tridandis snātata and other kinds of Brahmacāryas hamsās and paramahamsās and mathas for the study of the Vēdas and Vēdangas in all their various sākhās. He obtained in 1003 A.D. a grant for these grants of land from Somaśvara I and from one Boddināycha who is described as the lord of Mahishmati and as the descendant of Kṛtavīrya and son to the lotus of the Ahibaya (Haihaya) family. In 1085 A.D. Madhusudana's son Kālidāsa II obtained the grant of a village from Vikramāditya II and some additional lands from Lōkarasa the lord of Mahishmati apparently the son Boddināycha who was besides the ruler of Eyalu 300 in which Nāgavāvi was included, and divided both the village and the lands among the 400 Brahmanas of the agrahāra and the temples. It is interesting to note that provision is made for the priests who worship the Madhusudana god observing the Brahmachārya vow (or vow of celibacy) for night feeding for sleeping on the (bare) ground for dancing girls, for feeding strangers for repairs to the Chālukya-Vikrama-varsha in supersession of the Saka era. The first year of the new era was the first year of his own reign, i.e., 1076-1077 A.D. As the Gadag inscription dated in 1098 A.D. puts it — “By his amplitude, and unaided, Tribhuvanamalla, the king Chālukya-Vikramāditya caused all the hostile kings to bow down, and became lord of the world. Having rubbed out the brilliant Saka-varsha, he, the impetuous one, the most liberal man in the world, who delighted in religion, published his own name throughout the world under the form of the Vikrama-varsha.” Another record, dated in 1094-1095 A.D., says — “Having said, ‘why should the glory of the kings Vikramāditya and Nanda be a hindrance any longer?’ he, with a loudly uttered command, abolished that (era) which has the name Saka, and made that (era) which has the Chālukya counting.” (See Fleet, ibid 447). As Sir John Fleet has observed, instances are not known of the era having been adopted by the kings of any other dynasties. But a great many records of his own reign are dated in his own era, the cyclic years being the usual ones. In this State, several inscriptions contain both the eras mentioned in them, as above indicated. Some of his successors and his feudatories, attempted to continue his era. There are inscriptions of this era ranging from 1127 A.D. to 1169-1170 A.D., in its 52nd, 53rd, 54th, 60th, 61st, 84th and 94th years (Fleet, ibid 447-448). Apparently its use did not extend even to a full century. Inscriptions dated in the Chālukya-Vikrama era 57 and 58th year have also been found (M E R 1916, Appdx B Nos 502 and 588 and M E R 1918, Appdx No 673). Apparently from the above quoted inscriptions of 1094-1095 A.D., Vikramāditya wanted to eclipse the founder of the Saka era. Vikramāditya’s son Sōmēsvaya III started an era of his own called Bhulōkamalla-Varsha, which commenced with the last year of Vikramāditya VI (M E R 1920, went through the body and came out at the back. He is also credited with the conquest of the Seven Konkanas on behalf of Vikramāditya. Under him, it would appear was one Tainba-chamupa who was governing the Santalige 1000. As we have seen, he won victories for his brother and was on the most affectionate terms in 1080 A.D. (E.C. VII Shikarpur 293 and 297) but later revolted against him.

As to Nolambavādi Province it was, as stated above under Tribhuvanamalla Pāndya Deva in 1083 A.D. (E.C. VII, Channagiri 33). Pāndya Dēva seems to have been later transferred to Banavāsī, Kadambalige and Santalige provinces. But in 1125 A.D. we find his son Raya Pandya ruling over Nolambavādi and Santalige (Channagiri 61). In 1098 A.D. the Mahāprachanda Dandadyāka Anantapāla seems to have been vested with the governorship. He seems to have been in office in 1100 A.D. (Shikarpur 13 and 311). Banavāsī however was under Padmanabhayya who seems to have been a dependant of Bhīmanayya, the Kannada Minister for peace and war (Shikarpur 106). About 1100 A.D. Govindayya was in charge of Banavāsī. He was a dependent of Anantapālāyya and was entitled Rana Ranga Bhairava. (Shikarpur 311). The genealogy of this local ruler is given in an inscription dated in 1104 A.D. (Shikarpur 131). He was a Brāhmin of the Vasishtha gōtra and appears to have been minister for peace and war. He appears to have been in power (together with Anantapāla) till 1114 A.D. (Shikarpur 192 of 1107 A.D. and 137 of 1114 A.D.). From Shikarpur 137, we learn Gōvinda was the brother in law of Anantapāla. An inscription dated in 1117 A.D. (Shikarpur 316) shows Gōvindarasa to have been still in power though Anantapāla's name disappears. In 1123 A.D. we find one Rāmayya ruling Banavāsī. (Shikarpur 249).

was probably so called because he stayed at Nadivi for a long time after a long journey—uppayana meaning the “cessation of journey” (M A R 1914-1915, Para 73) The capital should have been originally called Nadivi. An inscription found at Nagai in the Nizam’s Dominions, dated in the 10th year of his reign, represents Vikramāditya as staying at Benneyadandu, having stopped for the journey (Benneya dandina palavum devasad uppayanavidinol) and made some grant. He was residing at Etagirī in 1077-1078 A D (Shikarpur 124 and 135), and he was at Banavāsī in 1091 (Sorab 549). He was in residence at Gōvindavādī in 1073-1074 A D (M E R 1924, Para 5).

Expulsion of the Chōlas from Nola-mbavādī

During his reign Nolaṃbapādī 32,000 was governed by the Pāṇdyas of Uchchangī, of whom Nigalankamalla-Pāṇdyā, who is mentioned in an inscription dated in the Chālukya-Vikrama year 4, Siddhārti (1079 A D) at Bagalī, in Bellary, is the earliest. Tribhuvanamalla-Pāṇdyā was the next. These Pāṇdyā feudatories boast of having frustrated the designs of Rājiga (i.e., the Chālukya-Chōla king Kulottunga I). According to Mr Venkayya, this boast is probably based on some service which they rendered to Vikramāditya against his Chōla enemy. The Vikramāṅkadēvacharita states that the Chālukya king overcame Rājiga, while the Tamil inscriptions of the latter report that he defeated the former (M E R 1904, Para 18). That Vikramāditya should have won some notable victory against the Chōla is repeatedly referred to in his inscriptions (Shikarpur 124 dated in 1077 A D and Shikarpur 114 dated in 1096 A D). In the latter of these, his general Kālidāsa is named as the “terrifier” of his enemies. He is represented as bringing as spoil the treasury of defeated kings, then elephants, wives and horses. In Channagirī 33, assigned to 1083 A D, we have mention made of also another inscription dated in Chālukya Vikrama 31, Sarvajña (1109 A.D.) mentions Vikramaditya VI as Tribhuvanamalla Permādi Deva and says Hoysala Vijayāditya was ruling Gangavādi 36,000 (E.C. XII Tiptur 105). This shows that the Hoysalas were becoming strong and asserting themselves. As they grow in power the suzerainty of the Chalukyas over them became more nominal than real. Many inscriptions found in the State attest to this conclusion (e.g. E.C. V Hassan District Hassan 31 dated in 1080 A.D. Arsikere 43 which may be assigned to 1090 A.D. Arsikere 87 probably belonging to 1090 A.D. Belur 200 dated in Ch. Vik. 22 or 1099 A.D. Belur 199 dated in Saka 1023 or A.D. 1101. Belur 118 dated in Ch. Vik. 11 or 1117 A.D. Chennarayana 15 dated in Saka 1001 or 1079 A.D. and Chennarayana 169 undated but assigned to 1106 A.D. E.C. VI Kadur District Kadur 22 dated in 1090 A.D. Kadur 164 dated in Ch. Vik. 250 or 1100 A.D. mentioning Hoysala Bittiga or Vishnuvardhana Chikmagalur 160 assignable to 1103 A.D. mentioning Vikramaditya as suzerain of Hoysala Vinayaditya Chikmagalur 151, assignable to 1122 A.D. mentioning Bittideva, and his recognition of Vikramaditya's suzerainty over him.) The last of the inscriptions quoted i.e. Chikmagalur 151, is interesting because it recognises though only nominally Chalukya suzerainty though it is dated after the great defeat that Bittidēva's general Ganga Rāja inflicted on Vikramaditya's army in a night attack at Kannegala from which their real independence of the Chalukyas commenced. Spirited accounts of this attack are given in Sravana Belgola 125 (old Edn. 45) and 78 (old Edn. 59) both dated in 1118 A.D. Ganga Rāja captured the whole of the enemy's stores and vehicles and presented them to his own sovereign.

As regards Santalige, it was being governed by the Santaras. In Nagar 35 dated in 1077 A.D. Nannisantara hand of Vikramāditya in Davangere 1390 dated in 1106 A D and other inscriptions (see Holalkere 25) Such was the confidence reposed in him by Vikramāditya that he was considered by himself capable of breaking the pride of the Chōla and other kings. He is described by his valour to have brought the whole earth encompassed by the four oceans into subjection to king Vikrama His residence was at Beltur or Bettur, north-east of Davangere (Davangere 3, dated in 1121 A D., see also M.E R 1919, Para 31 Appendix B. 229 of 1918, M.E R 1925, Para 3, Nos 278 and 31 of 1925 dated in the 35th and 36th years of Vikramāditya VI) In 1124 A.D, he seems to have ruled over Santalige 1,000 and various agrahāras in Banavāsī Province as well (Davangere 155). In this inscription he is called the younger brother of Tribhuvanamalla Vīra-Nolamba-Permādi-Dēva, who has to be identified with Vikramāditya's younger brother Jayasimha How he came to be described as Jayasimha's brother is not evident, but perhaps, as Mr Rice suggests, the designation "is intended in a complimentary sense as betokening a close intimacy between Chālukya-Pallava prince (Jayasimha) and the Pāndya chief (Vīra Pāndya)" (EC XI, Introduction 17) In an inscription dated in his son's governorship, he is also described as "the confounder of the Chōla king" etc Apparently, he was one of those connected with the final driving away of the Chōlas from the Nolambavādi 32,000, which took place in Vikramāditya's time.

Vikramā-ditya's other conquests

As some inscriptions of Vikramāditya have been found in Gooty in the Anantpur District, it has to be presumed that his dominions extended as far as that place In several inscriptions, Vikramāditya is also described as having conquered the kings of other countries as well—Magadha, Pāṇchāla, Nēpāla, Barbara, Kaihāta, Chehadī, Kasrhira, Gurjara, Kalinga, Āndhra, Varatalata, and Vaishnava cults. Vikramaditya appears to have been as many of his predecessors were catholic in religious patronage. Not only Jainism but also Saivism and Vaishnavism and even Buddhism which still claimed votaries in the land received support at his hands. Several inscriptions of his reign testify to this fact. In Shikarpur 99 dated in 1111 A D. he is described as the granter of all the hosts of Brahmins. Kālāmukhas appear to have belonged to the Muvara Koneya Santati of the Parvatāvali (Shikarpur 99). The head of these was it would appear Divyajñāni Kāmīra Deva who is described as the heavenly seer the emperor of the Kālāmukha munis. The Muvara Koneya Santati is also referred to as Devavrata muni santati (Shikarpur 104). There seems to be some reason for believing that these line of Saivas had some connection with the Kashmir Saivas not the least significant part of the evidence of this view being the definite suggestion that the emperor of the munis of this order was Kāśmiradeva. In his descent—i.e. succession—was Trilochana munindra whose senior disciple was Varasvadeva. Through Varasvada's teaching, Haris Dēva Dandadhīpa the senior uncle of Dandadhīpa Kālīdāsa above named caused to be built as an ornament to the Tripurāntaka temple at Baligrāma a temple of Sarvasvara with a golden kalasa. So wonderful was the tale told was this temple that it seemed as if Indra had come to see the royal city of Baligrāma the most beautiful in the eyes of all the Earth and caused his vimāna (celestial aeroplane) to stop there. (P. C. VII Shikarpur 114 dated in 1096 A D.) The temple of Kēdāresvara of Baligrāma (Balligāve) was the chief seat of the Kālāmukhas. It is called the Southern Kēdāresvara to distinguish it from the Kēdarnāth in the Himalayas and is highly praised as an ornament of Banavāsī 12,000 and as resembling the waving clusters of curls (kuntala) of the lady of Tribhuvanamalla Pāndya-Dēva, who held the titles of “the punisher of the Parichchēdins” and “the vanquisher of the hopes of the Chōla king Rājuga-Chōla” (See above) It is possible that Vikramāditya was, from political motives, even more strict in this area than elsewhere. Another instance of his strictness in the same province is afforded by the personal interest he took in putting down a rebel chief named Dandanāyaka Biddayya in 1071-1072 A D (M E R 1914, Appendix No 127) He seems to have encamped at Gōvīndavādī after this event, and “pleased with the victory over” this chief—apparently a traitor—he made a grant, at the request of the mahājanas of Kōtinaguru, to the temple of Kallēsvara at Huvīnahadgallī, where the slab containing the inscription is still to be seen.

His conquest of Chchēdins and Āndhras

There may be some ground for the boast of Vikramāditya that he conquered the Chchēdins, the Āndhras, etc. The Chchēdins may be the “Parichchēdins” referred to above, whom Pāndya-Dēva is said to have vanquished. The Āndhras referred to are probably the Telugu-Chōda chiefs said to have been captured by Vikramāditya VI in his inscriptions at Draksharāma. The Pithapuram inscription of Prithivīsvara records that Kulōttunga I bestowed the Vēngī 16,000 on “his adopted son,” Chōda of Velanandu. An inscription of this chief at Draksharāma shows that in A.D. 1120-1121, he was a vassal of Vikramāditya VI. It may be concluded from these two statements that when Vikrama-Chōla went to the South, Kulōttunga I entrusted Vēngī to Chōda of Velanandu, but the latter became a dependant of Vikramāditya VI, who took advantage of Vikrama-Chōla’s absence in the Chōla country as co-regent of his father and of the subsequent death of Kulōttunga I, for conquering the Vēngī province. The inscriptions of Vikramāditya VI at Draksharāma range from A D 1120-1121 to 1123-1124 A D. Shortly

Other evidence of the patronage extended during Vikramaditya's reign to Brahmins may be briefly noted. There is a grant by a Gatuunda in his 15th year (or A.D. 1083) to Brahmins for a satra for distributing food to those of the country and for those from other parts another in the 10th year (or 1053 A.D.) for another satra for feeding Brahmins both of the country and strangers. Both these grants are in favour of the Heur agrahara, of whose virtues and learning long accounts are given in them. They are stated to have mastered all the systems of philosophy including Nyāya Vaiśeṣika Lokajāta Sāṅkhya Bauddha and Mīmāṃsa. Similarly in Shikarpar 176 dated in 1092 A.D. we have a long account of the 32000 Brahmins of Tanagundar of their immigration from Ahichchatra and of their being residents of 111 villages cc. (Shikarpar 168 to be assigned to A.D. 1123 and not 1200 as suggested by Mr. Rice—cc. E.C. VII.) Shikarpar 166 gives an account how they were brought down to the Kadamba country by Mayura varina. Both these record grants in favour of these famous Brahmin settlers. The second grant is particularly interesting for it records the setting up at Tanagundar by a certain Brahmin named Trilochana of the god Madhava—Prayāga Mādhava the famous Madhava at Prayāga or Allahabad—and made grants of land to the Brahmins of the place for its decoration and illuminations. (Shikarpar 180) It is stated in this inscription that the god Prayāga Mādhava appeared in a dream to Trilochanadeva and said "As to the boy Praharada (i.e. Praballāda) I was in the pillar so I will be in the stone and vanished. Apparently about this time Prayāga Mādhava was a famous god as a Vaishnavite deity in Southern India. From this it would seem to follow that the cult of Vishnu was being revived about this time in the Banavāsī area. Similarly we note Anantapāla the Mahāprachanda the Western Chālukya kingdom. This occasion may also be the one on which, according to the Eastern Chālukya records, Kulōttunga-Chōla-Dēva I pursued Vikramāditya VI from Nangali in Mysore to Manalur on the Tungabhadra (S I I, II 22)

Rebellion of Jayasimha
III

An event that seems to have disturbed Vikramāditya's rule to some extent seems to have been the rebellion of his younger brother Jayasimha III. He had been made, as we have seen, Yuvarāja by him and was ruling over the Banavāsī and other provinces, in fact all the territory as far as the southern ocean in 1079-1080 A D (Shikarpur 109, 293 and 297). In 1080 A D., he appears to have been on the most affectionate terms with his elder brother. As Sir John Fleet has suggested, the fact that there are no indications of his rule over these provinces after 1080 A D corroborates Bilhana's account that not long after his appointment, Jayasimha rebelled and was removed from office (Ibid 449). The rebellion was apparently nipped in the bud, for it does not appear to have produced any consequences adverse to Vikramāditya's fortunes. Sir John Fleet thinks that he probably died before Vikramāditya VI. At any rate, it is certain he did not succeed him on the throne. (Ibid 454)

Feudatories of Vikramā-
ditya

Among his other provincial rulers and feudatories were a few who are noticed by Sir John Fleet

The Mahāmandalēsvara Kīrtivarman II, of the family of the Kadambas of Hangal, who in A D 1076-1077 and the following year was ruling the Banavāsī twelve-thousand, the Mahāsāmatādhīpati, Mahāsēnādhīpati, Mahāpradhāna, and Dandanāyaka Barmadēva, who also in A D 1077-1078, was governing the Banavāsī twelve-thousand, the Sāntalige thousand, and the eighteen agrahāras, the Mahāmandalēsvara Munja, of the Sinda family who in A D 1082 was governing in the neighbourhood of Tīdgundi in the Bījāpur District, the worship of Tāra—the Mahāyāna form of Buddhism—was spreading in the land (See Chapter V above). Bahliṃ should at about this time have been not only a famous religious centre for every one who hears the dharma expanded there made a grant but also a beautiful and well known city rich with royal and religious associations. The many descriptions we have of it need not necessarily be treated as poetical exaggerations. These accounts of its beauty and greatness are in one sense less poetical and more matter of fact in character though a poetical turn is given to them by the poetical composers of inscriptions. Vikramāditya himself was attracted to the place near where at Banavāsi also called Jayantipura he was in residence in the 13th year of his reign and is even represented as ruling the kingdom from that place (Sorab 519 dated in the Chālukya-Vikrama year 13 Prajāpatti). Of course he should have resided at it as governor of Banavāsi during his younger days. The place was also a great centre for religious and philosophical training for all the main religions of the land were actually professed by its many inhabitants and at their mutts were eagerly taught and learnt. A fact to note in connection with them is that there appears to have been considerable good feeling among these differing religious sects as may be inferred from many of the inscriptions that have survived the ages of this place. If the kings were tolerant and entertained equal regard for all faiths, the people at large seem to have been no less eager to show their catholicity of feeling by the spirit of good fellowship they showed towards each other—a fact in striking contrast with what we note a century or two later. Learning was in high repute charity appears to have been proverbial and the desire for digging tanks or wells founding almshouses rest houses (śaṭras) building temples and providing for the maintenance of schools and religious centres seems

Gōvindaśa, who, under Anantapāla, was managing the melvattēya-Vaddaravula, the eradu bilkode, and the perjunta taxes in A D 1102-1103, and who subsequently was promoted to the offices of Mahādandanāyaka, Mahāsamantādhipati, Mahāpradhāna and in A D 1114-1115 and 1117-1118, was governing the Banavāsī twelve-thousand itself, Ballāla I, of the Hoysala family, for whom we have a date in A D 1103, the Mahāmandalēśvara Tailapa II, of the family of the Kadambas of Hangal, who was ruling the Panumagal five-hundred in A D 1103-1104 and 1107-1108, and the same district, with the Banavāsī twelve-thousand, in A D 1108-1109 and 1124-25, and probably both the districts again in A D 1125-1126, the Mahāmandalēśvara Yane-marasa, with the title of "Lord of Mahīshmatī, the best of towns," and belonging to the Ahihaya-vamsa, who in A D 1104-1105 was governing in the neighbourhood of Kammuravādi in the Nizām's Dominions, the Mahāsāmantādhipati, Mahāpradhāna, Bhanasaveygade, Dandanāyaka, and Achchupannayad-adhishthayaka Bammarasa, who in A D 1108-1109 was administering the pannaya-tax of the Nolambavādi thirty-two-thousand, the Mahāmandalēśvara Gandarāditya, of the Karad branch of the Silahara family, who was ruling his hereditary possessions in A D 1109-1110 and 1118-1119, the Pāndya Mahāmandalēśvara Tribhuvanamalla-Kamadēva, with the title of "lord of Gōkarna, the best of towns," and the designation of "ruler of the Konkana rāshtra," for whom we have a date in A D 1112, the Mahāpradhāna, Dandanāyaka, and *Kannada-Sandhivigraha*n or minister of peace and war for the Kanarese districts, Srīpatiyāśa, who in A D 1112-1113 was governing the Belvola three-hundred and the Peimādi, of the Western Ganga family, who in the same year was governing the Banavāsī twelve-thousand the Santalige thousand, a member of the Gutta family of Guttal, named Malla or Mallidēva, who is to be placed about A D 1115, the Mahāpradhāna and Dandanāyaka Nāgavaimayya, who was governing the Belvola three hundred, the Purigere three-hundred, and the Banavāsī twelve-thousand, in A D 1115-1116 and 1117-1118, the Hoysala Mahāmandalēśvara Vishnuvardhana, who in A D 1117 was ruling the Gangavādi ninety-six-thousand, the Mahāmandalēśvara Peimādi, of the Jimutavāhana lineage and the Khachara race, who was governing the Basuvura

tary called the Vitakshdja on Mann's famous laws lived at his imperial capital which with its ruler he has glorified in terms of high praise. (see above) Kalyana must have been a city of great joy and beauty at the time and Vikramāditya a prince who had proved himself a liberal patron of the arts and learning. Architecture received an impetus for many temples were founded during Vikramāditya's reign all over his vast territories and thus must have been evolved the famous Chalukyan style, which later in the hands of Hoysala architects and sculptors became the leading style in all Mysore and the adjoining Kannada districts of Bombay and Madras.

Vikramāditya appears to have had after the final defeat of his younger brother Jayasinha a comparatively peaceful rule. His free movements throughout his territories with prolonged stays at his different provincial capitals should have helped him in the easy and regular administration of his kingdom. He seems to have been on the whole well served by his generals, governors and ministers. He seems at any rate in the earlier campaigns to have led his armies in person though he appears to have been assisted by his skilled generals. The constant change of provincial governors, which is indicated in the many inscriptions of his long rule of nearly half a century shows that he seems to have relied on the political maxim do ut des. I give that you may give. They proved loyal to him because he gave them opportunities to distinguish themselves as much in war as in peace. The grades of provincial rule made it possible for him to promote his officers not only from one place to another but also from inferior to superior positions in succession and thus they were kept away from schemes or alliances inimical to himself and his house. As above mentioned, delinquent governors and generals were severely punished and had even their emoluments

Character of Vikramā-
ditya's rule

Bellary District, also dated in 1079 A.D., has, perhaps, to be identified with this Mahāmandalēsvara Joyimmarasa. (M A R 1920, Appendix B No 697) According to a third inscription, found at Konakondla, Gooty Taluk, Anantapur, this Joyimayyarasa was a Jain by faith and was entitled Pesanagaruda. His wife was Navikabbe, who built a Jain temple called Chutta-Jinālaya, at Kondakundeyatīta (modern Konakondla) for which her husband made a grant. This was in the 6th year of Vikramāditya's reign, i e, about 1081 A.D. Joyimayyarasa was also in charge of the divisions Edadore 2,000 and Kullakelage 500. The former has been identified by Sir John Fleet with a part of the modern Raichur District. Thus, it would appear, he had charge of the whole of Ādoni (Sindavādi) and parts of Anantapur and Raichur Taluks, with his capital apparently at Tumbalam. Other subordinates are mentioned in another inscription at the same place (Konakondla) in an inscription dated in 1087 A.D. These were the Mahāmandalēsvara Balaya-Chōla Mahāiāja, who was ruling the Sindavādi 1,000, apparently after Joyimayyarasa, and whose prasasti begins with the words charana-saroruha, etc., apparently of the Telugu-Chōla family (see M E R 1906, Appendix No 350 of 1905), the Mahāmandalēsvara Chiparasa of the Mahābali race and the Mahāsāmantas Chandarasa, Barmarāsa and Revarasa of Kondakunde whose prasasti coincides with that of the Chōlas of Cuddapah (E I XI, 343, No 3 and M A R 1916, Part II, Para 43). An inscription found at Karakantapuram, near Peda-Tumbalam, Bellary District, and dated in 1106 A.D., shows that Sindavādi was under the Mahāmandalēsvara Mallarasa who is recorded to have made a grant to the temple of Kara Kantēsvara at that place. His eulogy supplies the information that he was "a brilliant sun in dispelling the darkness, viz, the heroic enemy forces of the Chōla camp, crowded with hordes of elephants, horses and pleasing wife) His wives, apparently distributed over his different capitals, had ample provision made for them and they appear to have even, in some cases at least administered over parts of the territory granted to them for pin money. They seem to have been drawn from the families of dependent chiefs or high officials. Thus there was Savaladevi, daughter of the Mahawandalēśvara Jōgamarasa or Jōgamarana of the Suryavansa who is spoken of as the lord of the Darikadonād and the Mahāwandalēśvara of Mangalavāda (which may be the modern Mangalavād in the Bombay Presidency) and of his wife Tāradevi. In or about 1077-1078 A D she was managing the agrahāra of Nareyamaḡal identical with Narengaḡ in the Hangaḡ Taluk Dhārwar District which her husband had bestowed on her for her angabhōga which Sir John Fleet translates as pin money. Next we have Lakshmadevi who is invariably spoken of with the title of priyavasi or chief queen. She is mentioned in A D 1084-1085 as ruling at the capital of Kalyāna in 1095-1096 as ruling the eighteen agrahāras and the town of Dharmapura i.e. Dambal and in A D 1100-1110 and the following year as managing the village of Nitṭasingi. She was, according to inscriptions at Sudi Dambal and other places in Dhārwar District still alive in A D 1125-1126 the last year of Vikramāditya's reign. Next we have Jakkaladevi daughter of Tikka of the Kadamba stock. In 1093-1094 A D she was managing according to the tribhoga abhyantara siddhi, the village of Ingunige (identified with Ingalligi in the Nizām's Dominions, where in the Jain basadi, an inscription of hers has been found). Then we have Malleyamadēvi or Malayamatidēvi who in 1094-1095 A D was governing the district attached to the agrahāra of Kiriya Kereynr which is probably the modern Chikka Kerur in the Dhārwar District, where an inscription of hers has been found. Next we have Chandaladēvi who was also

Vikramāditya, and states that he was in charge of tolls of Kibbatti, apparently an important frontier post. (M E R 1914, Para 12 and Appdx B Nos 128 and 204). Another great minister of Vikramāditya was Kālidāsa Dandanātha, who had the titles Rājādhyaksha, Kadita-vergadde, Kannada-sandhivigrahi, Mahāprachanda Dandanāyaka, a scent-elephant of his father and the promoter of the prosperity of the Chālukya kingdom. His other name appears to have been Dandanāyaka Kālīmarasa, which seems a shortened form of Kālīmahārasa. He is mentioned in two inscriptions at Nāgai, Hyderabad State, dated in 1085 A D (M A R 1914-1915, Paras 70-74). He is described as possessed of a literary taste, as a great leader of the army, a Brihaspati in politics, a garuda in daring, etc. He appears to have belonged to the Banasa (or Vanasa) family and of the Vasishtha gōtra. Whether he is the same as the Mahāsāmanta Kāliyammarasa, of the Jimūtavāhana lineage and of the Khachara race, above mentioned by Sir John Fleet, who, in 1085-1086 A D, was governing the Basavara 140 division, is difficult to determine. It will be seen that though the names and the dates agree, the pedigrees differ. The Kālīmarasa of the Nāgai inscription was the son of Madhusūdana and Malaladēvi. Madhusūdana was the chief minister of Trailōkyamalla (i e., Sōmēsvara I), who, it is said, made him Yuvarāja, a rare distinction to confer on a Brāhman minister. He was also entitled Mahāprachanda-Dandanāyaka, Karnāṭaka Sandhivigrahi, promoter of prosperity of the Chālukya kingdom, etc. Madhusūdana's father was, it is stated, Dandādhipa Kālidāsa, who married Rebbanabbe, and was entitled Sangrāma Kanthirava. This Kālidāsa was, it would appear, the son of Gōvinda and Echikabbe and is said to have secured the kingdom to his lord Jayasimha, apparently Jayasimha II, the predecessor of Sōmēsvara I —when owing to the treachery of the Mahāsāmantas

(See U E R 1914 Appdx B 1913 No. 122. Also part II Para 12) Apparently she was present at the place at the time of the grant. Another queen of Vikramaditya is mentioned in an inscription at Sirugoppa Bellary District dated in 1091 1092 A.D. She is spoken of in it as Abhinavasarasvati Piriya Kotaladevi queen of Tribhuvanamalladevi. She is stated to have been a very learned lady and deeply accomplished in music. She was it would seem familiar with many languages. It was perhaps on this account she was known as Abhinavasarasvati. She is described as governing the three villages of Sirugoppa and the other villages in the Ballakundo 300 and Takkakallu 12 and making a gift providing for worship etc. in favour of the temple of Svayambhu Kotalavaradeva at Sirugoppa a temple apparently founded after herself. The Sambhulinga svami temple at Sirugoppa where the slab on which the inscription giving these particulars is found is perhaps the Svayambhu Kotalavaradeva temple founded by her. Her local subordinate the Sinda chief Mahāsānanta Mannaya Chokarasa, also made a gift to it on the occasion (U E R 1923 Appdx B 1922 No. 072 dated in Chulukya Vikrama year 16. Also Part II Para 21) Queen Chandaladevi mentioned by Sir John Fleet is referred to in an inscription dated in 1092 1093 A.D. found at Chinnatumbalam Bellary District in which the Mahāmandalesvara kaliga (or kalimamarasa) is described as the "mast elephant of Chandaladevi. The association of her name with this general who was governor of Hangal shows probably the interest taken by this royal lady in the administration of the country (U E R 1916 Appdx B 1915 No. 515 dated in Chulukya Vikrama year 17 and Part II Para 42) Another inscription at Chinnatumbalam dated in 1106 1107 A.D. mentions a grant by the chief queen Malayamatidevi who is described as piriyarasi pattamahādēvi. She is temple, etc. We are also told that a Brāhman of some rank, named Nārāyana Nāyaka, who was the protector of the charities made by the great Dandanāyaka (Kālīdāsa), caused the temples to be built agreeably to his master's orders, and that the sculptor who worked at the temple was one Nagōja, an expert in sculpture and other arts. Another grant in favour of the temple was made by Kālīdāsa and the Mahājanas and merchants of the place in 1092 A D. All the income was, under the arrangement made, to be deposited with respectable merchants and drawn upon for legitimate expenses (e g., providing for decorations, offerings, festival charges, repairs, etc.) for the service of the god (See M A R 1914-1915, Para 72-74). There can be hardly any doubt that this Kālīdāsa is different from the general of the same name mentioned in Shikarpur 114 dated in 1096 A D, who is described as the head-ornament of good warriors, a terror of the enemy and as the conqueror of different kings and the plunderer of their treasuries, elephants and horses, for he is spoken of as a Brāhman belonging to the Vatsa gōtra and the Kamme-kula. Another mahāprachanda dandanāyaka mentioned in an inscription dated in 1098 A D. (E C VII, Shikarpur 13) is Anantapāla.

Provincial
Rule

As regards the provinces in Mysore proper, in 1076 A.D., Banavāsī, Santalige and the eighteen agrāhūras were under the governorship of Baimadēvarasa (Shikarpur 124 and 135). He obtained in that year a grant for a basadi in Banavāsī, which had been established by Vikramāditya himself when he was governor in that province (Shikarpur 124). He was followed first by Gandamarasa (Shikarpur 111) and then by Vikramāditya's brother Jayasīma III. The latter seems to have been appointed about 1088 A D. He is praised in rather notable language. He is said to have so shot his arrows that they enough to have conferred the blessings of peace on his kingdom. The fact that his inscriptions are found literally in almost every village throughout his kingdom shows the practically undisputed sway he held over it. Active wise and tolerant he should have proved himself both popular and successful as a ruler. The last years of his long reign appear to have been marked by peace abroad and happiness at home. The chief political event of his reign was the rise of the Moysalas who under Bittiga (or Vishnuvardhana) drove the Chālas out of Talkad and later even defeated as we have seen Vikramāditya's troops at Honnegala near Hassan. His independence was virtually recognized by Vikramāditya.

By his many wives Vikramāditya seems to have had two sons and one daughter. The elder of the sons was probably Jayakarna by Chandaladevi. He seems to have governed according to inscriptions found in the Bijāpur and Belgaum Districts and in the Nizām's Dominions, dated in 1102, 1120 and 1121 A.D. in the more central parts of his father's kingdom. As no inscriptions of his reign have been found after 1121 A.D. either in this State or in the home parts of the Chālukyan territories Sir John Fleet has suggested that he probably died before his father (Ibid 450). The daughter Moilaladēvi (or Moilalamahidevi) by queen Moilelodevi was married to Jayakesin II of the Kadamba family of Goa. His other son Sōmāśvara III entitled Bhūlōkamalla and Sarvajña-Chakravartin, succeeded him on the Chalukya throne. He ruled from about 1120 A.D. to 1138-1139 A.D. There are a number of inscriptions of his reign mentioning him as Sōmāśvara or Bhūlōkamalla in the Shimoga and Chitaldrug Districts. (EO VII VIII and XII). In Tiptur 104 dated in 1130 A.D., he is referred to by both names combined (EC XII). He seems to have had a quiet and peaceful reign. He made,

Sōmāśvara
III Bhūlōka-
malla
Sarvajña
Chakravartin
1120-1138
A.D.

The Nāgaiahkhandā part of Banavāsī 12,000 was at first apparently under Vikramāditya's brother Jayasinha (Sagar 109 dated 1079 A D) He also was governor of the whole of Banavāsī 12,000, Santalige 1,000, etc His minister was Tambarasa, holding sway over Santalige 1,000 Under him was Māchi Rāja, the Royal Inspector, or Rājādhyaksha of the nād He was a Brāhman and had his capital at Andhasura, modern Anantapur, where he founded the temples of Māchīsvara, Āditya and Viṣṇu in 1079 A D

In 1123 A D Banavāsī and Kadambalige were under Tribhuvanamalla Pāndya-Dēva's governorship (E.C. XI, Davangere 1) It would seem as if Rāmaīya acted under Rudradēva The capital was at Jayantipura, or Banavāsī It is stated he appointed himself to it "by his own victory" He appears to have dug two tanks and granted them to god Tribhuvanamalla Pāndyēsvara, apparently named after himself. As Beltur (modern Bettur, between Harihar and Anaji in the Chitaldrug District), the locality of one of the tanks, is said to be in the Kadambalige 10,000, it might be inferred that Kadambalige 1,000 was the country round about it. A point of some interest in regard to the gifting of these two tanks is that it is proclaimed to the people of the locality in terms which recall to our minds the text of Asōka's famous edicts —

"He Tribhuvana Malla-Vallabha-Nāṇēndia-Dēva . being in good health commands all who are concerned,—you the vāśhīpati, viśhayapati, grama-kutana ayuktaka, nyuk- taka, ādhyakṣika, mahattara and all others, etc , etc "

Apparently the civil administration was a highly decentralized one in Vikramāditya's time Numerous inscriptions found in the Tumkur, Hassan, Kadur and Chitaldrug Districts show that they were included within the dominions, real or nominal, of Vikramāditya VI. An inscribed slab dated in 1000 A D (Kalayukti year), which includes

S masvara was apparently a man of some literary taste. He is known as the author of a Sanskrit work named Ibhilāṣitārtha Chintāmaṇi or Vanasollāsa which deals with a variety of topics including polity, administration of justice, medicine, elephants, alchemy, astrology, arms and rhetoric. The following description of it is given by Bhandarkar in his Early History of the Dekhan —

The book is divided into five parts. In the first are given the causes which lead to the acquisition of a kingdom; in the second those that enable the king to retain it after he has acquired it; in the third the kinds of enjoyment which are open to a king after he has rendered his power firm; in the fourth the modes of diversion which give mental pleasure; and in the fifth sports or amusements. Each of these consists of twenty kinds. In the first are included such virtues as shunning lies, refraining from injury to others, confidence, generosity, affability, faith in the gods, feeding and supporting the poor and helpless friends and adherents, etc. Under the second head are described what are called the seven angas i.e., the ideal king, his ministers including the priest and the astrologer, the treasury and the way of replenishing it, the army, etc. The enjoyments are—a beautiful palace, bathing, anointing, rich clothing, ornaments, etc. The diversions are military practice, horsemanship, training elephants, wrestling, cock fights, bringing up of dogs, poetry, music, dancing and others. The last class comprises sports in gardens and fields, or on mountains and sand banks, games, enjoyment of the company of women, etc. In connection with these subjects there are few branches of learning or art in Sanskrit the main principles of which are not stated. We have polity, astronomy, astrology, dialectics, rhetoric, poetry, music, painting, architecture, medicine, training of horses, elephants and dogs, etc. The king does appear to have been a man of learning, and it was on that account that he received the title of Sarvajñabhūpa or the all-knowing king. In the Mānasollāsa in connection with the preparation of an almanac the day used as an epoch from which to calculate the positions of certain heavenly bodies is stated as Friday the beginning of the month of Chaitra one thousand is mentioned as ruling under Chālukya suzerainty Nannī tiaces in this inscription his descent from the Gangas and his adopted mother Chattaladēvi is described as building the Panchakūta basti She is again referred to in Tirthahalli 192 dated in 1103 A.D. In Sagar 80 dated in 1096 A.D., Rāya Santara is described as governing the Santalige under the suzerainty of Vikramāditya Under him was Sirivarma, from whom was descended Pergade Nāgavarma His brother was the minister Kanna, who at the bidding of Santara chief Tailappa is said to have extirpated the hostile army and established himself He was styled Bilankakāia (warrior with the bow). Bhārati herself is said to have inscribed his name "Billanka-Rāya" on pillars all round the world! Similarly Humcha recognized the suzerainty of Vikramāditya (E.C. VI Koppa 43, dated about 1090 A.D.)

Nolambavādi 36,000 continued as before under Chālukya rule as a province It included the modern Chitaldrug and a portion of Tumkur Districts (see ante) An inscription of Vikramāditya has been found on the Nagapade rock on the Jatinga Rāmēsvara hill, Molakalmuru Taluk in the extreme north of the State (M.A.R. 1908-1909, Para 155)

Kālāmukha
Saiva
Revival

The Saiva cult seems to have received further impetus during this reign in the Banavāsī, Nolambavādi and the adjacent provinces The Kālāmukha ascetics grew more and more into royal favour and the gifts of land and villages made to them increased their popularity. Several temples devoted to Siva came to be built in the Banavāsī province. Though Vikramāditya VI was probably a Jain in religion—he is, as stated above, said to have even built a basadi when he was governor of Banavāsī—he favoured the Kālāmukhas. Some of his many wives also were probably adherents of the Saiva increased his fame by capturing his elephant (E C VI Davangere 85) The Hoysala king referred to should have been Nārasimha I But according to Sorab 414 (dated in 1139 A D) we hear of Bittiga (or Vishnu vardhana) having siege to Hannagal just beyond the Shunoga border in Dhārwar (E C VIII) During his reign Vira Pandya was still ruling over Nolambavadi (E C VI Davangere 85 and E C VII Channagiri 38 and 39) His senior hannada minister for war and peace Bamina Devarasa was governing Banavasa in 1147 A D (E C VII Shikarpur 267) He is referred to as Bommanayya in Sorab 333 dated about 1140 A D (E C VII) He was also his general His son Dandanayaka Recharasa was ruling over Sindavadi in the 11th regnal year of Jagadēka malla (M E R 1916 Para 43 Appendix B 1915 No 503) In an inscription assigned by Mr Rica to about 1145 A.D (E C VIII Sorab 07) Gorava Devarasa is described as the lord of Banavāsi-pura who among other things is credited with having dedicated 48 temples to Siva and Vishnu performed 18 horse sacrifices and having set up a pillar of rock crystal on the great peak of the Himavat mountains As regards the local Cholas Irungola's son Malla (or Malli Deva) surnamed Jagadēka malla, evidently after his suzerain ruled over Henjara and the surrounding country (E C VII Pavagada 43 see also M E R for 1913 Para 19) The Malli Deva is like his father termed Chōla Mahārāja. A feudatory of the latter was Tantrapala Neman who held charge of Nidngal where he built a temple of Nagesvara and a tank and donated it to one Chandrābharana Pandita apparently a Kālāmukha teacher (E C VII Pavagada 43) Jagadēkamalla Pāndyadēva was ruling over the Nolambavadi 82 000 in the 10th year of this king's reign. In his 9th and 11th years, Jagadēkamalla Vira Pāndya Dēva is represented as ruling over it Apparently Pāndya Dēva was also known as the Kuntala land—the name by which Banavāsī and the neighbourhood went in ancient days (Shikarpur 98 dated in 1103 A D.). Of the Saktiparshe, Kēdara-sakti is to be the agranī or chief. He is called Yatipati in the above quoted inscription. He may have been, if not its actual founder, at least the head at the time, i e, about the beginning of the 12th century A D (Ibid). His disciple was Śīkanta, described as the “faultless” and as “praised by the learned”. He is said to have understood the paramātmāgama, and he is spoken of as skilled in overpowering eloquence and as distinguished by all the āchārya qualities and as having practised several penances. He is described as another Lakulīsa, i e, an incarnation of Lakulī, the founder of the Pāsūpata sect. His disciple was Sōmēśvara, who is praised both as a great muni and as a distinguished poet (Shikarpur 99 dated 1113 A D). He is said to have made the Lakulāsiddhānta to blossom. He was the recipient of a grant from the local ruler for the repairs of the Kēdarēśvara temple at Baligrāma and for the supply of sandal, flowers, incense, lights, offerings, and all manner of services, and for the food of the ascetics and others there, in the Chālukya-Vikrama 37, when Vikramāditya VI was ruling at Kalyāna. Sōmēśvara yati was apparently a great pacifist, for we see him described as one to whom war appeared as tears, and a battle as filled with demons. He was apparently something of an orator, for it is said of him that he was “a delight to speakers” (Ibid). The temple of Kēdarēśvara is described in high flown language in several of the inscriptions of this period. Shikarpur 100 says that the god Kēdara at Balligāve, thinking with supreme benevolence on his faithful worshippers, afraid of the cold and unable to make that distant pilgrimage, frees them from all sins here. At the Kēdarnāth, on the Himālayas, the presiding priest is a Jaṇigama from the Mysore State. (Imperial Gazetteer, Old Edn VIII 109)

father. The records are dated in the 5th and 6th years of the Jagadekamalla era (i.e. in 1111 and 1115 A.D.). Bhutarasa, one of his Mahatman-lakshanas is said to have fallen in a fight, as testified to by an epigraph dated in his 13th year (at Devagudi in the Kurnool District (V.H.R. 1906 Para 10 Appendix No. 117 of 1905). With the aid of the Sindas he seems to have vanquished several of his neighbours. Permadi I of the Sinda family is described as vanquishing Kulasekaranka, besieging Chatta, poroing Jayakam and seizing upon the royal power of the Hoyala who was foremost among fierce rulers of the earth and as going to the mountain passes of the "Marander" Butiga (i.e. Vishnuvardhana of the Hoyala line) besieging D rasamudra pursuing him till he arrived at and took the city of Belopura and driving him on as far as the mountain pass of Vahadi (Ibid 159). Bujala (or Bhyana) of the Kalachurya line who usurped the Chalukya throne in the reign of Somesvara IV appears as a contemporary of Jagadekamalla II. Vijaya Pandya Deva is said in certain records to have been ruling over Nolambavadi 12000 under Bujala. It has been inferred from this statement that Bujala must have held some high office under Jagadekamalla II (Ibid 159).

An era of Jagadekamalla is also known from certain of his inscriptions, (E.C. VIII Sorab 253 dated about 1141 A.D. 422 dated in 1112 A.D.—his 3rd year). The first year of this era according to Sir John Fleet was the Siddhārtin Samvatsara = A.D. 1139 (Loc cit 157).

There is an interesting description of the Kuntala country (country round N.W. of Mysore State) in an inscription dated about 1115 A.D. in this king's reign (E.C. VIII Sorab 138). If it is in any extent typical of the peace and contentment that the provinces enjoyed during the latter part of the Chalukya rule it ought to Dandanāyaka, in 1098 (Shikarpur 13) directing the manager of the Vaddaravula Sunka of Banavāsī to remit a certain portion of the taxes for the god Viṣṇu in what is here called the Maṇasinga Begur agrāhāra. From Shikarpur 131, we note Īsvarayya Nāyaka, the minister for war and peace, making a grant in 1104 for the god Narasiṃha and all the other ministers and king's servants contributing certain amounts every year.

Description of Baligāmi

In Shikarpur 106, dated in 1098 A.D., we have an interesting picture of Baligāmi, the capital of the Banavāsī 12,000. The royal city, we are told, was like the twining curls (kuntala) of the lady of the Kuntala country, "with clusters of lotus, with swarms of bees, with mango groves filled with beautiful swans, parrots and cuckoos, surrounded with climbing betel vines, areca palms, bignonias and muchukunda." We are told in Shikarpur 98 and 99, dated in 1103 and 1113 A.D., that there were three purās (or townships) in Baligāmi, and five mathas, the names of the āchāryas presiding over the latter being given. There appears to have been at the head of the town a mayor, called pattana sāvī (or swāmi). The Buddhists seem to have held their place in it equally with the Jains, Saivas, and Vaiṣnavas. For in a grant dated in 1098 A.D. (Shikarpur 106) we see Nāgīyakka the sāvāsī of the Baudha temple at the place, is cited as a witness to it together with other leading men of the place. That the Buddhists were still powerful in the land and that Buddhism was still a leading religion of the people is also clear from the Dambal inscription of 1095 A.D., which, as above mentioned, records grants to Vihāras of Buddha and Ārya-Tārādēvi at that town, Tārādēvi being the very goddess which, as we have seen, was the goddess set up by Nāgīyakka at Baligāmi in 1067 A.D. (Shikarpur 169 and 170, dated in 1067 A.D. and 1065 A.D.) Apparently the records a grant in his sixth regnal year, the cyclic year Yura. He therefore appears to have succeeded to the throne about the beginning of 1150 A D a conclusion which is fully in accordance with other evidence adduced by Sir John Fleet. (Loc cit 450) There is an inscription of his dated in 1151 A D (E C VIII Sorab 1161) another dated in his 11th regnal year (Sorab 520) which is a Utrakal and a third in his 9th regnal year (Sorab 290). He had been nominated yuearja by his father apparently in preference to his elder brother. An inscription dated in Chalukya Vikrama year 57 (1132 A D) actually refers to him as Yavaraja Tailapadēva. (V & R. 1916 Appdx B No. 502) Under him in 1156 A D Mahadevarasa was ruling the Banavasi 12 000 associated with Bijjana i.e. Bijjala Deva. (E C VII Shikarpur 101) This Mahadevarasa is mentioned in E C VIII Sorab 510 dated in 1151 A D and is described as Taila's great minister Senādhipati Hergade Dandanāyaka etc. In another inscription which has been assigned by Mr Rice to 1161 A D but which may be dated a year or two earlier Taila III is described as ruling in unparalleled glory apparently because of the successes attained by Bijjala whose usurpation was becoming an accomplished fact. (Shikarpur 108) What is more Taila is called a double of Ravana tenfold of Dasasthabhuja (i.e. kārtavīryārjuna) a hundred fold of Rama a hundred fold of Mahesa — hyperbolic language is employed to show that Bijjala's victories had brought renown to his sovereign Davangere 35 assigned by Mr Rice to about 1160 A D but which may be two years later speaks of the ever valiant Nurmadi Taila whose fame was like a brilliant moon. This inscription also mentions Bijjala and quoting the text that the Earth is for the enjoyment of the brave remarks that that saying had not proved false for, it adds, Bijja (i.e., Bijjala) had subdued to have been at its height during this period. The Vēdantic school had come into prominence, the Kālāmukha ascetics were spreading the tenets of the Pāsupata faith and helping towards the Saiva revival that was shortly to come, and the Vaiṣṇavite faith was, as it were, showing signs of reawakening even at the centre of the strongest Saiva cult at the time. Poets must have flourished and some of the poetry composed by them must have been good, if the descriptions enshrined in the extant texts of inscriptions are any real guide to their probable excellence in other directions. One inscription (Nagai 35) dated in 1077 A.D. in Vikramāditya's reign shows that long before this period Rājasekhara, Bhāṇavi, Bāna, Mayūra, Vālmīki, Kālidāsa and Vyāsa were well-known in this part of India. The same inscription is witness to the existence of numerous Jaina philosophical and other literary works in it. Teaching appears to have been prized as much as learning. A Jain teacher was called Srīvijaya, we are told, "from giving sāstras to the learned and their needs to the destitute" (Ibid). The poet who composed Shikarpur 98 and 99 calls himself an āsu-kavi or impromptu poet and an ati-patu-kavi, a very fast poet. His name was Malli-deva or Mallikārjuna of Gobbur, who was, besides, an adept at mnemonic feats. If two from two different sides should together come writing it down from the end and reading it out, he would arrange the poem so read out, whatever it might be, as a new poem, would repeat four stories from hearing them (simultaneously) repeated, and make calculations in any given figures. He is called avadharana-chakravarti and dharana-sārvabhauma, also a Nītalaksha and a Shanmukha among good poets. Bilhana flourished at Vikramāditya's court and wrote its annals in his Vikramankadēvacharita in which we have a picture of his times. The great Hindu lawyer (or rather glossator) Vijnanesvara, who wrote the commenfor the rite of severing the throats of his enemies let him go from goodwill produced by his devotion. Taila appears to have been under complete subjection till Saka 1079 (1157 A D), when he fled to Annigero in the Dhārwar District. As there is an inscription in Saka 1079 Cycle year Isvara (1159 A D) in Bijjala's name and the next year Bahuddnya is spoken of as his second year 1158 1157 A D may be fixed as the year of Bijjala's usurpation. Taila seems later to have gone further south and established himself at Banavasi. This must have been before 1162 1163 A D before which he should have died the date of the Anumakonda inscription of Rudradeva in which the fact that he was then dead is mentioned (Bombay Gazetteer 223 462). A few steps in this eventful revolution may be noted to indicate its general nature. A Bijapur inscription dated in 1151 A D mentions Bijjala as a founder of Taila III. He had under him Dandanāyaka Mailārayya governing Tardavadi 1000 i.e. the country around Bijapur (Sir John Fleet loc cit., 460). Dandanāyaka Mahādōvarasa is, in Sorab 504 dated in 1154 A D described as Taila's great minister. But in Shikarpur 104, dated 1156 A D he is spoken of as governing Banavasi under Bijjala. In this inscription Bijjala is further described as a Mahāmandaleśvara ruling all the countries putting down the evil and upholding the good. Mahādōvarasa is besides spoken of as Bijjala's Mahā-prachanda-dandanāyaka. This would seem to show that Mahādōvarasa had transferred his allegiance to Bijjala and had become his Dandanayaka by about 1156 A D. He apparently should have had a hand in effecting the revolution in favour of Bijjala. Associated with him were apparently four Karanas chief revenue officers, Potarasa, Chattamarasa Padmarasa and Savarasa who we are told, were the embodiments of the mind of Bijjala wishing stores in granting the desires of their dependents sons in dispersing the darkness the cut off This was the more easy to do as because of the fair treatment that was accorded to the generality of them There is hardly any doubt that in this he was following well established practice, but there is at the same time equally no room for suspicion that he improved on it by giving his trust unreservedly and receiving it ten-fold from his subordinates and feudatories It is on some such basis as this that we could at all explain the mystery of his personal rule over a territory extending from near the Gōdāvarī in the north to the Cauvery in the south and the sea on the west to the borders of the Eastern Chālukyan territory on the east A point of some interest is that even those who were really independent kept up forms of friendly intercourse which were indistinguishable from those of feudatories The Hoysalas were a notable example of this type of nominal feudatories, a position that diplomatically should have proved mutually beneficial It argues no little political instinct on the part of Vikramāditya to have followed in this matter a peaceful policy with his neighbours He may be set down as the antithesis of the normal old-world ruler who revelled in war and forgot peace. A great soldier and general, Vikramāditya seems to have grasped the fundamental fact that all war is intended for securing lasting peace and once it was attained, there was no further need for war The progress of the arts—especially temple architecture—and learning during his rule amply testify to the peace that his kingdom should have enjoyed

His domestic
life

In the domestic sphere Vikramāditya should have been equally fortunate As we have seen above, Bilhana mentions the fact that he possessed four wives The inscriptions mention as many as six He may have had some more Vikramāditya was apparently a believer in the old tag, domus et placens axor (i.e., a house and apparently the last year of Bijjala's reign, he is described as Maharājādhirāja paramāvara, paramabhattāraka

Bhujabala chakravartī, 'Tribhuvanamalla' etc., some of which titles are among the full titles of the Chālukya kings. There is little doubt, as Sir John Fleet has observed that Bijjala assumed after his usurpation beginning from 1155-1156 A.D. practically all the titles of the ruling sovereign whose position appears to have been reduced to one of a purely titular character. The advance of Taila III towards Banavasi in about 1163 A.D. spoken of above may be taken to suggest that the trouble arose in the Banavasi area where the local chiefs had apparently declared themselves in favour of Bijjala (Shikarpur 104). The mention of the Chālukya capital being at Halyāna in the reigns of Taila III and Jagadekamalla III would seem to indicate that these princes were probably reconciled to their dethronement and preferred to stay at their established capital. The causes that contributed to Bijjala's revolution are nowhere definitely mentioned though hints are not wanting that it was the weakness of Taila and the martial prowess of Bijjala that directly contributed to it. Apparently it was the case of an ambitious and crafty soldier with pretensions to nobility of some kind dethroning his own sovereign and declaring himself the ruler of the land. Nothing is more significant than the language of Shikarpur 92 dated in 1167-1168 A.D. which states that the Earth which had been for long reduced to the condition of a cow through the stupidity of Prithvi was chosen the crowned queen of Bijjana-Dēva likewise, we are told like the jewel which covered up under the lord of the sea shore became kausthubha on Vishnu's breast so by the king's choice she (the Earth) became as renowned. These significant words and phrases throw light on the nature of the revolution effected by Bijjala. His was a semi political, semi military revolution effected partly by the strength styled priyarasi, and in one passage (referred to by Sir John Fleet) agrahamāmahishī. She has been identified with Bilhana's Chandaladēvi and Chandialēkha and according to him she was the daughter of one of the Silahara princes of Karad—probably of Mānasimha. She is spoken of in 1102-1103 A.D., as the mother of Jayakārṇa and in the following as causing certain grants to be made to the god Kēsavadēva at the agrahāra of Ruddavādi, identified with the place of that name in the Nizām's Dominions. Sir John Fleet has suggested that she is the Chandala, who is described in the Rājataranginī (Calcutta Edition VII 1122) as the wife of King Parmandi (i.e., Permanadi, an old title of Vikramāditya) the lord of Karnāta, of whom Harsha of Kāshmir, among his other follies, became enamoured through seeing a portrait, and contemplated acquiring possession of her by destroying Vikramāditya VI. (Sir John Fleet, Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, 449 f n 3). Next we have Malaladēvi or Malika, daughter of Sanabova (i.e., Shanabhōga) Rāyana and his wife Olajikabbe, who is mentioned in an inscription dated in 1113-1114 A.D., at Yalawatti in Hangal Taluk, Dhārwar District. Another of his queens Engaladēvi is said to be referred to in an inscription found at Belambigi in the Nizām's Dominions but Sir John Fleet is not quite sure whether she was a wife of Vikramāditya VI or some one else. There is, however, no doubt, that at least two other queens of his are mentioned in two recently discovered inscriptions in the district of Bellary. One of these was Padmaladēvi, who made a grant in favour of the Navamala temple at Rangāpura in Hadagalli Taluk in 1116-1117 A.D. It is stated that she was induced to make the gift while "ruling with pleasurable conversation" with the Brāhmanas of the place. Mangola is probably represented by Rangāpura, where the temple to which the grant was made still exists, with the inscribed slab set up in it.

(Virasaiva or Lingāyat) creed at Kalyana. He retired in favour of his son in 1167 A D and shortly afterwards appears to have been put to death. His son did not prove himself as capable as himself and thus the way was opened for a counter revolution which ended as described below in the restoration though only for a brief period of the Chalukya power under Sōmasvara IV.

There are a number of inscriptions which refer to a Jagadekamalla who seems to have succeeded at least in name, Taila III. He appears to have ascended the throne though perhaps only to rule as nominal sovereign in 1161 A D. Davangere 43 which is dated in the eighth year (in words) of the Kalachurya year corresponding to the Cyclo year Subhānu refers itself to the reign of Jagadekamalla III. The exact relationship of Jagadekamalla III to Taila III is not known probably he was his elder son who has not been so mentioned by the genealogists, his other son being Sōmēśvara IV surnamed Tribhuvanamalla. He is, in the conventional language of the poet who composed Davangere 43 described as of matchless valour though this description is coupled with the name of the mighty king Bijjala which indicates what he was (EC XI). He is called Chalukya Chakrēśvara, in the inscription above quoted. In Davangere 77 dated in Saka 1087 Cyclo year Pārthiva (1165 A.D.) he is given the full Chālnkya titles and called Pratāpa Chakravartī. His feudatory Vijaya Pandya Dēva is said in it to have been governing the Nelambavadi 82 000 with Uchchangi as his capital. In another inscription dated in 1167 A D he is termed as Chālnkya-Chakravartī and in (EO XII) Chiknāyakan halli 48 dated in 1178 A.D. as Bhuvallebbha-Raya-Per mādi Dēva. In (EO VI) Kadur 80 dated in Saka 1092 (1170 A D) he is mentioned as Tribhuvanamalla Per mādi Rāya and as ruling from Kalyāna. In Kadur 87 88 and 86

stated to have owned—evidently in her own right—the capital town of Tumbala itself and to have granted it to the mahājanas of the place so that they might maintain a commentator on the Sāstras, the reader of the Purānas, the teacher of the Rig-Vēdu and the Yajur-Vēda and of the Brāhmaṇa of the Agnishtoma, besides a feeding house (satīa)

His probable change of faith

It has been suggested above that Vikramāditya was probably professing Jainism in his early age while he was yet a governor. In later life, he seems to have been a Saivite or at least one not disinclined to view it with favour. However it be, there are at least a few inscriptions which refer to Saiva teachers as his gurus, they being called in fact Rāja-gurus. A Nāgaṇi inscription at Kallattipura, Tarikere Taluk, (E.C. VI, Tarikere 34-35), which is undated but assigned to 1080 A.D. by Mr. Rice, refers to one such guru who is called Nijarudiapāda. He is described in the inscription as in some way connected with Vikramāditya, probably as guru. The inscription is on a rock around the Viṇabhadra temple at the place and states that he erected a temple (probably the Viṇabhadra temple) and set up the linga. An inscription found at Chinnatumbalam, Bellary District, dated in 1079-1080 A.D., mentions the Rājaguru Sōmēsvara Pandita (M.E.R. 1916, Appdx B 519). In an inscription found at Guruzala, dated in 1111 A.D., there is mention made of the Rājaguru Anantasivadēva, and he is described as being in charge of two villages called Unakalu and Gurindalu, the latter of which is probably represented by modern Guruzala.

His personal traits

The reign of Vikramāditya should, on the whole, have been a prosperous one. He was undoubtedly the greatest of his line. Though distracted by war in the early part of his reign, he seems to have gained successes

Malli Deva who apparently had passed under the yoke of the usurper Bijjala and so just kept up the appearance of acknowledgment to the Chalukya Emperor (See V. E. R. 1917 Part II Para 11) The Jagadekamalla mentioned in the inscription at Madhudi Anantapur District (V. E. R. 1918 Appendix B 732 dated in Saka 1091 Cyclic year Irodhi (A D 1169) should accordingly be identified with Jagadekamalla III and not with Taila III as suggested by Mr H Krishna Sastri (V. E. R. 1918 Part II, Para 9) This is also an inscription recording a grant by the Telugu Chola chief Malli Dēva son of Irungola. Malli Deva's minister was Ilirya Tantrapāla Nāmana, the person mentioned in E. C. XII Pavagada 43 (see above) Similarly the Jagadekamalla ruling from Kalvāna mentioned in the Madalavada inscriptions (M. E. R. 1919 Appendix B 1918 No 257), dated in the 4th year of Raja Nārāyana Ahavamalla Bijjala's son (A D 1183-1184) should also be identified with Jagadekamalla III In this view of the matter Mr Krishna Sastri's suggested identification with Taila III has to be given up (See V. E. R. 1919 Part II Para 34) As Jagadekamalla is mentioned in inscriptions as late as 1203 A D as stated above, it is possible he continued to rule with his brother Somesvara IV The break of twenty years between 1163 A D the latest date of Taila III who appears to have died in or about that year and 1183 A D the earliest date of Somesvara IV has been ascribed by Sir John Fleet to Kalachurya usurpation In the Tolugu Chola Pāndya and Hoysala records no such break is, as we have seen recognized and the ruling Chālukya king (whether Taila III or Jagadekamalla III) is mentioned as the sovereign Bijjala and his son Ahavamalla being at the same time set down as actually governing the kingdom The position of the Chālukya sovereign seems much like a roi faineant and no more during this period the actual powers of the sovereign in the 3rd year of his reign, a digvijaya to the Banavāsī province and was encamped at the Hullinatīrta. Here he confirmed a grant in favour of the Kālāmukha temple at Balagāmi, which had been made by the Kadamba governor of the place (Shikarpur 100, dated in 1129 A D). The fortune of the Kēdaramatha was, we are told in this inscription, planted through Sōmēsvara; through Vamasakti it threw out branches, spread abroad and blossomed, and then through Gautama it bore fruit. Banavāsī in his time was ruled by the Kadambas (Sorab 141) while the Pāndyas (under Vira-Pāndya) continued to govern Nolambavādī with their capital at Uchchangī fort (E C XI, Davangere 4), and the Chōla feudatories Iṅgola and others, the territories in the north-east. His mahāpradhāna and Kannāḍa Sandhi Vighraha in 1129 A D was Bhoga Bhattāya. This general and minister was apparently enjoying the Vaddaravula tax of the $7\frac{1}{2}$ lakh country and Banavāsī 12,000. Mahādandanāyaka Chōladandēva was, at about this time, governor of Nolambavādī 32,000 (M E R 1919, Appdx B No 234). His chief minister in 1131 A D was Anantapālāya. (M E R, 1914, Appdx No 230). He is also called Sēnādhipathi. In 1134 A D., his chief minister was Sandhare Ganganda Garudhi Setti, a merchant (M E R 1920, Appdx No 699). The Haihayas were also his feudatories (M E R 1910, Appdx No 596 dated in 1129 A.D). He started an era of his own called Bhūlōkamalla era, which did not last beyond his reign. It began in the last year of Vikramāditya's reign. Sorab 289 (E C VIII) dated in 1138 A D, is dated in this era. During his reign, the Kālāmukhas were in high favour (E C VII, Shikarpur 100, M E R 1919 Appdx Nos 277, 278 and 204 of 1918). His capital, throughout his reign, was Kalyāna. During his reign, there was little change in the territorial extent of the kingdom.

seen above was one of the principal capitals of Vikramāditya VI. At the date of this inscription it is impossible that Somēśvara IV had regained his kingdom. That event seems to have taken place some thirteen years later. The statement that he was ruling at Kalyāna at about this time must perhaps be explained as the use of conventional language on the part of the composer of the inscription. The fact seems to be that he was resident at Annigera in the present Dhārwar District, which is described in an inscription dated in 1181-1185 A.D. and found at the place as Rājadhāni pattana or Royal capital city while Kalyāna is mentioned as the neleridu or capital at which Somēśvara was reigning according to an inscription dated in 1185. Cycle year Viśvāvasu month Isiṃja (September-October) found at Hodal in the Nizām's Dominions. This latter inscription is cited as of the fourth year of Somēśvara IV. Accordingly Sorab 419 (E.C. VIII) which is dated in 4th year of his reign cycle year Sōbhakṛitu may be assigned to 1183-1184 A.D. Shikarpur 249 (E.C. VII) dated in the 5th regnal year of Somēśvara cycle year Viśvāvasu (Chaitra Bahula 14) is a few months earlier than the Hodal inscription. The first regnal year of Somēśvara IV seems apparently reckoned from the date of his accession to the Chālukya throne after the counter revolution effected by him. The earlier dates being referable to his nominal rule from at Kalyāna or really from Annigera over a small part of his inherited kingdom. The date of the counter revolution should therefore be fixed somewhere about the year 1179-1180 A.D. The terminology used in certain of his inscriptions from about that date fully confirms this view. Thus in Sorab 419 (E.C. VIII) which refers itself to his fourth regnal year (or 1123-1124 A.D.), he is described as Chālukyābharana or ornament to the Chālukya race. In Shikarpur 249 (E.C. VII) dated in his and fifty-one years of Saka having elapsed, the year of the cycle being Saumya, while the king Sōma, the ornament of the Chālukya race, who was the very sage Agastya, to the ocean of the essences of all the Sāstras, and whose enemies were destroyed, was ruling over the sea-begirt earth. This work, therefore, was written in the fourth year after his accession.

The title of Sarvajña or all-knower attributed to Sōmēsvara (E C XI, Davangere 41) and the statement that he had been "lauded by all learned men" are therefore not without foundation.

Jagadĕkamalla, Perma, 1138-1150
A D

Sōmēsvara III was succeeded by the elder of his two sons, Jagadĕkamalla, entitled Perma, Permaḍi, or Permaḍi-Dēva. He also seems to have borne the further title of Pratāpa-Chakravartī (E C VII, Sorab 233 dated in 1139 A D, E C XII, Pavagada 43, dated about 1150 A D). That he possessed this title is known from other sources as well (Sn John Fleet, Bombay Gazetteer 456). A number of his inscriptions have been found in the Shimoga and Chitaldrug Districts. During his reign Kalyāna continued to be the capital (E C XII, Pavagada 43). He is described in an inscription dated in 1143 A D, as Kuntala Rāya and as frightening and driving away in alarm the Chōla king in battle and to have made the Chōlnela (i.e., the Chōla country) to be as if an āl-nela (i.e., slave or servant country). This apparently refers to some fresh aggression on the part of the Chōlas and of his inflicting a defeat on them. His defeat of the Chōlas is confirmed in an inscription dated about 1161 A D, in the reign of his brother Taḷa III. In this record it is stated that he chained with his arm the vast armies of the Chōla and Guṇjara kings and captured their herds of elephants and troops of horses and wealth (E C Shikarpur 103). Similarly we are told that he is said to have attacked the Hoysala king and to have faith His son Sūmesvara was not as capable as himself and some of his feudatories were alienated by his wanton excesses This gave the opportunity to Somesvara IV and his followers to subvert the usurping Kalachurya line As Sir John Fleet has pointed out they owed their success to a Mantrin and Dandanāyaka or minister and commander of the forces called Brahma also called Bamma Baimmarasa, Banainadeva etc One record at Ahbur in the Dhārwar District styles him Chālukya rājya pratishṭāpaka the establisher of the Chālukya sovereignty Another at Annigere dated in 1181-1185 A D says plainly that the position of Somesvara IV was secured for him by Brahma and adds that the latter a fire of death to the Kalachuryas seized the whole earth for the purpose of making the Chālukyas lords of all the world A Hoysala inscription found at Gadsg dated in 1192 A.D states that Brahma took away the sovereignty from the Kalachuryas and that he did so by seducing the allegiance of some of the Kalachurya forces which were under the command of his own father This is rendered clear partly by the statement in a Hoysala record that Brahma had acted in contempt of his father (nyakkurena pituh) and partly by a Harihara inscription which mentions his father having as a Danda nāyaka of the Kalachurya king Sankama (second son of Bijjala, who succeeded Sūmesvara in 1176 A D) and describes him as Kalachurya rājya samuddharana the upraiser of the Kalachurya sovereignty There is besides a Balagāmi inscription dated in 1179 A D which speaks of him as the commander in-chief of all the forces of Sankama (samasta sena agresaram) Brahma himself is in a record of 1175 A D mentioned as Mahāpradhāna Sānādhipati and Dandanāyaka of the Kalachurya king Sovidēva (or Sūmēsvara) Sir John Fleet has suggested that it was evidently this position which Brahma probably continued to hold under Sovidēva's brothers and successors

Vīra-Pāndya-Dēva His capital was at Uchchangī. The Sinda chief Irmadī-Bhīma governed Sindavādī (modern Adōnī, etc.) A grant by his younger brother Rāchamalla to the Saiva teacher Nīvanidēva of the Ēlkoṭī-chakravartī matha at Sindagere is referred to in an inscription at Sindagere, Bellary District (M.E.R. 1914, Appendix B for 1913, No. 206). The grant is dated in Jagadēkamalla's 4th regnal year and states that the donee was the pupil of one Vāmadēva of the Kālāmukha sect and presiding priest of the Svayambhudēva temple at Mulugunda. Vāmadēva is described as well-versed in all sāstras, such as grammar, logic, philosophy, literature, drama, medicine, lexicography, etc. Apparently he was a great and well-known scholar of the time. Irmadī Bhīma and his brother were, according to another inscription, (Ibid. No. 211 dated in Jagadēkamalla's 10th regnal year), ruling over the Ballakunde-nādu and built certain temples at Kolur. An interesting fact mentioned in this record is that the Kuntala country of seven-and-a-half lakhs (of villages?), i.e., the Rattapādī of earlier years, over which the Western Chālukyas claimed suzerainty, was first ruled by the Mauryas of the Nanda and Gupta races and after them by the Rāshtrakūṭas. This statement is also made in E.C. VII, Shikaripur 225, where it is stated that the Kuntala country was ruled by the Nava Nandas of the Guptakula Maurya kings and then by the Rattas. (See also above).

Jagadēkamalla had several other feudatories and subordinates under him (Sir John Fleet, Bombay Gazetteer 457-459). Some of these are mentioned in recently found inscriptions. Mahāpradhāna Śrīkaraṇa Heṇḷala Sandhivigraha and Sēnapatī Kēsīnayya, son of Kamma Nāyaka, are referred to in two inscriptions (M.E.R. 1920 Appendix B, 696 and 701, see also M.E.R. 1916, Appendix B, 549 dated 1143-4). His son Dandanāyaka Chīyamarasa was ruling over Sindavādī-nādu under his

at Malakapuram in the Bellary District. (M E R 1916 Appdx B 1995 No 555) It is dated in Saka 1106 cyclic year Arōdhin kṛtika new moon or 1184 A D It gives to Sōmesvara the titles of Trailokyamalla Bhujabalaśīra and Rāyamurāri the latter apparently appropriated from the defeated Kalachurya. In this inscription a genealogical account is given of Brahma (Bammideva) his son Padmideva and the latter's maternal uncle Vatsaraja Padmidēva and Vatsaraja are stated to have been jointly ruling the whole of the Eastern country including Sindavādi Province. Bammideva was known also as Tumbala Bammideva being evidently a native of that village. His father was Lakshmidēva, son of Kalidasa who was again the son of Harischandra. Among the heroic feats of Bammidēva are mentioned the capture of Allu mallarvipa and the extension of the Chalukyan kingdom right up to the sea (in the East) after defeating the Chola king and raiding his country Mr Krishna Sāstri has remarked that these events which must fall into the reign of the Chola king Kulottunga III are not however referred to in the enlogistic accounts of that king found in the Tamil country He rightly suggests that Bammideva's conquests of the Chōla country must, if true indicate the defeat which he may have inflicted on some of the Chōla subordinates in the Telugu Districts. (M.E.R 1916 Part II Para 44) The Brahma (Bammideva) of this inscription was apparently an entirely different personage from Brahma the leader of the counter revolution above-mentioned Their pedigrees differ their exploits differ and their spheres of action differ Though they were contemporaries serving the same king they were two different persons. The latest inscription we have for Sōmēśvara IV is Chitaldrug 36 dated in Saka 1121 cyclic year Kālayukta, or 1199 A D What became of him afterwards or where he died is not known In that be worthy of note. After observing that the Kuntala country is an ornament to the fine face of many countries forming the world, the composer of the inscription says —

“ Adorned with great oceans, to the exulting earth goddess like carefully formed curls (Kuntala) did the Kuntala country appear, to which the Banavāsī country was a mine of enjoyment, an ocean of happiness, a source of gladness, a settled abode of fortune. In that nād, with rows of rice fields from town to town, with running channels from place to place, with flower gardens filled with the fragrance of areca, punnāga, nāga, vakula, champakā, jasmine, screw pine, sandal, kanavīra and white rose, with groves of areca, cocoanut, plantain, jack, mango, rose-apple and other trees, with darkly shaded gardens of betel leaf, and plantations of sugar-cane trickling with juice, with lines of gardens of waving lotus and water-lilies, most beautiful to behold, devoted to yōgis and pleasure, a pleasing jewel-mirror to that nād, was Jidvahge-nād ”

Making some allowance for poetic exaggeration, a good part of the country forming the N -W of the State should have enjoyed the blessings of peace and happiness during the greater portion of this reign.

Taila III,
Tailapa,
Trailōkya
malla, etc., 1150-1163
A.D.

Jagadēkamalla II was succeeded by his younger brother Taila III, also called Tailapa, Trailōkyamalla, Nūrmadī Taila, etc. He also bore the title of Chālukya-chakravartī (E.C VIII, Sorab 175 dated 1156 A.D. and Sorab 290 dated 1155). He appears to have been known also as Chālukya Chakravartī Vikramāika, after his famous grandfather, the famous Vikramāditya VI. (M.E.R 1917, Para 14, Appendix C, No 15 dated in Saka 1084 or 1162 A.D.) E.C XII, Tiptur 61, dated in 1162 A.D. seems to support this view, for the reigning Chālukya king is named in it as Tribhuvanamalla-Dēva, i.e., the title by which Vikramāditya VI was known. From Shikarpur 104 dated in 1156 A.D., we note that it inscription of the Nidagal Chōla chief Irangoladeva Chōla Mahārāja ho is described in an inscription dated in Saka 1148 or the year Parthiva (1226 A.D.), as ruling independently by himself, no suzerain being referred to in it. It may be taken as a settled fact that the Western Chālukyas of Kalyāni disappear as a ruling dynasty from about 1200 A.D. though some persons who are spoken of as representing it appear to have ruled in some parts of the Kanhan till the middle of the thirteenth century (See Bombay Gazetteer 223-224 and 466-467).

The revived Western Chālukya dynasty which thus disappears from history after a rule of nearly two centuries and a quarter has left its permanent impress on the country which was once part of its kingdom. Literature and the arts flourished during the time it held sway over the north west of Mysore and beyond it in the present Bombay and Madras Presidencies. The vogue it gave to architecture produced the style famous as the Chālukyan style after its dynastic name. It is a distinctive type by itself and has won admiration from the severest of Western critics whether from the purely architectural or sculptural point of view. (See Chapters V and VI ante.)

The gold coins of both branches bear the Chālukya emblem a boar and are remarkable as showing a particular application of the Indian method of punch marking by which each portion of a definite design is impressed on the coin by a separate punch. Most of the coins of the Western Chālukyas are of thick gold and often oap-shaped. Elliot (O.S.I. p. 67) supposes these to have been imitated from the Kadamba Padma tankas which are executed in the same manner and which he assigns to the 5th or 6th century A.D. but there is no proof in either case of so early a date and on the analogy of the Eastern Chālukya coins they should probably be

Western
Chālukya
Coinage.

the earth from the southern ocean to the northern limit of the Chālukya capital. The above inscriptions show that Taila III had not been long on the throne when he was eclipsed by one of his Mahāmandalēsvaras, Bijjala. Indeed, there is every reason to believe that under Taila III, the Chālukya power, which had reached its zenith in the reign of Vikramāditya VI, began rapidly to decline. It appears to have been actually overturned by Bijjala, in or about 1162 A.D. It seems as though that for some time before that date, Bijjala had slowly encroached on the royal power and in the end wholly usurped the sovereign right and title. The story of the revolution wrought by him will be found told at some length in the section relating to the Kalachuryas below. Here it may be briefly summarised as follows —As the Chālukya power declined during the reigns of Jagadēkamalla and Taila III, some of the feudatory chiefs became powerful and arrogant. The opportunity was seized by a dependent chief (Mahāmandalēsvara) Bijjala of the Kalachurya race, who held the office of Dandanāyaka or minister for war under Taila III. He conceived the design of usurping the throne of his master and endeavoured to secure the sympathetic co-operation of some of the powerful and semi-independent chiefs. Vijayārka, the Mahāmandalēsvara of Kōlhāpur, was one of those who assisted him, and Prolaṅga, of the Kākatiya dynasty was another. The latter is represented to have fought with Taila III, and to have captured him and then let him off through devotion for him. The Anumakonda inscription (1163 A.D.) which records this fact says — “In an instant he (Prola) made captive in war, the glorious Tailapadēva, the ornament of the Chālukyas, who was skilled in the practice of riding upon elephants, —whose inmost thoughts were ever intent upon war— and who was mounted upon an elephant which was like a cloud (in size), and then, at once, he, who was renowned might easily be made between the first two syllables kala and the kannada kali to kill. The name kala bhurva mentioned by Sir Walter Elliot in place of kalachurya is set down by Sir John Fleet as due to mislection or some other mistake (Ibid 170 n.1) Occasionally the name kalaturya has been found in place of kalachurya. Sir John Fleet notes an inscription of Bijjala dated in 1166 A.D. and another of his son Sovideva of 1174 A.D. in which the name thus appears (Ibid). The name also appears in the more curious form kalatsurya in E.C. VIII Sorab 131 and 287. Sorab 131 is an inscription dated in 1157 A.D. in the fourth year of Bijjala's usurpation and Sorab 287 is an inscription of his 8th year. The family could boast of some respectable antiquity as the use of a Chedi or kalachuri era dating according to Dr. Kielhorn from 218-249 A.D. is known from their early northern inscriptions. (I 4 \ VII, 215 E I IX 129) Their inscriptions in Mysore some seventy-one in number are principally confined to Balagūm in Shikarpur Taluk. Harihar in Davangere Taluk, and some places in the Sorab Taluk. They are all dated subsequent to the time of Bijjala, the usurper.

The genealogy of the Kalachuryas as given in Davan gere 42, brings the descent down to Bijjala. Krishna, the founder was, it would appear, followed by many kings and then came Kannama Dēva. He had two sons Bijjala Deva and Raja. The former is said to have distinguished himself as a great conqueror and as a mine of untiring energy. The younger Rāja had it is said four sons—Ammagi, Sankhavarma, Kannara and Jōgama called also Talikada Jōgama. Ammagi and Jōgama ruled one after the other. Next followed Jōgama's son, Permadi. He is said to have eclipsed the pure character of Mann. To him was born we are told the repository of valour the king Bijjala Dēva. He is poverty of the needy." (Shikarpur 104). These may have proved themselves useful in effecting Bijjala's object. There were, however, still a few adherents of Taila III among his Mahāmandalēsvaras, while a few more recognized Bijjala and acted under him as Mahāmandalēsvaras (Sir John Fleet loc. cit 460-461) While the Bijāpur inscription of 1151 A D referred to above and another at Kembhavi in the Nizām's Dominions dated in 1157 A D. mention Kalyāna as the capital of Taila III, an inscription at Harasur in the Nizām's Dominions dated in 1161 A D states, according to Sir John Fleet, that he was then reigning at Jayantipura, i.e., Banavāsī. This would seem to indicate that Bijjala's usurpation was fait accompli about 1162 A.D. Davangere 35 and Shikarpur 108, both of which may, as stated above, be assigned to 1162 A.D., show that Taila had yielded the royal position to Bijjala, who though still described as a Mahāmandalēsvara is given a position equal to that of his sovereign and described as a Rāma in war and as Nissankamalla, etc. As in an inscription dated in 1158 A D, dated in the 3rd year of Bijjala Dēva, corresponding to Cyclic year Bahudānya, he is called Kalachuriya-Bhujabala Chakravarti (Shikarpur 162), it must be inferred that he was already in 1158 A D in full possession of the royal powers and that he counted his usurpation actually from 1155 A D. Taila had apparently retreated southwards into Banavāsī, but was afterwards reconciled to Bijjala. Though in most records Bijjala is represented in Taila's reign with the designation of Mahāmandalēsvara, it would, in the face of Shikarpur 162, above quoted, be incorrect to state that he did not assume even the title of Bhujabala-chakravarti, i.e., emperor by the prowess of his own arms, a distinctive title assumed by him and his descendants, by that date. In Shikarpur 92, dated in the 16th Kalachuriya year, corresponding to Cyclic year Sarvadhārī, Shikarpur 236 (F C VIII) dated in 1171 A D the Isvaranama of the kalachuri family is referred to as having been preserved from the raking fury of Parasurama. There is a further statement in it which is not quite clear. The rule of the kalachurya line we are told gave light to the world through homa through Periutia it became spotless through Gurvappa it was distinguished for enjoyments through Vajra it acquired might of arm king Yoga obtained for it stability through Perinadi it tasted happiness and approved of it and through king Bijjana acquired power. Except Bijjana and Perwadi the other names cannot be identified. Soma who is said to have given light is probably Siva himself from whom the line traces its descent.

Their
Genealogy

The kalachuryas carried the Surarna Krishabhudhaja Their or banner of a golden bull, and were heralded in public dynasty by the sounds of the damaruka or double drum shaped titles, etc. like an hour glass and the turya. Their crest also was a figure of the bull. Among their titles were 'boon lord of kalanjara Sanivarasiddhi and Giridurgamalla. The last two seem to have been adopted by Hoysala Vira Ballala after his final conquest of the Chälukya provinces in the north west of Mysore.

The following is the succession list of these kings — Succession list of their kings.

Jogama
Perinadi	1126 A D
Bijjala, Bijjana, Nisankamalla, Tribhuvanamalla Bhujabala chakravarti	1156-1167 A D
RAYA-murari Savidya, Somevarna.	1167-1177 A D
Sankama Nisankamalla	1176-1181 A D
Vhavamalla, Viranarayana	1181-1183 A D
Singhana	1183 A D

of his arms and partly by the aid of his friends. Hence he had, among his other titles “Bhujabala-chakravarti” (See below). Taila seems to have died about 1162-1163 A.D., in the very year in which Bijjala completed his usurpation (Fleet, Bombay Gazetteer, 462). Where he died is not known. He was apparently a weak and incapable sovereign, though he is described in terms of high praise by the panegyrists of the period, transferring to him the exploits of his minister and supplanter, Bijjala. Both Sri Ramakrishna Bhandarkar and Sri John Fleet refer to an inscription in the fifteenth year of Taila III, Cyclic year Pārthiva or A.D. 1165 (Bombay Gazetteer 223 and 463), but this seems to be a reference to Davangele 77, which is actually dated in Saka 1087 (1165 A.D.) in the reign of Jagadēkamalla III (E.C. XI). As both Bhandarkar and Fleet do not mention the reign of Jagadēkamalla III, it is possible that this inscription was quoted by them as an authority for saying that it was one of Taila III and that he lived up to 1165 A.D., which is directly contradicted by the statement in the Anumakonda inscription that he had already died before January 1163 A.D. It might now be taken as settled that Taila had ceased to live sometime prior to 1163 A.D. Where actually he died—whether at Banavāsī or at Kalyāna—is not known. As the Banavāsī leaders were among the chief revolutionaries who set themselves up on behalf of Bijjala, it is possible Taila returned to his capital and reconciled himself to his position as nominal ruler. This is the more reasonable as we find his successor Jagadēkamalla III ruling, of course in name, at Kalyāna during a long period of time. The position of Taila III and Jagadēkamalla III seems to have been one of quiescent hope. Bijjala having completed his usurpation about 1162 A.D., had his hands full in connection with the suppression of the disorders that broke out in connection with the establishment of the revived Saiva putting down the evil and upholding the good. In Shikarpur 108 assigned to 1161 A.D. but which may be some years earlier he is similarly styled Mahāmāṇḍa-lārāra though mentioned with all his titles and in a manner indicating his almost regal position with the reigning king Taila III his uncertainty is acknowledged. From 1158 A.D. described as his 2nd year in Sorab 255 he is entitled Kāla-huryabhujabala-chakracartri Tribhuvanamalla emperor by virtue of his own arms entitled Tribhuvanamalla. He is also invested with numerous other titles such as boon lord of Kālanjara, Sanivarasiddhi, Giridurgamalla etc. all showing that his usurpation was a fully accomplished fact. (Shikarpur 18 dated in 1158 A.D.) In the next year 1159 A.D. the dominion appears as Bijjala Devarāja's victorious kingdom. (Shikarpur 123) though Taila III is also mentioned. In this inscription Bijjala's conquests are referred to in high sounding language and it is significantly said that the saying that heroes should possess the Earth was not spoken in vain for Bijjala had brought into subjection the territory from the ocean on the south to his northern boundary the Chālukya capital. In Sorab 328 of the same year nearly the same expression as in Shikarpur 123 is used stating that at the time Narmad Taila was reigning Bijjala was king, which indicates the nominal nature of Taila's sovereignty. Shikarpur 107 an undated inscription assigned to 1162 A.D. speaks in terms even more noteworthy. After giving him the full royal titles stating that the Lakshmi of the Chālukya kingdom transferred her society with pleasure to Bijjala—the author adding the query—what is it a new thing for women to seek after something new?—goes on to state that the various kings in the land did his daily work as servants. In Sorab 277 dated in 1165 A.D. we are told that Mahāmāṇḍalārāra Bijjala Dēva had acquired the empire, from which the inference is possible that he

the Chālukya king is named as Bhuvallabha Permādi Rāya. These inscriptions are dated in (?) 1187, 1191 and 1203 A D. A feudatory of his was Mallidēva termed Chōla Mahārāja, named above, who ruled over the Chōla territory to the north-east of Mysore, whose capital was at Henjeru. Henjeru is, in this inscription, described as a pattana and as a ghatikasthāna, where there appears to have been a resident priest, who was the Rājaguru. Mallidēva's wife was Sīta-Dēvi-arasi, who made a grant to the Rājaguru Anantasiva-Dēva, the local priest, for maintaining a satra (or feeding house) in connection with the Nonambēsvara temple there (E C XII, Sna 23, dated in 1167 A D). The Gangavādi 36,000 was under the Hoysalas, who recognize the suzerainty of Jagadēkamalla-Permādi (Ibid Chiknāyakanhalli 43, dated in 1171 A D, 13 dated in 1181 A D, Chiknāyakanhalli 14 dated in 1187 A D, 20 dated in 1188 A D, 16 dated in 1194 A.D, and 35 dated in about 1200 A.D by Mr. Rice but probably more correctly in or about 1194 A D.) In the Chiknāyakanhalli inscriptions referred to and in Kadur 30 dated in 1170 A D, Jagadēkamalla III is stated to be ruling from Kalyāna and over the $7\frac{1}{2}$ lakh country, corresponding to the old Rāshtrakūta kingdom. All these are Hoysala inscriptions, down to about 1194 A D, and they recognize the suzerainty over them, of Jagadēkamalla. The Chālukya-Chakravartin mentioned in an inscription registered in M.E.R. 1899 (No 12, dated in Saka 1070 (1168 A D) must, accordingly be Jagadēkamalla III and not as suggested in M.E.R. 1917 (Part II, Para 14) Taila III, who, as stated above, appears to have been known also as Vikramadēva. Accordingly Jagadēkamalla III should have continued as titular sovereign in 1168 A D, which is quite in keeping with the mere incidental mention made of him—as Chālukya-Chakravartin. He is so referred to in an inscription dated in the reign of the Chōla feudatory and the temples at Abbatur. A year later Boumarasa son in law of Bijjala was governor of Banavasi (Shikarpur 212). In 1161 and 1162 A.D. raids by the Hoysalas are mentioned (Davangere 12, Sorab 372). Davangere 12 states that Bannuarasa general of Kaspayya a dependent of Bijjala put to flight the Hoysala army riding on his single horse and driving it into the river so that the water of the Tungabhadra was dyed with a new saffron colour from the streaks of their blood (E.C.VI). Kaspayya was ruler of Banavasi 12000. In 1172 Duggarasa was governing it (Davangere 33).

From the above it will be clear that the first signs of Bijjala's usurpation were manifest in 1155 A.D. and it was a fully accomplished fact by 1162 A.D. The earliest known inscriptions in which Bijjala is mentioned is the one at Bijapur which is dated in Saka 1071 current or 1151 A.D. (J. Bo. Br. R. I. S. VI 211 quoted by Fleet Bombay Gazetteer 469 and 472). The earliest inscription in which he is referred to is in Sorab 255 dated in 1158 A.D. his 2nd regnal year. He is called therein Kalachurya Bhujabalachakravarti Bijjana Deva. Like wise in Shikarpur 102 dated in 1158 A.D., he is described as Bhujabala-chakravarti i.e., emperor by virtue of his own valour. The term mahāmandalesvara is coupled with higher regal titles in many subsequent inscriptions such as Shikarpur 18 dated in 1158 A.D. Shikarpur 123 dated in 1159 A.D. Shikarpur 102 dated in 1162 A.D. and in Shikarpur 103 assigned to about 1161 A.D. but may be earlier by a couple of years at least. The following is a list of the more important inscriptions found in this State mentioning him which indicate the manner and time of his assumption of full regal powers —

Inscription.	Date and contents.
Shikarpur 102	Dated 1158 A.D. 3rd year of Bijjala. Mentions him as Kala-churya Bhujabala Chakravarti .

being in the hands of the usurping minister Bijjala or his son, as the case may be. It may be, as suggested by Sir John Fleet, that the Telugu-Chōla, Uchchangī, Pāndya, Hoysala and other chiefs entertained hopes that the Chālukya suzerainty would be restored and therefore thought it wise to acknowledge it in their own inscriptions. (Loc. cit 463).

Sōmēsvara IV or Vira Sōmēsvara
IV Tribhu
vanamalla, Viranārā-
yana

Sōmēsvara IV, called also Vira-Sōmēsvara, apparently younger brother of Jagadēkamalla III. is described as the reigning Chālukya sovereign in several inscriptions. He restored the Chālukya power for a time, wresting it back from the usurping Kalachurias. He is described specifically as "the destroyer of the Kalachuria race" in an inscription dated in Saka 1107, Viśvāvasu or A.D. 1185, recently found at Satasivaram, in the Madakura Taluk of the Anantapur District (M.E.R. 1917, Appendix C No 28). Perhaps the earliest mention of him is in an inscription at Chinna Tumbalum dated in the Cyclic year Yuva corresponding to A.D. 1155-1156, which falls into his father's reign. It refers to him as Mahāmandalēsvara Trailōkyamalla Bhujabala Viranārāyana Āhavamalla, one of whose titles was "the lion of the elephant Pāndya," the reference being to the Pāndyas of Uchchangī. His titles were Tribhuvanamalla and Viranārāyana. While yet a Mahāmandalēsvara, he seems to have been known as Āhavamalla also. At this time, he was apparently only a Mahāmandalēsvara or governor, administering the province of which Chinna Tumbalam was the capital. In an inscription dated in Saka 1092, Vnōdhi, or 1170 A.D., he is spoken of as ruling at Kalyāna (M.E.R. for 1924, Appendix B 1923, No. 461). This is a Telugu-Chōla inscription, in which Malli-Dēva, son of Irungola, who has been mentioned above, is represented ruling from Gōvīndavādīpura, modern Gōvīndavādī, in Rāyadurg Taluk. Gōvīndavādī as we have

Scrab 257	- Dated in 1161 A.D. I bhaj bala chakravarti Tribhuvanamalla Bijjana Dēva 8th year
Scrab 572	- Dated in 1164 A.D. Nija-Bhuj bala chakravarti Bijjana 9th year Pāṭhira
Scrab 6	- Dated in 1163 A.D. Bhajabala-chakravarti Bijjana-Dēva 10th year cyello 3 ar Pāṭhira

Bijjala on his usurpation started an era of his own dating from the cyclic year Dhātū Sakā 1079. About that time he assumed the titles of Kalachurya Nija Bhujabala Chakravarti Tribhuvanamalla Bijjala Dēva etc. From the above list of inscriptions it will be seen that they are fairly representative of his reign ranging as they do from his 2nd regnal year to the 10th. The use of the title Mahāmāndalesvara in 1159 A.D. in the 3rd year of his reign and the acknowledgment of Toila III as his suzerain even as late as 1154 A.D. and 1162 A.D. seem more mechanical than necessary descriptions in the few later records in which they appear. Force of habit should be held responsible for their use at a time when they had been already given up. The title Mahāmāndalesvara does not occur in any dated record after 1162 A.D. All dated records from that year describe Bijjala as Kalachurya-chakravarti Bhujabala chakravarti or Nija Bhujabala chakravarti. This shows that the usurpation was complete in his 6th regnal year after his conquest of the South where apparently Toila III was then resident and from where probably he was compelled to retire northwards to Annigero or Kalyana itself from where he bore nominal rule. The Kalachurya kings who displaced the Chālukyan sovereigns were much like the Carolingians who supplanted the Merovingians who had become faineant. If Charlemagne was the greatest of the Carolingian dynasty Bijjala was the most famous of the Kalachurya race.

The chief event of Bijjala's reign was the revival of the worship of Siva which ended in the formation of a new Siva Revival.

fifth regnal year, he is given the full Chālukya royal titles, including Samastha-bhuvanāśraya Śrīprithvī-val-labha mahārājādhirāja paramēśvara parama bhattāraka Satyāśraya-kulatīlaka Chālukyābhāraṇa, etc. Similarly, in Sorab 47 (E C. VIII), dated in Saka 1109, cyclic year Plavanga, or 1187 A D, we have the complete Chālukya royal titles given to him. He is described as Chālukya-Chakravartī prithvī-vallībha, etc. In Chitaldrug 33 (E.C. XI) dated in Saka 1108, cyclic year Plavanga, or A D 1187, we have mention made of all his regal attributes. In this inscription, he is stated to be ruling from Jayantipura, with Vijaya-Pāndya, as governor of Nolaṃbavādi 32,000. Apparently, he was on a visit to Banavāsī at the time. Finally, in Sorab 179 dated in 1189 A D, Honnali 46 dated in 1189 A D. and in Chitaldrug 36, dated in Saka 1121, Kālayukta, or A D 1199, we have descriptions of him with his full royal titles. As in Chitaldrug 33 (E C. XI), so in Chitaldrug 36 (E C. XI), he is mentioned as ruling from Jayantīpura nelavidinōl, i e, from his capital at Jayantipura (or Banavāsī). In 1199 A.D. he was either still in residence at Banavāsī or was continuing his stay from 1187 A.D., the date of Chitaldrug 33. In the latter case, it is possible that the conditions at Kalyāṇa prevented his stay there or the existence of his brother Jagadēkamalla III there did not require his presence at that place (see above).

However that may have been, it is clear from the above inscriptions, that the restoration of Chālukya rule under Sōmēśvara IV was an accomplished fact at or about 1180 A D, which may be taken as the approximate date of the uprooting of the Kalachurya usurpation. The manner in which this counter-revolution was wrought is referred to in several inscriptions. Bijjala abdicated in 1167 A D. and was, according to tradition, subsequently put to death, apparently in revenge for the wanton cruelties he inflicted on the adherents of the new Viṇasaiva

He wrote the Basavarāja Vijaya in 1677 A D. According to tradition Shadakshara was born at Danagur near Malavalli. He appears to have been an Ārādhya Brahman who was patronised by Chikka Deva Raja of Mysore. The story is told that he belonged to the family of the guru of Chikka Deva Raja's mother who belonged to Yelandur (Narasimhachār, Karnātaka Kaviśaṣṭi II 19-24 and 112 see also now Edn I 423). Finally we have Channa Basava Purāṇa by Virupākṣa Pandita who states that he composed his work in Salā 1507 cyclic year Tūraṇa or A D 1551. He seems to have lived at Vijayanagar the capital of the kingdom of the same name. Some of these works have been printed but most of them are known only in MS form. Abstract translations of the Basava Purāṇa and the Channa Basava Purāṇa were published by the Rev G. Warth some thirty years ago (see J Rom Br R I S VIII 65 97 and 98-221). Wilson in his Descriptive Catalogue of the Mackenzie Collection also notices these works (Wilson Descriptive Catalogue Hala Kanara Works Nos 79 305 113).

According to the Basava Purāṇa Basava was the son of Madirāja and his wife Madalambika both belonging to the Brāhmin caste and residing at Bagewādī identified with the town of that name in the present Bijāpur District. It is sometimes stated (Wilson 305) that they belonged to Ingaleshvar (or Hingaleshvar) which is a village close by Bagewādī. To recompense the piety of this couple Nandi the bull of Śiva, was born on earth as their son at the command of Śiva to resuscitate the declining Śaiva faith. In his eighth year when his father sought to invest him with the sacred thread Basava objected to it as involving the worship of Surya. He declared himself a special devotee of Śiva declined to accept any guru except Śiva propounded a new doctrine

Story of Basava's
Life—Śaiva version according to
*Basava
Purāṇa*.

that put it in his power to effect the revolution that he accomplished. (Bombay Gazetteer 464-465) To Brahma is attributed an exploit in this war against the Kalachuryas which is of some interest. It is said that he conquered sixty tusked elephants with one young tuskless elephant, when, in contempt of his father, he was depriving the Kalachuryas of the sovereignty (Gadag inscription dated in 1192 A.D., see Bombay Gazetteer, 464, n. 4). Later, about 1192 A.D., Brahma seems to have been defeated by the Hoysala king Vīra-Ballāla II. Ballāla II, it is stated, defeated with cavalry only and took away the sovereignty from this famous general Brahma, whose troops were supported by an array of elephants. The suggestion is made that if Brahma took away by one exploit the Kalachurya sovereignty, Vīra Ballāla II took it away from him by another (Ibid)

An Annigere inscription dated in 1186-1187 A.D. and some others quoted by Sir John Fleet give the following genealogy of Brahma, the leader of the counter-revolution —Dandanāyaka Bammi, whose wife was Jakkiyavve; his son Dandanāyaka Kāma or Kāvana, whose wife was Kalaladēvi or Kalavve, his son Dandanāyaka Brahma, whose younger brothers were Dandanāyaka Kēsava or Kēsajā, Nārasimha or Nārasimha, and Linga or Lingadēva. These records speak of the general Brahma as a Kumāra, doubtless, as Sir John Fleet remarks, not to mark him as a “youngman,” but to distinguish him from his grandfather, after whom he appears to have been named. (Ibid n. 3)

In Sorab 179 (E C VIII) dated in 1189 A.D., there is mentioned a Kāma-Dēvarasa as governing, under Sōmēsvāra IV, the Banavāsī 12,000 and the Hanungal 500, “with equal justice to both” (ubhaya samyakt). Whether this Kāma-Dēvarasa may be identified with Kāma, the father of Brahma, is not clear. A chief Brahma is mentioned in a recently discovered inscription need to illustrate of this is narrated in the Purana Basava having made himself remarkable for the profuse boonties he bestowed upon his followers helping himself from the royal treasury for the purpose the other ministers reported his conduct to Bijjala who called upon him to account for the money in his charge. Basava smiled and giving the keys of the treasury to the king requested him to examine it which being done the amount was found wholly undiminished. Bijjala thereupon caused it to be proclaimed that whoever calumniated Basava should have his tongue cut. Illustration of his bounty towards his followers is told in another story. A follower of his kept a mistress who having heard of the magnificence of the attire of Basava's wife, desired it for herself. Hearing of it Basava directed his wife to strip herself of it and give it to his follower's mistress! Other dresses of similar magnificence began to spring from her body and these also were made over to his other followers! Not only did Basava perform miracles but also some of his disciples. Kinnarayya one of these having been solicited thus by a Jangama touched it is told the stones about him with his staff and converting them into gold told the Jangama to help himself with it! Many other stories of this kind are related including Mochaya's bringing to life Kinnarayya and Basava himself!

Basava's official position and generosity to his adherents made his creed both popular and attractive. He speedily got a large number of followers and ordained a great many priests who were called Jangamas. His nephew's activities also added to the numbers of people who joined him. The Bijjala Rāya Charita which enshrines the Jain version of the story referred to below makes no secret of the fact that the new faith attracted converts from almost every caste. It also suggests that the poor were attracted to it by the desire for money.

Popularity of his creed.

year, as we have seen above, mention is made of his ruling from Jayantīpura. This is the last we hear of him. Inscriptions dated in 1189 A D, found in the Bijāpur and Dhānwār Districts, show that Bhīllana, the Yādava king of Dēvagiri had by that time secured the northern and eastern portions of the Chālukya kingdom. Other inscriptions dated in 1192 A.D, found in the Dhānwār and Shimoga Districts show that before the end of that year, the Hoysalas under Vīra-Ballāla II, had made almost equal encroachments from the south. The Gadag record of 1192 A D, as we have seen, expressly mentions the fact that the Hoysala king had acquired sovereignty in that neighbourhood by defeating the general Bīahma. It would seem, as though, that when the Yādava and Hoysala kings were disputing the possession of southern provinces, Sōmēsvara IV had been driven back to the extreme south-west of his dominions and sought refuge in Jayantīpura also known as Banavāsī (Fleet, Bombay Gazetteer, 466, see also E C VIII Sorab 419 dated in 1183 A D). Apparently his retreat had already occurred in 1187 A D (the date of Chitaldrug 33) when we find him at that place. As Chitaldrug 36 dated in 1199 A D still describes him as ruling from that place, it is probable he was compelled to stay on there and end his days in it. He could not have survived longer than the date of this inscription. After this date, there is hardly any acknowledgment of Chālukya suzerainty in the inscriptions of its old feudatories. Thus in Holalkere 56 (E C XI) dated in Saka 1142, cyclic year Vikrama, which records a grant by the Pāndya king of Uchchangī, and mentions the Hoysala king Vīra-Nālasimha as ruling from his capital Dōrasamudra, the Chālukya rule is spoken of as a thing of the past in these words —“The Chālukyas ruled the ocean-gudled earth, after them the Kalachuriya king Bijana protected the earth,” etc. Similarly in an elephants until agreeably to the curse pronounced upon it by Basava to his disciples Kalyana was utterly destroyed. Hearing of the news Basava hastened towards Kudali Sangamesvara (at the confluence of the Malprabha with the Krishna according to some and according to others at the junction of the Krishna and Tungabhadra) where he was absorbed into the god flowers falling from the sky. Channabasava his nephew fled to Ulavi in North Kanara where it is said he found refuge in a cave.

The account included in the Channa Basava Lalagnina (Wilson Descriptive Catalogue of the Mackenzie Collection 312 313) gives a somewhat different version. It places the absorption of Basava in Sangamesvara in Saka 707 Rakthakṣi year Phalgun month or A D 785 which is too early for him by four centuries. (The date is wrongly given in Wilson as Saka 600 or A D 774—Wilson 313) The Lalagnina itself dates from 1585 A D and the prophecies given in it show that it is a late work. According to it on Basava's flight and absorption into the deity Bijjala who was not yet dead appointed Channa Basava to succeed him in the post of Prime Minister. After this, the two devotees Halleja and Madhuvaja were tied to a rope and dragged about the ground till they died. In revenge for this two torch bearers Jaggadeva and Bommana killed Bijjala. Meanwhile Channa Basava had sent away his followers to Ulavi on the pretext of celebrating a feast there and himself followed them immediately on the death of Bijjala. He was pursued by Bijjala's son in law and in the battle which ensued, the pursuers were killed and the king himself was taken captive. Channa Basava however, restored the slain army to life, at the request of Nāgalambika, his mother and admonished the king not to persecute the Virasaivas as his father had done and

According to Channa
Basava
Lalagnina

placed much later (Rapson, Indian Coins, 37) In these coins, a lion or a temple takes the place of the lotus in the Kadamba coins The legends are in Hala Kannada. They were apparently struck by Jayasimha, Jagadēkamalla I (a title of Jayasimha) and Trailōkyamalla, probably Sōmēsvara I, or Taila III, also entitled Trailōkyamalla—all belonging to the 11th and 12th centuries A D In 1913, a very large number of these cup-shaped coins were unearthed at Kōdūr in the Nellore District and this find shows that the type was subsequently copied by the Telugu-Chōla chiefs of the Nellore District in the 13th century

KALACHUR-YAS OF KALYĀNI, THEIR ORIGIN

The Kalachuryas, who under Bijjala subverted the Chālukyas and usurped their kingdom for nearly twenty-seven years, claim connection with the Kalachuris of Central India, who called themselves Haihayas (E I. I 37, 263, II 5). The Western Chālukya king Vinayāditya subjugated the Haihayas. Inter-marriages between the Haihayas and the Early Chālukyas, the Rāshtrakūtas and the later Chālukyas appear to have been common (Bombay Gazetteer, 296) The origin of the Kalachuryas is given at some length in Davangere 42 assigned to 1162 A D (E C. XI) Kṛishna, the son by the miraculous union of Siva with a Brāhman girl, was, it is stated, the founder of the family In the guise of a barber, he killed at Kālanjara—identified with modern Kālanjar or Kālinagar, a town with a well-known hill-fort in the Banda District, Bundelkhand, United Provinces—an evil-minded king, who was a cannibal, and took possession of the Nine-Lakh country of Dahala, i e., the Chēdi country in Central India Sir John Fleet has remarked that this story looks like some reminiscence of a fuller story, invented to explain the family name In Kannada, we have chura and surige, as corruptions of the Sānskrit kshura, ksharikā and chhurikā, a razor, and a connection with Bijjala it is stated that Basava's influence with the king was due to the fact that Basava had married his sister Paduini (also called Padmavati) who was celebrated for her beauty. It is mentioned that Basava's father Madirāja was the astrologer at Bijjala's court. Because of this relationship Bijjala appointed it would appear Basava as his Senapati or Dandanāyaka. It is also stated that when he first rebelled against Bijjala Basava fell into a tank and was taken out of it at the orders of Bijjala, pardoned and reappointed to his office. Later Bijjala on his return march from an expedition he had undertaken against the Silahāra chief Bhoja II of Kolhāpur encamped at a certain place on the banks of the Bhīma. While reposing in his tent Basava it would appear sent to him a Jangama disguised as a Jain with a poisoned mango fruit. Bijjala himself a Jain took the fruit from the seeming Jain priest which he no sooner smelled than he dropped down senseless. His son Immadi Bijjala (apparently Sōvidēva though there is as remarked by Sir John Fleet no epigraphic evidence for calling him Immadi Bijjala) and his attendants hastened to his assistance, but it was in vain. Bijjala revived however for a short period and being aware who was responsible for sending the poisoned fruit enjoined his son to put Basava to death. Immadi Bijjala accordingly ordered Basava to be apprehended and all the Jangamas wherever seized to be executed. On hearing of this Basava fled and being pursued went towards the (Malabār) coast and sought refuge in a place called Vrishabhapara. This place being closely invested Basava in despair drowned himself in a well while his wife poisoned herself. As he fled to Urive and died there the place (it is added) came to be known by the name of Ulve. After the resentment of Immadi Bijjala was allayed, Channa Basava, the nephew of Basava, presented his uncle's treasures to him and was said to have taken possession of the whole earth, even as Agastya from the pitcher swallowed up the ocean. Slightly different, but not wholly inconsistent accounts are given in certain records found in the Bombay Presidency and the Nizām's Dominions. (Bombay Gazetteer, 468-469). Two inscriptions dated in 1173 A.D. in the reign of Sōvidēva, son of Bijjala, trace the descent from one Santama or Santasama, whose son was Sagararasa. The latter's son was Kannama, whose sons were Naiana and Bijja. Bijja's son was Karna, whose son was Jōgama, the Jōgama of Davangere 42. These two inscriptions of Sōvidēva's time apparently fill in the gap in the descent referred to in Davangere 42, which refers to the many kings who "passed away" after Krishna, before it mentions Kannama-Dēva. The Kokatur grant of Sōvidēva dated in 1174 A.D. and the Behatti grant of his brother Singhana dated in 1183 A.D., simplify the whole genealogical description by saying that Jōgama was the son of Krishna of the Kalachuri family and furnish no further details. An inscription dated in 1178 A.D., in the reign of Sankama, Bijjala's second son, gives a few particulars, which are entirely in keeping with the account given in Davangere 42. This inscription states that Kannama had two sons, Bijjala and Rājala (the Rājala of Davangere 42) and that Rājala had a son Jōgama (grandfather of Bijjala, the usurper). None of these inscriptions hint the actual point of contact of Bijjala's ancestors with the ancient Kalachuris or Haihayas above referred to. But remembering the claims of connection put forward in Davangere 42 and in the other inscriptions referred to above and the mention of Dahala and Kālanjara, which are both connected with the original Kalachuris, it might be presumed that though not directly descended from them, they might have had some connection with a branch of it, which had strayed away from Central India. (See Bombay Gazetteer, 469-470). In the date 1155 A D assigned by Sir Walter Elliot for them in the Bijjalārjya Charita as wholly unsupported and if even supported by any manuscripts, as inconsistent with the ascertained fact of Bijjala's assumption of sovereignty in 1167 A D and not earlier Sir John Fleet remarks that no epigraphic record of Basava and Channa Basava has been obtained which is peculiar if they really held the high office that is allotted to them by tradition. Finally he says that in the only epigraphic record which has come to notice containing an allusion of any kind to the revival of the Saiva faith and rites the indication is that it was a Brahman named Ekāntado Ramayya to whom the movement owed its origin. (Bombay Gazetteer 481)

Quite apart from the dates mentioned in the two Purāṇas mentioned above which are plainly refuted by the dated inscriptions of Bijjala, there is it is to be feared something to be said in favour of the work achieved by the chief personalities mentioned in them. The suggestion that because there is no epigraphic mention of Basava and Channa Basava and that there is only an epigraphic mention of Ekāntado Ramayya and that it is to the latter that the Saiva revival movement owed its origin seems somewhat wide of the mark. Though Basava and Channa Basava are not mentioned in lithic inscriptions Ramayya who is referred to in an epigraph is mentioned in the Saiva Purāṇas. This at least makes it possible that Basava, Channa Basava and other characters connected with the Saiva revival are historical and not shadowy personages. Palkuriki Sōmanātha, a poet in the Kannada Telugu and Sanskrit languages who lived within about 35 years of Basava's time wrote a life of Basava (See Karnataka Kavicharita 291). His works include the Basava Purāṇa in Telugu and many short lives of Basava in popular metres criticisms are not erod.

His

Jōgama

Nothing historical is known of and up to Jōgama

The names of all the early kings but Bijjala, son of Kannama, are but mere names. Of this Bijjala, the first of the name, Davangere 42 speaks highly of as a successful warrior. Whether he can at all be identified with the Mahāmandalēśvara Bijjala mentioned in M E R inscription No 139 of 1899 found at Uchchangiduiga, in the Bellary District, where another inscription dated in 1064 A D of the same feudatory of the Chālukya king Sōmēśvara I, is also mentioned is a matter for consideration. He is in this latter inscription said to have granted a tank in the Uchchangi fort to the temple of Galagēśvara. (M E R. 1919, Appdx B 1918 No 286) The one hundred years that separates Bijjala I from Bijjala II may be held to be sufficient to bridge over the four generations (of five kings) that ruled between them.

Permādi, 1128
A D

Jōgama's son Permādi appears, from an inscription dated in 1128 A.D., to have governed the Taidavādi District, or the country round Bijāpur, as a feudatory under Sōmēśvara III.

Bijjala,
Tribhuvana
malla,
Nissankamalla,
1156-1167
A D

Bijjala, the son of Permādi, proved himself the greatest of his line. His connection with the history of the Kalachuryas dates only from the time he supplanted the Chālukyas and ends with the extinction of the line. The period, though short, is an eventful one, and is of interest from having seen the birth of the Vīrasaiva (or Lingāyat) faith, which so largely prevails throughout the Kannada speaking territories of Mysore, Madras, Hyderabad and Bombay.

The earliest inscription in Mysore in which Bijjala is mentioned is Shikarpur 104 dated in 1156 A.D. In it, the supremacy of the Chālukya king Taila III is recognized, but Bijjala, though termed only a mahāmandalēśvara, is described to be "ruling all the countries, upon his shoulders. The Jain temples were thereupon it is said destroyed by the Jangamas. It does not appear however from both the Purāṇas that the king was made a convert or that he approved of the principles and conduct of his minister. He seems on the contrary to have incurred death by attempting to repress the extension of the Virasaiva faith. Different authorities although they disagree as to the manner in which Bijjala was put to death concur in stating the fact. The epigraphic record of Ēkāntada Rāmāyja nowhere says that he possessed any influence at Bijjala's court or that he held any official position under him to enable him to propagate the Virasaiva faith in the manner in which Basava by reason of his ministerial position, is said to have done. Both the Purāṇas agree in assigning to Ēkāntada Rāmāyja—he is mentioned in the Channa Basava Purāṇa though his story is told in a somewhat different form from the version given in the epigraphic record—a subordinate position in the Saiva revival though he seems to have been perhaps, the most prominent figure after Basava and Channa Basava and one or two others.

In discussing the part played by Basava and others in the founding of the Virasaiva faith the work of Pāsupatas (or followers of Lakula) should be remembered. They were already strong in and about the Banavāsī province the temples at Balagāmi being in their hands and Brahma-chārī mathas being run in connection with them. Even Bijjala who appears to have been a fairly tolerant king made or confirmed some grants in their favour. The revival of the Saiva faith seems to have followed as the natural result of the work of these Saiva teachers of the Pāsupata school at Balagāmi who were famous as royal preceptors and teachers between the 10th and 14th centuries. Basava was undoubtedly an important religious

The leaders of the Saiva
Revival

was still only a Mahāmandalēsvara when the revolution was effected Bijjala's governor of Banavāsī in 1159 A D was Kēsīrāja, also called Kēsava-Dēva (Shikarpur 123). He is said to have built a beautiful temple of Kēsava at Baligāmi, of which there is at present no trace whatever. In or about 1160 A.D., Banavāsī was under Kaiya-Kēsīmaya (Shikarpur 161). He was marching against Bandalike, which was apparently in revolt, or would not acknowledge Bijjala's authority. In 1162 A D Bijjala's army marched to destroy Tagarte. (Shikarpur 56). According to Shikarpur 102, dated in the same year, we see that Bijjala had a great minister Kasapayya-Nāyaka, under whose authority Bammārāsa was governor of Banavāsī. Bammārāsa was, however, associated in his administration, and to some extent, probably controlled, by five Karanams, who were royal censors appointed "to see that the Lakshmi of that Bommārāsa's government was free from adultery"—that is, to ensure his loyalty—and these were like the five senses to king Bijjala, unmatched in minstrel skill, bold as fierce lions, able in detecting frauds, superior to all opposition." Apparently Banavāsī, owing to its having been the retreat after defeat, of the Chālukya kings Taila III, etc., required special attention on Bijjala's part. It was evidently the last portion of the Chālukya kingdom to give in to the usurper. Bommārāsa and his associates joined in making a grant to the famous Kōḍiya matha at Baligāmi in 1162 A D. This matha is described at length as a great seat of learning for all branches of study, a place where food was freely distributed to all—the poor, the decrepit, the wounded and the naked, a hospital for the treatment of the diseases of destitute sick persons, and a place of security from fear of all living things. Bijjala himself visited the place in the course of his expedition to subdue the south and halting at it, in 1162 A D, made a grant to the great Kēdarēsvara temple reference to an Ekrama in the Dēśāṅgapurāṇa. He is there described as the son of Devadasa the 7th incarnation of Devaṅga and is credited with the conversion from Jainism to Saivism of Bijjala's queen (Karnātaka Kaviśaṣṭak 215-216). This Ekrama confessedly was a contemporary of Bijjala. If he was the same as the Ekāntada Rāmāyṇa of the epigraphic record such a memorable victory of his as the conversion of the queen would doubtless have found mention in it, more especially as the inscription though undated belongs to the period 1181 to 1203 A.D. long after the death of Bijjala.

However that may be there is scarcely any doubt that Ekāntada Rāmāyṇa was a prominent figure in the Saiva revival which occurred in Bijjala's reign though the claim made for him in the epigraphic record is perhaps a slightly exaggerated one throwing into the shade the work of Basava and his nephew Channa Basava. This record which is to be seen at the temple of Sōmanātha at Ahlur in the Dhārwar District, is one of the time of Mahāmandalēśvara Kāmādēva of the family of Kadambas of Hangal in the Dhārwar District just beyond the Shimoga frontier. The narrative, leaving out the supernatural and miraculous parts, is not only reasonable and verisimilar enough but also interesting as showing the militant form that Saivism had assumed during the period. Sir John Fleet thus summarizes its contents —

Story of Ekāntada
Rāmāyṇa

Among the Brāhmins at a town named Alanda in the Kuntala country where there was a temple of the god Siva under the name of Sōmanātha, there was one named Puruṣhōttamabhatta, of the Vata or Srivata gōtra well versed in all the Vēdas and Vēdāṅgas. His wife was Padmāmbikā. He and she lived together for some time without having any offspring. And Puruṣhōttamabhatta began to do special worship to Siva, in order to obtain a son. One day when Siva,

Sorab 255	. Dated 1158 A D , 2nd year of Kalachurya-Bhujabala Chakravarti Bijjana Dēva
Sorab 99	Dated in the 2nd year of Bhujabala Chakravarti Bijjala
Shikarpur 162	Dated in 1158 A D , 3rd year of Bijjala Kalachurya Bhujabala Chakravarti
Sorab 416	Dated in the 3rd year of Bijjana Dēva Varsha, cyclo year Bahudānya
Shikarpur 190	Dated in 1158 A D Bhujabala Chakravarti Bijjala-Dēvarasa (Mayidēvarasa dandanāyaka of hejjunka and vadda ravula of B'vasi 12,000)
Shikarpur 18	Dated in 1158 A D Gives him Mahāmandalēsvara and other full royal titles ending with Bhujabala chakravarti Tribhuvanamalla Bijjala-Dēvarasa (A Ganga prince, Mahāmandalēsvara Nanniya Ganga Permādi-Dēvarasa governing Edevatte 70 etc , including Begur agrahāra)
Sorab 131	Dated in 1159 A D Bhujabala Chakravarti Tribhuvanamalla Bijjana Dēva's 4th year Pramathi
Shikarpur 123	Dated in 1159 A D Nūrmadi Taila III, his Suzerain mentioned Bijjala described as Mahāmandalēsvara and given full royal titles ending with Bhujabala Chakravarti
Sorab 323	Dated in 1159 A D Bahudānya, Taila III, mentioned suzerain king Bijjala Kshānipōla ruled then. Year Premadi (? 5th year of Bijjala)
Shikarpur 78	Dated in 1160 A D Bhujabala chakravarti Bijjana Dēva
Shikarpur 139	About 1160 A D Bhujabala-chakravarti Bijjana Dēvarasa ruling the kingdom
Shikarpur 161	About 1160 A D In the victorious reign of Nija bhujabala chakravarti Saṁvarasiddin malla Bijjala dēva
Shikarpur 116	Dated about 1160 A D Kalachurya Bhujabala-chakravarti Tribhuvanamalla Bijjana-Dēvarasa
Shikarpur 56	Dated in 1162 A D 5th year of Kalachurya Chakravarti Bijjana Bijjala marched to destroy Tāgarate.
Davangero 84	Dated in 1161 A D Mentions him as a Bhujabala Chakravarti
Shikarpur 102	Dated in 1162 A D Mahāmandalēsvara and other royal titles ending with Bhujabala chakravarti Trib Bijjala Dēvarasa
Davangero 12	Dated about 1162 A D Mentions him as Bhujabala chakravarti
Shikarpur 212	Dated in 1163 A D Kalachurya Bhujabalachakravarti king Bijjala
Shikarpur 103	Dated about 1161 A D mentions as mere Mahāmandalēsvara May be earlier as only Mahāmandalēsvara is mentioned
Sorab 177	Dated in 1163 A D Subhannu year Kalachurya Bhujabala-chakravarti Bijjana ruling the world
Sorab 119	Dated in 1163 A D Subhannu year Bhujabala-chakravarti Bijjana Dēva's 7th year.

universe. The Jains then challenged him to decapitate himself and offer his head to Siva in the presence of all the people promising that if his head should be restored to him they would admit that Siva was indeed the one god and Ekānta Rāmāyā his true disciple. And being asked to wager something against his head they further bound themselves by a writing on a palmyra leaf to demolish their Jina and set up an image of Siva in the event of his success. Then singing the praises of Siva Ekānta Rāmāyā cut off his own head with a scimitar and laid it at the feet of his god. On the seventh day it was found by all the people that Ekānta Rāmāyā's head was restored to him without a scar. The Jains, however failed to keep their word. And so he himself in spite of their guards, their horses, their chieftains and the troops that they sent against him broke off the head of their Jina and presented it as an offering to his own god and as is gathered from subsequent parts of the record set up an image of Siva under the name of Vira Somanātha at Ablūr and built a temple for it as large the record says, "as a mountain. A short inscription on a sculptured stone outside the temple commemorates the bravery displayed by Ekānta Rāmāyā at the place of the god Brahmēśvara, in cutting off his head when the Jina of the basadi was wagered against it and adds that in spite of the forces which Saṅkavāṇḍa brought against him Rāmāyā fought and conquered and broke the Jina. The sculpture shows to the right a fight and on the left a linga with a standing priest and a kneeling figure—the latter being evidently intended for Rāmāyā in the act of offering the head of the Jina. The Jains went and complained to Bijjala who became much enraged and sent for Ekānta Rāmāyā, and questioned as to why he had committed so gross an outrage on the Jains. Thereupon Ekānta Rāmāyā produced the writing on the palmyra leaf which he asked Bijjala to deposit in his treasury and offered that, if the Jains would wager their seven hundred temples, including the Anesojjaya basadi—this was, and perhaps still is a celebrated Jain temple at Lakṣmīśwar—it is mentioned in other records also he would repeat the feat and he undertook even to allow his opponents to burn his head and still to recover it. Wishing to see the spectacle Bijjala called all the learned men of the Jain temples together and bade them wager their temples, sect of Saivas called Vīrasaivas, commonly called Lingāyats. They are to be found all over in the Kannada country, though in large numbers only in the Mysore State, certain districts of Bombay (Belgaum, Bijāpur and Dhārwar), Bellary and Anantapur Districts of Madras, and the Hyderabad and Kolhāpur States. They belong chiefly to the trading classes, though a numerically small number of them, calling themselves Ārādhyas, are members of the Brāhman community. The Vīrasaivas, wherever found, form an intelligent and a progressive body of people. As traders and merchants, they are known to be both energetic and successful. (See Volume I, Chapter VIII)

The traditionary stories connecting Basava, the promulgator of the new Saiva faith, with, Bijjala, the Kalachurya king, are told in several Kannada poems recounting his life including the following in chronological order — Basava Stōtra Trividhi by Siddha Rāma, about 1160 A D, Pancharatna, Sharanu Basava Ragale and Channa Basava Stōtra Ragale by Palkuriki Sōma (or Sōmana Ārādhyas), about 1195 A D, Basava Purāna by Bhīma Kavi, written according to the author in 1369 A D, and Basavarāja Vyaya by Shadakshara Dēva, written about 1677 A D. The last of these is also popularly known by the alternative name of Viśabhēndra Vyaya, Basava being the Kannada form of Viśabha. It appears that Palkuriki Sōma (or Sōmanātha), an Ārādhyas Brāhmana, who was a poet both in Telugu and Kannada, composed the first life of Basava in Telugu. This, it would appear, was translated, under his inspiration in a dream, by Bhīma Kavi, who also calls himself a poet in two languages, i.e., Kannada and Telugu. Sankara Kavi rendered the latter into Sānskrit, and this again was turned into a Kannada Champu Kāvya by Shadakshara Dēva. Shadakshara was the author of the famous Rājasekhara Vilāsa, composed about 1655 A D.

have taken place after the ground had been prepared for an exploit of the kind that Ekāntada Rāmāyā is said to have achieved. Basava's revival of Saivism should have preceded it by some years for Rāmāyā's daring deed ending in the destruction of the greatest temples at Lakṣmīśvar the most famous religious centre of the Jains at the time seems like the enlivening act in the drama rather than the commencement of it. In keeping with his theory of putting Rāmāyā before Basava, is Sir John Fleet's other theory that Basava and Channa Basava's work for Virasaivism came after Bijjala's abdication. This is entirely opposed to literary tradition which states that Basava's revival of Saivism took place while Bijjala was still king of Kalyāṇa. His further suggestion that Bijjala met with his death after abdication in connection with some political opposition to the (Virasaiva) movement which he may have instigated or favoured is equally unsubstantiated. He quotes in support of this view that the Kalachūryas met with some reverse about that time as might be inferred from Sankhaṇḍa's Dandanāyaka Kavaṇa being called Kalachūrya rājya Samuddhārana the upraiser of the sovereignty of the Kalachūryas. Sankhaṇḍa succeeded Sovidūva in or about 1177 A.D. and it is possible he was associated with Sovidūva in the sovereignty from 1176 A.D. Kavaṇa's Dandanāyaka his great minister and sēnādhipati is referred to in Davangere 44 and Honnali 50 (E.C. VII and E.C. VIII) both assigned by Mr. Rice to about 1180 A.D. In both these records, he is described as possessing the titles of Gaṇḍa pendara and Gaṇḍa-gaṇa and as the uproter of the Voinada Chūleya kingdom, displacer of Hoysala, terrifier of Konkana and the upraiser of the Kalachūrya kingdom. In Davangere 50 he is also spoken of as having made the Gurjara roll on the ground. There is, in these inscriptions not even a faint suggestion of his having put down any insurrection at Kalyāṇa.

and a new mode of worshipping Siva, in which the Linca and the Nandi (or bull) were present. His piety and knowledge of the scriptures impressed Baladēva, the "prime minister" (or Dandanāyaka, as he is described in some versions) of Bijjala. Baladēva gave his daughter Gangādēvi (or Gangāmba) in marriage to him. Basava excited local antipathy by his doctrines and beliefs, and as the result of it, transferred himself to Kappadi, where he spent some time in the meditation of Siva, who, in the form of the local God Sangamēsvara, instructed him in the faith. Meanwhile his uncle Baladēva died. On the advice of the latter's relations, Bijjala, the ruling king, now called into office, Basava, who had by now acquired considerable reputation as an able and virtuous man. Basava accepted the king's invitation and proceeded to Kalyāṇi with his sister Nāgalambika, where he was welcomed and installed in the office of prime minister, commander-in-chief and treasurer by Bijjala. To keep Basava further attached to himself, Bijjala gave his younger sister Nilalōchana in marriage to him. At about this time, Basava's unmarried elder sister Nāgalambika, who was an incarnation of the goddess Pārvatī, gave birth, by the grace of Siva, to a son, who was an incarnation of Siva's son Shanmukha or Kartikēya, the god of war. As he was more beautiful than Basava, he was named Channa Basava, or the beautiful Basava. He aided Basava, his uncle, in the propagation of the new faith.

Basava's
Popularity.

Basava's popularity increased by the performance of miracles several of which are recorded in the Basava Purāṇa. Among these are those connected with the converting of grains of corn into pearls, discovering hidden treasure, feeding multitudes, healing the sick, and restoring the dead to life. Charges, false or true, began to be preferred against him by his enemies. An chief inimical to the Ch lukya power that earned for him the distinctive title of the upraiser of the Ch lukya kingdom. If it had been connected in any way with the religious feuds of the time there would have been at least a hint of it in the inscriptions referring to him. Another point worthy of note is that both the Basava and the Channa basava Purāṇas distinctly record the death of Bijjala at the hands of Basava or Basava's immediate follower or followers, so also does the Jain work Bijjalurīya Charita. There is nothing, besides in any of these works to indicate that Bijjala instigated or favoured any political opposition to the Virasaiva movement after his abdication. If these works can be believed he met with his death while yet king and only because of his cruelty towards Basava's followers who contrived to kill him either openly in his own palace (Saiva version) or secretly by poisoning (Jaina version).

Bijjala had an younger brother named Mailugi Deva. Davangere 44 praises him as acquainted with all arts and an abode of all good qualities. He is said to have shone with the lady earth in his arms. Apparently he ruled over a part of the kingdom. Bijjala had four sons. Of these Sōvi Dēva (or Sōmēvara) was the eldest. He bore the titles of Rāya Murāri and Bhujabalamalla. The next was Sankama Deva. Whether he is identical with Mailugi Deva mentioned in Davangere 44 is not known. But as both these are mentioned in this inscription as having ruled Mailugi before Sankama it seems as though they were two different persons. The third was Āhavamalla and the fourth was Bhangana. All these four succeeded to the throne one after the other. Inscriptions dated in 1170 and 1180 A.D. which have been found in the Dhārwar District show that by a wife named Echaladevi who was probably not the mother of successors.

Bijjala's
Sōvīdēva or Sōmēvara—Rāya Murāri,
Bhujabala-
malla, 1167
1176 A.D.

However that be, the suspicions of Bijjala, who was of the Jain faith were it would appear, at last roused against his minister and he was prevailed upon by a designing rival minister, named Manchanna, who though himself a Vīrasaiva in sect, did not scruple to conspire against Basava. In the course of time, Bijjala was completely alienated from Basava, and endeavoured to seize him. Basava, however, managed to escape with a number of followers, whereupon the king sent some men in pursuit. Basava easily dispersed them. Thus discomfited, Bijjala advanced in person against him. But a large number of followers had now followed Basava, who, with their aid, defeated the king. Bijjala was thus compelled to submit to his minister, who was allowed to return to the capital and reinstated in his office. Complete reconciliation was, however, impossible and in a short while, events occurred which ended in the death of Bijjala and the disappearance of Basava from the scene of his activities.

Bijjala's Countermeasures.

In his attempt to put down the Vīrasaivas, Bijjala ordered, it is stated, the blinding, in sheer wantonness, of two well-known devotees—Halleyaga (or Allaya) and Mādhuvayya. Indignant at this cruelty, Basava's followers assembled in his house. Basava left for Kūdali-Sangamēsvaia pronouncing a curse on Kalyāna and leaving instructions behind with one Jaggadēva, that he should slay the king. Jaggadēva hesitated for a moment but being spurred on by his mother, he, with a couple of friends, made his way into the palace, a bull clearing the path, and stabbed the king in the midst of his court. Jagaddēva and his companions then came out and proclaimed the cause why they had put the king to death. Jagaddēva next put himself to death. Then arose dissensions in the city, and the people fought among themselves, and horses with horses, and elephants with policy of the ancient kings the good of others was the wealth he accumulated the promotion of the greatness of his ruler was his own greatness and the satisfaction of his dependents he reckoned as his own satisfaction Thus, it is stated did Byahko Kesava Dandanāyaka live and prosper He seems to have been duly impressed with the religious sanctity and the fame of the Kedarēvara temple of Biligauri included in his charge and made a gift in 1164 A.D. in favour of it The Yati Vamasakti was at its head He is said to have been a Panini in grammar in Siddhānta Lakullavara in policy and discernment Tribhuvanaacharya in drama and the science of music, Bharata muni in poetry Subaudhu himself in Śiva devotion, Skanda He seems to have been styled Rāja guru His grant was not only for the repairs of the temple and the food of the ascetics connected with it but also for propagating (free) learning Sōvi Deva's capital is said to have been at Halyana though he seems to have had another seat of government at Modaganur located by Sir John Fleet somewhere in the Vizam's Dominions (Bombay Gazetteer 485) Among his other Dandanāyakas was Baminidevarasa who subsequently restored the Chālukya power (Ibid 468) During Sōvi Deva's reign Kadamba kings had been governors of the Banavasi province According to Sorab 315 dated in 1171 A.D. (E.C. VII) Sōvi Deva, the Kadamba governor in that year had put the Changalur king into chains as he had vowed Sorab 139 dated in 1178 A.D. shows how the despatch of military forces was necessary for collecting fixed land rent.

Sōvi Deva was succeeded by his brother Sankama Deva in or about 1177 A.D. though he seems to have ruled with Sōvi Deva from sometime in 1176 A.D. He is described as Kalachurya Chakravarti Kalachurya bhujabala chakravarti and Nissankamalla (Shikarpur

Sankama
Deva, Nissankamalla,
1177 1180
A.D.

anointed him and sent him back to Kalyāna to rule over the country. The Channa Basava Purāna describes Channa Basava as an incarnation of the Pranava or the mysterious syllable Aum begotten on Nāgalambika, sister of Basava, herself an incarnation of Pārvatī, by the spirit of Siva. The story goes that Bijjala having called in question the spiritual origin of Nāgalambika's pregnancy, she was delivered in presence of his whole court of a child resplendant with all the attributes of Siva, and his divine nature was consequently accepted as fully proved and acknowledged. According to the Purāna, it would seem as though the religious portion of the Vīṇasaiva movement was under Channa Basava's direction, Basava giving the needful political support. He seems to have shaped the creed of the sect and the direction of its adherents. The Kālagṇāna states, for instance, that the 36,000 disciples of Siva, were to eat and sport in his abode and then all disappear! The Purāna hints that he was even superior to Basava in matters spiritual. It states, in fact, that he incarnated as the Pranava to instruct Basava in the tenets of the Vīṇasaiva faith, the establishment of which is thus divided between the uncle and the nephew. Channa Basava, thus, appears to have been more wholly a religious character although the secular authority of Basava was most instrumental in the augmentation of the Vīṇasaiva sect. The Purāna adds that Channa Basava was Siva, Basava, Viśhabha (Siva's Bull), Bijjala, Siva's door-keeper in Kailāsa, Kalyāna, Kailāsa, and Siva's worshippers (Vīṇasaivas), Siva's hosts.

Jaina version
according to Byjalarāya
Charita

Far different is the version given in the Jaina work entitled Byjalarāya Charita. This is a work by Dharaṇī Iandita (The Dharaṇī Dharēndia Pundita of Wilson's Catalogue, 321). This Jain poet seems to have lived about 1650 A D. As regards Basava's relations seems to have obtained the northern and eastern provinces while Āhavamalla received the country more to the south. He probably ruled from Kalyāna. (Bombay Gazetteer 188-189) Shikarpur 119 dated in 1181 A.D. gives a glowing account of him and of his five leading ministers, upon whom his sovereign powers of government devolved. These five were Lakshmana Dandasa, spoken of as the Mahāśmantasendapati next Dandanātha Chandaḍideva who is said to have burnt the territory of the brave Vijayāditya taken the Chōla and Hoysala kingdoms and was giving constant trouble to the other kings then Rechana Dandanātha next Sūvana-chamupati and finally Kavana Dandanayaka who was like Airāvata among the regent-elephants. The experienced administrator Kesimayya Dandanayaka was appointed governor of Banavāsīnād called the treasury of the south to govern it as a father. So well did he administer his charge that under his government, we are told none were conceited none conspicuous in splendour none in opposition none clamouring for influence, none creating disturbance none in suffering no enemies filled with anger and none receiving titles had their heads turned by the songs of poets. He is spoken of as a double of Chanakya. He was apparently so greatly trusted by the king as to be termed the chief master of robes and invested with the title of Vergadde of the Antahpura i.e. female apartments. (Shikarpur 144 dated in 1181 A.D.) The latest date we have for Āhavamalla, 1183 A.D. is described as his fourth year in Shikarpur 245 (Shikarpur 159 dated in 1183 should also be set down to the same regnal year and not the 8th which seems manifestly wrong)

Āhavamalla was succeeded in 1183 A.D., by his younger brother Singhana Dēva of whom no records have, so far been found in this State. But a copper plate

Singhana
Dēva, 1183
A.D.

admitted to royal favour and appointed to a ministerial office at Court

Bijjala as described in this Poem.

Bijjala is described in this work as an embellisher of the Jaina line of kings, as the moon to the ocean of Jaina religion and as the promoter of the prosperity of the Jainas. He is also spoken of as the ocean of truth; as proficient in the wielding of the 32 implements of warfare, as the subduer of the rutting elephant and the restive horse, and as sarvajña (or all-knower). There is, besides, a vivid description of the manner in which converts were secured for the new faith by Basava's adherents, though a good part of it seems to be actuated by sectarian bias. It is suggested that the inducements were—free distribution of money and jewellery and freedom from irksome ceremonialism. Dharanī Pandita lived nearly four centuries after the events he relates took place and he can, accordingly, be only taken to record the received tradition among his own religionists.

Sir John Fleet's criticism

Writing of these traditional accounts, Sir John Fleet has offered certain criticisms which should be considered here. He says that there is no apparent reason why we should attribute to either of the two—Saiva and Jaina—Purāṇas any greater historical accuracy than any other Hindu works of the same class have been found to possess. "On the contrary," he adds, "there are fair grounds for questioning the correctness of the narratives given by them." The Saiva and Jaina accounts differ markedly and to a greater extent than can be accounted for, he holds, on simply the supposition of a representation of true facts from different sectarian points of view. After rejecting the date 785 A.D., mentioned in the Channa Basava Purāṇa for the events immediately preceding the deaths of Basava and Bijjala as untenable and rejecting equally independent faith. As regards Jainism the case was different. Bijjala was not converted to the new faith and his successors held on to it. It was professed by other kings as well in the south of India. Still it is not open to doubt that the new cult markedly checked its growth and effectively challenged its supremacy over the masses. As it spread Virasaivism claimed many of the Jain temples and with but a little change, converted Jain images even into the Linga.

The following is a genealogical table of this short lived but historically important dynasty —

Not much has been discovered of the coinage of the Kalachuryas. To Sōmāśvara (Rāyamurali Sövi) is attributed the coinage of pagōḍas and fanams with the king's titles in Hale Kannada on the reverse and a figure advancing to the right on the obverse. (Elliot, Coins of Southern India, 78 and Plate III. 87 and Rapson, Indian Coinage 88.)

Kalachurya
Coinage.

After the overthrow of the Gangas in or about 1004 A.D., the Chōlas dominated the south and east of the State. Their rule lasted until 1116 A.D., or about 112 years. During this period, almost contemporaneously with them there ruled in the north west of Mysore, the restored dynasty of Western Chalukyas. During the reign of Vikramāditya VI of the latter dynasty the

CHŌLAS.

These works could not obviously have been written of a little known or imaginary person, without pretensions to name or fame at the time they were composed. As a matter of fact, Sir John concedes that there is nothing inconsistent in the account of Ēkāntada Rāmayya as given in the epigraphic record referred to with the possibility of the revival of the Saiva religion having been largely helped, and of the establishment of the Vīsaiva sect having been actually effected by persons named Basava and Channa Basava, and even of Bijjala having been assassinated, after his abdication "in connection with some political opposition to the movement, which he may have instigated or favoured." In other words, Sir John suggests that it was Ēkāntada Rāmayya that originated the movement and not Basava and Channa Basava, who, he allows, may have played a subordinate part. Literary tradition is wholly and uniformly opposed to this suggestion. According to it, Ēkāntada Rāmayya was only one of the several adherents of Basava, included among the Śivaganas, who took part in the popularizing of the movement. The fact that no epigraphic record mentioning Basava and Channa Basava has been, so far, discovered is no argument against the rôle assigned to them in literary works, however exaggerated their accounts may be. The Basava Purāna distinctly refers in many places to the Jainas, and in fact addresses itself to them, in the shape of dialogues between some of the Jangama saints and the members of that faith, in which the former relate to the latter instances of the superiority of the Saiva religion and the shortcomings of the Jaina religion, which was professed by Bijjala and the greater part of the population of Kalyāna. In order to convert them, Ēkāntada Rāmayya, one of Basava's disciples, cut off his own head in their presence (see below) and then marched five days in solemn procession through and round the city, and on the fifth day replaced his head another. He is mentioned not only in Tamil literature but also in the Tiruvālangādū plates of Rājendra Chōla's time in the large Leyden grant and in the Udayendiram grant of Prithivīpati II. Another Chōla king referred to in the Tiruvālangādū plates is Kōchchamkāṇṇa who is mentioned in the Tamil Periyapurāṇam. It is said of him both in the Periyapurāṇam and in the Tiruvālangādū plates that he had been a spider in his previous birth. The legend was already current in the reign of Rājaraṇa I (V.E.R. 1891 2, Para 10 Ins. No. 41 of 1891 and M.E.R. 1906 Para 15). An inscription of the Pāṇḍyan king Kaḷasekhiara mentions the sacred street called after the God who transformed a spider into a Chōla King (V.E.R. 1891 2 No. 25 of 1891).

Then we have frequent allusions to Karikāla Chōla, who is also referred to in the grants above quoted and in the Bedīrūr grant of the Ganga king Bhuvikrama dated in Saka 506 (634 A.D.). He is described in this grant as the builder of banks to the Canvery (Karita Kāvēritira) a work that has been assigned to him by literary writers and lithic inscriptions of the Telugu Chōḍas of the 12th century as well (See M.A.R. 1925 Paras 135 136 (V.E.R. 1909 Para 34)). The Tiruvālangādū plates state (Verso 42) that he made the town of Kānchi new with gold a fact that is not mentioned anywhere else. (M.E.R. 1906 Para 15). This statement if true, would show that Kānchi was in the hands of the Chōlas in Karikāla's time. He is said to have invaded Ceylon and to have employed his prisoners of war in fortifying the sea port of Kāvēri pumpattinam, at the mouth of the Canvery. This place is known to Tamil poets as Puhar. His capital was situated at Uraiyūr (also spelt as Warriore and Woraīyūr) near modern Trichinopoly. This was probably the earliest capital city of the dynasty though the suggestion has been made that it was founded by Karikāla

Karikāla
Chōla 1st
century A.D. to 2nd century A.D.

figure of Bijjala's time His works, Shatsthala Vachana, Sikhāratna Vachana, Kālagṇāna Vachana and Mantra Gōpya have come down to us These works show indubitably that he was the son of Mandige Madirāja and Mādāmbika and that his grandfather was one Lingabhatta He seems to have had a son named Bālasangaiya, who, from certain known references to him by Basava himself, should have died while still young His prose sayings end with the words "Kūḍali Sangamadēva" by way of dedication to Kūḍali Sangamēśvara, his patron deity Channa Basava was likewise an author Among his works Shatsthala Vachana, Karanahasuge, Mīsrārpanu, Padamantriagōpya, Mantragōpya, Kālagṇāna and Rudrabhārata Srushti There were other followers of Basava, whose works have come down to us, e.g., Piabhudēva, Madivāla Māchāya, Siddharāma, Kondagoli Kēsirāja, who was a Dandanāyaka under Bijjala and governed Banavāsī province (Shikarpur 119 and 123), Soddala Bācharasa, Mahādēvi Akka, Gattivālaia, Mōlgeya Māiaia, Mahādēvi (poetess), and many others too numerous to mention (See Narasimhachāi's Karnāṭaka Kavicharite, New Edition, 1924, 173-200) It is not a little curious that there is no mention in Kannada literature of Ēkāntada Rāmayya There is an Ēkōiāma Tande, who is reckoned among the first five Vīrasaiva Āchāryas, some of whom are said to have lived long before Basava and some contemporaneously with him Whether Ēkāntada Rāmayya of the epigraphic record and Ēkōiāma Tande are identical or not is not known Of Ēkōrāma Tande it is said he belonged to Chanamudrapura and to have defeated many religious disputants Among those won over by him from Vaiṣṇavism was one Vyāsa, who is said to have been highly honoured by Vīra Bhāskarā, the ruler of Mudrapura The particulars given of Ēkāntada Rāmayya in the epigraphic record wholly differs from this account There is a

(V F R 1903 and 1907) Hsien Tsiang seems to have passed through this country. He writes —

"The country of Chulya (Chola) is about 2 100 or 2,500 li in circuit. the capital is about 10 li round. It is deserted and wild a succession of marshes and jungle. The population is very small and troops of brigands go through the country openly. The climate is hot the manners of the people dissolute and cruel. The disposition of the men is naturally fierce they are attached to heretical teaching. The sanghadrmas are ruined and dirty as well as the priests. There are tons of Deva temples, and many Nirgrantha heretics. (Beal Si yu ki II 227 228)

Only a person who had personal knowledge of the country could have written the above description. He refers to the capital of the kingdom which unaccountably he omits to name. Of the Buddhist monasteries near it, he says —

At a little distance south-east of the city is a stupa by Asokaraja. Not far to the west of the city there is an old sanghadrma. (Beal, Si yu ki II 227 229)

Buddhism was apparently in a decaying state. Jainism and Brāhminism being in the ascendant. The Chōlas described by Hsien Tsiang must be taken to be a branch of the main line, resident in the Telugu country and not the main line itself, which had its capital at or near Trichinopoly. Even during the height of the Pallava power the Tamil Cholas who dominated the country round about Trichinopoly do not appear to have lost their hold on it. Hence we have to conclude that Hsien Tsiang's reference to the Chōlas must be held to apply only to a section of them and not to their main line resident in or about the Canvey delta. Not long after the visit of Hsien Tsiang the Pallavas were defeated by the Chalukya king Vikramāditya I in 674 A D and again by Vikramāditya II in 740 A D. On both occasions, with Pārvatī, Brahman, Vishnu and Indra and a countless host of his Ganas or attendants, was in public assembly on the mountain Kailāsa, a leader of the Ganas, named Nārada, stood out and represented that while Ōhila, Dāsa, Chenna, Sūryāla, Halāyudha, Bāna, Udbhata, Malayēsvara who came to Kailāsa in human form, Kēsavaiaja (these persons were famous Saiva saints, and are mostly mentioned in the Basava-Purāna), and countless other Ganas resigning the happiness of earthly life, had been dwelling in Kailāsa, engaged in the worship of Siva, an opportunity had arisen for the Jains and Buddhists to become predominant and aggressive. Thereupon Siva commanded his son or attendant Vīrabhadra to make a portion of himself incarnate, in the person of a man who should restrain these hostile rites. And Vīrabhadra appeared to Purushōttamabhatta in a dream, in the guise of a hermit, and announced to him that he should have a son, who was to be called Rāma, and who should discomfit all those, in the dakṣhīnāpatha or Dekkan, who had gone astray into the paths of the Jains. In due course, a son was born to Purushōttamabhatta. According to the god's command, he was named Rāma. In conformity with his divine origin, he was taught to practise the Saiva rites, with a view to ultimate absorption into Siva. And, by the exclusiveness and intensity of his devotion to Siva, he acquired the name of Ekāntada-Rāmayya or "the single-minded Rāmayya." At various Saiva sites, with speech, body and mind entirely given up to Siva, he worshipped all the Sōmanāthas at Hulgere, i.e., at Lakshmēshvara in the Dhārwar District. There the god appeared in person to him, and gave him the command to go to Ablū,—to take up his abode there—to enter fearlessly into controversy with the Jains,—and to defeat them by wagering his head. Accordingly, he established himself at Ablū, and continued to practise asceticism at a place there known as the site of the god Brahmēsvara. One day, the Jains, led by one of the village-headmen named Sankagāvunda, assembled and began to persistently sing the praises of Jina, as the sole god, in the vicinity of the image of Siva which he worshipped. He remonstrated, maintaining that no other god deserved to be praised in the neighbourhood of Siva. And, on their refusing to desist, he then began to sing the praises of Siva, as the creator, the preserver, and the destroyer, and as the god whose essence pervades the whole

South Arcot District it has to be inferred that he ruled over a fairly good part of Southern India. He captured Tanjore apparently from some enemy and made it his capital. He is said to have built a temple of Durga Numbhasudani at this place (M E R 1906 para 16). A reference to him and to a previous grant made by him is referred to in M E R 1910 Appendix B No 676 of 1909.

Vijayalaya is referred to in some copper plate records of a date later than his own. A few lithic inscriptions of a certain Parakramavarman in Conjeevaram and Ukkol in the Chingleput District have been attributed to him. A lithic inscription of his dated in his 5th year is recorded to have been recopied in the 5th year of Vikramo Cholo when the temple of Kilputtur (North Arcot District) was renovated (M E R 1916 Para 17 Appendix B No 161). This inscription registers a previous grant of land made for offerings and worship to the central shrine in the Svayambhunathasvamin temple of Kilputtur.

The subject of the chronology of the Imperial Chōlas is not free from doubt. The dates furnished by the Ceylon chronicle, the Mahāvaṃsa for kings who ruled that province contemporaneously with Chōla kings are not always trustworthy. For instance a manifest error of 23 years has been pointed out by Dr Hultzsch. The following dates of accession have been worked out on the basis of inscriptions found in Southern India including the Mysore State. The interested reader should consult the authorities quoted at the end of this volume.

Chronology of the Imperial Chōlas.

Vijayalaya	816—820 A.D.
Āditya I	820—807 A.D.
Parāntaka I	807—917 A.D.
(The highest regnal year in y be taken to be 80, though a few stray inscriptions are found for him subsequent to that year).
Rājāditya	917—919 A.D.
Gandarāditya	919—920 A.D.

repenting the conditions on the palmyra leaf. The Jains, however, would not face the test again. So Bijjala, laughing at them, dismissed them with the advice that thenceforth they should live peaceably with their neighbours, and gave Ēkāntada-Rāmayya, in public assembly, a jayaputra or certificate of success. Also, pleased with the unsurpassed daring with which Ēkāntada Rāmayya had displayed his devotion to Siva, he laved Rāmayya's feet, and granted to the temple of Vīra-Sōmanātha a village named Gogave in the Sattalige seventy in the Banavāsi twelve thousand. Ēkāntada-Rāmayya is mentioned, with the story of his cutting off his head, in the Channabasava-Purāna (Journ Bo Br R As Soc Vol VIII p 198). But the controversy, in the course of which he cut off his head, is there attributed to a Jain having entered a Siva temple without removing his shoes, and the occurrence is located at Kalyāna, where, it is said, Rāmayya had gone in order to see Bijjala, whose fame had spread in all directions. Subsequently, the record says, when the Western Chalukya king Sōmēśvara IV and his commander-in-chief Brahma were at Seleyahalliva-koppa, a public assembly was held, in which recital was made of the merits of ancient and recent Saiva saints. The story of Ēkāntada-Rāmayya being told, Sōmēśvara IV wrote a letter summoning him into his own presence at his palace, and laved his feet, and granted to the same temple a village in the Nagalakhandā seventy in the Banavāsi twelve-thousand. And finally, the Mahāmandalēśvara Kāma-dēva went and saw the temple, heard all the story, summoned Ēkāntada-Rāmayya to Hangal, and there laved his feet and granted to the temple a village named Mallavalli, near Mundagod, in the Hosanād seventy in the Panumgal five-hundred.

Sir John Fleet who accepts the above story as 'reasonable and verisimilar enough' states that the events mentioned in it took place while Bijjala was still a Mahāmandalēśvara in the reign of Taila III, before 1162 A D, when Bijjala completed his usurpation of Chālukya sovereignty. This may have been so—though in effect the difference is only slight, for Bijjala was virtually king since 1156—but the narrative shows that it can only similarly several inscriptions which mention Rājakesari varman and are dated in his reign should be assigned to Āditya I, son of Parantaka I. Thus there is an inscription of the 24th year at Jananāthēsvara temple at Takkolam near Arkonam, of a Rājakesarivarman who has been identified with this king (M E R 1897 Appendix B No 5 of 1897). It records a gift by Pirīdipati son of Maramaraiyar, probably one of the two Western Ganga kings named Prithivipati (S I I II. 380). For the same reason several records found at the Siva temple of Tiruvambur mentioning a Rājākēsari varman have been attributed to Āditya I. This temple is one of those mentioned in the Tamil Dēvāram (7th to 8th century A D) and was probably built during the time of Āditya I (M E R 1915 Appendix B, Nos 101 104 105 127 and 130 and 133. See also Para 3). Three inscriptions found at Sēndalai mentioning Rājākēsari varman have also been attributed to him. Two of them bear the high regnal year 24 (M.E.R 1920 Appendix C Nos. 202 209 and 210). An inscription at Brahmādēsam is dated in the much higher regnal year 27 and refers to a king named Rājākēsari varman. It has been rightly attributed to Āditya I as the high regnal year cannot be assigned to any other Rājakesarivarman between Parantaka I and Rajaraja I (M.E.R 1916 Appendix B No 230). Besides this the donor in this is the same as in another inscription dated in the 17th year of Parāntaka I (Ibid No 224).

Āditya I is probably also the Rājakesarivarman who is referred to in an inscription found at Niyamam (No 10 of 1899) in which the Pallava queen Mārambavi is mentioned. She is also named in two inscriptions found at Tiruchenampundi near Kumbakonam of the Ganga Pallava king Vijaya Nripatungavikramavarman one of his 22nd and another of his 18th year as the queen of the Pallava king Nandipōttaraiyar.

in connection with any religious dispute. Apparently he was a great general and had successfully put down feudatories or neighbouring chiefs who had shown signs of revolt or aggression against the reigning Kalachurya king. It is clear from Davangere 50 that he made a victorious expedition to Banavāsi and incidentally halted at Baligāmi and pitched his camp at it, surrounded, we are told, by all the feudatories. Perhaps, once again there was trouble in the southern region and his presence secured it for the Chālukya king. The title of Kalachuryarājya-samudhanana may, therefore, have to be accounted for otherwise than with his quelling any "political opposition" to the Vīrasaiva movement during the time of Sankhama, which is, by the way, too far removed from Bijjala's life-time to be connected with it. It is strange that we have no inscriptions of Bijjala beyond 1165 A D in this State and 1167 A D (his 12th regnal year at the temple of Gōpalasvāmī at Chikka Muddanū) in the Nizām's Dominions. As Sōvidēva's inscriptions show that the latter was reckoned as the first year of his reign, Bijjala's abdication should have taken place in that year. As Sankhama is removed by nearly ten years from Sōvidēva and as Kavana belongs to the former reign, it seems altogether baseless to suggest that some disaster befell the Chālukya kingdom in a reign other than that of Sankhama in which the latter's Dandanāyaka so distinguished himself as to obtain so high a title as that of "the upraiser of the Chālukya kingdom". Nor is Kavanayya mentioned in any known epigraphic records of either Bijjala or his immediate successor Sōvidēva. The only reasonable conclusion from this absence of all mention of Kavanayya in the inscriptions of Bijjala and Sōvidēva, and his actual mention in the records of Sankhama's time is that he distinctively rose to power in the latter's reign and achieved some success against some feudatory or other

Kerala Sthanu Ravi Mr H Krishna Sastri has identified this Sthanu Ravi, the ally of Aditya in his war against the Pallavas with Kakkandan Ravi—the vanquisher of Linga mentioned with the other Chera king Vakkandan Vtranarayana of the Chandraditya family (M.E.R. 1911 Para 3) The friendly relations that existed between the Kerala Ling Sthānu Ravi and the Chola king Aditya I, as stated above explain how Parantaka I son of Aditya I came to marry the daughter of the Kerala king as mentioned in the Udayāndiram Plates of Prithivīpati II (S.I.I. II 386) Sthānu Ravi of the Kottayam Plates is a later king of that name and cannot be identified with the king of the same name referred to above (E.I. IV 293 M.E.R. 1912 Para 11)

Aditya I must have organised his military forces on the basis on which Rājaraṣa I later built up his own system After him was named the regiment called 'Ādittanpan matovinda kakkolar' (V.F.R. 1925 Appendix B No 135 of 1925)

Aditya appears to have died at Tondaimanattur as he is called Tondaimānattūr tūyinaḍvā. This place has been identified with Tondaimanad in the Kalahasti Taluk, North Arcot District whose inscriptional name is Tondaiman parattur (M.E.R. 1907 Para 29) Arinjaya, his grandson also died at an Attur but this place has probably to be identified with Sittāttur in the Walajapet Taluk, North Arcot District. (M.E.R. 1921 Para 26)

Aditya I appears to have had two sons—Kannaradēva and Parāntaka I Of the former who is described as Ādittan Kannaradēva (i.e. Kannaradēva, the son of Aditya I) nothing is known A gift of gold for a lamp is recorded by him in an inscription dated in the 3rd year of his father (M.E.R. 1895 Appendix B, No 38 of 1895) Parāntaka I the other son succeeded his father on the

Parāntaka I, Vīrañārāyaṇa Parakṛṣaṇi
varman, A.D.
907-942.

Sōvidēva and his brothers, Bijjala had another (fifth) son, named Vajradēva and a daughter Siriyadēvi, who was married to the Muhāmandalēsvara Chavunda II of the Sinda family of Yelburga (Bombay Gazetteer, 477). Davangele 44 also mentions a grandson of Bijjala named Katedēva, but it does not state whose son he was

On the abdication of Bijjala in 1167 A D, Sōvi-Dēva succeeded him on the throne. He was contemporary with Sōmēsvara IV of the Chālukya line. Occasionally he is mentioned as Sōmēsvara, and sometimes as Sōma, Sōyi and Sōvi in inscriptions (E C VIII Shikarpur 249, 92, 171, 181, Honnali 50). He had the paramount titles of Rājādhirāja, Rājamārtanda (Shikarpur 92); Kalachurya Chakravarti (Shikarpur 181), Kalachurya Bhujabala Chakravarti (Shikarpur 269). One of his wives was Savaladēvi, who is described as not only highly skilled in music and dancing, but also as displaying her accomplishments in public (Bombay Gazetteer, 484). There are about eleven inscriptions of his period or mentioning him in the Shikarpur Taluk. Among these are — Shikarpur 236 dated in the 7th year of his reign, cyclic year Vijaya, dated 1174 A D, Shikarpur 269 of the 9th year, cyclic year Khara, which may be set down to 1176, and Shikarpur 206, 10th year, dated in 1176 A D. His governor for the southern province was Kēsamayya or Kēsava-dandanāyaka. He held charge of Taddavādi 1,000, Hanungal 500 and the Banavāsi 12,000 (Shikarpur 92). He seems to have visited Baligāmi in 1168 A D. According to Shikarpur 92, he seems to have been a wise administrator and a great general. It is said of him that he killed many kings in battle, apparently an exaggeration for the successful manner in which probably he put down truculent feudatories and vassal chiefs. He is said to have followed the practice of the Manus. The policy he adopted was, we are told, the whole period of his long reign have been found (e.g. M.E.R. 1901 Nos. 281 to 299 ranging in regnal years from 20 to 36 M.E.R. 1922 Appendix B No. 216 M.E.R. 1896 Appendix B No. 42, of the 40th year etc.)

He appears to have been a pious Saiva though as we shall see he was not intolerant of Vaishnavism. A meritorious work of his often mentioned in inscriptions was his reweaving the gold plating of the famous Chidambaram temple. The gold used for this purpose is described as the pure gold brought from all the regions subdued by the power of his own arm. According to the Tiruvalangadu Plates the portion of the Chidambaram temple which he covered with gold was the small hall of Siva known as darbhavabha Tamil Chitambalam (M.E.R. 1906 Para 16). The Kulamukha ascetics appear to have received considerable patronage at his hands. A well organized village administration is found mentioned in his inscriptions. An inscription of his 14th year shows that during his reign if not from an earlier date there was a Committee of the Village Assembly called the Sabhai Idriyam along with the tank supervision and other special Committees. (M.E.R. 1923 Appendix C No. 74). He probably built on the foundations of an existing system of rural self government. The Udayandiram Plates state that he practised many meritorious acts and gifts, such as the hemagarbha gift, the tulabhāra gift gifts of land to Brahmans and the building of temples.

His religion domestic life etc.

His capitals were Conjeevaram and Tanjore. One of his queens was a princess of Kōrala being the daughter of the Kōrala prince Paluvittaraiyar (E.I. XV 50). Another was Villavan Madēviyār who is known from an inscription dated in his 30th year (M.E.R. 1910 Para 16, No. 87 of 1910). An unknown queen of his was Ādittan

His Capitals
and his Queens.

237 and 300 dated 1180 A D) Kalyāna seems to have been his capital, with a second seat at Modeganur, above named. There seems to have been some trouble in his reign, for Kavana or Kavanayya is said to have proved himself the "upraiser of the sovereignty of the Kalachuriyas" (Honnali 50 dated in 1180 A D) Apparently he put down certain of the feudatories and probably also some of the more troublesome independent neighbours, among whom must be classed the ruler of the Velnāda Chōleya, Hoysala and Konkana countries, mentioned in the inscription referred to (See above) This Kavana is said to have been descended from Bankarasa of Baluhara in the Sagara country and had an younger brother named Mahādēva-dandanīyaka. Among Kavana's titles were, according to Davangere 44, Ganda-pendara and Gandara-gova. He should have been a great minister, for he is said to have had under him over seventy-two officials. Shikarpur 96 dated in 1179 A.D refers to a pleasure visit he paid to the southern province of Banavāsī. At Baligāmi, he heard of the great Kēdarēsavara temple and its famous head Vāma-sakti, who is described as the very Māgha in poetry. Sankama appears to have ruled to about the end of 1180 A D.

Ahavamalla,
1180-
1183 A D

Sankama was succeeded in or about 1181 A D by his brother Āhavamalla. He also possessed the title of Viṛa-Nāīāyana (or Rāya Nāīāyana, as Shikarpur 245 puts it). His real name is not known. Like his predecessors, he appears to have been known as Kalachuriya Chakravarti (Shikarpur 144, 245), Kalachuriya Bhujabala Chakravarti and also Paramabhattacharya. From an inscription at Baligāmi, it is inferred that he was associated in the rule with Sankama about 1179 A D and that probably there was a division of the kingdom in the same year between the two brothers. Sankama Takkolam in Saka 872, corresponding to A.D. 949-950 (E.I. VI 51 and ante under Western Chalukyas) The year 'two' of the hūlapuram record should according to Dr. Hultzsch, refer to Rajaditya, which would make him king for two years, from A.D. 917-918 to A.D. 919-950. According to the Kanvaṅṅur inscription of Viṣṇurājendra Kṛṣṇa III was defeated perhaps earlier in his reign by Parantaka I (E.I. XVIII 24) and in retaliation Kṛṣṇa III killed Rajaditya in battle. Why a powerful king like Parantaka I did not avenge his son's death is not clear. It has been suggested that he was engaged in his third war against the Pāṇḍyas of Madura (946-947 A.D.) and could do nothing at the time to save his son. It is probable he died about 947-948 A.D. and that he was succeeded by his son Rajaditya in that year. His death left Kṛṣṇa III free to rule over the conquered area in the south which inscriptions show the Cholas had given up for lost for the time being. This is how a number of inscriptions found in the South Arcot District, with Saka dates, ranging from A.D. 953 to 963 and referring to a local chief but without mentioning any overlord have to be explained. This peculiarity shows that there was no Chōla king ruling over the territory comprised in the modern districts of North Arcot, Chittoor, South Arcot and Chingleput.

Mention has been made of Parantaka's war against the Pāṇḍyas of Madura. It must be added that he fought against them three times and twice against the Ceylonese. (M.E.R. 1907 Pages 58-49) His first war against the Pāṇḍyas appears to have been as stated above in his 8th year (or A.D. 910) when he assumed the title of Maduraiṅṇḍan. The second war should have taken place about his 12th year (or A.D. 919). Mr. Venkayya has suggested that there should have been another war between these two wars i.e., between the Pāṇḍyas.

War against

grant of his has been traced in the Dhārwar District. (Bombay Gazetteer, 489) It is dated in October 1183. As he is described in it as Mahārājādhirāja, Sir John Fleet suggests he actually ascended the throne. But we know nothing about him. He proved the last of his line. In the same year, 1183, A.D., probably in the earlier part of it, the Western Chālukya sovereignty was restored, by Dandanāyaka Brahma, as mentioned before, in the person of Sōmēsvara IV.

Importance of Kalachurya
Rule

The Kalachurya dynasty thus did not last beyond a short period of about twenty-seven years. Brief though its rule, it was highly eventful. The rise and rapid growth of Vīrasaivism was one of its chief features. This resuscitated Saivism, of a strict and militant type, produced at least two effects. One was, it stimulated Kannada literary effort, though it took a controversial turn at first and later a sectarian. But Vīrasaiva writers have been among the most assiduous cultivators of polished Kannada. Their writings cover many pages of the literary history of the Kannada country and range from popular poetry to abstruse philosophic thought. Some of the authors were great scholars as much in Sānskrit as in Kannada. Another effect of the spread of Vīrasaivism was the eclipsing of the more ancient Buddhist and Jain faiths. Buddhism was still a living religion during Bijjala's time, and as such claimed numerous followers in the Deccan and the Banavāsī areas. There are many references to Buddhism in the Ācharasāra, which shows clearly that about Saka 1076 (1154 A.D.) it was still popular. Nagiyakka founded the temple of Tāra at Baligāmi in 1065 A.D., the year of Bijjala's abdication (Shikarpur 170, see under Western Chālukyas). With the growth of Vīrasaivism among the masses, Buddhism slowly lost its hold on them and combined with other causes, soon ceased to exist as an Kilappaluvur in the Trichinopoly District and Tiruppar-kadal in the North Arcot District (M P R 1926 Appendix C No 211 and M I R 1903 No 693 of 1901). In the Tiruppar-kadal inscription it is stated that the Pandya and the king of Ceylon came together in the battle with Perumanadigal (i.e. Parantaka I) at Velur. In the Kilappaluvur record we are told that the Pandyan king had with him the army of Ceylon and died in the battle at Vellur. From the I dayacodiram plates of Prithivipati (verses 10 and 11) we find that Rajasinha was the Pandyan king who was defeated with an immense army sent by the king of Lanka and lost his life and from the concluding portion of verse 11, it might be even inferred that Vellur or Velur referred to above as the place of battle should be located in the Madam country.

Among the feudatories of Parantaka I were Nalamba ^{His} Tribhuvanadhiraja and the Ganga king, Prithivipati II ^{feudatories.} identical with Nalamba (or Nalamba) and Vira Chola of an inscription at Palankot (North Arcot District) assigned to Parantaka I (F I IV, 82 and 223 and M. E. R 1925 Appendix B Nos. 361 and 362 of 1925). An important personage of his reign was Tirukattalipichegar. He built the Tiruvāduturai temple to which Parāntaka I contributed 500 kulanju of gold (Ibid No 143 of 1925). On the south wall of the central shrine of this temple is cut out in relief a figure about a foot in height, of this chief with his name engraved beside it. Another chief connected with his reign was Paluvottaraiyar apparently he of Paluvar, in the modern Udavarpālāiyam Taluk Trichinopoly District who gave his daughter in marriage to Parāntaka I. In the Anbil Plates of Sundara Chōla this chief is called Keralarāja. It is curious that the god in the Siva temple at Paluvur is referred to by Tirugnānasambhandar (7th century A.D.) as having been

Hoysala king Vishnuvardhana overthrew the Chōlas and captured Talkād, the old Ganga capital

Their origin
and history,
Circa 4th to 3rd century
B C

The Chōlas were one of the oldest royal lines known in the south of India. They are mentioned by Katyāyana, the great Sūtra writer, who has been assigned to the 4th century B C. by some and by others to the 3rd century B C, and in the edicts of Asōka, the Maurya Emperor, which belong to the 3rd century B C. As they are not referred to by Pāṇini (Circa 300 B C, according to Macdonell and 700 B C, according to Belvalkar in his Systems of Sanskrit Grammar), it has been suggested they might have come into existence, some time between the 3rd and 7th centuries B C. In Asōka's Edict XIII, the Chōla king is referred to as an independent ruler in the south, to whose dominions Buddhism had been extended. Their origin and early history are lost in obscurity though a great part of their later annals has been recovered mostly through the decipherment of their extant inscriptions in India, Burma and Ceylon. Their name is written in Tamil as Sōla or Sōra, in Kannada, it is Chōla, and in Telugu, it appears as Chōḍa. As Asōka states that his religious conquest extended to the Chōla kingdom and beyond it to the Pāṇḍya kingdom as well, it may be taken that there were, about the 3rd century B C, already professing Buddhists and Jains in and about the Chōla country.

The Early Chōlas 3rd century B C to 1st Cent.
A D.

Of the earliest kings of this dynasty, of whom there might have been several generations, practically nothing definite is known. The few stray literary references we have hardly lift the veil that obscures them.

Kōpperun
Chōla Kōchchamkanna

A king prominently mentioned by poets is Kōpperun-Chōlan (literally the Great Chōla King), who appears to have been at war with his own sons. Perunatkili is been identified with modern Nellore which should have been a frontier town of the Eastern Chalukyas. At this very spot a battle had been fought in the 18th century A.D. by Udayachandra the general of Nandivarman Pallavamalla. (See ante and SLI II 361) The conquest of Nellore by Sombiyen shows that Parāntaka I completed the conquest of Tondaimandalem which was first begun by his father and even extended his conquests northward as far as Nellore.

Parāntaka's political relations with the Cheras were always cordial. This is confirmed by an inscription at Tiruvorriyur which records a gift at the place made by Iravi Nila (i.e. Ravi Nile) daughter of Vijayarāghava Deva king of the Cheras (U.E.R. 1913 Appendix B No 169) who cannot be the king of that name mentioned in the Kottayam Plates assigned by Rai Bahadur V. Venkayya to a period later than the 11th century A.D. (E.I. IV, 203). A number of inscriptions mentioning Parāntaka I have been found at Sūmur near Karur which shows that the Kongu country or at least the part of which borders on the Trichinopoly District, should have passed into the hands of the Cholas in his reign or in the reign of his predecessors. That Parāntaka does not lay claim to such conquest though the territory was under his sway and that it is actually attributed to Āditya I by the Kongudēsarājākkal indicates that Āditya I should have conquered it. An inscription in the Kolar District dated in the 29th year of Parāntaka I mentions the village of Parantakapura and describes it as situated on the road to Kongunād. This confirms his rule over Kongunād which at the time should have extended over a part of the Mysore country (M.F.R. 1912 No 457 of 1911). An inscription found at Kuhur in the Kumbakonam Taluk dated in the 9th year of Perakūśarivarman may be one of Parāntaka I as it mentions the

His Relations with the Cheras.

Chōla Kāvēripūmpattinam attracted to itself much of the sea-borne trade of the times. Foreign merchants, including those from Rome, regularly visited it and even resided at it for considerable periods of time. Graphic descriptions of it are to be found in the writings of Tamil poets (see Kanakasabhai's Tamils Eighteen Hundred Years Ago, (16-38). Karikāla seems to have improved and fortified and not founded it, for it is referred to as having existed long prior to his time. Roman trade with it seems to have lasted to about 215 A.D. Caracalla's massacre at Alexandria in that year put an end to it. The ancient site of Kāvēri-pūmpattinam, now called Sāyāvanam, has been searched for early Chōla inscriptions. It has yielded only three records of Vikrama-Chōla; one of these refers to Sajai in Pugal-nagar, which is the name given to Kāvēri-pūmpattinam in Tamil literature (M E R 1912 Appendix B No. 269).

Nedumadi
Kili Destruction of Kāvēripūmpattinam
Huen Tsiang's
description,
7th century
A.D.

Karikala was succeeded by his son or perhaps his grandson Nedumadi Kili. During his reign, Kāvēri-pūmpattinam is said to have been destroyed by an invasion of the sea. The event is held to have happened in the 2nd or 3rd century A.D. About this time, the Chōlas appear to have suffered at the hands of the Chēlas and then of the Pallavas. At the time of Huen Tsiang's visit, about 641 A.D., the position of the Chōlas was a wholly subordinate one. No king of theirs is mentioned by him. Their country is stated to have been 1000 li south-west of Dhanakataka (modern Amalāvati) and about 1500 li from it to the south was Diavida, capital of which was modern Kānchi. The country thus demarcated must be identified with a part of the Ceded Districts, more probably that portion of it which comprises the Cuddapah district, where Tamil inscriptions of Parāntakal of the Imperial Chōla dynasty have been found (M E R. 1908, Para 49), and also Telugu Chōla inscriptions.

He was apparently later in life if not an adherent of Vaiṣṇavism at least not uninterested in its tenets. His surname Vīra Vārdyana shows him in the light of a militant Vaiṣṇava. The temple of Viranārāyaṇasvami at Kattumannarkovil which is still in existence seems to be named after him. Kattumannarkovil is famous in Śrī Vaiṣṇava tradition as the birth place of the famous Ālvar Nādamuni and his grandson Yamunaitturaiyar or Ālavandār. Parāntaka I is stated in the Cape Comorin inscription of Rājendra Chōla to have founded many Brahman villages after his surname of Vīra Nārāyaṇa (Verse 60). One of these apparently was the village of Viranārāyaṇa Chaturvēdinangalam a village in the Mayavaram Taluk Tanjore District. (M.E.R. 1925 No. 135 of 1925). Nādamuni's date has not been definitely fixed. He enjoys the reputation of having by divine grace reproduced the lost lyrics of Nammalvar. He may be placed about the middle of the 10th century A.D. i.e., about the very time that Parāntaka I ruled over the Chōla country. Parāntaka I was also known by the surname of Panditaratsala after which is a place called Panditaratsalacheri in the Tanjore District. It is a hamlet of Rājakesari-chaturvēdinangalam (now called Kōyil Tōvārāyanpēttai) which should have been so named after Rājakesari Āditya I the father of Parāntaka I. The suburb of Rājagiri near Kōyil Tōvārāyanpēttai, where are vestiges of ancient temples may be the site of Rājakesari Chaturvēdinangalam (M.E.R. 1924, Part II Para 8 Appendix B Nos. 276 and 234 of 1923). The title Panditaratsala may perhaps be taken as suggestive of his interest in letters or men of learning.

The Udayōdiram Plates say that he made many gifts befitting his title of Dānatunga. One of these is of some interest. He is recorded to have granted the revenue of a field at the base of the Shūlinghur hill for the Kānchi, their capital, was taken but spared (see ante) This prevented fresh Pallava aggressions southwards Gōvinda III, the Rāshtrakūta king, defeated the Pallavas again, in or about 797 A D (See ante under Rāshtrakūtas). About 862-863 A D, the Pāndyas under Vaiaguna appear to have invaded the Chōla country but were beaten off by Aparājita, the Pallava king, aided by the Western Ganga king Prithivīpati I, at the battle of Tiruppurambiyam, near Kumbakonam. (See ante under Pallavas). This gave an opportunity to the Chōlas, who had hitherto been in a repressed state, being hemmed in between the Pallavas on the one side and the Pāndyas on the other, both trying to occupy as much of their territory as possible Towards the close of the 9th century, however, Āditya I, the Chōla king, defeated in battle Aparājita, the Pallava sovereign, and annexed his territories (See ante under Pallavas) As the Tiruvālangādu Plates state that Aparājita was conquered in battle with his brilliant troops, it is possible he was taken captive and made to end his days in a state prison (Ibid)

Imperial
Chōlas
Vijayālaya,
846-880 A D

Āditya I, above named, was the son of Vijayālaya, the founder of a new dynasty of Chōla kings, who might be well called the Imperial Chōlas (About these kings and their successors, see M.E.R. 1892, Para 6 and S.I.I. III. ii 196) They seem to have been alternately entitled "Rājakēsari-varman" and "Parakēsari-varman" How far this dynasty was descended from the old Chōla rulers of Urayūr mentioned by the Tamil poets, it is yet too premature to suggest Some of the former are claimed as ancestors by some of the latter, and both belonged to the Solar race Vijayālaya probably began his reign about 846 A D and continued till about 880 A D As his inscriptions have been found in such widely scattered areas as Suchindram near Cape Comorin and Ukkal, Conjeevaram and Tirukkoiyur, in the Chingleput and interest about him is that he was the first Chōla king—before the time of Rajaraja I—to begin a lithic inscription with an eulogistic introduction. This is an inscription of his 9th year and does not contain any of his exploits (M F R 1921 Appendix B No. 261 of 1924)

Parantaka I was not only a warlike and religious prince. He also appears to have taken an active interest in improving the internal administration of his kingdom. Abuses had crept into the working of the village assemblies which he sought to set right on two occasions once in his 12th and again in his 15th year. These inscriptions specify at length the course to be pursued in the selection of members to the different committees into which the village assembly appears to have been divided at the time the qualifications of the persons to be selected the disqualifications to which they were to be subject the manner in which the members chosen to the different committees should carry out their work and submit their annual accounts etc. These injunctions were adopted by the Village Assembly concerned and they indicate the insight that Parantaka had in the smallest detail of rural administration. (M E R 1800 Paras 58 and 73)

Reform of Village
Assemblies

Parāṇṭaka died about 917-918 A D (E I VII 123-124, also see above) leaving five sons and a daughter. An inscription of his 31st year mentions his daughter named Viramadeviyār. She was the wife of one Gōvinda pallavaraiyār apparently a Pallava prince of whom nothing is known (M E R 1922, Para 13 Appendix B No. 216). Towards the end of his reign the Rāshtra kūṭas under Krishna III invaded the Chōla country, killed the Chōla prince Rājāditya and seized Tondai nāḍu, which they seem to have ruled for about a quarter of a century (see below). During this period, the Chōlas

His Death

Arinjaya	919—950 A D
Sundara-Chōla, Parāntaka II	917—966 A D
(His highest regnal year was, perhaps, 17)
Aditya II, Karikala II	965—970 A D
(His highest regnal year known is 5)
Uttama-Chōla, Parakēsari-Varman
(S I I III 284)	969—985 A D
Rāja-rāja I	985—1013 A D
Rājendra-Chōla	1012-13—1045 A D
Rājādhirāja I	1012—1054 55 A D.
Rājendra Dēva	1052—1062 A D
Rājamahēndra	} (? 1062—1065) } } (? 1063—1066) }
Virarājendra
Adhirājendra
Rājendra Chōla II or }	} 1063-64—1070 A D
Kulōttunga Chōla
Vikrama-Chōla	1070—1120 A.D
Kulōttunga-Chōla II	1118—1135 A D
Rājarāja II	? 1183—1145 A D
Rājādhirāja II	1146—1172 A D
Kulōttunga Chōla III	? 1172—1187 A D
	1178—1216 A D
Kopperunjinga's Rebellion and Rule, 1243—1279 A D
Rājārāja III	1216—1257 A D
Rājendra Chōla III	1246—1268 A D
Pandyan, Kālatiya and Hoysala occupation, 1266—1310 A D
Semapillai (Feudatory of Vira Pāndya)	?
Tirubhuvanaohōladēva	1332 A D

Several Chōla kings are known from inscriptions, but their identity cannot be established as they bear no distinguishing royal titles, beyond the names Rājākēsari-varman or Parakēsari-varman (e g, see M E R 1920, Para 18, M E R 1924, Para 10, etc) A number of inscriptions attributed to Parakēsari-varman without any distinguishing title should be set down as stated above, to Vijayālaya, the first of the Chōla line Thus inscription No 45 of 1895 (M.E R 1895, Appendix B) dated in the 5th year of the early Chōla king Parakēsari-varman should be attributed to Vijayālaya If so, No 45 of 1895 which records gifts by Mallur-nangai, the mother-in-law of the early Chōla king Parakēsari-varman, shows that she was the mother-in-law of Vijayālaya She is mentioned in an inscription in the temple of Tiruppuvanam (M.E R 1895),

27th year of Krishna III in the Jalanthasvara temple at Takkolam corroborating this statement. (No 2 of 1897 M F R 1897 Appendix B)

An inscription at Sôlapuram further confirms the Âtukur inscription as to Krishna III piercing Rajaditya and entering Iondimandala. From this inscription it might be inferred that he died in the second year of his reign. This, again confirms Dr Koilhorn's calculation of the date of an inscription at Kuram according to which the 10th year of Parāntaka I the father of Rajaditya, corresponded to A.D. 916. So Parāntaka should have reigned from A.D. 907 to at least A.D. 916 and Rajaditya's reign commenced about 918 A.D. and he was killed by Krishna III about 919 A.D. (M F R 1903 Para 6). According to the Âtukur and the Sôlapuram records, he is reported to have been killed in or before Saka 872 (919-920 A.D.) whereas Parāntaka's latest year derived from inscriptions is A.D. 951-952. Consequently Rajaditya's death must have happened almost about the end of Parāntaka's reign. If not a little earlier. That Rajaditya was killed in battle while he was actually seated on his elephant is proved not only by the Âtukur stone but also by the large Leyden grant which states that he 'went to the world of heroes (i.e. died) being placed in the heart while seated on the back of (his elephant)'. He is the prince referred to in certain inscriptions at Kumbakonam and Tirunâgasvaram as Ānamerrunjinār i.e., the king (or prince) who died on the (back of his) elephant. His mother—queen of Parāntaka I—was Kulānadigal, who is probably identical with Kōkkilānadigal.

Rajaditya was also known as Muvadi Chôla. His queen was Irayiravāndēvi Ammanar (M.E.R. 1912, Appendix B Nos. 226-213 and M.E.R. No. 534 of 1905). His death at Takkolam shows that before his death he was in charge of the modern North Arcot District.

(M. E. R. 1901, Nos 300, 301 and 303) Dr. Hultzsch writes ---

“ One feels tempted to conclude from this that Rājakēśari-varman put an end to the rule of the Ganga-Pallavas, and that certain chiefs who claimed connection with the Pallava dynasty were first subordinate to Nīpatungavarman and afterwards to his conqueror the Chōla king. We have no means of ascertaining whether Mārambāvi's husband Nandipōttaraiyan was identical with (Nandivarman), who was “ Victorious at Tellāru ”

Of this latter, an inscription has been found in the Tiruchenampūndi temple (M. E. R. 1901, No 25) Mr H. Krishna Sāstri has suggested that this Nandivarman has to be kept distinct from the Vijaya-Nīpatungavarman above referred to (See S. I. I. II, V 506, also ante under Pallavas)

Āditya I, Rājakēśari
varman,
880-907 A. D.

Āditya I succeeded Vijayālaya I on the Chōla throne about 880 A. D. He had a long and eventful reign of about twenty-seven years. His defeat of the Pallava king Aparājita has been referred to above. He is said to have taken the Kongu (Salem and Coimbatore Districts) and the Tondaimandalam country.

In his conquest of the Pallavas, Āditya appears to have been assisted by the Kērala King Sthānu Ravi, both of whom are represented in an inscription at Tillaisthanām as having conferred on one Vikki-Annan certain honours. This Vikki-Annan had married a Kadamba princess, called Kadambamādēvi. He was probably a Kodumbalūr chief and a feudatory of the Chōlas. Some Kannada inscriptions found at Kodumbalūr suggest their connection with the Mysore country. Vikki-Annan, from the nature of the honours bestowed on him, which included a throne, palanquin, mansion, etc., should have distinguished himself as an able general to have deserved them at the hands of the two kings, the Chōla Āditya and the probably also owes its origin to him (M.E.R. 1911 Para 22)

Gandarādittan (or Gandarādityan) the second son of Parantaka I succeeded him on the throne. Although some epigraphs with regnal years running up to 17 have on some plausible grounds, been attributed to this king there are also some grounds for doubting whether he had such a long reign. The Cape Comorin inscription of Vira Rājendra omits his name in the line of Chola succession. This omission confirms to some extent Mr. K. Subramanya Iyer's view that if he ruled at all it was only for a short time and that he died soon and was succeeded by his brother Arinjaya (Historical Sketches of Ancient Dehkan 231-232).

Gandarāditya Rājakesarivarman
919-920 A.D.

But there is, as suggested by Mr. G. Venkoba Rao nothing to preclude the possibility that Gandarāditya might have begun his rule during the latter part of his father's reign as co-regent (V.E.R. 1921, Para 27). An inscription of the 12th year of a Rājakesarivarman 'who took Madura' has been attributed to him. (S.I.I. III 250 V.E.R. 1923 Appendix B 396 of 1922). As he was known as Madirakonda Rājakesarivarman (see M.E.R. 1913 Para 19) it has to be inferred that he took an active part in one of the campaigns of his father against the Pāndyas if he did not actually lead it. The title 'Madirakondān' would itself indicate that he was the general in charge and was successful in the expedition. An inscription of the 22nd year of Parantaka I at Kilappalavur mentions a gift by a servant of Gandarādittan at Tanjore. This was probably Prince Gandarāditya. He must have been at the time of this inscription already a grown up prince. (M.E.R. 1926 Appendix U No 241). One of his surnames was Neriyaarachchola-perāru. (M.E.R. 1925, No 166 of 1925). Considering his great piety, the title was not undeserved. At least

His part in the Pāndyan war
His religious piety and zeal in temple affairs.
His literary work Tiruvicaiippa
His death

throne His brother Kannaradēva was probably the elder and had predeceased him sometime before the death of Āditya I Parāntaka I appears to have been an ambitious and intrepid prince He is described in many of his inscriptions as "Maduraikondān" ("who took Madura") and "Īlan Kondān" ("who took Ceylon"). His Tamil inscriptions have been found in the Cuddapah District, where the prevailing language is now Telugu. He carried on three consecutive wars against the Pāndyas, in the last of which he also invaded Ceylon (M.E.R. 1906-07, Part II, Paras 32-34) He defeated the Pāndya king Rājasimha in the third year of his reign, or about 910 A D He defeated the Bānas as well, and conferred their sovereignty on the Western Ganga prince Prithivīpati with the name of Hastimalla (See ante under Pallavas) This was about 921 A D This is the first event which brought the Chōlas into contact with Mysore.

The extent of
his Rule

An inscription dated in the 29th year of his reign has been found at Bairakur, Kolar District, recording a grant in favour of a hero His 29th regnal year would be A D. 935-936 (E C X, Mulbagal 203) Apparently a part of the present Kolar District formed part of his kingdom. He conquered Kongu, modern Salem and Coimbatore Districts, in the former of which his inscriptions have been found. Towards the close of his reign, he even invaded Ceylon from which exploit he took the modest title of "a veritable Rāma in battle" In describing it, he says, "he slew in an instant, at the head of a battle, an immense army sent by the Lord of Lanka," and another inscription definitely states that he entered the island with an invading army The reality and the extent of his conquests may be inferred from the fact that inscriptions referring to him have been found from Suchindram, near Cape Comorin, in the south, to Kālāhasti in the North Arcot District Many inscriptions ranging over the who was pleased to go to the west— Vērkkelunda rulina dēvar an emblemism for saying that he had been pleased (like the sun) to sink (in the West)

i.e. die

Sembiyan Mahādēviyar was as we have seen the second of his two queens. She is referred to in inscriptions as the daughter of Malavaraiyar or Malavarkūn.
Apparently she survived Gandarāditya long after his death. She had a son by him who afterwards became king under the name of Uttama Chōla. She appears to have survived him also. It is known from the inscriptions referring to her that she lived through the reigns of Arinjaya Sundara Chōla Āditya II Uttama Chōla and Rajarāja I. She probably died about 1001 A.D. in the 16th year of the reign of Rajarāja I. In two records dated in the 8th and 12th years of Rajarāja I, she is referred to as Udaiyapirāṭṭiyār. Her record for pious deeds is a long and notable one. Her prolific building activities indicate her deep piety which probably she imbibed from her husband.

His Queen
Sembiyan
M. Mahadeviyar

Here is a brief summary of her charitable foundations —

Her record of pious deeds

Widowed early in life and with an infant-son who could not immediately succeed to the Chōla throne after the death of his father Gandarāditya Parāntakan Mādēvadigalar alias Sembiyan Mahādēvi appears to have developed a devout turn of mind and to have spent large sums of money in renovating ruined temples and constructing new ones in stone, providing the images of gods and goddesses with valuable gold ornaments set with pearls, rubies and diamonds and making gifts of gold and silver utensils to several temples for use during the services. Such donative records are distributed in the reigns of her son Uttama-Chōla. The earliest gifts made by this queen seem to have been the gifts of a perpetual lamp to be burnt in the Tiruvananthapuram Udaiyār at Kāttumannārkōyil

Karalippnātti, who is mentioned in an inscription dated in his 40th year (M.E.R 1918, Para 9, Appendix B No 353 of 1918) An inscription at Tiruvaiyar in the Tanjore District refers to a princess named Arinjigai, the daughter of a certain Ilādarayar, i e, Lātarayaṇ, or king of the Lāta country If she was a queen of Parāntaka I, she was probably the mother of Arinjaya, one of his sons (See M.E.R 1918, Appendix C Nos. 131 to 139, 143 and 144 of 1918) Another inscription of his dated in his 34th year mentions his queen Seyyabhuvanasundaramaniyār (M.E.R 1923, Para 25, Appendix C No 46 of 1923). Another queen of his was Kōkkilānadigal (E.I. VII 137) It is possible that Kōkkilānadigal is only an honorific title meaning “H R H” and as such referable to one, either Seyyabhuvana or Villavan-Mādēviyār His son Rājāditya had under him a Kērala general, who built a temple in the present South Arcot District

Period of his
rule

He probably ruled for about forty years from 907 A.D. to 947-948 A.D. Though there are a few epigraphs bearing even a higher regnal year than 40, it is possible that they were so dated in his reign, despite his demise at an earlier date, in conformity with the practice of the times which continued the dating of records in the name of a dead king until his successor was firmly established in the kingdom (See M.E.R 1926, Para 12). It is possible also that he lived a few years later and his son Rājāditya was co-regent with him during that period—until he was unhappily cut off at the battle of Takkolam This view is rendered probable by the Sōlapuram record, whose date is expressed in three different ways —(1) “the year two”, (2) “the Saka year 871 (A.D. 949)”, and (3) “the year in which Kannalādēva-vallabha having pierced Rājāditya entered Tondaimandalam.” (E.I. VII). Krishna III began his rule in or about A.D. 940 and continued till about A.D. 968 and killed Rājāditya at Uttama Chōla was a recipient of some fresh donations at her hands in the 9th year of Rājārāja I and a year later similar presents of jewels and money were made to the temple of Tirukkārkudi Īlvār at Nandivarmamangalam alias Uyyakkondān-Tirumalai in the Trichinopoly District. An epigraph of the 11th year of the same king engraved on the wall of the handalavara temple at Tennēri (in the Chingleput District) testifies to her having made a present of some vessels to that temple. In the 15th year of Rājārāja, some jewels and gold vessels were presented to the Vṛddhaśālam temple and in the next year she built the Chandramaulavara temple at Tiruvakkaraī. This appears to have been the last temple built by this saintly queen and she appears to have passed away in the 16th year of Rājārāja, corresponding to A.D. 1001. An inscription at Tirumalavādi mentions that a liquid measure was called after her name as Samhiyan Mahādēvi. Such is the list of her benefactions as collected from the inscriptions copied hitherto and there may have been other charities of which we have no knowledge at present. Her benefactions gave a great impetus to the growth of architecture in the Chōla times, which bore noble fruit in the reigns of Rājārāja and his son Rājendra Chōla.

To this list may be added her gift of gold and silver vessels to the god at Tiruchcheluar, now known as Koyil Tevarāyanpettai in the Tanjore District. (M.E.R. 1924 Appendix B Nos. 262 and 263 of 1923) Similarly her gifts to the temple at Tiruvankādn consisted of copper vessels, ornaments, images of gold and silver set with precious stones such as pearls of different kinds (M.E.R. 1918 Para 13 Appendix B No. 444 of 1918). All her gifts to temples and gods were made after the demise of her husband. Her statue is to be found set up in the Siva temple at Kūnērirajapuram in the Tanjore District. On the south wall of the Siva temple at Tirunāgesvaram near Kumbhakonam is a miniature representation of a lady in a sitting and worshipping posture. Next to it is an inscription in Sānskrit which refers to Gandarāditya, his son Madhurāntaka and the latter's mother. As

Her Canoniza-
tion 1000
A.D.

910 and 919 A D According to inscriptions, the last war against the Pāndyas should have taken place towards the close of his reign, ie, about 947-948 A D The earliest mention of the conquest of Īlam (Ceylon) in his records is in an inscription of his 37th year (or A.D 943-944). According to the Mahāvamsa, it should have occurred in the reign of Udaya III, who ruled from A D 964 to 972 Making allowance for the error in the chronology of Ceylon pointed out by Dr. Hultzsch, ie, in other words, deducting twenty-three years from the initial year of Udaya III, we find that the event cannot fall in his reign, though it does into that of Parāntaka I According to the Leyden grant, when Parāntaka I died, Rājāditya became king, but was killed at Takkolam about A D 950 The Tuvālangādu Plates (verses 54-55) clearly state that Gandarāditya and Arindama became kings after Parāntaka I. But as the Leyden grant mentions nothing about them, it has been suggested that they died a natural death, after short reigns, in or about 950 A D From A D 950 to 963, the ruling Chōla king was Sundara-Chōla Parāntaka II and he consequently could have ruled over the Tanjore and Trichinopoly Districts, as no inscriptions have so far been discovered further north. It is, besides, significant that with the accession of Āditya Karikāla and his successor Uttama-Chōla, whose initial date was A D 969-970, Chōla inscriptions begin to appear in the South Arcot and Chingleput Districts This shows that with the decline of the Rāshtrakūtas under Khottiga (A D. 966-971), the vigour of their rule in these districts waned and the Chōlas correspondingly increased their domination over them

Second war
against the Pāndyas,

Of Parāntaka's second war against the Pāndyas, we get a few glimpses in a couple of inscriptions, both dated in his 12th year, but coming from different places—

is a shrine of Arinjivara within the temple there. This should have come into existence as the result of this visit (M.F.R. 1913 Appendix B No 170, Para 18). A daughter of his is referred to in a record of his 6th year. Her name was Arinjigaipirattiyār alias Banapperundōviyār. As her gifts are referred to in three other records of the 11th year of Rajaraja I, found at Tirunngesvaram near Kumbhakonam she must have lived till then. Parāntaka I, her grandfather uprooted the Bānas and bestowed their kingdom on a Ganga prince. As she is described as the queen of a Bāna king we have to infer that the Bānas accepted the suzerainty of the Chōlas and entered into matrimonial relations with them (M.E.R. 1912 Para 16 Appendix B 215 218 and M.E.R. 1897, Nos. 81 and 82).

Arinjaya died at a place called Āttūr hence the name His death.
the king who fell asleep (i.e. died) at Āttūr is given to him in an inscription of Rajaraja I. This Āttūr is perhaps identical with Sittāttūr in Walajpet taluk North Arcot District as a temple in his honour was built by Rajaraja I his grandson at Melpadi, not far from it, as pallipada, or a last resting place (S.I.I. III : 22). He is specifically called Āttūrtunjinadēva i.e. the king who died at Attur, in an inscription of his son Sundara-Chōla Parāntaka II dated in his 12th regnal year (M.E.R. 1921, Appendix B No 587). We do not know anything useful of Arikulakēśari another son of Parāntaka I (E.I. VII, 141 142 M.E.R. 1908). He may have been the younger brother of Arinjaya.

Parāntaka I had still another son Uttamasila, of whom also nothing is known (M.E.R. 1908 Para 51 No 196 of 1907). These two princes, who are mentioned in the inscriptions of Parāntaka I do not appear to have ruled as independent sovereigns. This is perhaps the reason

His brothers, Arikulakēśari and Uttamasila.

worshipped by Malayāla Brāhmans The exact connection of West Coast Brāhmans with this temple is not understood (M E R 1926, Para 9). A Paluvettaraiyar Kandan Amudanāi is mentioned as having helped Parāntaka I in the 12th year of his reign against the combined forces of the Pāndya and Ceylon kings in the battle of Vēlū (M E R 1926, Appendix C. No 231). He may be the father-in-law of Parāntaka I mentioned in the Anbil Plates Other members of the Paluvettaraiyar family are known in several inscriptions (e.g., M E R. 1926, No 609 of 1920, No 237 of 1926, Appendix Nos 219 and 229)

As regards Vīra-Chōla, alias Nolamba, an inscription of his has been found in the ruined Siva temple at Sōlapuram near Vellore (M E R 1902, No 346 of 1901) It seems to be dated in A.D 953 and appears to show that subsequent to the reign of Parāntaka I, he became a vassal of the Rāshtrakūta king Krishna III This corroborates Dr Hultzsch's identification of Hastimalla with the Vīra-Chōla mentioned in the Vellore rock inscription of Krishna III (E.I IV, 223, see also M E R 1902, Para 5)

An inscription found at Kīlappaluvū and dated in the 19th year of Parāntaka I records a gift by one Dandīnadigalār of Umbalappādī We have no particulars given of him and we are quite unable to identify him with his namesake, the author of Dandīalankāram (M E R. 1926, Appendix C No 241) He may have been a feudatory of Parāntaka I A leading general of Parāntaka I was Sembiyan Sōliyavaraiyan of Sirukalattū, who fought and defeated Sitpuli This Sitpuli should have been the reigning Eastern Chalukya king, who at this time was Chalukya-Bhīma II, or one of his powerful subordinates The inscription recording the event states that Sembiyan "destroyed Nellore" (M A R 1913, Appendix B Nos 160 and 231, also Part II, Para 18) This place has

His invasion of Ceylon probably took place in the 9th year of his reign i.e. about 959 A.D. in the reign of the Ceylon king Mahindra who ruled, according to the revised chronology of Ceylon between 952-966 A.D. (See M.E.R. 1926 Para 15). An inscription at Kilapalavur dated in the 12th year of a Rajakesarivarman has been attributed to him (M.E.R. 1926 Appendix C No. 220). He is described as Mann born again in order to re-establish on earth his laws which had become lax. As he is known by the name of Ponmāligai Tunjīnadeva he should have died at the Golden Hall i.e., the Chidambaram temple. According to the Ṭiruvālangadu plates his queen Vānavanmahādevi became a sati on his death. Rāj Bahadur V Venkayya has suggested that Sundara Chōla and his wife apparently spent their last days at Chidambaram as Saiva devotees. Their daughter Kundavai set up images in honour of each of them in the Tanjore temple and made an endowment for their worship (S.I.I. II V. Introd. 1 and M.E.R. 1906 Para 16). He is probably the Chōla king whose head was cut off by Vīra Pandya for the latter calls himself Sōlantalaikōndu. If this is so the event should be set down to a date not later than 967 A.D. The execution probably took place at Chidambaram as Sundara Chōla was known after his death as he who died at Chidambaram (Ponmāligai tunjīnadēva) and inscriptions of both Āditya II and his feudatory Pārthivēndravarmān dated in their very early regnal years, have been found in the vicinity of Kumbhakonam claiming for themselves the title of who cut off the head of Vīra-Pāndya. As Pārthivēndravarmān claims this title in records of his 2nd regnal year and after he should have been a feudatory of both Āditya II and Uttama-Chōla his successor (M.E.R. 1926 Para 13).

Sundara Chōla's mother (Āchiyār=Āychchiyār= His daughter Āchchiyār=Āyar) was probably an Eastern Chalukya Kundavai.

temple of Ādityēśvarāṃ udāya-Bhattāraka, probably after Āditya I (M.E.R. 1918, Appendix B. No 292). To him also may be attributed a fragmentary record at Tuvandārkōyil, which is dated in the 40th year of his reign (Ibid No. 376). Eight of his inscriptions in Vatteluttu have been found at Kuttalam in the Tinnevely District, besides two in Tamil dated in his 24th and 36th years. So the title of "Madurai-Kondān" seems fully justified. An inscription of his 33rd year has been found at Anāmalai, near Madura town. (M.E.R. 1905, Para 10, No. 63 of 1905, and M.E.R. 1918, Appendix B Nos 446 and 448). The Kuttalam records establish beyond doubt that he conquered the whole of the Pāndya country as detailed in the Udayēndiram grant and the Tuvālangādu Plates (S.I.I. II, 379). But his conquest of this kingdom did not prove a lasting one. Indeed, as will be seen below, the conquest of this kingdom was rendered effectual only in the time of Rājēndira-Chōla, who took the final step of appointing a viceroy of royal blood to the province first formed by his father.

His titles and Surnames

Among the many titles of Parāntaka I, there are some which are of some historical interest. Among these are Dānatunga, apparently a tribute to the lavish charities he made, Sōlapērumūnadigal, Kunjaramalla and Sōlasikkāman, (M.E.R. 1913, Appendix B Nos. 167, 168 and 187, also Part II, Para 18), which indicate the esteem in which he was held as a successful Chōla king, and Vīranāīyana, a surname showing his religious leanings. He founded the town of Vīranāīyana-Chaturvēdimangalam, now known as Kāttumannārkōyil, eight miles from Gangaikondachōlapuram, in the Tiruchinopoly District, and sixteen miles from Chidambaram in the South Arcot District (M.E.R. 1921, Para 24). The tank near this place is called Vīranam-yēri, i.e., the tank of Vīranāīyana (South Arcot District Gazetteer, 275-276).

took the head of Vira Pandya (Vira Pāndyantalaigonda) and set it up as a pillar of victory in his city. As he describes himself with this title he may be taken to have avenged the death of his predecessor at Vira Pāndya's hands.

In his war against the Pāndyan king he had evidently the help of a feudatory named Pārthivēndravarmān, whose inscriptions have been found at Takkolam, Uttaramallūr and other places in the Chingleput District. (M.E.R. 1896 Appendix A No. 288 of 1895 M.E.R. 1897 Appendix B Nos. 7, 13 and 14 of 1897 M.E.R. 1900 Para 17) He also describes himself as having conquered Vira Pandya. Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sāstri has suggested that as Sundara Chōla the father of Āditya II has described himself as he who drove the Pāndya into the forest and is known to have been aided in this warfare by his general Sīriyavelan, it seems right to assign the success over the Pāndyan king to Sundara Chōla and not to Āditya, who while yet a boy perhaps joined his father in his fight against the Pāndyas. As the Chōla king "who took the head of Vira Pāndya" is spoken of as a Parakesarivarman the feat should be accorded to Sundara Chōla who bore this title and not to Āditya II who should have had the title of Rājākēsarivarman. (M.E.R. 1909, Para 40 but see also M.E.R. 1910, Para 17, where Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sāstri doubts whether Āditya II and Pārthivēndravarmān were after all contemporaries as neither of them supply names which give a clue to the contemporaneous nature of their records or show the subordinate position of one to the other) Though Āditya II claims to have sported with the head of Vira Pāndya he himself was the victim of some treachery. He was done to death by some local chiefs, as is evidenced by the confiscation of certain landed properties ordered by Rājārāja I, his younger brother, of certain of the proscribed families. These against Pāndyas

His war
His unhappy end

maintenance of a tank near it. The inscription states that the tank bore the name of Chōlavāṇḍhi, i.e., "the Chōla ocean," apparently after himself. The execution of this grant was left to his feudatory, the Ganga-Bāna king Prithivīpati II, surnamed Hastimalla, who is known from the Udayēnduam copper-plate grant. (SI I II, No 76, and above). Four Sāṁskṛit verses of the Shōlinghur rock inscription are identical with four verses of the copper-plate inscription. In the former, Prithivīpati receives the title of Vīṇa-Chōla (see above). He is probably identical with the Vīṇa-Chōla of another incomplete record from Udayēnduram (E I III, No 14) and the Vīṇa-Chōla who is mentioned, as stated above, in the rock inscription of the Rāshtrakūṭa king Kṛishna III, near Vellore (See above, E I IV, No. 10 and M.E.R. 1896, Para 8).

His army and Royal regiments

Parāntaka I must have possessed an efficient and well-organized army. Several royal regiments of Kaikōlas were named after his surnames, such as, Parāntaka-Terinja-Kaikōlar, Simhalāntaka-Terinja-Kaikōlar, &c. (M E R. 1921, Appendix B Nos. 574 and 557).

An Estimate of his Rule

Parāntaka I should have been a king as great in peace as in war. The materials for forming a proper estimate of his rule—indeed its main events are as yet only incompletely or partially known—have not been brought together. That he was an active prince goes without saying, that he organized his army, that he added to his patrimony by further conquests, that he was wise in his tolerance of religious faiths, which were just crystallizing into the modern sects of Saivism and Vaishnavism, that he patronized these faiths equally, and that he allowed the rural assemblies to govern themselves as of yore are facts established by his many inscriptions found in the large tract of country he ruled over. A point of some his queen Sembiyan Madaviyar, the great builder and donor of temples. An inscription of his dated in Kaliyuga 4063 (A.D. 981-982) corresponding to his 13th regnal year has been found at Tiruvidaimarudūr in the Tanjore District (M.E.R. 1908 Para 53). According to an inscription at Tiruvidaimarudūr he probably ascended the throne in 969-970 A.D. (M.E.R. 1908 Para 53 S.I.I. III 281). His initial date corresponded to the 28th year of the Rāshtrakūṭa king Krishna III. This date is confirmed by three epigraphs registered in M.E.R. 1912 Appendix B Nos. 245, 229 and 240 dated in his 4th, 8th and 13th years. A number of inscriptions mentioning Parakesarivarman and ranging from the 8th to the 16th regnal years, found at Kilappaluvur have been attributed to him (M.E.R. 1926 Para 19). However this may be his latest regnal year is 16. A number of his inscriptions ranging from the 10th to the 16th regnal year have been found at Kāttinmannārkōyil (M.E.R. 1921 Para 28).

His mother seems to have played a prominent part in his reign. She built a temple at Ādntarai, renovated others at the same place and built a shrine in the temple at Tiruvarur (near Tanjore). Her munificence to temples is attested to by inscriptions at Tirumananjūr. The stone temple of Mahādēva here was built by Pichchan Āruran, one of her officers. She made a gift of 14 vēlas of land to it in the reign of Rajarāja I. Under her order Āruran made a gift of 16 kalanjus of gold towards its expenditure and fixed in grain the fees payable to its servants. (M.E.R. 1915 Appendix B No. 21 No. 9 etc. Para 21).

Influence of his mother

Uttama-Chōla married a daughter of Miladudaiyār, a chief of Tirukōilur, in the South Arcot District. Some gifts by her are mentioned in the inscription.

His queens.

had to confine themselves to their hereditary dominions in the Trichinopoly and Tanjore Districts. The Rāshtrakūta conquest, however, had no lasting effects. The country was apparently reconquered a few years later by Āditya II (S I I III 21)

Rājāditya, Rājakesari
varman,
919 950 A.D.

Rājāditya, the eldest son of Parantika I, seems to have ruled as a governor under him. His real name appears to have been Kōḍandaṇṇa, under which name he made a grant at Tiruvoniyūr (M.E.R. 1913, Appendix B. 161). He probably predeceased his father. His rule was very short—hardly two full years (E.I. VII. 193). He was killed at the battle of Takkolam, near Arkonam, by Būtuga II, the ally of the Rāshtrakūta King, Krishna III, in 919 A.D. (See ante under Western Gangas). Būtuga II and Krishna III seem to have followed up this victory by carrying the war into the Chōla country by besieging Kānchi and Tanjore and burning Nalkote. Krishna III, according to the Kaihad inscription (E.I. IV 281), halted at Mēlpati (identified with Mēlpadi near Thuvalam in the North Arcot District) for, it is said, “establishing his followers in the southern provinces” and “for constructing temples to Kālapūya, Gandamārtānda, Kṛishnēsvara and others.” An inscription found at Kāveripākkam registers an endowment in favour of the Kīrtimārtānda Kālapūya temple, built perhaps by Krishna III as mentioned in the Kaihad Plates. A grant to it was apparently made by Arinjaya, son of Rājāditya, who bore the title Rājakesari (M.E.R. 1906, Para 21). This was apparently followed by the revolt of the newly added territories and the irregular successions which ensued show the internecine warfare of the times.

The Ātukur inscription of Rāshtrakūta king Krishna III states that Takkolam was the place where Būtuga, his feudatory, killed Rājāditya. There is an inscription of relationship with the neighbouring chiefs. We do not know whether any particular event in the life of Sembayan Mahādēvi that may have occurred about this time invited the spontaneous out-burst of filial piety on the part of the several queens of Uttama Chōla between the 12th and 16th years of his reign or whether these were simply gifts made in honor of the temple built by their mother in law. The senior queen is known to have made a supplemental gift for conducting worship in the same temple in the 7th year of Rājārāja I (No 480 of Appendix B). Of these the chief queen (agra mahadeviyār) was Urattaiyan Sorabbaiyār, whose name appears also as Orattannan Sorabbaiyār (M.E.R. 1925, No 165 of 1925). She was, besides, known as Settan Sorambaiyār alias Tribhuvanamahādēviyār. She presented a silver pot to the Tiruvānkādu temple (M.E.R. 1918 Para 13 Appendix B No 444 of 1918). The name of Āruran Ambalattadigal appears also as Āruran Ponnambalattadigatar Ambalattadigal and Ponnambalattadigal meaning devotee of the deity of Chidambaram (M.E.R. 1925, No 47 of 1925).

Uttama Chōla was a usurper and he appears to have maintained his position in the midst of opposition. (M.E.R. 1905-1906). According to the Mahāvamsa there were two invasions of Ceylon about this period. The chronology of the Mahāvamsa is not reliable. The earlier one might have occurred in the reign of Āditya Karikāla who might have advanced against Ceylon after his encounter with Vira-Pāndya (M.E.R. 1908, Para 54). He was apparently a contemporary of the Ganga king Mārasimha III and Khottiga and Kakka II the last of the Rāshtrakūtas. It was during his time that Taila II subverted the Rāshtrakuta kingdom and restored the Chalukya power. An inscription of the 12th year of his

His two invasions of Ceylon

Whether he ruled as independent sovereign or only as a subordinate chief is still a doubtful question. His reputation, however, as a general was apparently great. An inscription from the Gudiyāttam Taluk, dated in the 28th year of Parāntaka I (i.e. A.D. 935), refers to a cattle raid and states that the attack on it was led by a prince styled Rājakēśarivarman Pattakēśari. Apparently the reference is to Rājāditya, the crown prince (See M E R 1921, Appendix C Nos 185 and 186). As in 935 A.D., Rājāditya was still alive, this identification seems tenable. It is also inferable that in 935 A.D. or thereabout, the debatable ground was somewhere near Gudiyāttam. In a vungal inscription dated in Saka 832 (A.D. 910), which falls in the 3rd year of the reign of Parāntaka I though he is not mentioned in it, there is a reference to a Māvah-Bānarāyar, who was evidently the local Bāna chief. It follows that Parāntaka I had not conquered the modern North Arcot District (forming the Perumbānappādi, or the Bāna country), before his 3rd or 4th year. Even in 910 A.D., his conquest of the country did not extend beyond Gudiyāttam. An inscription of his 37th year is on the walls of the Yathōkthakāni temple at Conjeevaram, though in characters of a later age (perhaps later by two centuries) being probably a re-engraved copy of the original, which disappeared at the time the temple was renovated (M E R. 1921, Appendix C. No. 21). This shows that about A.D. 944 or about five years before the death of Rājāditya at Takkolam, Parāntaka I had advanced in his conquests northward as far as Kānchi, which certainly was in his possession at the date of this inscription. The Bhaktajanēsvara temple at Tuunāmanallūr, which contains many records of Parāntaka I, was founded by Rājāditya (M E R 1902, No 335 of 1902). Many lamps were dedicated to it by Rājāditya's servants and other persons. The temple of Rājādityēsvaram Udayū at Kilpākkam, near Arkonam, line for Uttama Chola's uncle Arinjaya married a daughter of the Kerala prince called Paluvettaraiyar (E I V iv M E R 1921 Para 10)

That Vaishnavism was more than tolerated by Uttama Chola like his grandfather Parāntaka I is testified to by a few of his inscriptions. Thus the temple of Madhurantaka Vinnagar Ālār at Narasimhapuram was apparently named after him and probably came into existence during his reign (M E R 1911 Para 26). An inscription of his reign in Tamil verse dated in the 3rd year of his reign records the fact that the temple of Solakula Sundara Vinnagar a Vishnu shrine was built at Minjur by one Kesavan Karuṭakkon for god Vīvalakkasava (M E R 1916 Appendix C No 131). This temple apparently was named after Uttama Chola's cousin Sundara Chola.

His religious
toleration

Rajaraja, who succeeded Uttama Chola Madhurantaka was known by the name of Arumoriyarmān Arumorideva and Rajakesarivarman Munmadī Chola. He is known in inscriptions as Rajakesarivarman up to the 9th year of his reign. How he was superseded by his uncle Madhurantaka has been detailed above. He was the second son of Parāntaka II and younger brother of Āditya II. His older sister was Kṇḍavaiyūr, who had married a certain Vallavaraiyar Vandyadēvar about whom nothing more is known. She seems to have spent her later life in Tanjore with her younger brother and that she even survived him there can be scarcely any doubt. Rajaraja seems to have entertained a high regard for her and it is possible that she exercised considerable influence on him. She was known for her piety and for her interest in providing medical aid for the sick. She founded a free dispensary the earliest of the kind known in Chōla inscriptions at Tanjore. It was called Sundara Sōla

Rajaraja the Great alias Rajaraja I
985-1013 A.D

His sister Kundaval.

two of his queens are known from inscriptions, Vīranāraṇyār (M E R 1906, No 108 of 1906) and Sembiyan-Mahādēviyār. The first of these, apparently after the surname of her father-in-law Vīranārāyana, is mentioned in certain inscriptions of Parāntaka I dated in 931 A D, as the builder of temples. She does not appear to have left any issue. Sembiyan-Mahādēviyār is known from numerous inscriptions as a pious devotee and donor of gifts to temples. She is described as the daughter of Mālavaraiyar and is known by the alternative name of Parāntakan-mādēvadigaḷ (M E R 1921, Appendix B. No 540). She is referred to further below. Gandarāditya was himself a pious and religiously inclined king, who engaged himself in scrutinising temple accounts, suppressing fraud and misappropriation, fining those guilty of such acts, improving temple funds by wise investment and arranging for the due performance of the ceremonies and festivals at the temples (See M E R. 1922, Para 14, Appendix B. No 218). According to the Leyden grant, which describes him as a divine being, he founded the town of Gandarāditya-chatuṣvēdi-mangalam, after himself. This place has been identified with the modern village of Kandarāditam in the Trichinopoly District (K. V. Subrahmanya Aiyar, Ancient Dekhan, 233). He appears to have been a Tamil poet, one of his hymns being preserved in the well-known collection Tirumaiṟppa. In this hymn, he calls himself the son of a Chōla king who took Madura and Ceylon, which of course is a reference to his father, Parāntaka I. When Gandarāditya died is not definitely known, though he could not have lived beyond 950 A.D. This date seems to be suggested by an inscription dated in the 2nd year of a Parakēśavarāman, who must have been Uttama-Chōla, who bore that surname (See M E R 1921, Appendix B. No. 540). In this record Sembiyan-Mādēviyār is described as the queen of Gandarādittadēvar.

throne on some day between the 23th June and the 24th July 993 A.D. He ruled for at least 29 years i.e. to about 1013-1011 A.D. He was undoubtedly the greatest among the Chola kings. His reign marks the beginning of a period of expansion and prosperity which remained practically unbroken for over a century except with one short interval. Rajaraja claims that his rule extended as far as Quilon and Coorg in the West and from Ceylon and Cape Comorin to the borders of Orissa. His descendants extended the Chola authority to Burma and the Malay Archipelago (Madras Review 1902 Page 246 and M. E. R. 1892 Para 11)

His military achievements are recorded in thousands of inscriptions found all over the Madras Presidency and the eastern districts of this State. From a study of these it has been suggested by Mr V. Venkayya that no expedition was undertaken by him until the eighth year of his reign (or A.D. 991). He apparently silently prepared himself for the struggle which was required to restore the Chola power. The exact chronology of his conquests is not yet settled. But a great many of his conquests should have been completed before 1002 A.D., or his seventeenth regnal year. An inscription of that year (at Tenkaval Madurai District) calls him Rajaraja and adds the qualifying phrase the conqueror of the world. As Mr H. Krishna Sāstri has suggested we have to infer from this statement that with the conquest of Ceylon, which must have been completed in his 17th year, Rajaraja had actually conquered all enemies whose dominions he thought of acquiring (S. I. I. II V 5 fn. 2).

His military conquests
their chronology

In the first campaign concluded before the 8th year he appears to have fought against a combination of the Chera and Pandya kings. The Pandyas seem to have held the post of Kāndalur Salai, which appears to have

Campaign
against Pandyas and Cheras

and of a silver vessel to the temple of Manavālēsvara at Tiruvilakkudi, but the earliest of the buildings erected by her appears to have been the temple of Tirunallam-Udayār (Umamahēsvaia) at Tirunallam, (i e.,) Kōnēirājapuram in the Māyavaram Taluk of the Tanjore District which was rebuilt in stone before the 7th year of the reign of her son Uttama-Chōla (i e., A D 976) and named after her deceased lord Gandarāditya. The figure of her husband Gandarāditya was sculptured on the wall of the same temple as worshipping the god Tirunallam-Udayār. The Agastyēsvara temple at Anangur was built in stone by this queen about this period. The god Sivayōganāthasvāmī in the ancient Siva temple at Tiruvīsālūr in the Kumbhakonam Taluk was the recipient of certain costly ornaments from this queen in the reign of her son Uttama-Chōla. In the 12th year of the same reign corresponding to A D 982, she built the Srikōyl of Mudukuniam-Udayār at Viḍdhāchalam in the South Arcot District, and erected several other minor structures, such as the sōpāna-mandapa, gōpura, the covered verandah, and the shrines of the parivāna-dēvatas. The Māsīlāmanīsvara temple at Tnūmūllavāyāl in the Chingleput District received a gift of some lands from her for the expenses of worship, in the 14th year of her son's reign, and two years later, in about A D 985, the last year of her son's reign, the temple of Kuṅgagaduturai-Ālvār (Āpatsahayēsvara) at Āduturai in the Pāpanāsam taluk (Tanjore) was built by her. In the succeeding reign too, the devout work of this old queen did not terminate, for we find that in the 2nd year of Rājārāja I (A D 987), the temples of Siddhēsvariam-udaiya-Mahādēva at Tnūnagēsvariam in the Kumbhakonam Taluk and of the Tirukkairālī-Mahādēva (Udvahanātha) temple at Tnūmananjērī in the Māyavaram taluk were erected by her, while some gifts were made to the god at Tnūvārūr for the merit of her son, Uttama-Chōla, and the Siva temple at Tirunārayū also came in for a share of her donations. A D 990 saw her making some gifts to the Tirukkattattai temple in the 5th year of Rājārāja. In the next year of the same reign again, repairs were conducted in, and some jewels and utensils were presented to, the Svētārianyam temple at Tiruvēnkādu in the Shiyālī taluk, and a year later the shrine of Anēnī-Ālvār was added in the Tnūvārūr temple. The Ādityēsvara temple which had been built in the 6th year of been wedded by the Goddess of Earth as well as of Prosperity. At the latest the conquest of the Cheras should have been accomplished by about the middle of the 10th year of his reign. A number of records enable us to fix this date as the probable one for this expedition (M.E.R. 1926 Appendix C 193, 231 and 218, all dated in his 10th regnal year). Though the conquest of the Pandyas and Chēras is referred to in his inscriptions, no inscriptions of his appear to exist in the Chera country i.e. Malabār and Travancore. A much damaged inscription found at Senur in the North Arcot District supplies further details of his Southern and West Coast expeditions. It says he destroyed the town of Madura, conquered the haughty kings of Kollam and Kodung Jūr (Cranganore) and that the kings of the sea (Kudalarasār) waited on him. Rājaraja is given the further epithets Tonnaparākraman and Kirtiparākrama Sūlan (M.E.R. 1912, Appendix B No 394 also Para 22).

According to certain inscriptions found in the temple at Kuttālām Tinnovelly District, it is clear that Rājaraja introduced the Tamil script into the Pandya country, where, until then the Vatteluttu was employed for writing Tamil (V.E.R. 1918 Appendix B Nos 154 and 155 of 1917). These inscriptions state that in renovating the temple, the older inscriptions in Vattam (or Vatteluttu) were replaced by new ones engraved in Tamil. All the inscriptions hitherto described in that part of the country and assignable to a period earlier than the time of Rājaraja I, i.e., beginning of the 10th century A.D. have been actually found to be in Vatteluttu characters and this is in consonance with the import of these two inscriptions. Vatteluttu inscriptions of Rājaraja I have been found as far south as Sanchidiram. (M.E.R. 1896 Appendix B 10th, 14th and 15th years). Before the fourteenth year of his reign (i.e., 998-999 A.D.),

Occupation of Tinnovelly

suggested in the Sānskrit record, probably Gandarāditya was the builder of the temple (M E R 1912, Appendix B. No 219) The standing lady is undoubtedly queen Sembiyan-Mādēviyār About twenty years after her death, her image was installed at Sembiyar-Mahādēvi-Chatuivēdimangalam, in the 8th year of Rājēndra-Chōla I (A D 1020) along with the image of Ishabhavavāhana dēva and provision was made for offerings to it This canonization of the queen soon after death indicates the great popularity she should have enjoyed during her lifetime (M E R 1926 Appendix B No. 481)

Arinjaya, Madhuraikondan Rāja-kēsari, 919 950
A D

Gandarāditya left an infant son Uttama-Chōla, surnamed Madhurāntaka Parakēsari-Vaiṁan, who probably was considered too young to succeed his father Accordingly Gandarāditya's younger brother Arinjaya next ascended the throne He appears to have been known also as Arjuna or Arindama His mother was the daughter of a Kērala prince Paluvēttaraiyar. (E I XV 50) His queen, Ādittan Kōdai Pirāttiyāi, was probably a Chēra princess. She made some gifts to the temple of Anantēsvara at Kāttumannāikōyil (M E R 1921, Para 26). Another queen of his was Pūdi Ādittan Pīdāri, a Kodumbalūi princess (S I. I III in 257) Sundara-Chōla was probably the son of the latter and not of the former, for the ending term of "mother" is not used in referring to her in an inscription of his dated in his 12th year. (M E R 1921, Para 26).

The Temples founded by him

Arinjaya has been identified with Madirai-kondān Rājukēsari-varaman of certain inscriptions He seems to have founded certain temples One of those is the deserted temple of Chōlēsvara at Mēlpadi, six miles north of Tiruvallam, which in ancient days was known as Arinjingēsvara or Arinjīsvara, after him (M E R 1890, Para 3). He appears to have visited Tiruvemiyur where certain Rajaraja apparently a person in whom king Rājārāja was interested To put down Vīṇalāditya Rājendra Chōla led an expedition This Vīṇalāditya is distinguished in some inscriptions as the chief of Kulita though this identification has been doubted He was defeated by Rajendra's general who besides captured Mahēndragiri and set up a pillar of victory on it. Two inscriptions on Mahēndragiri still attest to this fact. It is clear from these inscriptions that Rājendra had been deputed to put down Bīrudanka Bhīma's revolt, a task in which he succeeded Vīṇalāditya is known from certain inscriptions to have been at Tiruvaiyār near Tanjore about 1013-1014 A.D. making gifts to the Paṇṇenadēvara temple. Shortly before or after this date, he must have married princess Kundavai daughter of Rājaraṇa and sister of Rajendra Chōla. (S.I.I. II v. 4)

The conquest of Ceylon seems to have been simultaneously carried out from between 1001-1004 A.D. and probably ended only about 1011-1013 A.D. (S.I.I. loc. cit.) That is in about the 20th year of his reign. The subjugation of the island was apparently complete about the latter year. A Tamil inscription of that year found at Pedaviya in Ceylon shows that several villages in the island were granted by Rājārāja to the temple at Tanjore and they had to remit their assessment to the temple in coin or kind. That the conquest was a real and not a mere nominal one is proved by the fact that not only Ceylon received the name of Mummudi Sūlamandalam after one of his own titles but also temples and towns in it were named after his other names and titles. (M.E.R. Part VI. 21) The conquest of Ceylon and its subjection to the Chōlas is placed beyond all doubt by the discovery of Chola inscriptions in Ceylon. Two mutilated inscriptions in the Colombo Museum (M.E.R. 1913, Appendix B Nos. 616 and 618) which may be referred to

Conquest of Ceylon.

why their names have been omitted in the genealogy disclosed by the Tiruvālangādu plates Arikula-Kēsari was a military officer under Parāntaka I and married Pudi Adichcha Pidāriyār, daughter of Tennavan Ilangoṇṇar This lady is known to have constructed the temple of Chandrasēkhara at Tiruchchendurai, in the Trichinopoly District, in the third year of a certain Parakēsarivarman (M.E.R. No 316 of 1916). This Parakēsarivarman has been identified with Gandarāditya, who, it has been suggested, must have been reigning in Saka 879, or A D 956-957 (M.E.R. 1903-04, Appendix A Nos. 425 and 426, Para 20). Of the two inscriptions on which this inference is based, one is dated in Saka 879, (A D 956-957) and another is not dated The former (No. 426 of 1903) though it gives the Saka date, does not mention the king's name But a subordinate chief named Gandarāditta-Pallavaraiyan is mentioned in it He may have survived Gandarāditya and retained his name after him. In the other inscription (No 425 of 1903) the third year of Parakēsarivarman is mentioned but no date is given This may be a reference to Arinjaya or Uttama-Chōla, who had the title of Parakēsarivarman. (See M.E.R. 1921, Para 21)

Arinjaya might have been called Madirarkondān because he was the son of Madirakonda Parāntaka I, or he may have actually taken part in one of the conquests of the Pāndyas by his father Parāntaka I, to deserve that title Inscriptions of his 6th year have been found at Kāvēripākkam. (M.E.R. 1905-06, Para 21; see also M.E.R. 1909, Para 39)

Sundara-
Chōla,
Parāntaka II,
919-966 A D

Arinjaya's son Parāntaka II, surnamed Sundara-Chōla, succeeded him He reigned probably for 17 years, from 919 to 966 A D He beat off the intruding Pāndyan king, Vira-Pāndya, who, we are told, in consequence took "shelter in the desert" (Pāndiyanaichchunam-irakkina) is an independent confirmation of this expedition. According to the Hottur inscription of Satyāśraya dated in 1007-1008 A.D. the Chōla king called in it Nurmadi Chola and named Rājendra having collected a force numbering 900 000 men had pillaged the whole country, had slaughtered the women the children and the Brāhmanas and taking the girls to wife had destroyed their caste (Bombay Gazetteer I ii 433). Apparently the war was fought on lines unapproved by Mann and other law givers of ancient days (see ante under Chālukyas). Satyāśraya claims to have put the Chōla king to flight and to have acquired great stores of wealth and vehicles. An inscription at Uttattur near Trichinopoly (M.E.R. No 575 of 1912), dated in the 3rd year of Rājendra Chōla I mentions the fight with Satyāśraya. It is evident that Rājendra-Chōla while still a prince actually followed the expedition against Satyāśraya and fought in the battle referred to in the Hottur inscription. Rājendra appears to have attached much importance to his victory over Satyāśraya as he is said to have presented gold flowers to the Rājārajēswara temple on his return from the expedition. (S.I.I II v 6)

The date of this war has not been fixed quite definitely. As mentioned above it has been surmised to have taken place towards the end of the 21st year of his reign or the beginning of the 22nd year (S.I.I II v 6). It is not mentioned in inscriptions of his 21st regnal year. An inscription of his 22nd year at Tiruvaiyar Tanjore District refers to the conquest of Rattapādi i.e. Western Chālukya country (M.E.R. 1895 Para 11 No 217 of 1914). Another inscription dated in the same year is however, silent on this point while those dated in his 23rd year and subsequent years mention the achievement. The inference is possible that the conquest took place somewhere about 1006-1007 A.D. which is

Date of this War 1006-1007
A. D.

princess She is described as the "mother of Parāntaka, son of Aṁṁjaya," and as "Uḍaiyapṇattiyār, Kundavaiyār, daughter of Bhīma," apparently Chalukya-Bhīma II (A D 934 to 945) If so, she is a Kundavai earlier than Kundavai, the sister of Rājārāja I, and Kundavai the daughter of Rājārāja I, who was married to Vimalāditya, the Eastern Chalukya king (M E.R. 1921, Appendix B, 572 and 589, Para 26) She provided, by a gift of land for 1000 potsfull of water, for bathing the god of Anantēsvara at Kāttumannārkōyil (M E.R. 1921, Para 26) Kundavai is distinctly mentioned as Sundara-Chōla's daughter A record at Dadapuram states that she built three temples at that place, one to Siva, dedicated to Ravikulamānikka-Īsvara, another to Vishnu, Kundavai Vinnagai Ālvār, and a third to Jina called Kundavai-Jinālaya and made costly gifts to them This shows the religious toleration of the times. The Siva and Vishnu temples built by her still exist but there is no trace of the Jina shrine (M E R 1919, Para 11) An inscription of the 13th year of Rājārāja refers to the 4th year of a Rājakēsaṁ, of whom the curious information is furnished that he climbed up a wall and was pleased to be seated on it (Madilēriehundarulina) It has been suggested that this may be a reference to Sundara-Chōla, Rājārāja's father, though the exact significance of the title is not by any means clear

Aditya II,
Karikāla,
965-970 A D

Parāntaka II was in turn succeeded by his eldest son Āditya II, who bore the title of Karikāla He probably ascended the throne in 965 A D His highest regnal year is the 5th Many inscriptions of his reign are known (See M E R 1895, Appendix No. 240 of 1894, 1921, Para 30, 1925, Nos 192 and 200 of 1925) He had distinguished himself, while still young, in the war against Vīra-Pāndya He is known, after his second regnal year, in inscriptions as "Parakēsarivarmaṇ, who 12 000 islands is mentioned as an accomplished fact in an inscription of his 23rd regnal year (EC IX Channapatna, 128) the expedition referred to by Mr Venkayya as having been undertaken in his 29th year must have been for putting down some revolt or other in the islands. The original conquest of these lands should have been effected in 1007 1008 A D and the revolt put down by the expedition of 1013 1014 A D.

During his reign Pakenādu forming the northern part of the modern Nellore District, was overrun by one of his feudatories named Paraman Malapādiyar, chief of Kārukudi in Tanjavur kurrām (U & R 1921 Appendix C No 70 also Para 31).

Conquest of Pakenādu.

The conquest of that part of Mysore known as Gangapadi and Nulambapadi (i.e. Gangavadi 30 000 and Nulambavadi 32 000) seems to have been completed about 1001 A D. It was apparently undertaken after the conquest of the Chēras and Pāndyas and the Vēngl and Kalinga kingdoms. It was evidently part of the campaign against the Western Chālukyas. The expeditions against these provinces preceded in fact the one against Satyāśraya. The earliest reference to Rājārāja in Mysore is contained in a recently found inscription at Jodi Kempāpura, Chamarājynagar Taluk, in which he is referred to as Vira Nārāyana. It is dated in Saka 913 cyclic year Ahara or A.D. 991 (M.E.R. 1917, Part II Para 91). We find him established near Hoskote in Saka 920, cyclic year Hēvilambi, or 997 A D (EC IX Hoskote 111). As the conquest of Gangapadi and Nulambapadi are referred to in inscriptions dated in the 8th 10th and 19th year of his reign (S.I.I II v 8 l. n e EC X, Mulbagal 123, EC III, 140 Seringapatam which must be assigned to the same date as Mulbagal 123 etc.) it has to be presumed that the conquest of these countries was an accomplished fact.

Conquest of Gangavadi or Nulambavadi,
1001-1004
A D

lands appear to have been bought by a certain Vyāla-gajamalla-Pallavarayan, who utilized them for feeding a number of Brāhmanas in the Kāttumannār kōyil (M E.R. 1921, Para 31, Appendix B, No 577) A record dated in his 3rd regnal year is worthy of note. It refers to a gift of land which had been made to the Brāhmanas who expounded the Prābhākaram. This is the name given to a famous commentary on the Pūrva-Mīmāṃsa-Sūtras. It founded a new school of philosophy called Prābhākara-mata after its expounder, the great Prabhākara, who in point of time was contemporaneous with Bhattakumārila, being one of his direct pupils and must, consequently, have flourished about the beginning of the 8th century A D (M E R 1912, Appendix B No 233)

The royal regiment Karikāla-Chōlaterinja-Kaikkōlar was apparently named after Āditya II, perhaps having been raised in his time. (M E R 1921, Para 29, Appendix B. No. 617)

Dispute about
the succession

Āditya II appears to have regained Tondainādu, as inscriptions dated in his reign have been found in Ukkal and other villages of that province. Apparently on his death or on the death of his father—whichever was the later event—the succession seems to have been disputed. The subjects besought Arunmori Varman, i e, Rājārājādēva, to become king, but he did not want the throne as long as his paternal uncle Madhurāntaka Uttama-Chōla was fond of his country. Eventually, Arunmori Varman was appointed heir-apparent while Madhurāntaka “bore the burden of the earth” It looks as if the former was a minor when his father or elder brother died. (M E.R. 1906, Para 16)

Uttama-Chōla
Madhurān-
taka, Parakēsari-
varman,
969 985 A D

Āditya II was, in the circumstances mentioned above, succeeded by his uncle Madhurāntaka Parakēsari, sur-named Uttama-Chōla, the only son of Gandaiāditya and to power. Thus, Rājārāja's general Apprameya is said in 1006 A D to have encountered the Hoysala king's minister Naganna, (E C III, T Narsipur 41) and to have won a battle over other Hoysala leaders at Kalavūr identified with Kaleyūr, near Malingsi opposite Talkad, on the other side of the river.

This Aprameya is said to have belonged to the Taya kula to which he is said to have been an ornament. He is described in glowing colours as—unassisted lion " fond of war favourite hero of his master destruction to the race of hill chiefs a jewel on the battle-field "a pillar of victory" a bee at the lotus feet of Rājārāja Deva, lord of Kōttamandala etc.

He seems to have himself fallen in the battle and to have won by his valour in the plains of Kalavur a name to endure as long as the sun and the moon. Then, Panchava Mahārāja, another of Rājārāja's leaders, referred to above, conducted victorious expeditions along the west coast (E C III Seringapatam 140). In this inscription he is spoken of as a bee at the lotus feet of Rājārāja. He is said to have obtained the rank of Mahadandanāyaka for Bengi mandala (i.e. Vēngi) and Ganga mandala, which seems to show that he was commander-in-chief of the forces sent against these countries. A graphic description of the manner in which he displayed the might of his arms is given in the above quoted inscription dated in Saka 934 Cyclic year Paridhātī corresponding to the 28th year of Rājārāja (1013 A D). He seized Tuluva and Konkana pursued after Maleya, pushed aside and passed over Chēra, Tuluva and Rattiga as if in sport and desired the small Balvala (Ballegola) country (near Seringapatam) that ma rāya what enemy could stand before him when he knit his brows? To those who were his friends like a moon to his enemies like a raging Yama, or a fierce at Tīruvīsalūr in the Tanjore District (M E R 1908, Para 51).

Uttama-Chōla had other wives as well. One was Kīlānadīgal, daughter of Vilupparaiyar, and another was Vīranāraṇiyāi. (M E R. 1909, Para 41, No. 298 of 1908 and No. 3 of 1906) Some others are also known. A few records dated in the 12th, 15th and 16th years of his reign, copied from the shrine of Sūkailāsam-Udaiya-Mahā-dēvar, built by his mother at Sembiyan-mahādēvi-chaturvēdimangalam, give the sundry gifts of money they made for conducting annually certain services in the temple on the birthday of their mother-in-law. Among these are —

- 1 Urattaiyan Sorabbaiyai alias Tribhuvana-Mahādēvi
- 2 Pattan Dānatongiyāi
- 3 Tennavan-Mahādēviyāi of Malapadi
- 4 Vānavan-Mahādēviyāi, daughter of Ilungōlai
- 5 Nambirātti . daughter of Vilupparaiyai
- 6 . the daughter of Paluvēttaiyar
- 7 Ārūran Ambalattadīgal

Of these, Sorabbaiyār was the Mūtta-nambūāttiyār or the senior queen, and No. 5 the daughter of Vilupparaiyāi, whose name is obliterated in this record, may have been the Kīlānadīgal mentioned in another record of Uttama-Chōla. (No. 298 of 1908) The term Kīlānadīgal has been interpreted as a title (M E R 1909, Para 41) Nos. 482, 489 and 492 of Appendix B. mention four other ladies, Arumoli Aṇṇigaipprātti . lakuntadēviyāi, . pprattiyār of Pangalu-nādu and Kannapparasiyār alias Sonna-Mahādēviyāi, who made similar provisions for worship on the birthday of Sembiyan-Mahādēvi. It is not known if these ladies were also related to Uttama-Chōla. Although there is nothing strange in a Hindu king marrying a number of queens, Uttama-Chōla's action may have been prompted by a desire to preserve friendly and diplomatic one self against gold pearls or other such costly material in order to celebrate his victories. He seems to have performed the Tulābhāra ceremony thrice once at Uttiramerur in Chingleput District, in the temple called Tulābhāra Śrī Kōyil the present Sundara Varada Perumal temple wherein there is an inscription of his (M E R 1923 Appendix C No 197 of 1923). In an inscription of his 28th year found at Tiruvīsulur Tanjore District reference is made to the performance of the Tulābhāra ceremony in the Śiva temple of that place (M E R 1907 Para 37). His chief queen Lokamahādevī also performed the hiranyagarbha passing her body through a golden cow (M E R 1907 75).

Inscriptions of his 7th 12th 16th 19th 22nd 27th, 28th and 30th regnal years have been found in the Kolar District. In E C \ Kolar 7, of his 7th year, he is described as the lord of seven beautiful cities wherever they were. This epithet is not met with elsewhere in his inscriptions. One of his generals in Mysore was Nalambādhirāja who in 1000 A D gave Parbanna (Hebbani) to the plunderer of Kādīyanna (? Kāduvetti). A farmer at this place is recorded to have repaired the big tank which was breached (E C \ Mulbagal 208 and 209). Nalambādhirāja made a grant in his favour on the occasion. Mulbagal 123 dated in 1003 A D (E C \) enumerates all his conquests including the destruction of the ships at Kāṇḍalur Sālai Vengunād Gangapādi, Nalambapādi Tadigivali Kollam Kalingam Kudumalai nādu and after having crossed the deep sea the impregnable Niranjaram and the Pāṇdyas. His grants to the Pīḍāriyār temple at Kolar are mentioned in an inscription dated in his 12th and 22nd years (E C \, Kolar 106, and 106,) dated in 996 and 1006 A D. The worshipper of the goddess was a Śaiva Brāhmana of the Kausika gōtra. A lithic grant in the 27th year of his reign

His
inscriptions
in Kolar District

mother Sembiyan-Mahādēviyār, wife of Gandarāditya, built the temple of Viḍdhāchala, its gōpura and its mandapa and made costly presents to it including copper images, gold and silver jewellery, plates, flowers, etc. Sembiyan-Mahādēviyār was the daughter of Malaperumānadigal (M.E.R. 1918, Para 24. Appendix C. Nos 47, see above). This adds to her other numerous munificent gifts. This royal lady also presented a costly crown set with rubies and 36 diamonds and fastened with 1998 pearls all round. It weighed, it would appear, nearly ten Kalanju. The total weight of silver in its inner cover was over 206 Kalanju. (M.E.R. 1918, Appendix C. No 48). She seems to have lived, as already stated, down to the 16th year of Rājārāja the Great. She was a great builder of temples, to which she appears to have made many costly gifts of silver and gold. The Āpta Sahāyēsvara temple at Ādutturai was built by her in the 16th year of her son's reign and the Umamahēsvara temple at Kōnērnājapuram was built perhaps in the same reign. A shrine in the Tyāgarājasvāmin temple at Tiruvārur was constructed in the 7th year of Rājārāja I and in the 16th year of the same reign, she built a shrine in the Chandramaulīsvara temple at Tiruvakkalai (M.E.R. 1909, Para 41, also M.E.R. 1910, Para 18). An interesting memorial of her husband was left by her in the Tirunallam-Udayār temple at Kōnērnājapuram. This temple was built by her in "the name of her lord the glorious Gandarādittadēva." She had in it the figure of Gandarādittadēva (the figure on the wall below which the inscription is engraved) worshipping the god Tirunallam-Udayār, carved on the stone. The carving of her husband's figure can only have been executed after the death of Gandarādityam (M.E.R. 1909, Para 41).

An officer of some note of Uttama-Chōla was a Paluvēttaiyar. He was probably a prince of the Kērala Manolar An inscription dated in the 30th regnal year refers to a grant by Rājarāja as Rājarāja vidanga Deva (E C III T Narsipur 48). Apparently it was after his name Vidanga (same as Vitenka) that the chief god in the Tanjore temple was named Dakshinamuru Vidangen (S I I II v 20).

There are certain intervals in the reign of Rājarāja during which there appear to have been no military expeditions. The first of these is that between the 18th and the 21st years corresponding to A D 1002 and 1005 A D respectively. Mr Venkayya has suggested that it was during this period that Rājarāja received the title of Sri Rājarāja which occurs first in inscriptions of the 19th year (A.D 1003). From the Hongudēsa vijalāl it is learnt that he made certain gifts to the Chidambaram temple in Saka 926 or A D 1004. It is probable that the title of Sri Rājarāja was conferred on him by the temple authorities at Chidambaram. Perhaps this was also the period when he conceived the idea of building the great temple at Tanjore and made arrangements for the construction to commence (S I I II V 5). It was during this period that he seems to have built and endowed a temple devoted to Vishnu at Todimalingi near Talkād. There are stone records of his reign at this place. They are on the basement of the Janārdana temple, which they call Iravikulamānikka Vinnagar or Ravikulomānikya Vishnugriha. One of these records is T Narsipur 86 (E C III) which seems to be dated in the 20th year of Rājarāja or A D 1004. The other records may belong to the same date. They record the purchase of lands for the temple from funds provided by Periya Kundevī Ālvār, elder sister of Rājarāja, so named to distinguish her from her namesake, the daughter of Rājarāja. Ravikulomānikya was one of the titles (see below) of Rājarāja. The sale deed was it would appear

Period of peaceful rule—Construction
of Temples

Vinnagar Ātulasālar, apparently (by herself) after her father king Sundara-Chōla Parāntaka II. She bought 9 ma of land for 70 kāsu and presented it for its upkeep in 1015 A.D. Four years later, having found the grant insufficient, she purchased $1\frac{1}{4}$ ground and donated it to the hospital. She left the management of the gift to one Savainan Arayan Madhurāntakan and his descendants, evidently to secure its proper supervision. The order was issued from the palace at Palayānu, the home of Rājēndra-Chōla I, in whose 3rd year the first grant was made, the land having been purchased by her from the big assembly of Rājakēsari-chaturvēdimangalam. In the 7th year of the same king, she bought a house site and made up the deficit of the Vaidyabhōga provided by her (M E R 1924, Appendix B. No 248 of 1923, Para 14). It has been suggested that Kundavai must have passed away long ere this, but this grant of hers made in Rājēndra-Chōla's 7th year, makes it clear that she was still living in that year. In a record of her nephew Rājēndrachōla I, dated in his 4th year, mention is made of an endowment by this royal lady for a free dispensary at Palayavanavan-mādēvi-chaturvēdimangalam to a member of the family of Savainam Arayan (Savainam Arayan, Chandiasēkharan alias Uttama-Chōla-Achalar and his descendants). Though a devout Saiva, she was a tolerant lady and her charities extended to Vishnu and Jain temples as well. There is a Jain temple on the rock close by Tirumalai, ten miles north of Polur, which was in olden days known as Kundavai-jinālaya, apparently after her, for her other benefactions to Jain temples are known. (M E R 1887, Para 7)

Period and extent of his
rule

Rājarāja's date is definitely fixed by inscriptions found in the Mysore State. Thus one at Balamuni, Seringapatam Taluk, is dated in his 28th year and Saka 934, Parīdhāvi. (E C.I. 78, No 140). He ascended the (renamed Nīkarī Cholaipuram) near Channapatna in the Bangalore District. The temple was apparently completed in the 2nd regnal year or 1007 A.D. The village assembly of the place made a grant for the daily offerings of the god installed—in the name of Rājārāja one of whose titles was Jayangonda Chōla—as also certain other neighbouring village assemblies and the citizens of Nīkarī Cholaipuram (EC IX Channapatna 128, 130, 131 and 132 dated in 1007 A.D.). Grants were also made to it in 1014 A.D., in the third regnal year of Rājendra Chōla Rāja-rāja's son and about 1030 A.D. also in the same king's reign (EC IX Channapatna 129 and 133). The temple was evidently dedicated to Vishnu as its name shows. The record of 1014 A.D. of Rājendra Chōla's time above quoted confirms this inference for it plainly states that the Srīvaishnavas and the 500 of Tiraiyayiram are to protect the charity. The record of 1007 A.D. of Rājārāja's time (EC IX Channapatna 132) ends with the final verse which says that he who protects the charity will attain Vāgundam, the abode of Vishnu, and the record of 1014 A.D., (EC IX, Channapatna 127) ends with obeisance to Hari &c Vishnu.

A famous Vaishnava temple of Rājārāja's time was the ancient one of Varāha Perumal at Tiruvadandai, one of the 108 Vaishnava divyadēśas of the Nāḷāyiraprabhundam. It appears to have been in a flourishing state even in Rājārāja's time as might be inferred from the evidence of records in it of unidentified early Chōla kings of the Rāshtrakuta king Krishna III and others. Six inscriptions of Rājārāja dated between the 8th and 20th years of his reign have been found in it. In his 17th regnal year 12 fishermen were dedicated to the temple and they were required to pay a tax of three-quarters of a kalanju per head earned by them and to render physical assistance also in celebrating the festival called Rājārāja-

been situated in the dominions of the Chēra king. The Pāndyan king was probably Amalabhujanga of the Tiruvālangādu plates and the port of Vūnam mentioned in them is perhaps the same as Kāndalūr Sālai, or very near it. The Chēra king was probably Bhāskara Ravi-varman, who ruled from 978 to 1036 A D (Travancore Archaeological Series II 33). The Pāndya king is said to have been seized by Rājārāja, while his general captured the port, and destroyed the fleet. Rājārāja, however, seems to have fought against the Pāndyas again and again, the Pāndyas being the hereditary enemies of the Chōlas. Among the places taken was one named Udagai which he stormed. This place has been referred to in many inscriptions and literary works. Though it has not yet been satisfactorily identified, it should have been a stronghold situated in the Chēra or the Pāndya country. Mr Venkayya thinks it was situated in the latter kingdom, while Mr K V Subramania Iyer has suggested that it was in the former. Mr. Subramania Iyer suggests that as Udiya means Chēra, it is not unlikely that Udagai was a place in the Kērala country, for it is said that Rājārāja obtained a victory after defeating the Udiyas. It is possible it lay on the Chēra-Pāndya border (See S I I II. v. and T A S III 1. 117 note 1). After the conquest of the Chēra and Pāndya kingdoms, Rājārāja took the title of "Mummadī Chōla" or "the Chōla who wears the three crowns," i.e., the Chēra, Chōla and Pāndya. This occurs first in an inscription of his 14th regnal year. The term "Mummadī" should be distinguished from "Mummadī" which occurs in his inscriptions of the 3rd, 4th and 10th years, which means the thrice-powerful Chōla, much like Mummadī-Bhīma and Nūmadī-Taila (S I I II V Introd 3). The conquest of the Chēra and Pāndya kingdoms must have been completed just before the 8th year, as he is represented in inscriptions of that year as having

and in the provinces of the Pandya and Tondainadu. The order was written by the Royal Secretary and approved by the Chief Secretary and engraved by order on the day mentioned above (M E R 1897, Para 3 see also S I I III No 9).

The result of the survey and resurveys effected by Rajaraja seems to be indicated in certain of the inscriptions. It seems inferable from these that at least in some cases the surplus of paddy resulting from the survey was made over to temples for the offerings of the gods. In one case (M E R 1924 Part II Para 17, Appendix C No 385 of 1921), one of Rajaraja's queens (Panchavanimaluvi) gave the surplus of 900 Kalams of paddy to a temple. Possibly the village was managed by her as her own.

Rajaraja was undoubtedly the greatest of the Imperial Chola line. Whether from the energy displayed by him in regaining the glory of his ancient heritage or from the extent of his vast conquests he must be styled 'Great'. He was undoubtedly as eminent an administrator as a soldier. He seems to have chosen his men well and to have trusted them. He was possessed of organising skill and knew how to win over the good will of the residents of the new territories added to his kingdom by his wise and far seeing ways. He reconciled them by allowing them the fullest local freedom and by the system of rural government he adopted through the aid of village assemblies which were nearly sovereign in their territories. Though probably gentle by disposition, he was as became a soldier not too prone to excuse wanton disobedience or slackness. His treatment of the defaulting tax payers has been referred to above. Religious and pious he seems to have built many temples, of which the greatest and most famous is the Rājārājasvara (now called Brihadisvara) at Tanjore. Though apparently a strict greatness and character

Rajaraja's

Conquest of Vēṅgi, Gangapādi, and Nulambapādi

he should have conquered Vēṅgai-nādu, i e, the Eastern Chālukya territory, Gangapādi and Nulambapādi which formed part of the present Mysore State (see below), and Tadiḡaipādi, which Sn John Fleet thinks included the present Krishnarājpēte, Nagamangala, Mandya, Seṅga-patam and Malvalli Taluks (IA XXX 109) As Mr. Venkayya has pointed out that in the Hoskote and Devanhalli Taluks of the Bangalore District a number of inscriptions have been found which mention Dadigavari or Tadiḡavari, which in later times bore the name of Vikramachōla-māṇḍala, it is possible Tadiḡaipādi included in Rājarāja's time these taluks as well According to Eastern Chālukya copper-plate grants, the kingdom of Vēṅgi was without a ruler about this time The inter-regnum had lasted for twenty-seven years Apparently Rājarāja ended the interregnum and restored peaceful government by placing Saktivarman on the throne (III loc cit 3 EI VI 349) About the same period, Rājarāja appears to have conquered Kudumalai-nādu, modern Coorg, where an inscription of his (at Malambai) has been traced His general in this war was Panchavanmāraya

Conquest of Kalinga

His other conquests included Kollam (Quilon) on the Malabār Coast and Kalinga, on the Eastern seaboard As regards the latter, it has been suggested by Mr. Venkayya that there were at least two expeditions against it The first of these was led by Rājarāja in person and the second by his son Rājēndia It is not unlikely that the final conquest was effected by Rājēndra-Chōla The first expedition was apparently undertaken to consolidate the position of Saktivarman, whom Rājarāja had placed on the Vēṅgi throne After that conquest, fresh trouble apparently arose in the Kalinga country. A chief named ōimalāditya and surnamed Mummadi, Bhīma and Bṛudānka Bhīma appears to have revolted and killed a many stone inscriptions in Southern India of the Chola king Parāntaka I whose extensive conquests are well known. Of these the stone inscriptions refer only to the conquests of Madura. Even this item of information would probably be missing had it not been for the fact that the king bore the name of his grand father Parakeśarivarmān and it was consequently necessary to add the epithet "conqueror of Madura" in order to avoid confusion. The idea of Rājārājadeva to add a short account of his military achievements at the beginning of every one of his inscriptions was entirely his own. His action in this respect is all the more laudable because his successors evidently followed his example and have left us more or less complete records of their conquests. But for the historical introductions which are often found at the beginning of the Tamil inscriptions of Chola kings the lithic records of the Tamil country would be of very little value and consequently even the little advance that has been made in elucidating the history of Southern India would have been well nigh impossible. Early Tamil records are dated not in the Saka or any other well known era but in the regnal year of the king to whose time the grants belong, and palaeography is not always a very safe guide in South Indian history. With the help of the names of contemporary kings of other dynasties mentioned in the historical introductions of the Tamil inscriptions it has been possible to fix the approximate dates of most of the Chola kings. Consequently the service which Rājārājadeva has rendered to epigraphists in introducing a brief account of his military achievements at the beginning of his stone inscriptions cannot be over estimated. The historical side of the king's intellectual nature is further manifested in the order which he issued to have all the grants made to the Rājārājēśvara temple engraved on stone. That this order of the king was not due entirely to self glorification is borne out by other records. For instance an inscription of his reign found at Tirumalavādi in the Trichinopoly district (M.E.B. 1895 No. 92 of 1895) records an order of the king to the effect that the central shrine of the Vaidyanātha temple at the place should be rebuilt and that before pulling down the walls, the inscriptions engraved on them should be copied in a book. The records were subsequently re-engraved on the walls from the book after the rebuilding was finished.

Rājendra-Chōla's time, mention the village of Māndōttam, otherwise called Rājarājapuram, situated in Īlam or Mummudisōlamandalam, so called, as above stated, after one of the titles of Rājarāja. At Māndōttam there was a Siva temple, called Rājarāja-ēsvaratta-Mahādēva. Māndōttam has been identified with modern Māntōta, in Ceylon, where there are some ancient remains, opposite to the southern end of the island of Mannar including those of a celebrated Tamil temple dedicated to Tirukēsvara, i.e., Vishnu (Parker, Ancient Ceylon, 251). Some of the generals who fell in battles in his Ceylon war are mentioned in two Truchengōde copper-plates dated in his 5th and 10th regnal years (M.E.R. 1914, Appendix A Nos 10 and 11).

A record of the 2nd year of his reign registers a grant of land made by the residents of Vinnandai alias Vikrama Pāndiyanallūr, a village in Kottur-nādu, which was a subdivision of Īla-mandalam, to the temple at Kuttālam in the Tinnevely District. This record proves clearly that both the Pāndya country and Ceylon were subject to Rājarāja's sway (M.E.R. 1918, Appendix B Nos. 454 of 1917).

Campaign
against Western
Chālukyas

About two or three years later, i.e., about 1005 A.D., or 1006 A.D., Rājarāja led an expedition against the Western Chālukyas. The real cause of the war is not known. It has been surmised that the conquest of Gangavādi and Nolambavādi, which were among the feudatory kingdoms of the Rāshtrakūtas and Western Chālukyas in succession, should have embittered Chālukya feelings against Rājarāja. Satyāśraya (or Iṭavi Bedanga), son of Taila II, was the ruling king of the Chālukyas at the time. The victory over Satyāśraya is mentioned in the Tiruvālangādu and the large Leyden grants and in one of the Tanjore inscriptions. In the Tamil records of Rājarāja, the reference to the conquest of the 7½ lakh country of Rattapādi should be taken to mean this conquest. There

Ceylon and took service there under the Singhalese kings. From the description given of them in the Ceylonese chronicle Mahāvamsa we learn that they belonged to the working classes and consisted of Valangai (Right Hand) and Idangai (Left Hand) Sirudanam, Pillaiyal danai Vadugar (i.e. northerners or those from the Telugu country) Malayalar (those from the Malayalam country) Parivārakkondam (i.e. those of the fishermen caste) and others and that their leaders were the Valanjivar (i.e. Banajigars) and the Nagarattār (i.e., Nagartha of the Kannada country). Apparently the Velaikkāra troops who took service under Vijayabāhu I, the Singhalese king referred to above refused to proceed against the Cholas in their mother country and that king is stated in an inscription dated in the 30th year of his reign to have successfully quelled their rebellion (V E R 1013, Part II Para 30). Though these Velaikkāra troops appear to have served as mercenaries under the Singhalese kings at the close of the 11th century, at the beginning of that century while under Rajaraja, the Chola king, and his son they seem to have been part of the regular army recruited on a voluntary basis. Rajaraja kept up a close connection between the troops and the temples erected by him. Thus, several men taken from the regiments were appointed musicians in the great temple at Tanjore and remunerated as such. To some of these regiments the management of certain of the shrines was committed, and they were expected to provide for their requirements. Others were granted loans from the temple treasuries on interest which they appear to have agreed to return in cash. Though kind and even generous to the troops, Rajaraja appears to have inspired fear into them as a disciplinarian. Thus, certain inscriptions of his which refer to military operations going on towards the close of his reign state how some of his officers of high rank (Perundanam) and entirely in accordance with the date of the Hottur inscription.

The order of
his Conquests

The order of his conquests is indicated generally in Rājaiāja's extant inscriptions. Generally it may be remarked that up to his 9th year, he is known in inscriptions as Rājakēsarivarman without any allusion to his conquests. His inscriptions dated from the 10th to the 12th year have the epithet Kāṇḍalūr sālai kala marutta and the later ones begin with the famous introduction tiṇumagulpōla, etc., and furnish a complete list of his conquests (M.E.R. 1924, Para 10). Three of his inscriptions dated in his 14th year, however, give us a historical introduction, which thus enumerates the order of his victories, Sālai, Tattapādi (? Taḍigapādi), Talaikkādu (Talkād), Nulambapādi, Pīrudigangavalanādu and Vēṅgai-nādu. It states that he cut off the ships at Sālai by sending his army and that he conquered the above named countries with his forces. The inference has been suggested that he did not himself lead his forces at Sālai (M.E.R. 1923 Appendix B No 376 of 1922 and Appendix C, 67 and 121 of 1923, Para 27). As inscriptions belonging to a period long before his 22nd year or 23rd year, these do not refer to the conquest of Rattapādi.

Expedition
against the Laccadives, 1013-1014
A.D.

The last war in which Rājaiāja engaged was, according to Mī Venkayya, one which was undertaken by him in the 29th year of his reign. (i.e., 1013-1014 A.D.) He sent, in that year, it is stated, an expedition against the Twelve Thousand Islands (S.I.I. II v 7). Which group in the Indian Ocean is denoted by this name has not yet been determined. The reference may be to the Laccadives and Maldives, as the conquest of Malabār had been accomplished already and these islands remained over from then unconquered. But as the conquest of these

(4) Malai nādu which comprized the conquered Chera territory and consisted of only one known nādu.

(5) Mukkonla-chola mandala, which comprized the southern portion of Gangavali (called also Gangavadi) represented by the present Mysore District. It consisted of one ralanādu named Gangakonla Chola valanādu. Its principal nādu was called Padi nādu identified with Hadi nādu or Hadimaru with its capital at Mur in the present Chamarajnagar Taluk.

(6) Vikrama Chola mandala, that part of Gangavadi which is now represented by the northern portion of Bangalore District. Its chief ralanādu was called Jayangonda Chola valanādu.

(7) Nihari Chola mandalam represented by the present Holar District.

(8) Nulambapadi comprising the ancient Nulamba territory. Its chief nādu was called Parival nādu after Parural modern Parigi 7 miles north of Hindupur in the Nantapur District. It consisted of the chief places of hūdalur and huasūr.

(9) Irām or Mummudi Chola valanādu or mandalam which formed the conquered territory in Ceylon (M. E. A. 1913 p. 96) which consisted of two ralanādus.

There are also known from inscriptions several other ralanādus whose location has not yet been determined. Some of these might have belonged to Chōla mandalam proper (S. I. I. II v 29 n 2).

Rājaraja seems to have had the assistance of a hierarchy of officials both in the provinces and at his head-quarters. Among his officers, two generals are referred to in the Tanjore inscriptions, viz., Kuravan Ulagalandan alias Rājaraja Mahārājann and Krishna Raman alias Mummadi Sora Brahmamārāyan. The latter was the Chief Secretary (Ōlai ndyagan or Tiru mandira vōlaindyagan) from the 21st to the 24th year of the king's reign.

Whether this Brahmamārāya can be identified with the Panchavan Brahmadhirāja one of the noblemen

His Secretaries and Officers.

before the 8th regnal year, ve, about 992 A D By A D 1004, we find his son Rājēndia Chōla, who was in command of the Chōla army, capturing Talkād, the Ganga capital, and bringing the Ganga power to an end. The conquest of the south and east of Mysore in an arc extending from Arkalgud in the west, through Seringapatam, north of Nelamangala to Nidugal, appears to have been speedily effected. Mr. Rice has suggested that by virtue of this conquest Rājēndia-Chōla assumed the title of "Gangaikonda-Chōla" or "the conqueror of Ganga kingdom." This, however, is now proved to be not well founded. The Changālvās, whose kingdom was in the Hunsur Taluk and Coorg, were at the same time brought under Chōla subjection. The victory over them was due to a warrior named Maniya, under the Chōla general Panchava-Mahārāya, already mentioned. For having overcome the Changālvās in the battle of Panasoge, he was rewarded by Rājarāja with an estate at Mālavvi, now Mālambi, and the Arkalgud and Yēlusāvira country, together with the title of Khsatriya-sikhāmanī Kongālva (Coorg 46). Recently a Kannada vīkal has been found at Hampapūr, Yedatore Taluk, which refers itself to the reign of Rājēndia-Chōla. It is dated in Saka 956 Srīmukha year, A D 1033. Nannī Changālva calls himself after Rājēndia-Chōla in this inscription. This unmistakably shows that he recognizes Rājendra's suzerainty over him (M A R 1912-13, Part II, Para 69). In the extreme north-east connected with Nidugal, was Henjeru, now Hemāvati, on the northern border of Sirsi Taluk, a subordinate Chōla kingdom, whose rulers claimed descent from the ancient kings of Urayur. The territories under Panchava-Mahārāya and the Nidugal chiefs were apparently the outposts of the new conquest. There is no doubt whatever that the Chōlas contemplated the entire subjugation of Mysore. But in this attempt they were foiled in the west by the Hoysalas, who were now rising are also mentioned as puravutari and varippottagam. The former was apparently the officer dealing with taxes due from revenue free villages and the latter with the rent roll of the Chōla dominions. Another important officer of the king was the magistrate (adhikarin) Udayadivakaran Tillaiyāl alias Rajarāja Muvendavelan of Kānchivayāl who figures both in the large Leyden plates and in the Tanjore inscriptions. Still another important person was the temple manager Ādittan Survan alias Iennavan Muvendavelār who was the headman of Poygai nāḍu. He set up images of some of the sixty three Saiva devotees in the temple and made gifts to them. The king seems to have conferred the title Perundaram on the most important officers and men of note in his dominions. The title Perundaram is prefixed to Sirudanattu paninakkal, i.e. the servants of the Sirudanam which seems to denote a class of officers. Perhaps the term was used to denote subordinate officials. One of the officers is described as Sirudanattu Perundaram. He probably belonged to the class of subordinate officials but received the title Perundaram. (Sirudanattu kkangāni ttattān of the lord Sri Rajarajadeva occurs in line 17 of the third section of No. 66. (See S I I II v Sirudanattu may also mean of the youth and the whole phrase may denote the goldsmith who was in the king's service when he was young.)

Among the public works carried out by Rajaraja are several temples some of which have been referred to above. The Uyyakondān Channel which is an ancient irrigation work in the Trichinopoly District was probably constructed during his reign and called after him Uyyakondār being one of his well known titles. It was apparently renovated in the reign of Kulōttunga Chola III (A.D. 1205-1206) as a fragmentary inscription on its head

His Public Works.
Construction of the great Tanjore
Temple

Māra, was this mast elephant of Mummadi-Chōla "Who this Panchavamahārāya was is made known in Seringapatam 125, dated in 1012 A D (not 1065 A D as stated in EC III) He was apparently Rājendra-Chōla himself, who is there called "Panchava-mahārāya Rājendra-Chola." This inscription is on the north base of the Rāmadēva temple at Kirangūi and records the fact that Panchava-mahārāya Rājendra-Chōla, filled with wealth, camped here, and constructed a stone pond of pure water. As "Panchava" is a title of the Pāndyas, "Panchava-mahārāya" may be taken to mean the king (or conqueror) of the Pāndyas, a title assumed by Rājendra-Chōla because, perhaps, he took part with his father in the conquest of the Pāndyas. In Mysore, however, the Kongālvās were opposed by the Hoysala king Nīpa-Kāma in 1022 and 1026 A D (EC v. Manjarabad 43, Aikalgud 46) and made no headway in extending the Chōla conquests in that part of the country (Rice, Mysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions, 86)

Details of Rājarāja's
Conquests

The conquests of Rājarāja, as detailed in various inscriptions in this State, are described in (EC IX) Channapatna 128 of his 23rd year. During his long life, we are told, of growing strength, he was pleased to destroy the ships at Kāndalūi Sālai, conquer with his heroic and victorious army Vēngai-nādu, Gangapādi, Nulambapādi, Tadigaivāli, Kudamalai-nādu, Kollam, Kalingam, Īlāmandalam, the strong and stubborn Singalas, the Irattapādi Seven-and-a-half lakh (country) and the twelve thousand ancient islands of the sea, and deprive the Sēliyai (i.e., the Pāndyas) of their splendour at the very time when their greatness, which was adored everywhere, became conspicuous

His performance of Tulābhāra ceremony

In the 29th year of his reign (or A D 1013), Rājarāja performed the Tulābhāra ceremony, i.e., weighing with the requisite amount of paddy money for purchasing the various articles for temple use not omitting even camphor cardamum seeds champakā buds and khasāhas roots required for scenting the bathing water of the gods (No. 24) sheep cows and buffaloes for supplying the ghee required for lamps skilled musicians for singing the Dēdram hymns dancing girls Brāhmana servants for doing the menial work in the temple accountants for writing the temple accounts and temple treasurers goldsmiths carpenters washermen barbers astrologers and watchmen were provided on a most liberal scale. The systematic way in which the various endowments to the temple were made on the principles laid down for their proper administration bespeak a genius for organisation which could not have been quite a characteristic feature of kings in general at the time.

The exact date of the building of the Tanjore temple is a question that deserves some attention. Stone temples were apparently not quite common in the time of Rājārāja. This is shown by the use of the word tiṛukkar raṭi i.e. the stone temple in the order of the king to have all the gifts engraved on stone. The difficulties also of procuring stones for such a big building must have been very great particularly as there was no hill in or very near Tanjore which could have supplied the requisite quantity. Such a monument as the Tanjore temple would take several years to build even with all the inventions of modern engineering. But at the time of which we are speaking mechanical appliances must have been in a primitive state and hence the time taken to finish the building must have been much longer. Therefore we shall only try to fix when the building was probably begun and when it came to a close. We have some reason to suppose that the period between the 18th and the 21st year of the king's reign was not occupied with any wars. This was probably the time when the titles Sri-Rājārāja and Sivapādasākhara were conferred

The Tanjore temple and its construction.

(Saka 932, Cyclic year Sādhārana), shows that Nolambādhirāja Chōlayya was a feudatory of his ruling over Kaivāla and the neighbouring country (Chintāmani 118). An inscription dated in 997 A D (Saka 920, Cyclic year Hēvīlambī) has been found at Kamasamudram in Hoskote Taluk (E C IX Hoskote 111). Channapatna 47 and 128, the former of which is much effaced and contains the Tamil introduction of the latter, give particulars of all the conquests of Rājārāja Channapatna 128 is of the 23rd regnal year or A D 1007. It records a grant to a Vishnu temple founded in the name of Rājārāja at Manalur (see above). In the same year, three other grants in favour of the same god were made (E.C. IX, Channapatna 132, 130 and 131). One was by the members of the village assembly of Vandur alias Sōlamādēvi-Chatuvēdimangalam (an agrahāra named after one of the queens of the king). Another was by the village assembly of Punganūr (now Honganūr in Channapatna Taluk), alias Trailōkyamahādēvi-Chatuvēdimangalam (so called after another queen of the king). A third was by the citizens of Nīgarli-Sōlapuram. In 1013 A.D., the assembly of Punganūr above named granted certain lands for the offerings of rice to be made to the god Kundavi-Vinnagar-Ālvār (E C IX Channapatna 42_a). A grant made in the 28th year of Rājārāja's reign, corresponding to Saka 934 (A D 1012), by the Mahādandanāyaka Panchava-Mahārāya, the commander-in-chief of Rājārāja's forces in Vēngi and Gangavādi, has been registered as Seringapatam 140 (see above). Rājārāja's conquests are described in T-Narasipur 35 (E C III). It may be set down to 1003-1004 A D, as it is nearly in the same terms as Mulbagal.123, which is dated in his 19th regnal year. This record testifies to a grant by the gāmundas of Mayīlangi (of Idai-nād) and other places in the name of Periya Kundavai Ālvār (i.e., Rājārāja's elder sister), in favour of Vinnagara Ālvai at have been built before the conquest of the 12,000 islands by the king in the 29th year of his reign. It is particularly noteworthy that unlike other Chōla temples of the south the Rājārājēśvara temple at Tanjore was built completely with its necessary adjuncts in the time of Rājaraṇa himself the founder of that temple on a well defined and stately plan which was persevered in till its completion (Tanjore District Gazetteer, Volume I, page 270). The small temple of Sobrahmanya within the courtyard of the temple is not referred to in the inscriptions though the adjoining Chandēśvara shrine is. Consequently, it seems to have been a later addition (See Fergusson's Indian Architecture Volume I p 365). The Brihannāyaki temple, also in the courtyard was constructed in the second year of a certain Kōnerimāikondan, probably a Pāṇḍya king of the 18th century A.D. (No 61). The Dakṣiṇāmurti shrine abutting the south wall of the central shrine has been already suggested to have been a later addition. The Marathi inscription on the inner wall of the south enclosure which is dated in Saka 1723 Durmati (A.D. 1801-02) states that the Mahratta king Sarphōji Mahārāja executed elaborate repairs to the shrines of Ganeśa Sobrahmanya, the Goddess (Brihannayaki), Sabhāpati, Dakṣiṇāmurti and Chandēśvara, built one or two new mandapas and renovated the prākāra walls the temple kitchen and the flooring of the courtyard.

The circumstances which led to the building of the Śrī Rājārājēśvara temple may now be examined. In the Dēvāraṃ hymns the Tiruvīsappa and the Periya purāṇam the first place among Śaiva shrines is assigned to the Natarāja temple at Chidambaram which is designated kōyil i.e. the temple. The name Ādavallān one who is able to dance which was given to one of the chief images in the Rājārājēśvara temple is derived from that of the deity in the temple at Chidambaram.

placed under the protection of the Śīvaishnavas of the temple. This mention of Śīvaishnavas in early 12th century, in connection with a Viṣṇu temple, shows that they were existent long before the advent of Śī Rāmānuja (M A R 1912, Para 77). Kundavi and Rājaiāja were not only devout Saivas but also ardent worshippers of Viṣṇu, a rare example of tolerant religious zeal which is fully reflected in the style of the Tanjore temple built by Rājarāja (M A R 1912, Para 77).

The next period during which Rājaiāja turned his attention from warfare to peaceful pursuits was from the 23rd to the 29th year. The Chōla dominions probably enjoyed peace and the king apparently devoted his energies to the task of internal administration. The building of the Rājarājēsvara temple in Tanjore and the many endowments and gifts to it must have occupied a prominent place in his mind during these years.

It was during this period that Rājarāja caused to be built the temple of Nārasimha at Maṇepalli, near Malvalli. It is called in the record relating to it as Rājasraya Vinnagar Ālvār (i.e., Rājasraya Viṣṇugriha Ālvār) after Rājasraya, a title of Rājaiāja. Provision for the carrying out of its festivals is made in a lithic record found at it dated in Saka 935 (A D 1012-1013). Another inscription dated in Saka 936 (A D 1013-1014) records another grant to it (M A R 1912, Para 79).

Another temple in the Mysore State with which Rājarāja's name is closely connected is that of Pīḍariyār, now called the Kōlāmma, which, he and his son Rājēndra-Chōla specially patronized and repeatedly endowed. Rājēndra Chōla indeed had its brick parts rebuilt in stone (E C X, Kolar 109).

Still another temple founded by Rājarāja and referred to in a series of inscriptions recording grants to it, is that of the god Jayangonda-Chōla Vinnagar Ālvār at Manalūr.

names Sri Rājariya and Sivapādasakṣura. The practice of engraving the name or title of the donor on vessels presented to a charitable institution is still current.

A study of the order in which the various inscriptions of the temple were engraved is not altogether unprofitable. It appears that the walls of the central shrine were reserved for recording royal gifts including those of the king's elder sister about whom more will be said in the sequel. The inscription on the north wall (No. 1) which begins with the Sanskrit verse (śaiṣa nripa sr̥ṇat etc.) was the first to be engraved and contains the order of Rājaraḍadēva to have all the grants made by himself and others recorded on the walls of the central shrine. This order of the king is dated on the 20th day of the 26th year. The gifts which had actually been made prior to this date were seven by the king himself and eleven by his older sister as registered in No. 2. No earlier benefactions of any of the queens or other donors are known prior to this date. Accordingly when the king issued orders that the gifts made by us those made by our elder sister those made by our wives and those made by other donors should be engraved on stone, he himself intended to make in addition a large number of presents and expected that his queens and his officers would follow his example. Thus the order of the king referred more to future benefactions than to those which had actually been made prior to the date of the royal order. The earliest gift of which the date is definitely given is that of the copper pot which was to be placed on the pinnacle of the central shrine. Though it was made on the 275th day of the 25th year it is by mistake registered between a gift of the 84th day of the 26th and another of the 104th day of the same year. Some at least of the numerous gifts which in this inscription are stated to have been made in the period from the 23rd to the 29th year of the king's reign may dēvantunāl, which was to last for seven days from the Satabhishaj-nakshatra (evidently the star under which the king was born) occuring in the month of Āvanī every year (M E R 1911, Para 22)

Revenue
Survey and Settlement carried out,
1002 A D

Rājarāja appears to have carried out a revenue survey and settlement in the 17th year of his reign or A.D. 1002 (M E R 1913, II 21, M E R 1918, II Appendix B No 199 of 1917) In his 19th regnal year, there was a fresh survey of the land ("measuring of the earth") to rectify apparently the small errors in measurement which might have crept into the registers maintained by village authorities (M E R 1913, Appendix C 59, also see Part II Para 21). The Tanjore inscriptions (S I I I) bear ample testimony to the accuracy of the operations conducted by the king Land as small in extent as 1-52, 428,800,000 of a vēli was measured and assessed to revenue An inscription at Tiruvīsālūr in the Tanjore District, dated in his 24th year, (M E R No 44 of 1907) also refers to a revenue survey apparently carried out some time before that date (or A D 1108) The officer of Rājarāja who took an active part in the survey operations was perhaps the general (sēnapati) Kuravan Ulagalandān alias Rājarāja-mahānājan His title Ulagalandān, one who measured the earth, might, Mr Venkayya suggests, have been given to him in recognition of his services in connection with the survey operations It was evidently as a result of this survey and settlement that Rājarāja issued his famous order dated the 143rd day of his 24th year (1008 A D) in which he confiscated to the villages concerned the lands of those who did not pay the taxes due along with their brethren This order, it is not a little curious to note, was made applicable only to "villages of Brāhmanas," "villages of Vaikhānasas" (Śīvaishnavas of Pre-Rāmānuja times) and "villages of Sīmanas," i.e., Jains in the home province

Tiruvallam, was also built by him. According to inscriptions on its walls—dated in his 20th year—the temple was built by him and so belongs to the same period as the great temple at Tanjore (M.E.R. 1890 Para 3). He also built the temple of Chōlendrasimhāvara at Mālpadi, alias Vira Rājārayapuram (M.E.R. 1921 Para 81 Appendix C No 103). It was formerly known as Viranurayanapuram after Parantaka I its name being changed as above by Rājaraja. From an inscription dated in the 8th year of Rājendra Chōla we learn that the Siva temple at Sivapuram near Kadambattur (Chingleput District) is called Rājarājāvara probably after Rājarāja just like the temple at Tanjore (M.E.R. 1898 Appendix B No 139 of 1895). For the funds necessary for building these temples and for carrying out the other public works he seems to have undertaken. Rājarāja should have used the large wealth he inherited and also acquired by his numerous conquests. His wars against the Chēras the Pāndyas the Singhalese, the Western Chōlukyas and others should have brought him—and also his successors Rājendra Chōla I and Rājadhīrāja—a large booty of which Rājarāja I boasts so often in his inscriptions. (M.E.R. 1899 Para 58)

The life of the people of the time seems to have centred round the local temple. It ministered to their spiritual and temporal needs. It was not merely a place of religious worship but also an institution to which the people could apply for aid during times of need. Thus in the 10th year of Rājaraja I certain villagers, having committed certain faults against the king and been fined for them found themselves unable to pay the fine imposed. Being harassed by the king's officers they sold part of their lands to the temple in order to find the money for paying the fine. (M.E.R. 1918 No 277 of 1917). Royal patronage added to its funds either by

Social life.

Saiva, he was tolerant towards Jainism and Buddhism and as regards Vaishnavism, he was apparently a worshipper as much of Vishnu as of Siva. His devotion to his elder sister Kundavai is one of the pleasing features of his character, which for its forcefulness and true charity is without a parallel in Chōla history. His singularly blameless career, as king, conqueror and man stamp him as a ruler worthy of the highest praise. His love of system, as displayed by his administrative acts—whether in the measurement of land or the building of a temple or engraving of his conquests on its stone walls—mark him out as a business-like and gifted personage who tried to avoid mistakes as far as it lay in his power and to leave his impress on the history of his country. Among the great works that he undertook and achieved are some which have been found not merely useful to this day to mankind but also admired by successive generations of men and women, as grand works of art.

His intellectual worth

Of Rājārāja's intellectual worth much may be written. Mr Venkayya in his dispassionate review of this king's career remarks thus of the innovation he introduced into the composition of the inscriptions which he ordered to be engraved on the walls of the temple he caused to be constructed at his capital —

“That part of Rājārāja's intellectual nature to which students of South Indian history owe most is the desire on his part to record his military achievements in every one of his inscriptions and thus hand down to posterity some of the important events of his life. As far as we know at present, Rājārājadēva was the first king of Southern India to introduce this innovation into his inscriptions. Before his time, powerful kings of the Pallava, Pāndya and Chōla dynasties had reigned in the south, and some of them had made extensive conquests. But none of them seems to have thought of leaving a record on stone of his military achievements. For instance, we have

cocoanut trees were to be planted and cherished on both the sides of the new road and the income to be derived from the trees thus planted was to be used towards the cost of maintaining lights and sundry other charges in the temple (M.E.R. 1915 No. 45 of 1914 also Para 26). Though this record belongs to the time of Rājārāja i.e. about 85 years later than Rājārāja I, there is no reason to believe that it was not by then a recognized mode of charity undertaken by private persons in the interests as much of religion as of public utility. Apparently even religious charity aimed at serving human needs while not forgetting its higher spiritual aspects. Kundavai's endowment of a free dispensary at Palaiya vānavanmahādevi chaturvādimangalam in the 4th year of Rājendra-Chōla, (see post) was eminently one of this kind (M.E.R. 1925, Appendix 112 of 1925). The assembly which thus guided the work of the village seems to have been an active body. Apart from its committees, there appear to have been active members of it who are called ganattār or those of the gana. As they are described as alum ganattār in certain inscriptions they may be taken to be the more active members of the assembly. They might have directed its work being men specially chosen because of the initiative they possessed. Whether they were jointly liable for their acts especially acts involving monetary transactions, is not quite clear (M.E.R. 1922 Para 71). In the Brāhman villages—agrahāras—the assembly was probably a body of superior men possessed of higher intellectual capacity. Their meeting place—at one place—was known as Brahmasthāna. (M.E.R. 1922 Appendix C Nos. 240 and 241).

Closely attached to the temple as an adjunct was the theatre with which was closely connected the art of dancing. An inscription dated in the 9th year of Rājārāja I records a gift to a professional actor (Sakkanyar)

Amusements Theatre and Dancing

The fact is borne out by the form of the characters employed in the re-engraving of the early inscriptions (M E R 1920, Para 17 No 92 of 1895)

His army its organization

We get some idea of the spirit with which Rājaiāja treated his soldiers from a study of his army organization. He was evidently anxious that his army should get its due share in the glory derived from his extensive conquests. It was evidently the same army which was called "the great warlike army" during the reign of his successor Rājēndia-Chōla I. The names of as many as 34 regiments are known and these seem to have been evidently named after the titles of the king or of his son, which indicates the attachment he and his son bore to the army. These may be termed, in modern terminology, the King's Own or Royal Regiments. These titles may be taken to have been bestowed on them after they had distinguished themselves in some engagement or other. One of these was the regiment named after his surname Kōdandaṇāma-teruṇavar. Two other bodies called Tāyātōṅga-teruṇa and Muttaval-petta-Kaikōlar are peculiar and the origin of their names is somewhat obscure (M E R. 1921, Para 28). The regiments were divided into elephant troops, cavalry and infantry. Thirteen of the 32 regiments known appear to have been designated Valangai-Vēlaikkāra-ppadaigal, i.e., Vēlaikkāra troops of the Right Hand. This shows that there should have been other regiments set down to the "Left Hand." Whether this distinction has anything to do with the origin of the South-Indian castes other than Brāhman into "Right Hand" and "Left Hand" has still to be determined. The term Vēlaikkāra has been rendered into Volunteer by Mr Venkayya, who adds the suggestion that they "were perhaps volunteers who enlisted when the occasion (vēlai) for their services arose." These vēlaikkāra regiments later appear to have migrated into a period of over two centuries—shows that the monotony of an agricultural life in the villages was relieved by diversions which, though they began as spiritual needs, remained to serve as social amusements.

Several inscriptions of Rajarāja's reign show that while he founded many temples repaired or restored others and donated requisites of every kind to most of them he did not allow their management to lax hands. Misappropriation of funds or want of care on the part of those charged with the duty of supervision was met by inquiries and audits of temple accounts. Thus, for instance, inquiries into misappropriations of the temple funds were under his orders undertaken by State officials and if the facts were proved on inquiry fines were imposed and the fines utilized for temple purposes—for example for making gold plate and presenting it to the temple. (See M.E.R. 1913, Para 21 and M.E.R. 1918 Para 25) Again, from an inscription of his dated in his 26th year we note that there was an audit of temple accounts conducted by an officer of his. (M.E.R. 1922 II Para 15) We note also from an inscription of his dated in his 27th year that during his royal tour of inspection one of his officers—Sirukndiyār Kalī Ādittan—andited the receipts and expenditure of the temple of Tiruverumbur (M.E.R. 1915 Appendix B 100, Para 21) In the 17th year of his reign, another officer inquired into the management of a temple and fixed its scale of expenditure (M.E.R. 1919 Para 16) In the course of the audit of his 26th regnal year abovementioned, he altered the measure with which paddy due to it was being measured so that from the increased quantity of paddy realised by the change in the grain measure he added another service to be conducted in the temple (M.E.R. 1922, Para 15 Appendix C No 21) Hereditary rights in the temple were compulsorily sold for misappropriation

Temple
management
and audit.

others who were apparently arbitrators and judges (naduvirakkum) vowed themselves to put up lamps in the Rājarājēsvara temple at Tanjore, if no disgrace betook them at the hands of the king on their return from the war. (S I I II. V 11. n 2)

Encouragement of weavers

A number of Kaikkōlars (weavers) of different classes, named after his titles are mentioned in different inscriptions (e g., Pārthivāsegaratterinja-Kaikkōlar, etc, M.E R. 1919, Para 10 Appendix B No 491 of 1918) These appear to have been recruited for service as much in the army as in the peaceful domestic art of weaving It would thus seem that Rājarāja encouraged weavers and weaving in his kingdom by paying special attention to the members of this caste.

His Administrative divisions

The empire of Rājarāja was divided into a number of provinces called mandalas. Each mandala was divided into a number of valanāḍus, each valanāḍu being named after a title of the king. Each valanāḍu was further subdivided into a number of nāḍus, each nāḍu being named after the chief village in it The empire then consisted of a number of Mandalas, valanāḍus, nāḍus and villages It appears that the territorial limits of the divisions could not have changed with the change of rulers but often fresh names were conferred on them The mandalas known from Rājarāja's inscriptions are —

(1) Chōla-mandalam, which appears to have consisted of at least nine valanāḍus

(2) Tondai-nāḍu alias Tondaimandalam or Jayangonda-Chōla-mandalam, which comprized the ancient Pallava territory It consisted of 21 valanāḍus, the names being often shortened into nāḍus, or kottams

(3) Pāṇḍi-nāḍu alias Rājarāja-mandalam This comprized the conquered Pāṇḍya territory and consisted of seven valanāḍus

St. Joseph's College at Negapatam (I.A. VII 221) This was one of the two Buddhist temples at the place called Rajarajapurumballi and Rajendraperurumballi and the small Leyden grant records grants to them in the 20th year of Kulottunga Chola or 1090 A.D. (See A.S.I. IV 321-327 M.E.R. 1899 Para 18)

The art of making ornaments of gold and precious stones must have reached a very advanced stage in the Chola country about the beginning of the 11th century A.D. A large number of ornaments which are mentioned in the Tanjore inscriptions either go by other names at present or have no representatives in modern South Indian jewel shops. One of the ornaments is called Sonagachchidukinkādu (No. 93), the first component of which indicates the influence of the Jonakas (Greeks or Arabs) in Southern India in the 11th century. The nine gems are mentioned in one of the inscriptions (No. 93). Their names are diamond (vayiram), sapphire (mīlam), pearl (muttu), topaz (pushyadīgn), cinnamon stone (kūmādagam), coral (pavaram), emerald (paachai or maratagam), lapis lazuli (caidūrya) and ruby (mānikkam). The following varieties of diamonds are mentioned in the Tanjore inscriptions — mattadārai, mattadārai-chchavakkam and mattadāraichchappadi. Another classification of diamonds appears to have been sappadi (flat diamonds) and urulai (round diamonds). In paragraph 8 on p. 78 (S.I.I. I) reference is made to pure diamonds (vayirantūyana) and the two other varieties pandasāram and savukkam. The flaws in diamonds are mentioned to be porivu (spots), murivu (cracks), kāka bindu (black dots), rakta bindu (red dots) and vendana (marks as of burning). Palikkuvayiram crystal diamond is mentioned on pp. 78 87 162 and 163 (S.I.I. II V) and palingu crystal on pp. 87 148 162 205, 206, 207 225 226 and 237. Rājāvariam is mentioned

Position of Arts and Indu tries in his time

(perundaram) of the king, on whom the jvritam (or jāghu) of Tagadur-nādu in the present Mysore State was bestowed by Rājaiāja is not clear (M E R 1910 Appendix B. No 254 of 1909). The inscription which supplies this information is one of the 25th regnal year of Rājaiāja and the donor of the grant mentioned in it is described as the son of the Nālgamunda of Erumaiya, and a native of Ariyur in Puramalai-nādu (Erumaiya-nālgamunda) Erumai-nādu which forms the first portion of this title is the name generally applied to the Mysore country (Mahāsha-maṇḍala) in Tamil literature. Puramalai-nādu to which Ariyur belonged, was a district bordering on Mysore, though not actually included in it (Ibid Para 19).

Another such Secretary (Tirumandiravōlai) was Kārāyil Eduttapādam, the headman of Rājakēsarinnallūr. Amudan Tuttakāran, the headman of Villattūr, who drafted the Ānaimangalam grant recorded in the large Leyden plates, was also another Secretary, Īrāynavan Pallavayan alias Mummadi-Sōia-Pōsan must also have belonged to the secretariat staff as he signed both the Ānaimangalam grant and the Ukkal inscription relating to revenue settlement. All the above mentioned officers figure in the Tanjore inscriptions as donors. Kṛṣṇan-Rāman built at least two of the enclosing verandahs of the temple. Another officer who belonged to the secretariat was Vōlān Uttama-Sōian alias Maḍuāntaka Mūvēṇḍavēlan, who figures among the signatories to the original order of the king in the Ānaimangalam charter. Other officers are also mentioned in the large Leyden plates, viz., five persons who are described as Karumamārāyum, i.e., "those who look after (the king's) affairs." They were probably the king's executive officers. Four others who must have been Brāhmanas are described as naduvuṭṭum "those who are in the middle." These were perhaps arbitrators or judges. Two other officers to twelve flaws of diamonds viz, saraimalam kīrru sambadi pilattal, tulas kārī rindu, kākāpādami miruttu kodiyillana kodimurundana and tāraimarungina. The five characteristics of diamonds are eight faces (paḷagai) six angles (kodi) dārai suttu and tardāsa and the four colours, the Brahmin 'white' the Kshatriya 'red' the Vaisya 'green' and the Sudra 'black'. Consequently the virtues and flaws of diamonds were known in the Tamil country long before the time of Rājārāja. Vṛahamihira (6th century A.D.) describes the characteristics of a diamond. Four rings on each of which the nine gems had been set were presented to the Rājārājāsvara temple. The amount of gold, jewels and silver granted by the king seems almost incredible. Several of the Tanjore inscriptions contain lists of gold ornaments set with pearls and other precious stones. The different parts of the ornaments are described in technical language and the number of jewels set on each their total weight excluding threads and lac and the approximate cost of each ornament are registered in great detail.

The Tanjore inscriptions also throw some light on the economic condition of the people of the Chōla country about the beginning of the 11th century. The land assessment (kānikkadan) was roughly one hundred kālam of paddy for each velu of land. It would be interesting to compare this with the present rate of assessment. Paddy was sold at the rate of two kālam for each kāsu and three cows could be purchased for one kāsu. The rate of interest was apparently 12½ per cent. It was actually 1/8th kāsu per year for each kāsu of three kurumi of paddy for each kāsu per year. For Sivayōgins who had to attend the temple on certain festive occasions and who may be taken to represent the average middle-class men of the time the allotment made for each meal is one kurumi and two nari of paddy. Assuming that a condition of the people in his time

Economic

sluice refers itself to the 29th year of that king. But the greatest monument of his reign was the beautiful temple of Rājarājēsvara he caused to be built at Tanjore. This grand undertaking must have created an admiration for him in the minds of his subjects. In later times, the several incidents connected with its foundation and its equipment appear by themselves to have become the theme of a popular story. For, in the 4th year of Rājarājēndia (i.e., A.D. 1055), we are told that provision was made for the performance of the drama Rājarājēsvara Nāṭaka, on one of the festive days in the temple. A modern critic has said that it is, like the Kailāsa temple at Ellōra, an architectural unity, built after a preconceived plan. The principal shrine is built on a colossal scale, it is 82 feet square and crowned by a stūpa-tower of thirteen stories 190 feet high. (Havell, A Hand-book of Indian Art, 85) It was undoubtedly built to commemorate the victories by which he became paramount ruler of Southern India, Deccan and Ceylon. Mr Venkayya writes thus of Rājarāja's personal interest in this temple. —

“The study of Rājarāja's inscriptions leaves on us the impression that he must have been an active man and that he was probably successful in realizing some of the highest aims of his life. Like most men who devote a considerable portion of their earlier years in the active pursuit of cherished earthly aims, this Chōla king spent the later portion of his life in works of devotion. The Rājarājēsvara temple at Tanjore, which evidently served as a model for a large number of other temples in Southern India, is a stupendous monument of the religious instinct of this sovereign. The enormous endowments in lands and gold made to the temple show that the king had one sole object in his later life, viz., to leave no want of the temple unsupplied. Almost all the booty he acquired in wars he gave away to the temple. Utensils required for temple services, ornaments for the various images set up in the temple, villages for supplying the temple by Mr Venkayya in the Director General's Annual for 1901-05 lay down rules for the selection of members to the village committees which were apparently controlled by the village assemblies. During the reign of Rājaraṇa I certain changes appear to have been introduced in these rules. In the 11th year of his reign (or A.D. 996) it was laid down that only those who were capable of reciting the Mantrabrahmana (Hymns of Brāhmanas) could be elected as members of the Village Supervision Committee (ūrdaṛiyam) and take part in the deliberations of the village assembly. Those who were guilty of misappropriation of property and of other heinous crimes were debarred from election. It was further ruled that any one chosen in contravention of these rules would be accorded the same punishment as was usually meted out to transgressors of royal orders. (M.E.R. 1922 II Para 16, Appendix C Nos 240 and 241). An inscription of Rājaraṇa dated in his 16th year (1001 A.D.) indicates that the members of a village assembly were called together by the blowing of a trumpet and that the herald was entitled to get a fee (2 śoru) from the village. (M.E.R. 1919 Para 15 Appendix C No 156). The members appear to have met together and transacted business even during night (Ibid Appendix C Nos 180 and 186) though in the generality of cases it is found that business was conducted during day time. We may presume that the same rules were in force in other village sabhas. There were also villages where the villagers managed the business of the village without having been constituted into a regular corporation (See M.E.R. 1913 Para 23). Wherever the village assemblies existed their transactions must have been quite lively as there were periodical changes of members on these bodies. They seem to have been entrusted with civil and magisterial powers. In fact each village seems to have been a self-contained body jealously watching over its on him as suggested already. The name Sri-Rājarāja occurs first in an inscription of the 19th year of his reign. If, as is not unlikely, the name Siī-Rājarājēsvara was given to the temple in order to perpetuate the biruda Siī-Rājarāja, the king could not have conceived the idea of constructing the temple before the 19th year. The temple must have existed in some form or other in the 21st-22nd year (A D 1005-1006), because it was during this year that the king's expedition against Satyāsiya was undertaken, and on his return from this conquest, Rājarāja is said to have presented some gold flowers to the temple. The whole structure, however, could not have been ready by that time. A very large number of gifts are stated to have been made between the 23rd and 29th years. The 23rd year was probably chosen because the building of the temple had in that year reached an advanced stage. Thus it appears that the construction of the temple began in the 19th year and that a considerable portion of it was completed by the 23rd year. On the 25th day of the 25th year, the king presented a copper-pot to be placed on the pinnacle of the central shrine. We may conclude from this that the topmost portion of the central shrine must have been ready by that time; for, so far as the central shrine was concerned, the fixing of the copper-pot on the pinnacle would have been the last thing to be done.

A considerable part of the enclosure of the temple was, by order of the king, built by a Brāhmaṇa named Krishnan Rāman who was a military officer. This fact is engraved twice on the south enclosure and once on the west enclosure. From this repetition we may conclude that these two enclosures were built at different times by the king's general. There is no such inscription on any part of the north or east enclosure, and it is not impossible that they were built by the king himself. The gōpura of the east enclosure and the Chandēsvara shrine must the defaulters were dealt with. The assembly concerned apparently sent out its order to the idikāri of the place where the defaulters were and he was requested to execute the order there. The property of the defaulter was accordingly sold away for any price it could fetch and the proceeds credited to the tilam (temple treasury) concerned after obtaining a receipt. If necessary the idikāri, in his turn sent out the order to the sabha of the village or to all the people of the place (ur) in order that they might openly bid for the land. The price for which the latter bid was called ūrttor. Where no bidders came and it was knocked down to the temple itself it was called āndyokrayam (i.e. upset price) (See M.E.R. 1923 Para 29 Appendix B No 379 of 1922).

Well defined restrictions were evidently laid on any exactions or pretended claims of the members of the different committees. Members of the Annual Tank or Village supervision were not entitled to any kind of payment in rice or paddy as amanji (without payment or cash). If any claimed such payment they were to be fined each 25 kalanju of gold. The fine was to be collected by the Dēva Konmis or Managers of the temple. Even after paying this fine, the defaulters were liable to a fine to the Dharmāsana (the court of Justice). The accountant of the committee who allowed unlawful collection was also asked to pay vetti (a fine). Any body who said nay to this order and anybody who instigated others into saying so were to pay a fine of 15 kalanju to the Dharmāsana and they were thereafter to obey the same order (M.E.R. 1918 No 362 of 1917 dated in the 12th regnal year). Anybody who ran away without paying the taxes due was pursued to the village or hamlet concerned and there the order was executed. The case of one Kilakkil Avanipa Bhatta is in point. He was thus deprived of bhottuom in a particular village,

Restrictions on Exactions

and shows the importance attached to that temple during the time of which we are now speaking. Three of the chief images are mentioned in the Tanjore inscriptions, viz, Ādavallān or Dakshinamēru-Vitankan, Tanjai-Vitankan and Mahāmēru-Vitankan. From two of the Tanjore inscriptions (Nos 65 and 66) it is evident that the names of the god as well as of the temple at Chidambaram and their various synonyms were very commonly borne by men and women during the time of Rājarāja.

Reference has already been made to the titles Srī-Rājarāja and Sivapādasēkhara. The second which means 'one (who has) the feet of Siva as (his) crest' is a distinctly religious designation. Rājarāja being one of the names of Kubēra, the Hindu god of wealth and a friend of Siva, the title Srī-Rājarāja, "the glorious Kubēra" must have been conferred on him on account of his munificence. As it appears that both of these titles were conferred at one and the same time, it may be supposed that the king owed them to the authorities of the Chidambaram temple. Rājarāja's great grandfather Parāntaka I, had distinguished himself by his devotion to that temple. He had either built or at least repaired the golden hall at the place. It was, therefore, quite natural that Rājarāja should try to imitate his famous ancestor in his devotion to the most important Siva temple in Southern India. Practical as he appears to have been in everything he did, the king was not forgetful of his capital Tanjore when he wanted to demonstrate his devotion to the Saiva religion, and accordingly built a temple there. In order to perpetuate the title Srī-Rājarāja which he must have prized highly, the temple was called Srī-Rājarājēsvara. A clear proof of his having highly valued these titles is found in No. 91 where the king is stated to have presented a large number of silver utensils to the temple, bearing the Siddhāntaśāstrāḥ we are told that the Chōla king Rājendra Chōla brought many Śaiva teachers from the banks of the Ganges and settled them in the Chōla country. It is however more probable that in setting up the images of the sixty three the king and his officers were only representing the religious fervour of the people at large to whom the lives of the sixty three devotees of Śiva must have been quite familiar even before the time of Rājārāja.

It has been supposed that Nambi Āndar Nambi was a contemporary of Rājārāja. It is true his patron is said to have been a Chōla king named Rājārāja Abhaya Kulavekhara. But there is a very serious difficulty in identifying this Rājārāja with the builder of the Tanjore temple. Among the poems which Nambi Āndar Nambi is said to have classified is the Tiruvisaippa which contains a hymn on the Gangaikonda Chōlesvara temple built evidently by Rājārāja's son Rājendra-Chōla and called after his title Gangaikonda Chōla. The composer of the hymn himself must have lived after Rājārāja and Nambi Āndar Nambi who classifies it along with the sacred writings of the Tamil Śaivas, must certainly belong to a still later period.

The chief image of the Tanjore temple was called Ādavallān. Another name of the same image was Dakṣiṇamēru Vidangan. Ādavallān was also the name of a grain measure and of a weight for precious metals while Dakṣiṇamēru Vidangan was the standard used in weighing precious stones. These two names were also borne frequently by ordinary individuals. Ādavallān one who is able to dance, occurs as a name of the god at Chidambaram in the first hymn of the Tiruvisaippa which was composed by Tirumāligaittevar. The name Dakṣiṇamēru Vidangan as applied to a god is easily explained with the help of a hymn of the Tiruvisaippa where Mēru Vidangan occurs as a name of the god at evidently have been anterior even to the date given at the beginning of the record. No 2 likewise begins with the 310th day of the 25th year and registers gifts made by the elder sister of the king in that year and between the years 25 and 29. It is apparent from this that no grants made could have been recorded on the temple walls prior to the 29th year of the king. This is also confirmed by the fact that all the inscriptions of Rājajāja in the Tanjore temple are either dated in the 29th year of the king or register gifts made until his 29th year.

One of the earliest inscriptions of Rājendra-Chōla found in the temple is on the Chandēsvara shrine, quite close to the north wall. During the times of Rājendradēva, Kulōttunga I and Vikrama-Chōla, the north wall of the enclosure was chosen for recording grants. From these facts it may be concluded that the north wall was the most conspicuous portion of the temple. The gate on the north wall of the enclosure which is now practically closed must in ancient times have been considered as important as the gōpura on the east side. It is not unlikely that the royal palace was situated to the north of the temple, and that the members of the royal family entered the temple by the north gate. No 624 of 1902 from Tiruvalanjuli dated in the 21st year of Rājarāja mentions his palace at Tiruvallam (M E R. 1903, Page 7). It is not impossible that by this is meant the village Vallam, 7 miles south-west of Tanjore, which is described as "a fortress of considerable strength and one of the great bulwarks of Tanjore." At any rate, the foregoing facts show that the gate in the north wall of the enclosure was in ancient times as important as the gōpura on the east wall which is now most commonly used. The interested reader will find a full description of the various images installed by Rājarāja, his different queens and others in the great temple in S II II v. (29-41). The Sōmanāthēsvara temple at Mēlpādi, near mentioned in an inscription of the 32nd year of the Chōla king Rajadhirajadeva (M F R 1671 No 221). In the light of the foregoing facts it may be concluded that only some of the authors of the Tiruvaisippa flourished during the reign of Rājarājadeva.

The worship of the sixty three saints became later a tenet of the Virasaiva faith as well. It will be seen from the above that it was popular over a half century before Basava.

The extent of his capital city Tanjore might be easily imagined from the large number of streets, quarters and bazaars mentioned in the inscriptions of the period. The city extended beyond its traditional limits. Apparently it was enlarged during the reign of Rājarāja. A great many of its quarters, streets and bazaars were named after the king or princes of the royal family. With the conquest of Gangavādi and Nolambavādi not only provinces got new names after the titles of the king but also the more important of its towns. Thus Tolkad the Ganga capital became Rājarājopura. Manalur (Malurpatna near Channapatna) became Nikaril Cholapura after one Rājarāja's titles, Kunigal (modern Kunigal) became Rajendra Cholapura after the king's son, who had led the expedition into Mysore etc. Kolar however, retained its original name of Kuvalala.

Rājarāja
Imperial and Provincial Capital.

Rājarāja bore several titles of which the following are the more important — Mummudi or Mummudi Chōla Chōla Arumori Rājasraya Nityavinōda Sri Rājarāja and Sivapudasekhara. He seems to have assumed the title Jayangonda Chola towards the end of his life. These titles of his figure in territorial designations occurring in the Tanjore inscriptions and one is tempted to think that in the names Kshatriyasikhamani Valanādu Pāndya kulasani Valanādu Kōralantakavalanādu, Rājendrasimha-

Rājarāja's
titles.

direct money grants or by gifts of villages or lands for its benefit, which, being managed by the temple committee or the village assembly itself, brought in a steady annual income. Often taxes due to the State were made over to the temple (M E R. 1922, Appendix B No. 270). Sometimes the taxes due on lands gifted to the temple were remitted (Ibid No 349). Lands gifted to the temple were not infrequently managed on their behalf by its priests called Vaikhānasas. These also had sometimes the custody of funds meant for certain of the services in the temple. The central shrine of the temple and the temple treasury were in certain cases in the hands of different committees. The treasury committee appears to have possessed administrative powers, since it bought and sold lands as it deemed necessary in the interests of the temple. It kept strict accounts of receipts and disbursements and of assets and liabilities. The surplus in its hands was used for special purposes with the consent or at the instance of the local village assembly. The lands under its charge were leased out perpetually to private individuals, after obtaining from them reasonable premia and fixing certain annual payments. The temple, besides, proved useful as a place where the charities made to it by royal and other personages were recorded on stone for all time. Thus their perpetuation was insured. (M E R 1922, Paras 66-69). Private charity often took forms which served public ends. Thus private individuals purchased land for the purpose of laying out roads through which images of gods could be carried in procession. Such roads as subserved public needs as well, were made tax free. (M E R 1913; Para 38). In a record of Rājaiāja II, it is stated that a large number of persons made a grant of land of this kind for laying out a road called Rājagambhīratiruvīdi for the local god to pass through to the river-side for the sacred bath festival. The inscription adds that 750

Rājārāja's reign (M E R 1920 Para 19 No 11 of 1920) Another was Vanamahādēvi alias Tribhuvanamahādēvi She was the mother of Rājendra Chōla (M E R 1919 Para 11 Appendix B Nos 412 and 148) A record of Rājendra Chōla states that Udayapirattiyar Tribhuvanamahādēvi was his mother (Ibid No 460 of 1918) She was also known as Trailokya mahēviyar She is described as the daughter of Irāmaṇ Abhinavāna Tongiyar (M F R 1925, Para 11 Appendix B 101 of 1925) He is stated to have made gifts of gold and silver vessels and ornaments to the Piruvādnuram temples in the Tanjore District Another queen of Rājārāja was Kuttan Viraniyar (M F R 1919 Appendix B No 419 of his 28th year) Another was Sembiyar Mukkok Kilānadiḡal alias Kannaranachchi Pidurinagaiyar (M F R 1923 Para 27 Appendix C No 139 of 1923) Cholanmahādēviyar mentioned above was the daughter of Tittapiran (M E R 1922 Para 14 Appendix B No 223) Panchavanimahādēvi appears as Nakkān Panchavan mahādēvi in some inscriptions. She is described as the daughter of Devanār of Avanī Kandarapuram in Paluvur (M E R 1924 Para 13 Appendix C No 385 of 1924) It was called Lokamahādevīvara after the queen's title Lokamahādēvi (M E R 1895 No 219 and 222 of 1891) She gave the shrine a number of gold flowers and appointed a goldsmith to work for the temple (Ibid, No 220 and 216 of 1891) The name shows that it should have been built by her In 1013 A D she performed the ceremony of hiranyagarbha or passing through a golden cow (see above.) Rājārāja himself celebrated the tulābhāra ceremony at the same place. (M E R 1918 Para 26 see above.) She seems to have outlived her lord for at least 17 years for we find her (M E R 1918 Appendix C 154) making presents of gold necklaces set with costly gems to the temple built by her in the 21st year of Rājendra Chōla I (1031 A D)

by the assembly of Sāttanūr, for staging the seven acts (ankas) of the Āryakkūttu (themes from Sānskr̥it Purānas) on the festival day in the month of Purattāsī. Provision is also made in the inscription for the supply, in connection with the staging of this kūttu, of rice flour, betel leaves and areca nuts, ghee for mixing collyrium and turmeric. A later inscription of the time of Rājakēśarivarman Kulōttunga-Chōla-dēva (M E R 1925, No 152 of 1925) makes provision for the maintenance of a theatre called "Nānāvīda-nātasālai." From the name it looks as if the theatre was intended for different kinds of amusements. Instances of encouragement, both private and royal, to this kind of pastime are not wanting. Inscription No 65 of 1914 (M E R 1914) registers a gift of land for the performance of the dance called Sakkai-kūttu before the gods, and inscription No 253 of 1914 (M E R 1914) provides for the dance Sandikkūttu. Rājaiāja I brought and settled at Tanjore as many as 400 dancing girls from several temples of South India (S I I II, Page 259). Anticipating a little it might be added that his son Rājēndia-Chōla made endowments for enacting a drama called Rājarājēsvaru-nātaka by an expert in Sandikkūttu named Tnuvalan Tirumudukuman alias Vijayarājēndia-Āchāryaṇ. (S I I, II, 306-307). Rājādhirāja I made a similar endowment in favour of a certain actor and his troupe for their services in the temple of Mahalingēsvara at Tiruvīdaimarudūr. (M E R, 1907, No 264 of 1907). An inscription of Kulōttunga III (M E R 1907, No 306 of 1907) records the appointment of an additional dancing master in the temple who had to dance with gestures. Rājaiāja III attended the performance of agamārgam by Uṭavakkīnan Talaikkoli at Tiruvorriyūr. (M E R 1912, No. 211 of 1912).

Though we have anticipated a little here, the gifts made for the encouragement of theatre and dancing ranging from the reign of Rājaiāja I to Kulōttunga III—different it is doubtful if Indaladeviyar Kuntadeviyar is the same as Parāntakan Kundavaiyār. Mandaraganrava appears as the attribute of Pāndya king Rājasimha III surnamed Abhimānawēru. Perhaps Vallavasāyar Vandyadevar the uncle of Rājārāja was a native of the Kongu country seeing that mention is made of a Pallavaraiya nadu in an inscription (M.E.R. 1916 Appendix B No. 157 also Para 13) from the Kongu country.

This lady seems to have lived till at least the 5th year of Rājendra Chōla's reign (see above). A gift of hers made in his 3rd year but registered in his 5th year is to be seen at Kōnerirajapuram. This was made from Palaiyāru where she resided. Palaiyāru was one of the royal houses of Rājendra Chōla. Apparently Rājendra Chōla treated her with the respect and veneration due to her age and position. She is described as Ālvār Sṛī Parantakan Kundavai Pirattiyār (M.E.R. 1910 Para 20 M.E.R. 1900 Para 43 see also S.I.I. II 72 and 81). As all the Tanjore grants refer only to the gifts made by her before the 3rd year and as the gift above referred to speaks of her charities in the same year while the actual date of the record is his 5th regnal year it has been suggested that she must have died between the 3rd and 5th years of Rājendra Chōla I. An inscription at Uttaramallur of Rājendra-Chōla I dated in his 30th year registers a sale of land made tax free to the temple for making a flower garden and for feeding Śrīvaiṣṇavas in a matha called after the king's aunt Sṛī Kundavai Ālvār (M.E.R. 1923 Appendix C No 184 of 1923). She must have been dead many years ago at the date of this description. Kundavai Chatanrōdamangalam in Mulaiyūr nādu is mentioned in a lithic inscription at Tirumallam (M.E.R. for 1910 Para 20 Appendix No 106 of 1910). This village was included among those which had to supply a Brahmachārin to the Rajarajēsvara temple at Tanjore. (S.I.I. II 323)

of funds and the proceeds credited to the temple treasury

Rājarāja's religious toleration

In spite of his sincere and deep-seated devotion to the Saiva faith, he was tolerant enough towards other religions. He permitted a feudatory of his, Chintāmanī Varman of Kataka (Burma) to build a Buddhist shrine at Negapatam and granted the village of Ānaimangalam to it. This grant is registered on the large Leyden plates. This temple was begun by Chintāmanī Varman before the 21st regnal year of Rājarāja and completed only in the reign of his son and successor Rājendra-Chōla by Chintāmanī's son Māravijayōttunga Varman. In his order of the 24th year regarding revenue arrears, the villages of Sramanas (i e, Jainas) are also included. This shows that the latter enjoyed equal privileges with Brāhmanas and Vaikhānasas. That Vaishnavism was popular may also be inferred. An inscription of the 11th year of Rājarāja (995-6 A.D.) records the gift of lamp to the shrine of Anumadēva (i e, the god Hanuman in the ruined Vishnu temple at Triumalpuram M E R, 1906 Para 37, No 335 of 1906). This, as remarked by Mr V Venkayya, is important as it shows that the worship of Hanuman in South India dates from the 10th century at the latest (Ibid). Private gifts to Jainas were still common and Jainism appears to have flourished side by side with the other two religions. In the seventh year of Rājarāja's reign, we find one, Vīnasōlan, a subordinate of his, making a gift not only to Brāhmanas but also to a Jain temple (M E R 1915, Appendix B 116, E I IV 136). The Buddhist temple above referred to continued to be the object of pilgrimages to the end of the 15th century A.D. It was locally known as Puduveligōpūram (or Chinese Pagōda) and went out of repair about 1867 A.D., when it was pulled down by the Jesuit Fathers and utilized for the erection of a Christian building, the after pavaram in three cases (pp 69, 143 and 179) Of rājavarṭa (lapis lazuli), Monier Williams says, "it is a kind of diamond or other gem of an inferior quality, said to come from the country of Vṛātā and regarded as a lucky possession though not esteemed as an ornament" As regards rubies (mānikkam), the varieties are halahalam, halahalam of superior quality (halahalam gunaviyana), smooth rubies (kōmalam), bluish rubies (nīlagandhi), unpolished rubies (talam), and sattam, all of which are mentioned on p 79, paragraph 8. (S I. I I). They were also divided into big rubies (pariyana) and small rubies (neriyana) The flaws of rubies are recorded as cavities (kuruvu), cuts (prahara), holes (vejjam), white specks (lasuni), trasa and such as still adhered to the ore (harparru) As regards pottu, which was either a kind of gem or part of a jewel, it has to be noted that it always occurs either with palangu or palikkuvayiram (pp. 143, 163, 196, 205, 206, 207, 225, 226 and 237) Other gems taruppu (p 205), uppalanīlam evidently a variety of sapphire (p 204) and nāligangapadikkal (p 196) are also mentioned The name of the last is interesting as it appears to have been originally at least obtained from Gangapādi Dr. Hultzsch thinks it may be the same as beryl. As regards pearls, the following varieties were recognised,—round pearls (vattam), roundish pearls (anuvattam), polished pearls (oppumuttu), small pearls (kurumuttu), nīmbolam, payittam, old pearls (paramuttu), ambumudu, oruppuravan, irratat, sappattu, sakkattu, karadu, panichchay, tōl-teynduna and tōlidandana. Their properties were varai, karai, kuru, suppiram, ippiparru, aiāvina, svandanī, kulirnda-nī and tirangal, which are also mentioned The nine gems are referred to in the Tamil poem Silappadigaram where the virtues and flaws of each of them are also given Of diamonds, the author mentions four flaws, viz, kākāpūdam, halangam, vindu and īgai, while the commentator refers beyond dispute with those occurring in the dynastic lists. With the reign of Rājarāja comes a coinage of an entirely new type on the obverse a king standing and on the reverse, a king seated with the name Rāja Rāja in Nagari. The coinage issued was wholly of copper. This type spread with the extension of the Chōla power over a great portion of Southern India. Its use was established in Ceylon as a result of the Chōla occupation of the island and was continued by the independent Rajas of Kandy. Its influence is also noticeable on the earlier issues of the Nayaka princes of Madura and Tinnovely (Rapson Indian Coins 36 Brown Coins of India, 62-63).

After an eventful reign of 29 years, Rājarāja seems to have died in or about 1012-13 A.D. Though there is no inscription attesting to this fact there cannot be any doubt that it did occur about this date. The place of his death too is not definitely ascertained though it might well be presumed that he died in his favourite city of Tanjore which he took so much pains to beautify and render famous in history.

Rājarāja was succeeded on the throne by his son Rājendra Chōla about the year 1012-13 A.D., during his father's life time. He appears to have been co-ruler with his father during the last three years of the latter's rule. This seems to be the reason why no lithic inscription dated in 1st and 2nd years are met with the earliest records belonging to the 3rd year (M.E.R. 1918 Para 26). The last date so far verified for him is furnished by an inscription of his 32nd regnal year at Tirunāvāsuvaram (M.E.R. 1912, Appendix B No 217). His inscriptions have been found at such widely distant places as Cape Comorin in the South at Mahēndragiri on the East Coast, at Sitturu near Nanjangud in the Mysore State

Rājendra-
Chōla I Gangaikon din 1012-13
to 1015 A.D.

middle-class man took two meals a day, the daily consumption for each man would be $2\frac{1}{4}$ kurun of paddy per day. The parasol-carrier may be taken as the type of the lowest class of manual labourers and each of them got 40 kalam of paddy per year and this would yield $1\frac{1}{3}$ kurun of paddy for each day. We need not suppose that he was a full time workman of the temple. He would probably be earning extra wages during the time when his services were not required in the temple. It is worthy of note that chillies are not mentioned where they may naturally be expected and cocoanuts seem to have been unknown at least in the vicinity of Tanjore, if not in the Chōla country.

Village
Administration

The following portions of villages were communal and as such free from assessment —the village site, the village tank and its banks, the portion occupied by the artisans and the pariahs, the burning ground, the irrigation channels, temples, the shrines of Aiyān, Kādugal, Durgaiyār and Kālā-Pidāriyār, the temple of Sēttai (Jyēsthā), the shrines of the Pidāris Tiruvaludaiyal, Kuduraiyattam-udaiyal, Punnaitturainangai and Poduvagai-Ūrudaiyāl, ponds in the middle of fields, flower-gardens, streams, the portion occupied by toddy-drawers, the portion occupied by washermen, the water-pond used by pariahs, the portion occupied by the polluting castes, high roads, rivers, the sacred courts, (i e., temples), the cremation ground of the pariahs, the stone fence (for cattle), the stables (kottāgram), the village threshing floor, grazing ground for calves, wells and cisterns.

The Village
sabha and its committees

A large number of villages in the Chōla country had sabhas or regularly constituted village corporations which watched jealously over the internal affairs of the village. The Uttaramallūr inscriptions of Parāntaka I published

12th year (1023 A D) which is registered as Kolar 44 of his 16th year at Nogarla (Nanjangud 151) dated in 1067 A D of his 21st year (1032 A D) at Suttur above mentioned of his 23rd year (1034 A D) registered as Channapatna 82 of his 24th year at Tadimalingi near Tolhad dated in 1035 A D of his 27th year (1038 A D) registered as Nelamangala 7 and of his 31st year also at Tadimalingi dated in 1042 A D In several of these the many conquests made by him and the trophies acquired by him are described at great length (U E R 1912 Paras 98 78 and 1916 Para 83) In Nanjangud 134 of his 9th year (1021 A D) they are thus described —

Idaturai oad Vanarasi kollipake Manne the crow of the King of Ila (Ceylon) and the more beautiful crown of Itsaen also the crown of Sudora and the necklace of Iodra which the King of the South (Pandya) had given up to the King of Ila the whole of Ilamandala (Ceylon; the famous crown and the ruby necklace which were heirlooms worn by the Chēralas of Kēralas (Kings of Malabar) many ancient islands the superb crown of pure gold which Parasurama when he uprooted the race of kings twenty one times, had deposited in the inaccessible Chaudimato Island He moreover defeated Jayasinga (the Western Chūlukya king) who turned his back at Musangi or Muyangi and fled

To these achievements are added in Kolar 44 of (?) 1023 his 12th year —

The Irattapādi Seven and a half Lakh country (the Ratta territory in the Dekhan) great mountains filled with the nine treasures Sakkaragottam (Chakrakotta in Central India) Maduramandala (the Pandya territory of Madura) Namanaigakkonai Panjappalli and other places whose names are gone.

But the information is supplied in Channapatna 82 of 1034 his 23rd year and Nelamangala 7 of 1038 his own interests as well as those of its members. The village assemblies generally managed temples and were trustees of public charities. A number of village assemblies are said to have received money on interest from the Rājaiājēsvara temple at Tanjore. In all probability the money thus borrowed was utilised in bringing waste lands under cultivation. From the produce of these lands, the interest on the money borrowed was paid. The money itself was apparently never returned. Village assemblies could alienate lands whenever the liabilities incurred by them could not be otherwise discharged.

Limits on its powers of taxation

These village assemblies appear to have been invested with the power of taxation. This is inferable from many inscriptions, a few of which may be referred to here. From an inscription dated in 996 A D, in the 12th regnal year, we see a vyavastai (agent) issued which says that the assembly of a village should not levy any tax other than the siddhaya, dandaya and panchavara. They should not levy any sillai (or miscellaneous) taxes not mentioned in the rates already fixed (M E R 1918, Para 23). It would seem as though they could not levy tax which was not included in the royal schedule. In an inscription of his 9th year, the great assembly Uttiramērūr was convened to put an end to inequality in taxation. Though the inscription is incomplete, it may be inferred that resentment was felt at some partiality shown to some particular communities in the matter of taxation. Accordingly, the assembly enacted that the employees of the royal household, Brāhmans, Merchants, Vellālas (agriculturists) should individually be responsible for the payment of the fines imposed upon their respective classes (M E R 1923, Para 28, Appendix C No 197 of 1923). From another inscription, (Ibid No 379 of 1922), we get to know how from the 8th to the 10th years refer in full to all the conquests from Idaturai nāḍ to Kōṛala and those from the 10th year refer in addition to Kerala and to Jayasimha and to his retreat from Musangi. The standardized description is given in the inscriptions dated from the 10th year onwards to 31st year. One of the 23rd year is that registered as Channapatna 82 3 and it is typical of its class. After stating how the goddess of Fortune having become constant increased and how the goddess of the great Earth, the goddess of Victory in battle and the matchless goddess of Fame having become his great queens rejoiced the inscription records that Rājendra-Chōla, in his extended happy life time conquered with his great and warlike army —

Idaturai nāḍu Vanavāsi shut in by a fence of continuous forests kōlippakkai whose walls were surrounded by *sull*i trees Mannai kkaḍakkam of unapproachable strength the crown of the king of Ilam which was surrounded by the (impetuous sea) the exceedingly beautiful crown of his queen the beautiful crown and the necklace of Indra which the kings of the south (the Pāndyas) had previously surrendered to the king of Ilam the whole of the Ilam mandalam surrounded by the clear sea the crown praised by many and the garland of ruddy rays which were family treasures worn in succession by the warlike Kēṛalas many ancient islands securely guarded from time immemorial by the sea resounding with conchs the crown of pure gold, worthy of Lakshmi which Parasurāma who in anger extirpated kings twenty-one times in battle had deposited in the inaccessible Santuna island having considered it a secure place the renowned Irattapāḍi Seven and a Lakh (country) together with the immeasurable fame of Jayasimha, who out of fear and to his disgrace, turned his back at Mnyangi and hid himself the great mountains filled with the nine treasures Chakkaragōttam whose warriors were brave Madurai mandalam whose fortresses had cloud kissing banners Namanaiykonai which was surrounded by groves Paṇjappalli, whose warriors were armed with cruel bows Masani-dēsam, abounding in green paddy fields a large heap

to which evidently he had run away, without paying the tax, the right being attached and sold by the local sabha, the purchasers being the local temple of Mahāsasta. The purchase in this particular case was called ājñāyakrayam. This term has to be distinguished from Uṇṇilai and Chandēsvaravilai. The former was probably the price obtained at an auction where there was free bidding and the latter the price fixed and paid on valuation, Chandēsvara being the accountant-god of each temple.

Influence on Literature

The reign of a powerful king like Rājarāja could not have been without its effect on South Indian literature. The traditions about the life of the sixty-three devotees of Siva which were in later times embodied by the Tamil poet Sēkkirār in his Periyapurānam were already current at the time of which we are speaking. It was in the time of the Chōla king Anapāya that Sēkkirār is supposed to have compiled the Periyapurānam. The record at Tiruvarur and allied inscriptions from other places prove that this Anapāya could be no other than the Chōla king Kulōttunga-Chōla II (A D 1133 to at least A D 1148). The Saiva hymns of the Tiruppadiyam were sung in the temple by 48 musicians accompanied by two drummers. The king himself and one of his officers set up images of the most prominent of the Saiva devotees and presented valuable ornaments to them. Rājarāja and his officers would thus have created a Saiva revival even if it did not already exist. The great love entertained by Rājarāja for Saivism must have been eagerly imbibed by his son Rājendra-Chōla. The latter's spiritual teacher (guru) was Īsāna-Siva-Pandita, the Saivāchārya of the Tanjore temple. Inscription No 20 at Tanjore also mentions the Saivāchārya Saiva-Siva-Pandita and makes provision of paddy for him, his pupils and his pupils' pupils who were natives of Āryadēsa, Madhyadēsa and Gaudadēsa. In Tūlōchana Sivāchārya's is undoubtedly the old Rashtrakuta kingdom in the rule of the Chalukyas of Kalyāṇi. Muyangi or Musangi as it appears in certain inscriptions has been suggested to be Uebhangī by Dr Hultzsch and Mr Rice but is more probably Maski in the Nizām's Dominions where an Aśoka inscription has been found. Sakkaragōttom has been identified with Chakrakotta in Central India while Madurai mandalam stands for the Madura kingdom whose capital was Madura. Namanakkonai and Panjappalli probably represent places in the Madura kingdom which have not yet been identified. Masani-dēsam abounding in green paddy fields has probably to be identified with Masangudi on the Mysore Ootacamund Road 18 miles north west of Ootacamund and six miles from the foot of the Sigur Ghat. There are the remains of a mud fort here and the place and its neighbourhood was at one time of far greater importance than at present. Remains of many forts villages and cromlechs are to be seen round about it. The tract round the village was formerly highly cultivated but was devastated in the campaign of 1790-91 with Tipu. It was apparently the capital at one time of Wainād Bayalnad of ancient days, but is now a malarious jungle. (Gazetteer of Nilgiri District I 351 2). At the time of Rājendra Chōla it should have been part of Mysore, as it continued to be until the Mysore Treaty of 1799. The conquest of Masani-dēsam which is specially mentioned here, would mean a fresh invasion during Rājendra Chōla's time to extend his conquests due south of Mysore towards the Moyar river. Indira ratan of the ancient race of the moon is probably Indra Rāja of Ratnapur in the Central Provinces. In the 11th century the Chēdi country (corresponding to modern Central Provinces) was divided into the kingdoms of Western Chēdi, or Dahala with its capital at Tripura near Jabalpur and Eastern Chēdi or Māhakōsala with its capital at Ratnapur. The Chēdi Chidambaram Mount Mēru consists of gold and is supposed to be situated to the north of Jambudvīpa. The temple at Chidambaram seems to have been looked upon as the Southern Mēru, as it contained a large amount of gold on the roof of its golden hall. Thus, as is remarked by Mr Venkayya, the two names of the most important image in the Tanjore temple are traceable to the Tiruvisaippa. The names Eduttapādam, Maralaichchilambu and Nīlanipavaiakkunnu which occur as the names of the temple women in the Tanjore inscriptions (No 66) are also found in the Tiruvisaippa. A number of other names which occur in the former are also found in the latter. Mr Venkayya is inclined to think, therefore, that one or more of the authors of the Tiruvisaippa must have flourished during the reign of Rājarāja. Karuvūrdēvar who composed the hymns on the Rājaiājēsvara and Gangaikonda-Chōlēśvara temples must have lived after Rājarāja. Gandarāditya, another of the authors of the Tiruvisaippa, has been identified with Gandarāditya, second son of Parāntaka I. So little is known about this Gandarāditya that Mr Venkayya is tempted to question this identification. It is true that in the hymn in question Gandarāditya calls himself 'king of Kōli' and 'lord of Tanjai.' But perhaps this means nothing more than that he belonged to the Chōla royal family. A certain Madhurāntakan Gandarādittanai (M E R 1907, Part II, Para 37) figures in several of the early inscriptions of Rājarāja making enquiries about the management of Saiva temples, asking for their accounts and rectifying abuses. He was probably the son of Madhurāntakan Uttama-Chōla, the predecessor of Rājarājadēva. It is not altogether impossible that this Madhurāntakan Gandarādittanār was the author of the hymn in the Tiruvisaippa under reference. Another of the authors of the Tiruvisaippa is Nambi-Kāda-Nambi. A certain Nambi-Kāda-Nambi of the Atrēya-gōtra is century it seems to have been ruled over by the Chondra kings of Arakan (Smith F H I 116). This explains the description the land of unceasing drizzle. Finally, Uttara Ladava i.e. Northern Rādhā (not northern Lata in Gujar.) or northern Bengal which is described as being surrounded by the vast sea which abounded with pearls was taken. The conquests above described refer to different parts of Bengal. Between the 7th and 11th centuries A. D. Bengal was ruled over first by the Sura and next by the Pala dynasty. Ranasura referred to in the inscription of Rajendra Chōla as ruler of Southern Rādhā apparently belonged to it. The Sura dynasty was founded by Adisura who introduced into Bengal the first five Brahmanas and Kāyasthas to revive the orthodox faith which had been superseded by Buddhism. Ranasura one of his successors was evidently one of those kings dispossessed of his territories by Rajendra Chōla. (Hara prasad Sastri Mem. I S B III 1 10). Dharmapala ruler of Dandabhukti mentioned in the record of Rajendra Chōla must be a Dharmapala later than the Pala king Dharmapāla who ruled from about 800 to 832 A. D. Mahipāla of Samantata (see above) was apparently an ally of Ranasura and fought with him against Rājendra Chōla. He was the king who drove out the usurping Kambōjas and revived the Pala power in Bengal about 1026. He was the ninth king in the Pala line. He is known to have been ruling in 1026 A. D. having won back this kingdom about 978 or 980 A. D. He is said to have ruled 58 years which may be near the truth for we have epigraphic proof that it lasted at least 48 years (Sarnath Inscription I. A XIV 140). Mahipāla ruled over a large extent of country, which included parts of modern Assam which may be the land of unceasing drizzle. He is the best remembered of the Pala kings and his reign saw a revival of Buddhism in his kingdom. He sent teachers of that religion to Tibet where they valanādu and Uyyakkondāi-valanādu, Kshatriyasikhāmanī Pāndyakulasani, Kēralāntaka, Rājēndrasimha and Uyyakkondār we have the titles of Rājārāja. He appears to have also been known by the title of Parākrama-Chōla (M E R 1819, Para 12). He is described as "the great king of the Chōla country who was, as it were, the supporting pillar and the celestial tree of the Solar race, who was the sun in the sky, viz., of the Chōla family. (M E R. 1913, Para 20). Another of his surnames was Kōnērinnaiḥkondān.

His domestic
life, etc

Like Chālukya Vikramāditya VI, Rājārāja seems to have had a number of wives. Lōkamahādēvi—she is surnamed Dantisakti-Vitanki in the Tiruvalanjuri (No 633 of 1902) and the Tiruvaiyaru inscriptions (Annual Report on Epigraphy for 1895, Para 11), Chōlamahādēvi, Tirailōkyamahādēvi, Panchavanmahādēvi, Abhimānavalli, Ilādanādēviyār (Lātamahādēvi) and Prithivimahādēvi are known from the Tanjore inscriptions. From a record at Tirukkalittattai (No 301 of 1908) we learn that Vemban Sūdaiyār alias Mīnavan Mahādēviyāi was another queen of Rājārāja. Prithivimahādēvi (in Tamil, Prithimādēviyāi) is called by her other name Nakkan Arumōi in the inscription from Uyyakkondān Tirumalai (No 455 of 1908). Each of them set up a number of images in the Rājārājēsvara temple and made gifts to them. Lōkamahādēvi was probably the chief queen. She built the shrine called Uttara-Kailāsa in the Panchanadēsvara temple at Tiruvaiyāru near Tanjore and made many valuable gifts to it. The shrine was in existence already in the 21st year of the king's reign and was then called Lōkamahādēvisvara after the queen. Besides the above, a few other queens are also known from other inscriptions. His senior queen (Mūla dēviyār) was Idangon Pichche, who is referred to as having made a gift of land in an inscription dated in the 27th year of who was the first to annex Pāndi nādu to his dominions. Another Chola Pāndya viceroy in the Pandya country was Maravarman Vikrama Chōla Pandyaadēva. It has been suggested that he was the successor of Jatavarman Sundara Chōla Pandya though what relation he bore to the latter is not known (M E R 1910 Para 20). He may be the Prince Chōla Keralaadēva mentioned in certain inscriptions found at Tirukoilūr S Arcot District. (M E R 1900 Para 21 Nos 126 and 127 of 1900). The province of Kongu was known in ancient times as Chola Kerala mandalam or the province of (prince) Chōla Kerala (S I I III 44). The Manimangalam inscription of Parakesarivarman alias Rājendra Chola mentions as his son a certain Chōla Kerala among the recipients of kingdoms from him. Accordingly there is ground for identifying the Chōla Kerala of the Manimangalam inscriptions with the Chōla Keralaadēva of the Tirukoilur inscriptions (M E R 1900 Para 21). He may be the Chōla Pāndya who was put in charge of the conquered Kerala country being called Pandya because he ruled over part of the Pāndya country on the Kerala side. Unquestionable evidence of the conquest of the present Tinnevely District and the part of Travancore State contiguous with it as far as Cape Comorin is offered by many inscriptions. One of these is of 18th year of Rājendra Chōla I and another of Kulōttunga Chōla I whose regnal year is lost (M E R 1894 Nos. 157 and 145). A half ruined temple close to Cape Comorin has on it inscriptions of Rājendra Chōla I. Its ancient name was Rājarājēsvaram after Rājarāja I his father (M E R 1896 Appendix B Nos 92 to 104).

The conquest of Ceylon is referred to as one of the chief events of Rājendra Chōla's reign. Apparently it accomplished what was left undone by his father or put down an assertion of independence on the part of the island

Conquest of Ceylon

Only one son and one daughter of the king are known, viz., Rājēndra-Chōla I, whose accession took place one year before the death of Rājarāja, and Kundava or Kundavai, who married the Eastern Chālukya king Vimalāditya. The Tiruvalanjuri inscription quoted above, also mentions a "middle daughter" named Mādēvadīgāl. Evidently Kundavai was the youngest of Rājarāja's children. She is mentioned in an inscription at Chidambaram, which records the fact that Rājēndra-Chōla put up at that temple a stone which he had received from the king of Kamboja (M E R 1888, Table II, No 119, see also E I V 105). The respect which Rājarāja showed to his elder sister Kundavai throws an indirect light on his domestic life. She is spoken as "the venerable elder sister." In the sentence which the king himself is said to have uttered when ordering all the grants made to the temple to be engraved on stone, the place assigned to his elder sister is next to himself and the queens are mentioned after her. During Rājarāja's reign, the walls of the central shrine seem to have been reserved for registering the king's grants. The gifts made by the queens and the officers of State had to be recorded on the niches and pillars of the enclosure. But Kundavai's gifts were invariably engraved on the central shrine. Whether she is the same as Queen Indaladēviyār described as the wife of Udayār Vallavarasan Vandyadēva mentioned in inscriptions of Rājēndra-Chōla I from Brahmadēsam is a moot point. In an inscription of the 5th year of Rājēndra-Chōla I, Indala-dēviyār is called Mandara-gaṇavānar Kuntadeviyār (wife of) Udayai Vallavaraiyai Vandyadēvar, chief of the Sāmantas (feudatories). The Tanjore inscriptions of Rājēndra-Chōla I also mention Vallavaraiyar Vandyadēvar as the husband of Kundavaiyāi, the elder sister of Rājarāja. But here she is always called Parāntakan Kundavaiyāi. The descriptions being is a palpable exaggeration for he long survived this war and indeed describes himself as a lion to the elephant Rajendra Chōla. (E C VII Bhikarpur 125) Apart from this verbal overstatement which may be taken to refer to the reverses sustained by Jayasimha's forces rather than by Jayasimha himself we have a graphic description of the fight. The forces we are told of Choleudrasimha and Jayasimha fought an intensive battle each side kindling the anger of the other wherein the fire generated by the tusks of huge infuriated elephants dashing against each other burnt all the banners. Jayasimha in order to escape from the fire of the terrible valour of Rājendra Chōla, took we are informed to his heels with fear, abandoning all his family riches and reputation. The rest of the enemy's forces, out of fear quickly sought refuge in forests and mountain caves as did also the dust raised by Rajendra's pursuing army. The pursuit should accordingly have been close and hot. Jayasimha's army, hemmed in on all sides by the continuous downpour of arrows, and beleaguered by the heroes of Rājendra's army was completely destroyed just as a range of clouds tossed about by the force of furious winds. The events referred to in this campaign are presumably different from those relating to the campaign of 1007-8 A.D. which was conducted during Rājārāja's reign. The campaign of Rājendra's was perhaps only partially successful though the damage done by his forces was great. It appears to have been fought in the spirit evidenced by the Hottur inscription (see above under Western Chalukyas) in which we have evidence of the lapse from the standard of conduct set down by Manu in regard to warfare. Rājendra's success, if it was really attended by success was wholly a temporary one, for we have simple proof in the shape of lithic inscriptions of the hold of Jayasimha II over his dominions in Nolambavādi and adjacent provinces. Equally exaggerated

Rājarāja's
metallio likeness in the Tanjore
temple

There is a metallic image of Rājarāja in the Tanjore temple. It is nearly 2½ feet high from the pedestal with the label Rāja-rajendra-Sōlarāja of the big temple engraved in the modern Tamil alphabet on the pedestal. The king is represented as a devotee standing before the god with both his palms joined together in worshipping pose. Though it is undoubtedly a work of much later date than that to which Rājarāja belonged, it may be taken to portray fairly faithfully. He is bejewelled and wears the crown. In other respects he is dressed in the fashion characteristic of the times. The barer portion of his body shows him to have been a practised athlete, a conception of him which is not belied by the energetic nature of his rule. The artist, whoever he was, has brought out in the expression of his face a serenity and composure that is impressive to a degree. The half-shut eye-lids, the joined palms, the motionless erect posture, all combine in conveying the religious equanimity that Rājarāja had reached in his last days, when his own object was to make the temple he caused to be built not only great in the corporeal but also in the spiritual sense. (See M.E.R. 1925, Para 12 and Plate facing page 81, see also Appendix C No 852)

His coinage

Chōla coinage changes, in characteristic fashion, in the reign of Rājarāja. Before his time, the earliest type, say before 985 A.D., seems to have been in gold and silver pieces, portraying a tiger seated under a canopy along with the Pāndya fish. The legends are indistinct and unreadable. Later, say before 1022 A.D., they indicate that the Chōla power was already becoming supreme. They bear the Chōla emblem, the tiger, in the centre with the Pāndya and Chēra emblems (fish and bow) on either side of it. The coin-legends, in Sānskrit characters, give the names or titles of the Chōla sovereigns, but they have not, as yet, been identified defeat of his campaign that we find in 1012 A.D. the last year of Jayasinha II, the local Chōla chiefs connected with Irangola Dōva ruling as feudatories under him in the north of the present Siru Taluk (E C VII Siru, 40 37 and 25)

After his campaign against the Western Chālukyas Rājendra Chōla is said to have returned to his capital. He next prepared for a campaign against the kings ruling over the country bordering on the Ganges. What prompted him to prepare for this war—absolutely unprovoked—and how he fared in it are set out at length in the Tiruvāṅgādu plates (verses 100 to 119) which deserve to be quoted here —

Campaign against kings on the Ganges border

This light of the Solar race (i.e. Rājendra Chōla) laughing at Bhagīratha who had brought down the Ganga (to the earth from heaven) by the power of (his) austerities, wished to sanctify his own country with the waters of the Ganga (i.e. the river Ganges) carried thither through the strength of (his) arm. Accordingly (he) ordered the commander of the army who had powerful battalions (under his control) who was the resort of heroism (and) the foremost of diplomats—to subdue the enemy kings occupying (the country on) the banks of that (river). Before him as from the slopes of the Himālayas, marched a very large army like the tremendous volume of the waters of the Ganga with wavy rows of moving horses, causing all the quarters to resound with its confused clamour. The van of his army crossed the rivers by way of bridges formed by herds of elephants. The rest of the army (crossed the same) on foot (because) the waters in the meantime had dried up being used by elephants, horses and men. The soldiers of Vikrama Chōla (i.e. Rājendra Chōla, one of whose titles was Vikrama Chōla) having reached the points of the compass (first) by the dust raised by crowds of elephants horses and foot-men quickly entered (next) the country of hostile kings. The general of the ornament of the Solar race first conquered Indraratha (and) captured the country of that jewel of the Lunar race who met strength of his arm Rājendra Chōla ordered his commander to subdue the kings occupying the banks of that river. The first king conquered was Indira irattan of the Luner race next Rānasura and then Dharmopāla. The general of the Chōla army then reached the Gange secured the most sacred water of that river and carried it to his master Rājendra after having defeated Mohipāla on the way. Meantime Rājendra had himself reached the Godāvari to meet his able general who had just brought the water of the Ganges. The meeting point was on the banks of the Godāvari, apparently somewhere near modern Rājahmundry for the sacredness of the water of the Ganges is enhanced by its being mixed up with that of the Godāvari before being used. The mixing up of the two sacred waters is still carried out by every devout pilgrim on the banks of the Godavari either at Nasik or at Rājahmundry whichever is found the more convenient spot for the purpose. Apparently Rājendra Chōla carried out this traditional duty on the East Coast, possibly somewhere near Rājahmundry.

Some points worthy of note in connection with this bringing of the water of the Ganges to his own country by Rājendra Chōla may be incidentally touched upon. It will be seen that the Chōla general got the vanquished kings on the banks of the Ganges to carry the water on their heads. Mr Venkayya has suggested that this humiliation of subjugated chiefs might have been an attempt at emulation of the incident mentioned in the well known Tamil classical poem Silappadikāram (Saminathaiyer's Edn. Introduction 58) according to which two princes of the north defeated by the Chēra king Seuguttuvan were made to carry stones (to the Chēra capital) for carving images of the deified heroic Pattin (M E R 1906 Para 18). However this might have been, there is hardly any doubt that such

Authenticity
of this event.

dated in his 31st year and Saka 954, cyclic year Āṅgīrasa (E I I 208, No 164), Nandagudi near Hadināru, Mysore State, dated in Saka 943, cyclic year Raudra (E C 204, No 134), and at Polannāruwa in Ceylon. This shows the extent of his conquests and his dominion. There are numerous lithic inscriptions of his in Southern India, while a copper-plate inscription of his dated in his 18th regnal year, from Tnukkalūr, is also known. (M E R 1903, Para 17). He ruled till about 1045 A D. He proved himself equally successful as a warrior and as an administrator. In the early part of his life, he took part in the campaigns of his father, and seems to have led even independent expeditions. That he did take part in Rājārāja's war against the Western Chālukyas is proved by a record found at Ūttattūr, Trichy District (M E R 1913, Appendix B. Nos 515). One of his heroic soldiers, who was a native of Ūttattūr, fell in the war while piercing at close quarters the elephant of Satyāśraya Irivabedanga, the Western Chālukya king. This must have occurred on the occasion referred to in the Hottūr inscriptions dated in A D 1007-1008. The gift mentioned in the Ūttattūr record was registered in the 3rd year (1013-1014 A D) of Rājēndra-Chōla I. It is probable that the gift on behalf of the dead hero was actually registered five or six years after the event took place (M E R 1913, Para 22).

His conquests The many inscriptions relating to his period describe his conquests and of these, several have been found in the Mysore State, ranging from his 6th to his 31st regnal year. Among these, a few may be mentioned here. An inscription dated in his 6th year, or A D 1017 has been found at Talkād, of his 9th year dated in Saka 943 (A D 1021) is at Nilatur, Siṁivaspuṭi Taluk, and another of the same year registered as Nanjangud 134, dated in 1021 A D, of his 10th year at Talkād, of his strength of his arm Rājendra Chōla ordered his commander to subdue the kings occupying the banks of that river. The first king conquered was Indira irattan of the Lunor race next Ranasura and then Dharmapāla. The general of the Chōla army then reached the Gongo secured the most sacred water of that river and carried it to his master Rājendra after having defeated Mohipāla on the way. Meantime Rājendra had himself reached the Godāvari to meet his able general who had just brought the water of the Ganges. The meeting point was on the banks of the Godāvari apparently somewhere near modern Rājahmundry for the sacredness of the water of the Ganges is enhanced by its being mixed up with that of the Godāvari before being used. The mixing up of the two sacred waters is still carried out by every devout pilgrim on the banks of the Godāvari either at Nasik or at Rājahmundry whichever is found the more convenient spot for the purpose. Apparently Rājendra Chōla carried out this traditional duty on the East Coast possibly somewhere near Rājahmundry.

Some points worthy of note in connection with this bringing of the water of the Ganges to his own country by Rājendra Chōla may be incidentally touched upon. It will be seen that the Chōla general got the vanquished kings on the banks of the Ganges to carry the water on their heads. Mr Venkayya has suggested that this humiliation of subjugated chiefs might have been an attempt at emulation of the incident mentioned in the well known Tamil classical poem Silappadikāram (Saminathaswami's Edn. Introduction 58) according to which two princes of the north defeated by the Chōra king Senguttuvan were made to carry stones (to the Chōra capital) for carving images of the deified heroic Pattini. (M E R 1900 Para 18). However this might have been there is hardly any doubt that such

Authenticity
of this event.

27th year. The above list of conquests is there extended as follows —

He took Masuni-dēsam, defeated Induāvnatan of the Lunai race in a great battle at Adinagaravai, capturing his relations and family treasures, Öttavishaiyam (Oissa), Kōsalai-nād (in Central Provinces) Tandabutti (Dandabhukti), after destroying Danmapāla (its king Dhāmapāla) in a fierce battle, Dakkana-Lādam (Southern Lāta), after a vigorous attack on Iranasūram, Vangāla-dēsam (Bengal) from which Gōvindasandan (Gōvindaachandya), dismounting from his horse, fled, terrified Mayipala of Sangottai in battle, capturing his elephants, women and treasures, and took Uttua-Lādam (Northern Lāta), and even Gangai (the Ganges) He also sent many ships over the billowy ocean and captured Sangnāma-Visaiyōttungapanman (Changirāma-Vijayōttungavarma), the king of Kidāram (near Prome in Burma), seizing his fine elephants and the jewelled archway of his fort and palace gates, gained Siivaiyam, Pannai, Malayūi, Mayirudingam, Ilangasobam, Mā-Pappalam (in the Andaman Islands), Mēvilipangam, Valarppandar, Kulaittakolam, Mādāmalingam, Ilāmuni-dēsam, Mā-Nakkavaiam (the Nicobar Islands), and Kidāram (in Burma)

A good many of these names of persons and places are not yet satisfactorily identified, but the enumeration suffices to show the wide range of Rājēndia-Chōla's victorious expeditions. His son boasts (Nelamangala 25) that his father had conquered from Gangai (i.e., the Ganga) in the north to Ilangai (Ceylon) in the south, and from Mahodai (Cochin) in the west to Kidāram (Burma) in the east. In his later lithic inscriptions, dating from his 11th to his 31st regnal years, Rājēndia-Chōla's conquests are set out in an uniformly lengthy style. They include mention of all countries and places from Iditarai-nād to Kidāram. Leaving aside the part relating to Kidāram, which will be found referred to above separately, the part relating to the earlier conquests may be considered here. Of the 12 inscriptions dated in gone to the Chōla capital as mentioned in the Tiruvālan-gadu plates. He writes —

"The Tiruvālan-gadu plates tell us that the Chōla king Rājendra Chōla I conquered the kings on the banks of the Ganges and got them to carry the water of the sacred river to his own capital where he is said to have set up a pillar of victory consisting, as it were, of the water of the Ganges (M. F. R. 190, 00 Part II paragraph 18). It is difficult to imagine a pillar of victory consisting of the water of the Ganges. But perhaps a tank or well was dug in which the water brought from the Ganges was poured. As a matter of fact there is a well within the big temple at Gangaikondacholapuram into which the water of the Ganges is supposed to have once flowed (Gazetteer of the Trichinopoly district p. 348). Was the boast of Rājendra Chōla that he got the kings on the banks of the Ganges to carry the water of the sacred river to his capital true? In this case a Gahadavāla king, or one of his relations must have actually gone to the Chōla capital which was subsequently called Gangaikondacholapuram. Is it likely that the acquaintance of the Gahadavāla kings with the Chōlas thus commenced was kept up even in later times? Have we to suppose that either Mandanapāla or Gōvīndachandra, one of whose ancestors might have accompanied the Chōlas, wished to make a grant to the temple at Gangaikondacholapuram though he need not actually have gone there?

The Gahadavāla kings of Kanauj were worshippers of the Sun and strangely enough Kulōttunga I appears to have built a shrine of Sūrya in his own dominions. The temple at Sūriyanārkoṭi is perhaps the only one in the Tamil country where the Sun god is regularly worshipped as the principal deity of a temple. The central shrine faces the west and is dedicated to the Sun and near it is an image of the god Viśveśvara with his consort Viśālākṣhī. Bṛhaspati is given a place in front of the central shrine. The garbhagriha and the mukhamandapa of the temple are built of stone. The shrines of the remaining seven of the navagrahas viz., Rāhu, Sukra, Ketu, Chandra, Angāraka, Budha and Sanī are constructed of bricks around the central building. Two inscriptions of Kulōttunga I are engraved on the base of the mukhamandapa. Both are built in. The temple is called in one of

of family treasures, along with many other treasures, after having captured together with his relations Indira-iratan of the ancient race of the moon, in a battle which raged at Ādinagaravai of unceasing great fame, Öttavishayam, surrounded by dense (?) bamboo thickets, which it was difficult to approach, the fine Kosalanādu, where Brāhmans were collected together, Tandabutti whose gardens abounded with bees, after having destroyed Dharmapāla in a hot battle, (Dakṣiṇa Lādāṃ whose fame spread in all districts), after having fiercely attacked Ianasuṇṇa, Vangāla dēsam of unceasing drizzle (from which Gōvīndasandan, dismounting from his horse, fled), elephants of great strength, women and treasures, after having been pleased to fight in a hot battle-field Mayipala of (?) Sangottal, who wore the warrior's ankle-rings, Uttma-Lādāṃ, surrounded by the vast sea which abounded with pearls, the wave-throwing Gangai, whose sacred waters were full of fragrant flowers "

The identification of many of the places and persons mentioned in the above description is not free from doubt or difficulty. Idaturai-nādu has been, for instance, identified by Mr Rice with Yedatore-nād in the north of Mysore District, but Sir John Fleet has suggested that it stands for the Raichore Doab. Vanavāsī is, of course, Banavāsī in the present Shimoga District. Kollippākkai is, according to Mr Rice, Kolpuk in the present Nizām's Dominions. Mannakkadakam is, according to Mr Rice, Manne in the Nelamangala Taluk of Bangalore District, which was the Ganga royal residence. But others have identified it with Manyakhēta, the former capital of the Rāshtrakūtas, which had later passed into the hands of the Western Chālukyas. This identification seems correct, for in the Kanyākumārī inscription, the name actually appears as Manyakhēta. Rājēndia-Chōla is said to have made it "a sporting ground for his army." Īlam and Īla-mandalam refer to Ceylon, while the island of Santimat has not yet been identified. It should be some island on the West Coast. Irattapādi 7½ Lakh country brought into existence by Rājendra Chōla as a memorial 'pillar of victory' which he obtained over the kings of his time, especially those on the banks of the Ganges and consecrated under his orders by the sacred water brought from the Ganges which apparently was poured into the tank thus symbolically converting the water of the tank into Ganges water. In place of the usual pillar of victory—a monolith—set up by previous kings to commemorate their conquests, Rājendra Chōla hit upon perpetuating his own victory by excavating a useful irrigation tank whose water he in orthodox fashion the great religious devotee that he was got consecrated by the water obtained from the Ganges.

A lithic record found at Ennāyiram alias Rājarāja Chaturvēdimangalam describes the stately march home of Rājendra-Chōla with all the splendour of a conqueror of his wedding, the Ganga and hence assuming the title of Gangaikonda Chōla and building a Hall called Ganguikondan mandapa after that title and feeding a number of people in it. It has been suggested (see M.E.R. 1918 Para 28) that this record indicates that Rājendra Chōla led the expedition to the Ganges borders and not his general as stated in the Tiruvālangadu plates. This, however, is untenable in view of the definite information furnished by the Tiruvālangadu plates and the Kanyakumārī lithic inscription that the conquest of the chiefs of the north was effected by Rājendra's generals and not by himself. The return home referred to in the Ennāyiram record occurred apparently after the king's conquest of the Oriya country which he accomplished after meeting on the banks of the Godāvarī the generals marching back from their expedition to the Ganges border (see below). The Tiruvālangādū plates (verse 122) definitely mention the return home of Rājendra after the conquest of the Oriya country and in the face of

Celebration of the
conquest of the Ganges chiefs

kings were the representatives of the Kalachuris. The kings of Chēdi had relations with the kings of Jejaka-bhukti ruling over the country between the Jumna and the Narmada, now represented by Bundelkhand (See Smith, EHI 105) Ādinagavai (or Ādinagavai as in Kolar 44 dated probably in 1023 A.D.) which is described as "of increasing great fame," represents, perhaps, modern Nagpur in the Central Provinces. Ōttavishaya "surrounded by dense bamboo thickets which it was difficult to approach," is undoubtedly Ōdda-vishaya, in modern Orissa. The "fine Kosalai-nādu, where Brāhmins were collected together," has to be identified with Mahākōsala or the Eastern Chēdi country, or Dakshina Kōsala country, now represented by the country south of Cuttack. Tanda-butti (or Dandabhukti), "whose gardens abounded with bees" has not so far been identified but is probably the name of a part of Bengal, much like the name Jejaka-bhukti. This place, we are told, was taken after the defeat of Dharmapāla, its king, in a fierce battle. Next it is stated, that Dakkana-Lādam, or Dakshina Rādhā, or Southern Rādhā (now represented by the Burdwan Division of Bengal and not Southern Lāta in Gujarāt as was once supposed) was taken after a fierce attack on Iranasūrian, or Ranasūra. Also, when Vangāla-dēsam, of unceasing drizzle, was taken, its king Gōvindasandan, i.e., Gōvindachandian having dismounted from his horse and fled from the battle-field. Similarly, Mahīpāla was frightened in a hot battle at (?) Sangattol and his elephants, women and treasure were captured. Sangattol seems to be a misreading for Samantata which, we know, was the kingdom that was ruled over by Mahīpāla. The kingdom of Samantata had for its capital Karumanta, modern Kamta, 12 miles west of Comala town. The kingdom appears to have included in the 11th century the districts of Tipperah, Noakhali, Barisal, Faridpur and the eastern half of Dacca District. In the 10th

the birthday of Śrī Kṛṣṇa each of those who read the Vēda was presented with a gold ring and a gold flower. Merchants were to supply the hostel with the required rice and the Village Supervision Committee (Āvāṛiyam) was to provide it with the necessary firewood. Local traders both Brahman and other who had their shops in the southern bazaar of Ennayiram were to supply sugar and the other things required in place of the interest due on the amounts invested with them. It is clear from the Ennayiram records (M E R 1918 Nos. 333 335 and 343) that the occasion of the celebration of the conquest of the Gangas valley kings was attended with not merely regal pomp but also with the foundation of a useful educational institution which was apparently a residential university teaching almost every branch of the Vēda Vēdānta and the Vyākaraṇa. The reference to the study of the Rūpāvatāra the well known comment ary on Pāṇini at this institution is worth noting. It is the work of the far famed Buddhist writer Dharmakīrti to which this is, perhaps the first reference we have in a lithic inscription in Southern India. For a work which had become so famous as a text book for study about the first quarter of the 11th century A D it should have been already old and well recognized as an authority on the subject of grammar. Accordingly Dharmakīrti's work may have to be set down to about the beginning of the 10th century A D at the latest and not to the 12th century A D as suggested by the late Professor M. Rangācharya. (See Rūpāvatāra Madras Edition Sāṅkṛit Introduction)

At this point a problem of some interest closely connected with the title of Gangakondān might be considered. Hitherto there has been some difference of opinion as to the origin of the title of Gangakondān as applied to Rājendra Chōla. The suggestion of Mr. Rice

Origin of the title of Gangakondān "or 'C pitar of Ganga.'" founded Tibetan Buddhism, Rājendra-Chōla attacked him and defeated him, but the defeat could not have left any permanent mark on his kingdom. For his successor Nāyapāla and his son Viśāhapāla II and his sons and their successors seem to have continued to rule, despite a revolution, to about 1130 A D (Smith E. H. I 415-16).

Order in which the conquests
were effected

In the Tuvālāngādu plates, which record a grant of this king, in his sixth regnal year, the order in which the above conquests were effected by him is definitely indicated. Backed up by a powerful army, we are told, he turned his attention to the conquest of the four different quarters (digvijaya).

War against Pāndyan king

First, with the object of conquering the Pāndyan king, he turned his attention to the south. It is to be presumed from this statement that the conquest effected by Rājarāja had not proved effective. Rājendra's commander (dandanātha) so decisively defeated the Pāndyan king that he took to flight and sought refuge in the Malaya Hill. After taking many a lustious pearl belonging to this king, Rājendra, placed his own son, here called Chōla-Pāndya, who could not, however, be identified with any of his three sons, in charge of the conquered country and turned westward.

An inscription dated in the 10th year of Rājendra-Chōla furnishes the information that he constructed at Madura a huge palace "by whose weight even the earth became unsteady" and anointed his son Chōla-Pāndya as the viceroy of the Pāndyan kingdom (M. E. R. 1918, Para 26). According to certain inscriptions found in the Tinnevely and Madura districts, the Chōla-Pāndya prince was entitled Jatāvarman Sundara-Chōla-Pāndya. The part of the Pāndyan country he seems to have ruled over possibly consisted of two provinces. One was called Rājarāja-Pāndinādu, so named after Rājarāja the Great, Srinivasapur 17 Chintunani 47 etc) Where a Ganga king is referred to the term used is Ganga and not Gange or Ganges (cf Nannayn Ganga Prithivi Ganga Ere Ganga Kacheheya Ganga Ganga Gangorn Guttaya Ganga Rakkasa Ganga etc) As Rajendra Chola actually sent invasions against the kings of the Ganges border and won victories over them the phrase Gange kondan (cf Madirukondan Tanjajumkonda Ilam kondan etc) seems not inappropriate. The title is better justified in the case of the conquests effected in his own reign rather than in that of his father Rajaraja during which time the Ganga kingdom was overturned. The title further is more expressive of the capture of a person (king or kings) rather than the conquest of a kingdom.

Since the older identifications of Idaturai nādu with Yedatore in the Mysore District and Manne in the Bangalore District have thus to be given up the conquest of Gangapādi and Nulambapādi should have been accomplished by Rajendra Chola as a general under his father during the latter's reign. As these conquests are mentioned in an inscription dated in the 8th year of Rajaraja they should be set down to some time anterior to that year i.e. 902 A.D. (SI I II v 3 fn 1). A representation of the conquest seems to be portrayed in the panels of figure-sculpture to be seen in the Arkāvāra temple at Hale Alur in the Mysore District (see Chapter V above). Yedatore 31 (EC IV) which is not dated refers to a war in which 'all the Ganga line were thrust out and rendered powerless'. It may be taken to refer to this first campaign against Gangapādi by Rājendra Chōla. The only other wars that Rājendra Chōla carried out during his own reign in or about Mysore was the conquest of the country called Masinidesam identified with Masinikōvil or Masinugudi, south of the Mysore

Conquest of Gangapādi
and Nulambapādi.

king and his people. Rājēndra is said to have taken the crown of the king and the more beautiful crown of his queen as also the crowns of Sundara and the necklace of India, which had been taken by the Ceylon king from his Pāndyan neighbour. An inscription dated in the 5th year of Rājēndra (437 of 1907) shows that this conquest should have been effected in A.D. 1015-16. (M E R. 1908, Para 55) The Siva temple at Polan-nāruva in Ceylon has a fragmentary inscription of the time of Rājēndra-Chōla which shows his conquest and possession of the place.

War against
the Kērala king

For the first time in its history, Kērala, which was impregnable and unconquered, was entirely annihilated. Apparently, Rājēndra was here confronted by a combination of kings and a bloody battle ensued, which ended in ruin to several kings. Rājēndra next returned to his capital and started afresh for the conquest of the north, after having committed the conquered Kērala country to his son Chōla-Pāndya. Whether this was the same Chōla-Pāndya referred to above as having been put in charge of the Pāndyan country is not quite clear.

War against Western Chālukya
king Jayasimha II

Rājēndra-Chōla entered Kāंची in his march against Jayasimha II (Jagadēkamalla), the Western Chālukya king. Though Rājēndra-Chōla is said to have started to conquer Jayasimha II "alone," i.e., by his own personal exertions and is described in these plates as "the very god of Death (Kāla) to the Taila (the Western Chālukya) family," he had undoubtedly the help of his general in the war he carried on against Jayasimha. The war was apparently a hard fought one. The slaughter apparently was so great that it caused much grief to the ladies of Jayasimha's realm. Evidently several of the adherents of the Chālukyan king fell in it, though the statement that Rājēndra's fierce general "cut to pieces" Jayasimha Srinivasapur 17 Chintamani 47 etc.) Where a Ganga king is referred to the term used is Ganga and not Gango or Gangai (cf Nanniya Ganga Prithivi Ganga Ere Ganga Kachcheya Gonga Ganga Gangeva Guttiya Gonga Rakkasa Ganga etc.) As Rajendra Chōla actually sent invasions against the kings of the Ganges border and won victories over them the phrase Gonga kondan (cf Madirakondān Tonjai ynmkondo Ilam kondān etc.) seems not inappropriate. The title is better justified in the case of the conquests effected in his own reign rather than in that of his father Rajarāja during which time the Ganga kingdom was overturned. The title further is more expressive of the capture of a person (king or kings) rather than the conquest of a kingdom.

Since the older identifications of Idaturai nādu with Yedatore in the Mysore District and Manne in the Bangalore District, have thus to be given up, the conquest of Gangapādi and Nulambapādi should have been accomplished by Rajendra Chōla as a general under his father during the latter's reign. As these conquests are mentioned in an inscription dated in the 8th year of Rajarāja they should be set down to some time anterior to that year i.e. 992 A.D. (S.I.I II v 3 fn 1). A representation of the conquest seems to be portrayed in the panels of figure-sculpture to be seen in the Arkesvara temple at Hale Alur in the Mysore District. (See Chapter V above). Yedatore 31 (E.O. IV) which is not dated refers to a war in which all the Ganga line were thrust out and rendered powerless. It may be taken to refer to this first campaign against Gangapādi by Rājendra Chōla. The only other wars that Rājendra-Chōla carried out during his own reign in or about Mysore was the conquest of the country called Masinidēsam identified with Masinikōvil or Mesinagudi south of the Mysore

Conquest
Gangapādi
and Nulambapādi

seems the statement in a Chōla inscription dated in 1021 A D , that Jayasimha II turned his back at Musangi (probably Uchchangi) and the boast made in another dated in 1026 A D , that Rājēndra took Irattapādi (i e., the Western Chālukya kingdom, which formerly formed the Rāshtrakūta kingdom), for we find from inscriptions actually found in the disputed territories that Chālukya rule was firmly established in it during the period (see above Western Chālukyas). The Kanyākumārī inscription of Vīra-Rājēndra referring to this campaign of Rājēndra-Chōla terms Jayasimha, the Kuntala king, i e., king of the Kuntala country, Kuntala being the country between the Vēdāvati and the Bhīma, formerly the territory ruled over by the Kadambas. It also furnishes us the additional information that Rājēndra made Manyakhēta, a Chālukya stronghold and former capital of the Rāshtrakūtas, a camping and sporting ground for his army (E.I XVIII. 53, T A S III 1 156. Verse 70)

Date of war
against Jayasimha II,
1018 A D

This campaign should be set down to about the year 1018 A D , the first year of Jayasimha and the 6th year of Rājēndra Chōla, the year of the Tuvālangādu plates. As the plates mention Jayasimha by name, any earlier date seems altogether out of the question. The cause of the war is not clear from the available inscriptions. It might, however, be surmised that it was due to the extension of Western Chālukya rule over Nolambavādi, which is testified to by the discovery of his inscriptions found at Bāgali, Kurugodu and other places. These show that the Chālukyas did not accept their defeat at the hands of Rājajāja in 1007-8 A D , but reasserted their power, which became firmly established in about 1018 A D , as the result of Rājēndra's campaign (Ibid). This re-assertion of their rule over Nolambavādi must have occasioned the renewed attempt made against them by Rājēndra-Chōla. So complete appears to have been the

the general set up a pillar of victory on Mahēndragiri (M.E.R. 1897 No. 397 I.S.I. 1911 1912, 171) Mr H. Krishna Sastri has suggested that Kuluta mentioned above has probably to be identified with the country of the same name referred to in the Bṛhatsamhita as lying in the north eastern division of India. (S.I.I. III 388 fn 6 quoting I.I. XII 182)

In several of his inscriptions Rājendra Chōla is described to have taken Purvadesam, Gangai Kidāram etc. Purvadesam in these inscriptions has been interpreted as Eastern Country. Mr Hira Lal suggests that the Chattisgarh division of the Central Provinces is called Pārcarāshtra in inscriptions. (E.I. IX 283) If this is so the expedition against Pārcadesam means the reduction of this portion of the Mahākerala country and not any vague conquest of the East Coast. (M.E.R. 1924 Para 15)

Conquest of the "Eastern Country"

An exploit attributed to the generals of Rājendra Chōla in the Kanyākumārī inscription is the subjugation of the Kalinga and the Vanga kings. (Mr Krishna Sastri has pointed out that the reading of Vimaendra in line 360 of the Kanyākumārī inscription is a mistake for Vaṅgendra. See E.I. XVIII 25 note 1) This is not referred to in the Tiruvālangadu plates which state that after the conquest of the Kuluta and Utkala chiefs Rājendra returned to his capital, being worshipped all along the route by the kings whom he had subdued. There are no details available of these conquests except what are mentioned in his inscriptions dated from his 19th regnal year. (See Channaspatna 82-83 quoted above, with identification of places mentioned therein) That he did war against the Pāla kings of Bengal may now be taken as fairly established. If he did conquer Kalinga and Vanga (i.e., Bengal) as is possible he actually did it.

Conquest of Kalinga and Vanga.

him (on the battlefield) with very powerful elephants, horses and innumerable foot-soldiers. The white parasol of that king, the jewel of the Lunar race, fell (to the ground), its (supporting) staff and top being torn (asunder) in battle by sharp arrows, as if the disc of the moon (fell) distressed by the defeat (of her descendant). Then having robbed Ranasūia of his prosperity, he entered the extensive dominions of Dharmapāla (and) conquering him too, this General of the king of Sibiś, (i.e., of Rājendra-Chōla) reached the celestial river (Ganga). The dandanāyaka then immediately got the most sacred waters of that (river) carried to his master Madhurāntaka (i.e., Rājendra-Chōla) by the subjugated chiefs on the banks of that (Ganga river). (Meantime) Rājendra-Chōla (himself) with a desire to conquer (enemy kings) reached the river Godāvare and by the scented cosmetics on his body (washed away) during a playful bath in the waters (of that river) caused her (i.e., the Godāvare river) to be suspected (of enjoyment with a stranger) by the lord of the rivers (i.e., the ocean). The powerful general had (just then) got the waters of the Ganga carried to his master (Rājendra-Chōla), after having defeated Mahipāla and having taken possession of his fame, splendour and precious gems."

The Kanyākumārī lithic inscription of Vīra-Rājendra, son of Rājendra-Chōla, confirms the above narration, though only briefly. It also attributes the conquest of the chiefs on the banks of the Ganges to the generals of Rājendra and not to Rājendra in person and states that the water of the Ganges—whose banks, it says, were destroyed by a roaring herd of elephants, was brought "in pots" which "were carried on the heads of crowned heads" (E I XVIII. 54, T A S III 1. 157). Whether this expression sets the limit of the humiliation inflicted on the conquered kings or is only metaphorical in character, water being carried only "in pots" and on the "heads" of persons, it is difficult to say.

Bringing the Ganges into his own country.

It will be seen from the above that with the idea of bringing the Ganga into his own country through the splendour (or "the jewel gate" adorned with great splendour) and the door set with large jewels (or the gate of large jewels) the expensive Sri Vijayan (i.e. Sri Vishaya, north Burma or Pegu) Pannai watered by the river the ancient Malayor (Malaya) which had many hill fortresses Mayirulinam the moat around which was the deep sea Ilanjaloham (Ilankaloka) of undaunted heroic deeds (or undaunted in fierce battles) Majapalam (= Mahajapalam a fort in the Telugu country of Burma) having a system of full streams (i.e. having abundant high waters as defence) Mavilpanam which had two fortifications as defence Vilappandur full of luxuriant green lands (or possessing cultivated land) and jungle kalai takkolam (= kalam takolam sea port town of Takkolam) graced by great men versed in the sciences Malamaliyam (= Matama or Martaban) of steady heroic deeds (firm in great and fierce battles) Ilamuri disam whose fierce strength was increased by enmity (or whose fierce strength was subdued by vehement attack) Makkavarani (the Nicobar islands) surrounded by gardens resounding with bees (or whose flower gardens—resembled the hum of the nymph—of the southern ocean) and Kadaram of great strength guarded by the deep sea (or of fierce strength which was protected by the neighbouring sea)

Kadaram or Kidaram above referred to is supposed to be Tharakhettra 8 miles west of Prome (J I XII 6 160). It has also been identified with Kerti in the northern coast of Sumatra (U E R 1921 Para 16) but there is nothing to support this suggestion. On the other hand the first named identification has much in favour of it. The other places mentioned are in or about Burma and there has been found much valuable local evidence to testify to the influence of Tamils from Southern India in Burma. About the time of Rajendra Chola's conquest of Burma that peninsula was already well known to Indians. Local records show that Tugaung the cradle of the Burmese race was founded in the 9th century B C, by Abhiragana Aryan Prince from North India. In 483 B C Aryan colonists from Tugaung founded him (on the battlehold) with very powerful elephants, horses and innumerable foot-soldiers. The white parasol of that king, the jewel of the Lunar race, fell (to the ground), its (supporting) staff and top being torn (asunder) in battle by sharp arrows, as if the disc of the moon (fell) distressed by the defeat (of her descendant). Then having robbed Ranasūra of his prosperity, he entered the extensive dominions of Dharmapāla (and) conquering him too, this General of the king of Sibi, (i.e., of Rājendra-Chōla) reached the celestial river (Ganga). The dandanāyaka then immediately got the most sacred waters of that (river) carried to his master Madhurāntaka (i.e., Rājendra-Chōla) by the subjugated chiefs on the banks of that (Ganga river). (Meantime) Rājendra-Chōla (himself) with a desire to conquer (enemy kings) reached the river Godāvarī and by the scented cosmetics on his body (washed away) during a playful bath in the waters (of that river) caused her (i.e., the Godāvarī river) to be suspected (of enjoyment with a stranger) by the lord of the rivers (i.e., the ocean). The powerful general had (just then) got the waters of the Ganga carried to his master (Rājendra-Chōla), after having defeated Mahipāla and having taken possession of his fame, splendour and precious gems."

The Kanyākumārī lithic inscription of Vīra-Rājendra, son of Rājendra-Chōla, confirms the above narration, though only briefly. It also attributes the conquest of the chiefs on the banks of the Ganges to the generals of Rājendra and not to Rājendra in person and states that the water of the Ganges—whose banks, it says, were destroyed by a roaring herd of elephants, was brought "in pots" which "were carried on the heads of crowned heads" (E I XVIII. 54, T A S III 1. 157). Whether this expression sets the limit of the humiliation inflicted on the conquered kings or is only metaphorical in character, water being carried only "in pots" and on the 'heads' of persons, it is difficult to say.

1e

occ will be seen from the above that with the idea of pinging the Ganga into his own country through the parts of the Indian peninsula. (M.E.R. 1903 Para 13)

Some Telugu inscriptions intimately connecting Hyanzittha king of Pagan with Rājendra Chōla and Kulottunga I raise questions of no ordinary interest. On close examination it has been found that the astounding statements of the Telugu inscriptions that Kulottunga Chōla resided at Pegu of Kadaram that he visited Pagan bearing tributes to Hyanzittha that he presented the latter with a daughter and that he himself became a convert to Buddhism have none of them been confirmed by Tamil inscriptions. The connection of Burma with Southern India is, however established beyond doubt. Burman script and numerals seem closely related to the Telugu and Kannada scripts and numerals. (M.E.R. 1919 Part I Pages 10 11, Para 9) The conquest of Kadaram was accounted a great feat of arms judging from the prominence given to it in the inscriptions of Rājendra Chōla. In later times—for e.g., in the time of Kulottunga Chōla—Rājendra Chōla became known as Kadarangondasola and a village came to be called after this title of his, Kadarangonda Sūlapuram. (M.E.R. 1911 Para 26)

Kalai Takkolam is probably Kalam Takkōlam meaning the sea port town of Takkolam, which has been identified with the Takola of Ptolemy the geographer (I.A. VIII 372 see Ptolemy Book VII Ch 2 5) It is probably the modern Taikkala, south-east of Pegu. Kadaram and Takkolam probably indicate Pegu Province. Pegu appears to have been under Indian rule for nearly five centuries (See Burma A.S.R. 1900 10 Pages 14 16 1916 17 Para 57) Madamalingam is probably Mutam or Martaban on the same coast. Srivijayam is undoubtedly Sri Viṣhayam a name given to north Burma or Pegu. The ancient Malaiyur is probably the Malaya peninsula. Apparently Rājendra-Chōla's fleet humiliation was apparently common during the period. That such humiliation was actually inflicted at least on certain of the conquered chiefs by the Chōla general is rendered more than possible by the discovery at Gangaikonda-Chōlapuram, the capital city founded by Rājendra-Chōla, where the water of the Ganges, brought as above indicated, was used in founding a tank, of a Gahadavāla inscription, which belongs either to Madanapāla or his son Gōvindachandra of Kanauj (M.E.R., 1908, Paras 58-60). It is a Sānskrit inscription in Grantha characters, found next to a damaged Tamil record of the Chōla king Kulōttunga-Chōla, apparently dated in his 41st regnal year, or A.D. 1110-1111. The Grantha inscription begins immediately after the Tamil date and is a verbatim copy of a portion of the introduction in the copper-plates of the Gahadavāla king Gōvindachandra of Kanauj (E.I. IV, 100). The inscription, however, is an unfinished one, and the date of the Tamil record leaves us in doubt whether it (the Grantha inscription) belongs to Madanapāla or his son Gōvindachandra. The latest known date of the former is A.D. 1109 and the earliest date of the latter is A.D. 1114. Mr. Venkayya suggests that there is no doubt that some sort of relationship existed between the Chōla king Kulōttunga I and the Gahadavālas of Kanauj. Perhaps either Madanapāla or his son Gōvindachandra or some other member of their family went to the Chōla capital Gangaikonda Chōlapuram on a friendly visit to the Chōla king Kulōttunga I and wished to make a grant to the temple. Accordingly, the genealogy of the donor was put in, but for some reason or other either the grant itself was not made, or it was not engraved in full on the stone. Though Mr. Venkayya has been unable to trace any reference in the numerous copper-plates of the Gahadavāla family to their relationship, alliance or friendly intercourse with the Chōlas, he suggests that one of their kings might have in the straits of Malacca and the Lalabans of Kallidiriachi (See Inscriptions 1909)

(6) Pajjalam = An ancient port in Lower Burma, also referred to in the Vaḥḥama Ch 76 verse 63 as Pajjalam.

(7) Jambamjari = The port of Lemang in the Island of Borneo

(8) Panlör = The Island of Pintang or Penten near Singapore

(9) Takkulam = The port of Takkola at the mouth of the river Takkola in the Island of Sumatra the classical Varagala.

(10) Malamillingam = Probably Mantalingam a port in the Paragna Palawan Island in the Ibilijung group

(11) Hamuri = Lamoria in Lamlur a part of North Borneo

(12) Nakkaramam = The Nicobars

Mr Coomaraswamy also draws attention to the interesting fact that Marco Polo who visited some of the places mentioned in Rajendra inscription about a century and half later describes them almost by the same names. (Ceylon Hindu Organ No 21 1927)

The year in which this conquest was effected is not quite certain. It has been set down to A D 102, 7 i.e. to some time between the 11th and the 16th regnal years of Rajendra Chola. (Burma I.S.R. 1906 7, Page 19) Some other writers have referred it rather vaguely to a year before the 19th regnal year. A number of lithic inscriptions found in the Kolar District fix the date of this expedition within fairly narrow limits and suggest a date anterior to the 11th regnal year. In Srinivasapur 17 and Chintāmanī 153 (E.C. \) both of which are undated, Rajendra-Chōla is only described as the conqueror of Ganga i.e., the kings on the Ganges border. In Kolar 106a which is dated in his 8th regnal year the conquests mentioned are Idaturai nadu, Binavisi, Kollippakkai, Manṇaikkadakkam Ilam and Kerala. In Kolar 112a, which is of his 11th regnal year he is described briefly as the conqueror of the eastern country (i.e. Vēṅgi or

The date of the conquest

them Kulōttunga-Chōla-Māttāndālayam, which shows that it was probably built during the reign of Kulōttunga I and that it was already dedicated to the Sun-god. That there is in the central shrine of Sūriyanārkōvil an image of the god Viśvēsvara with his consort Viśālākshī, both of whom are worshipped in Benares even to this day, may be taken to show that the worship of the Sun was introduced from Benares, provided these two images are as old as the temple itself. This would again prove that there was some intimate relationship between the Chōla Kulōttunga I and the Gahadavālas of Kanauj."

It will be remembered that Kanauj lies on the western bank of the Ganges and in the Ganges-Jumna valley and would be just one of the countries subjugated by the general of Rājēndra-Chōla in his attempt to reach the Ganges. That Rājēndra-Chōla kept up the connection that he thus formed with the Ganges is further confirmed by the fact that he imported many Saiva teachers from its banks and settled them in the Chōla country. He was a staunch Saiva and his teacher Īsāna-Siva-Pandita, the Saiva āchārya in charge of the Tanjore temple, was probably one of those specially brought down from near the Ganges.

Consecration of the "Chōla Gangam" tank

The sacred water thus brought was apparently used for consecrating with it a tank that Rājēndra-Chōla excavated at his new capital Gangaikondachōlapuram. The Tiruvālangādu plates thus briefly refer to this event —

"(This) lord constructed in his own dominions as a pillar of victory (a tank) known by repute as Chōlagangam which was composed of the waters of the Ganges"

This tank still exists. It has at present an embankment some 16 miles long, and is fully provided with the necessary sluices and channels for irrigation of a large area. There is now hardly any doubt that it was up to the conquest of Irattapadi 7½ lakhs and suggests like several inscriptions found in the Mysora State that the northern and Indonesian conquests took place later. An inscription found at the same place but dated in the 12th regnal year gives the full historical introduction. Thus the inference drawn from the inscriptions found in the State that the northern and Indonesian conquests took place between the 10th and 12th regnal years is confirmed by inscriptions found outside of it also.

Summarising briefly Rājendra Chōla's conquests during the period of his rule included parts of Ganga pādi and Banavāsī in Mysora, Vengi and Halinga up to Mahendragiri and Orissa in the East Coast, Kērala in the West Coast, the dominions of the Haihayās in the Central Provinces, probably also the territories of the king of Kanauj in the Ganges valley, the dominions of Pāla kings in Bengal and Assam, the kingdom of Pegu in Burma, and some of the unidentified countries and places mentioned in his later records may perhaps be taken to refer to his conquest of Sumatra and Jāva where Tamil inscriptions have been found. The Chinese work Sungshih records that Sri Rājendra Chōla (Shih li lo ch a yin fa lo chu lo) sent an embassy to China in A.D. 1033. Seeing that he had a well-manned and strong navy it is possible that this embassy took the sea route to China. The object of the embassy is not known but it has been surmised that he might have had more extensive military schemes in view than are revealed in his inscriptions. (Snhramania Iyer Ancient Dekhan 257). At the same time it may be taken to have been merely a friendly gesture on his part to his neighbour.

Summary of Rājendra-
Chōla's
conquests.

Besides Tanjore Rājendra Chōla had other capitals in which he seems to have resided at times in his royal

His capital
cities.

this explicit declaration it would be difficult to construe the Ennāyiram inscription otherwise than as suggesting something in conformity with what is stated in the Tiruvālangādu and the Kanyākumārī inscriptions. The Ennāyiram inscription, whose date is undecipherable but which might be assigned to about 1023 A D, records the interesting fact that the Assembly of that village, in order to secure success to the arms of the king, made certain charities to the Lord Paramasvāmin, who "was pleased to stand with a fierce appearance" in the temple of Rājārāja-Vinnagar, in the village of Rājārāja-chatuvēdimangalam (the other name of Ennāyiram), receiving worship and offerings. The temple was obviously one dedicated to Vishnu, probably in one of his fierce conquering forms, and the charities made by the Assembly include the maintenance of a hostel and a college for Vēdic study. It also provides for the recitation of the Tuvvāmozhi, for the feeding of twenty-five Srī-Vaishnavas in the mutt attached to the temple, feeding 1,000 Srī-Vaishnavas, who came to witness the annual seven days' festival at the temple, for meeting the cost of the car festival, the distribution of garments to mendicants, etc. In the newly built Gangaikondān-mandapa, a total of 230 Brahmacārins studying different parts of the Vēdas were to be fed as also 40 others were to learn the Rupāvatāra. Provision was further made for the feeding of 70 other students learning the Vyākaraṇa (Grammar), Prabhākara (one of the Siddhāntas) and Vēdānta. To the professors teaching these subjects and the different parts of the Vēda, separate provision was made, partly in paddy and partly in gold. The grant was made on the order of king Rājēndira to mark the event and it was entered, at his instance, in the royal account books. In the hostel attached to the college, not only the professors and students were fed but also Srī-Vaishnavas. It was also ordered that on towards that religion. His grants to the Pidaripār temple at Kolar shews that strict Saivism was not held to be incompatible with primitive forms of belief. Apart from his grants to this temple in his 11th and 16th years the former of which was to take effect as from his 7th year his general Uttama Chola had its brick portions built with stone. (E C \ Kolar 109a dated in his 22nd year) An inscription found running around the figure of the lotus on the top slab of the first doorway of the Kolaranina temple which may be assigned to 1030 A.D. states that its outer mantapa was called Srī Rājendra Chola-dēvan after the name of the king and that it was caused to be erected by Jakkijappai (or Jakkijabbi) daughter of Tribhuvanaiyan of Ittakirai at the foot of the Solkalimalai otherwise called Kanaka parvatam (the golden mountain) in the Kadai banakkai nadu. (E C \ Kolar 115) The worship of Chāmundesvari is referred to in an epigraph dated in 1038 A.D. found at Alur Mailanahalli Hobli Nēga mangala. (E C IV 7a) It records a grant of 500 kuli of land to the goddess Chāmundesvari under the (?) silk-cotton tree to the west of Siddhisavarani for providing thrice daily the usual offerings. The village is described as being situated in the Ankanur nādu in Vikrama Chola Mandalam. Rājendra's guru was Isanasiva Pandita who is mentioned in several of his inscriptions as 'the guru' (e.g. in an inscription of Rājendra's 6th year in S I I II 92) Rājendra is said to have imported into his kingdom a number of Saiva priests from the Ganges border for conducting the worship in the temples on approved lines. The respect he showed to his guru is reflected in the grant he ordered to be made to a temple founded in Isanasiva Pandita's honour and name at Suttur in the Mysore District. An inscription of his 21st year (1032 A.D.) at that place (E C III Nanjan gud 164) records the gift of the five great musical that Rājendra-Chōla took the title of "Gangaikonda-Chōla" because of his conquest of the Ganga country (Mysore and Coorg, 89, note 1) has to be given up in view of the explicit mention of the conquest, under Rājendra's directions, if not under his leadership, of the chiefs on the Ganges border, of their bringing to his capital the sacred water and of his commemoration of the event by the founding of a mandapa called Gangaikondān, etc. He appears to have taken the title to mark as much the occasion of the celebration as of the conquest of the northern kings. Though the theory of Mr Rice is directly contradicted by the Ennāyiram record and has to be abandoned, the opinion might perhaps be hazarded that the idea of the conquest of the chiefs on the Ganges border was probably suggested to him by his conquest of the Gangas and their country in 1004 A D, while he was still a prince, leading expeditions under the orders of his father Rājaiāja. There is, however, no inscriptional or other basis available for this suggestion and further speculation as to its probability or otherwise seems therefore hardly called for. Remembering that the Pallava king Narasimhavarman was called "Vātāpikonda" or the conqueror of Bādāmi, and the Chōla king Parāntaka I, "Madirāikondān" and "Īlamkondān," or the "conqueror of Madura" and the "conqueror of Ceylon," we have to interpret the title "Gangaikondān" as the "conqueror of Ganga," where Ganga means the river Ganges or the kingdoms on its border.

Thus the title of "Capturer of Gange," referred to in many of the inscriptions of Rājendra-Chōla, is a clear reference to the conquest of the kings on the Ganges border and not to the capture of the Ganga kingdom in Mysore. The term invariably used is "Gangē" or "Gangai" and not "Ganga," when the conquest of the kings of the Ganges border is referred to (Chintāmanī 153, during Rājendra Chola's reign Saivism was in high favour. He built rest houses for Saiva ascetics (Siva yogins). One of these was the dwelling place or as we would now call it a matha called Tiruvāṅṅuram Rājendrasolan at Uyyakkondan Tiruinalai. Its name shows that it was called after himself. That it met a local religious want is testified to by an inscription of the 12th year of Rājendra Chola which records a private grant of paddy for feeding the ascetics resident in it. (M.E.R. 1909 Appendix B No 467 of 1908). Kālāmukha ascetics had already become influential in the Chola kingdom during the reigns of Parantaka I and Āḍitya II (M.E.R. 1909 Appendix A No 129 of 1907). They had apparently extended their influence still further south during the succeeding reigns. It is evident from several inscriptions of Rājendra's time that Brāhmins were held in high respect. There appears to have been a ghatika of theirs at Vombarrur (Voppattur) in the Tanjore District. The grants made to them show the esteem in which Vedic learning was held at the time. The Ennayiram inscription also well testifies to this fact. The study of the Vēda Vidānta and the Vyākharana had become popular and provision was made for their regular teaching and for the boarding and maintenance of scholars learning them. (See above). During Rājendra's time, Tiruvorriyur near Madras continued to be a place of religious importance. It attracted as ever before pilgrims from the north. Nimbalaḍvī, wife of Indradeva of Talagrama in Virāṭanagara (identified with Hangal in the present Dhārwar District) visited it in the 30th year of Rājendra's reign and made a gift of 90 sheep for a perpetual lamp in it. (M.E.R. 1913 Appendix B 138). Ariyavammal (alias Nagalabbaisani) wife of Prahhākara Bhatta of Merkalapuram in Āryadesa) settled in Tiruvorriyur as a devotee of the temple. She bought and granted in the 30th year of Rājendra a that Rājēndia-Chōla took the title of "Gangaikonda-Chōla" because of his conquest of the Ganga country (Mysore and Coorg, 89, note 1) has to be given up in view of the explicit mention of the conquest, under Rājēndra's directions, if not under his leadership, of the chiefs on the Ganges border, of their bringing to his capital the sacred water and of his commemoration of the event by the founding of a mandapa called Gangaikondān, etc. He appears to have taken the title to mark as much the occasion of the celebration as of the conquest of the northern kings. Though the theory of Mr. Rice is directly contradicted by the Ennāyiram record and has to be abandoned, the opinion might perhaps be hazarded that the idea of the conquest of the chiefs on the Ganges border was probably suggested to him by his conquest of the Gangas and their country in 1004 A D, while he was still a prince, leading expeditions under the orders of his father Rājarāja. There is, however, no inscriptional or other basis available for this suggestion and further speculation as to its probability or otherwise seems therefore hardly called for. Remembering that the Pallava king Narasimhavarman was called "Vātāpikonda" or the conqueror of Bādāmi, and the Chōla king Parāntaka I, "Madiraikondān" and "Īlamkondān," or the "conqueror of Madura" and the "conqueror of Ceylon," we have to interpret the title "Gangaikondān" as the "conqueror of Ganga," where Ganga means the river Ganges or the kingdoms on its border.

Thus the title of "Capturer of Gange," referred to in many of the inscriptions of Rājēndia-Chōla, is a clear reference to the conquest of the kings on the Ganges border and not to the capture of the Ganga kingdom in Mysore. The term invariably used is "Gangē" or "Gangai" and not "Ganga," when the conquest of the kings of the Ganges border is referred to (Chintāmani 153,

District. Between the regnal years 16 and 18 of this king Anakkayar Paravai Nangaiyār rebuilt in stone this shrine. The fact is recorded that in the 16th year she covered the shrine with gold tiles and its other parts and the central śrīmūla with copper. Her endowments and those of others included gold ornaments set with jewels, pearls, necklaces, gill utensils and a large number of lampstands. One of these last we are told was to be lit at the place where the king (Rajendra) and herself (she calls herself his servant and was probably a queen) took their stand in the temple apparently on an important occasion. To this temple—it has even now a reputation second to none in Southern India—Rajadhiraja Rājendra Deva II made gifts and added to its buildings. (M E R 1920 Para 20 Appendix B No 680 of 1919)

The worship of Viṣṇu continued undisturbed as usual during his reign. It was evidently becoming more and more popular in the Chōla country. The setting up of images in honour of Krishna is referred to in certain inscriptions of the 10th year (M E R 1900 Para 43) Conjeevaram and the country round about it continued to be the stronghold of Śrī Vaiṣṇavism. A grant of land to the temple of Mahāviṣṇu at Tīramukkudal in the Chingleput District is mentioned in a record dated in the 7th year of Rājendra Chōla. The temple at the place now called after Venkatēśa Perumāl was already an ancient one dating as it did from the time of the Ganga Pallava king Nripatunga. The flower garden whose cultivation was arranged for by the Vaiṣṇavas, at the instance of the local village assembly was called

Worship of Viṣṇu
during his reign.

Rājendra Sōlan after the king (M E R 1916 Para 11, Appendix B No 173 of 1915). Perhaps one of the most popular Vaiṣṇava temples of Rājendra's time was the Tīrumanantēśvara at Kattumannar Koyil. It is

District (see above) and Banavāsī, in the north-west of the state

Conquest of Kulata and Utkala

The war against the Utkala (Odda) king was apparently undertaken on the occasion of the visit of Rājendra to the East Coast to meet the generals returning from the Ganges border (see above). It is thus described in the Tīruvālangādu plates —

“The heroic king killed in battle (the lord of) Odda who was carrying on the orders of the king of the Kūli (age), i.e., who was following vicious ways, together with his (younger) brother and (his) army, and then forcibly took possession of (his) rutting elephants. There, the king with his own hand (and) from the (back of the) elephant mounted himself, killed a mad elephant that ran at him with its trunk raised.”

This account seems to suggest that Rājendra took a personal part in the fight against the Utkala king. The Kanyākumārī lithic inscription gives a rather different version. It says that Rājendra-Chōla “had the lords of the Kulata and Utkala (countries) slain by the generals of his forces,” which would seem to indicate that he took no personal part in the killing of the wicked Utkala king and his brother. The version of the Tīruvālangādu plates being more circumstantial, has to be accepted as enshrining the true facts. As to the subjugation of the Kulata chief, the reference should be taken to be to the same chief who is referred to in Rājaraāja’s inscriptions. From the Mahēndiagnī pillar inscription, which bears the Chōla insignia of the tiger and the two fishes, we learn that the Kulata chief referred to was Vimalāditya. He is stated in that inscription to have been defeated by a general of Rājendra-Chōla, whose name is given as Rājendra-Chōla-Pallavaraiyan Rājaraajamarayan. He is called in another inscription found in the same place as Dattakara. To signalise his victory over Vimalāditya, century A D These indicate three different classes of these assemblies. Those designated sabhas were generally to be found in Brahmadēya (i.e. Brāhmana) villages and were almost entirely constituted of Brāhmanas. The rules laid down in the Uttaramallur inscriptions of the time of Parāntaka I (A S.R. for 1001 5 Page 131 to 135), for membership on village committees apply purely to such Brāhmanical sabhas. A still earlier inscription at Manur in the Tinnevely District (No 423 of 1906) which is dated in the 35th year of the reign of Māraṇjadaiyan (i.e., about the 9th century A D) refers to similar rules for membership in the sabha. These are interesting and deserve to be recorded here. It is stated that of the children of share holders in the village only one, who is well behaved and has studied the Mantra Brāhmaṇa and one Dharma (i.e. Code of Law) may be on the village assembly (manru) to represent the share held by him in the village and only one of similar qualifications may be on the assembly for a share purchased received as present or acquired by him as stridhana (through his wife) (2) that (shares) purchased, presented or acquired as stridhana could entitle one if at all only to full membership in the assemblies and in no case was quarter half or three quarter membership to be recognised (3) that those who purchased shares were to elect only such men to represent their shares on the assembly as had critically studied a whole Vēda with its parisishtas (4) that those who did not possess full membership as laid down by rule (2) were not to stand on any committee (vāriyam) (for the management of village affairs) (5) that those who satisfied the prescribed conditions should in no case persistently oppose (the proceedings of the assembly) by saying nay nay to every proposal brought up before the assembly and (6) that those who did this together with their supporters were to pay a fine of five lāsū on each renders more than possible his conquest of the other chiefs mentioned in the Tiruvālangādu plates and the Kanyākumārī inscription

Invasion of Burma and Indonesia

But, perhaps, the greatest feat of arms performed by Rājēndia's troops was the capture of Kataha in Burma, which ended in the annexation of a part of that peninsula. This is referred to in the Tiruvālangādu plates and in the Kanyākumārī and other lithic inscriptions. The Tiruvālangādu record refers to this expedition in brief terms. It merely records the fact that he "conquered Kataha with (the help of) his valiant forces that had crossed the ocean." The Kanyākumārī inscription describes it thus "With (the help) of his forces, which crossed the seas, which were excessively powerful in arms and which had scattered away the armies of all his enemies, he (Rājēndia-Chōla) burnt Kataha, that could not be set on fire by others. What is (there that is) impossible for this Rājēndia-Chōla!" Several other lithic inscriptions give graphic accounts of this conquest. Among these are the following — The Tanjore inscription dated in the 19th regnal year, or A D 1030 (S I I II No 20) in his 22nd year, or A D 1033 (E C X, Kolar 109a), in his 23rd year, or A D. 1034 (E C IX, Channapatna 82-83), and in his 27th year, or A D. 1038 (E C IX, Nelamangala 7a). The following passage taken from the last of these epigraphs fully describes this conquest —

"Having sent many ships in the midst of the billowing (or rolling) sea and having captured Sangirama Viśayōttungavarman (i.e., Sangrāma Vijayōttungavarman), the king of Kadaram, along with his victorious five elephants which had (well-formed) frontal globes and resembled the impetuous sea (in fighting) took the great heap of treasures which he had rightfully amassed the (arch called) Vichchadna-Hoianam (Vidyādhara-tōrana) at the "War-gate" of the enemys' extensive city, the wicket door set with jewels of great

The dwelling place of a thief who had unlawfully taken possession of a dog that did not belong to him was, it is recorded burnt down and fifty golden images, which he had wrongfully seized and sent to the king. In Nolamangala I (E C IV) dated in this king's 18th year (A D 1020) the writer of the inscription is described as the son of Mahāmātra Ajavarmaya. The post of Mahāmātra goes back to the time of Asoka (3rd century B C). Whether it existed during Rajendra Chola's time is a moot point. Kolar 112a which records a grant made to the Pīḍariyār temple at Kolar by the king from Kāñchi where he should have been staying temporarily, shows the methodical though circumlocutory manner in which public business seems to have been transacted. The order appears to have been communicated by the Royal Secretary to the Chief Secretary who with three others having passed it directed that it should be entered in the revenue register. Accordingly the revenue officers (eleven of them are named) and the revenue accountants (seven of them are named) met together and made the entry in the revenue register on the 29th day of the 13th year (of the reign). The grant was ordered to take effect from the king's sixth year, though actually made in the 13th which shows that the endowment had to be ante-dated by four years. (E C V Kolar 112a) Kolar 111, dated 1027 A D registers a similar grant to the same temple but made in the 16th regnal year and entered in the revenue register on the 281st day of that year. This record shows that on the registration of the lands or villages granted as dēvadāna, the revenue specified was paid in paddy and gold to the temple authorities for meeting the cost of the requirements of the goddess. In the dēvadānas thus registered under the king's orders, the local rulers remitted the land tax, the tax on houses, the tax on (?) sugarcane mills and other similar taxes. (E C V. Kolar 110 dated probably

Conduct of public business

Prome and in the 1st century A D , when the latter was destroyed, the fugitives sought refuge at Pagan, to the northward, and established there a new kingdom. The Talaing kingdom of Thaton was subverted in 1057 A D , a year which serves as a great landmark and a dividing line between traditional and authentic Burmese history. In Burma, there were prevalent the Northern and Southern schools of Buddhism, Prome marking the line of separation between Pāli and Sāṅskṛit. The country south of Prome was influenced by South India and Ceylon, whence Buddhist scriptures in Pāli were obtained. The country north of Prome with Pagan as its centre was influenced by Sāṅskṛit. Rājendra-Chōla's conquest had to do more with Prome than with Pagan and apparently occurred before the subversion of the Pagan kingdom in 1057 A D. A Tamil inscription of the 13th century A D , has been found at Pagan showing the prevalence of the Vaishnavite faith there. This shows that since Rājendra-Chōla's conquest, Tamil influence spread northwards to Pagan. The inscription consists of one verse in the Sāṅskṛit language and Grantha alphabet and a prose passage in the Tamil language and alphabet. The Tamil characters are those of the 13th century. The Sāṅskṛit verse is taken from the Mukandamāla (verse 6), a short poem by the Vaishnava saint, Kulasēkhara, who, as shown by Mr Venkayya, must have lived before the 11th century. The Tamil prose passage records gifts by a native of Mayodayarpattanam in Malaimandalam, i.e., Cranganore in Malabar. The recipient of the gifts was the Vishnu temple of Nānādēśivinnagar at Pukkam alias Arivattana-puram, i.e., Pagan. "Nānādēśi-Vinnagar" means "the Vishnu temple of those coming from various countries". The name shows that the temple, which was situated in the heart of the Buddhist country of Burma, had been founded and was resorted to by Vaishnavas from various Pongannur in enforcing the right to irrigate certain lands granted to the temple. The Assembly had the power delegated to it in this behalf by the inhabitants of the village with pouring of water. The village was a tax free dēradānu granted to the temple by the local Assembly (E C I\ Channapatna 127). For the maintenance of tanks it appears from an inscription of his 6th year that not only private donations (called erpatti) were collected but there was levied besides, a regular tax (called eri-uyam) collected in kind by the great men in charge of the tank supervision committee which was responsible for the maintenance of tanks (M.E.R. 1919 Appendix C No 102 and No 66).

The duty of supervising the temple administration seems to have been entrusted to a committee of the Assembly itself appointed every year or to independent bodies subject to the control of the Assembly. Inscription No. 66 of 1923 (M.E.R. 1923) mentions such a committee consisting of 8 members called Vanrāddivāriyam to which the work of inspecting the produce of the temple land and conducting the festivals in the temples with the mālvaram received from the tenants was assigned. Punishments were meted out to defaulters in the matter of burning perpetual lamps by the "Annual Supervision Committee" along with the Sraddhāmantas and devotees (M.E.R. 1922 Nos 163 and 161 of 1922). Local bodies responsible to the sabha were the Perilamayyar (M.E.R. 1923 Nos 163 164 166 167 178 and 182 of 1923) also called Irādupakkattu Perilamayyar (M.E.R. 1923 No 185 of 1923) whose assurance was obtained by the donors or by the assembly with regard to the burning of perpetual lamps, the Viraganattār (M.E.R. 1923 No 187 of 1923) the haliganattār (M.E.R. 1923 No 189 of 1923) the Krishnaganap perumakkal (M.E.R. 1923 No 174 of 1923) and the Supervision

of Temples.

crossed the Bay of Bengal and attacked and captured Kadaram, which is said to have been "of great strength, guarded by the deep sea" The smaller ports, including Takkolam and Mataban, also fell With these successes, the kingdom of Śrī-Vishaya (i.e., Pegu) passed under Chōla rule Two granite pillars standing at the town of Pegu are believed to have been set up by the Chōla king to commemorate his conquest (Burma A S R 1906-07, Page 19) The conquest of the Nicobars (Mahā Nakkavaiyam) appears to have next followed The campaign must have proved a successful one for Sangrāma Vijayōttungavarman, the king, who was attacked by sea, was defeated and caught This king must have been a successor of Māravijayōttungavarman, the son of Chūdāmanivarman, the king of Kataha or Kadaiam, who is mentioned in the large Leyden grant as a vassal of Rājarāja The expedition against him was probably undertaken by Rājēndia because of his intended or actual rebellion against his suzerain lord That he and his successors remained faithful to the Chōla emperors is suggested by the mention of an unnamed king of Kadaram as a vassal of Kulōttunga-Chōla in the small Leyden grant (See Burgess, Archæological Survey of India IV, 224, text line 5 and 225, text line 10)

Since the above was written, Mr V. Coomaraswamy, B A, of Ceylon, has suggested the following identifications of the twelve places enumerated as having been captured by Rājēndia-Chōla in the course of his naval expedition --

(1) Śrī-Vijayam = Śrī Bōja, the capital of the kingdom of Kadaram, which is located in the Island of Sumatra

(2) Pannai = the Pannai Island in the Philippine group

(3) Malayān = The Malayan land which is the ancient appellation "Thana Malaya" now included in the Sultanate of Johore

(4) Indugam = Tarantaka in the Island of Sumatra

(5) Ilungasokam = The Island of Lankay of modern maps,

Rājendra Chōla I had three sons and one daughter. Of the former, Rājadhīrāja I was the eldest and he succeeded him on the throne. The name of the daughter was Ammanga, called Pillaiyār Ammangai Ālvār in the inscriptions dated in the 4th and 5th regnal years of Kulōttunga-Chōla I (M.E.R. 1912, Appendix B No. 469 and 470). She was the wife of the Eastern Chālukya king Rājarāja and the mother of Kulōttunga Chōla. Perhaps as a Chōla princess she was called Pillaiyār and as an elderly person Ālvār. She was probably a widow at the time the above records were engraved. (c. 1074-1075 A.D.)

Among his nobles were the following — Araiyan Rājarājan alias Vānavan Brahmadīrājar of the king's Perundaram. Rājarāja Vādya mahārājar evidently the master musician. Sembrugudaiyār. Vaippūr kīlavar. Madisudan Adittan of Siruvayal or Siruvayalūr who settled the District of Damar kōttam of Jayangonda Sōlamandalam (M.E.R. 1916, Para 13). The first of these Araiyan Rājarājan was also one of his foremost generals. He appears to have had a number of titles, among them Nālmadī Bhīma and Jayasīnghakula Kāla. The last of these indicates that he took part in the war against the Western Chālukya king Jayasīmha. He built a mandapa in the 10th year of Rājendra-Chōla's reign at Kottaiyāram in the present Annamalai District (M.E.R. 1917, Appendix O No. 23). His title Vikrama Chōla Chōliyan Varaiyan is after Vikrama Chōla, one of the titles of Rājendra Chōla I. An equally notable member of perundanam was Irāyiravan Pallavan. He was called Minimadi Chōla Bhōjan in Rājarāja's time. In Rājendra's time he came to be known as Uttama-Chōla-Pallavaraiyan. Another general referred to in an inscription dated in his 6th year was Sōla Mōrvēndavēlar. He was then the Commander of Rājendra's troops.

Pūrvarāshtra as the case may be) and Gangai (i.e., the Ganges valley). In Chintāmanī 47, which is also of his 11th regnal year, in addition to the eastern country and Gangai, he is said to have taken Kadāram also. Kolar 111 dated in his 11th year also mentions the same three conquests. The longer historical introduction which describes in full the conquests from Idaturai-nādu to Kadāram is first seen in the Tanjore inscription of his 19th year and repeated in inscriptions dated in his 22nd, 22rd and 27th years above mentioned. There are inscriptions of his dated in the 26th and 31st years, but they do not indicate that Rājendra-Chōla made any further conquest of Kadāram. As Chintāmanī 47 of the 11th regnal year refers definitely to the conquest of Kadāram, while other inscriptions of the same year (Kolar 112a) do not mention it, it is possible that the conquest should have been accomplished somewhere about that year. The conquest must have been too fresh to have been included at once in all the dynastic descriptions. Inscriptions dated in the 6th (Kolar 106a), the 8th (Kolar 106a), the 9th (Nanjangud 134) and the 10th (T-Narasipur 34) years do not refer to it. So that the inference seems fairly irresistible that the conquest of Kadāram should have been accomplished in or about the 11th regnal year, or about A.D. 1021-1022. This is as near a date as we can get to for the event in the present state of our knowledge.

Recently, a mutilated inscription dated in the 3rd year has been found at Tirukkānavāsal giving a part of the historical introduction. This, if it has been properly read, would be the earliest date in which Rājendra-Chōla's earlier conquests are first mentioned, the earliest of the others so far discovered being in his 5th year (See M E R 1909 Appendix B No 451 of 1908, also Para 43). An inscription found at Uyyakondān-Tirumalai dated in the 10th year sets out the historical introduction in some certain inscriptions as Kalyānapuramkonda Chola i.e. the Chola who took the city of Kalyāna undoubtedly after his conquest of the Western Chālnkya capital (M.E.R. 1921 Appendix B No 407). In the inscriptions of his successor Rājādhirāja he is reverently called Periyedēvar i.e. the great lord evidently because of his greatness as a conqueror. A rather strange surname of his is given in an inscription of his 28th regnal year. It is that of Virarāṭṭhasa after which a village was called Virarāṭṭhasanallūr (M.E.R. 1923 Appendix C No 191 of 1923). It means a hero among Rākshasas or a hero among giants which is to be construed as being more complimentary than otherwise. An equally interesting title of his is Kalīkhanthala. But his most conspicuous titles were Gangaikonda-Chola and 'Mudigonda Chola.' 'Gangaikonda Chōla' has been explained already. As regards Mudi gonda Chōla, it is derived from the fact that he took the crown (mudī) of the king of Ilam (Ceylon) with that of his queen, the crown of Sūndera, the crown of the king of Kēraḷa and the crown which Parasnāme had deposited at Sandimettivī (in the Kēraḷa country).

The story of Satyēndra Chōla, told in a variety of versions in Kannada, Tamil and Telugu seems to refer to Rājēndra-Chōla. Among the version is the one of Shadəkshara Dēva, included in his Rājashēkhara-vilāsa (1655) in which some of the descriptions seem to be not wholly imaginary. The story briefly is that the horse of Satyēndra Chola's son Rājashēkhara while he was out riding through the streets kicks the son of an old woman, who dies. Satyēndra after investigating the cause, orders his own son to be beheaded, and himself dies with his ministers. Śiva appears on the scene, and as a reward of the king's piety and justice, takes all of them to his own regions. This story is told in Tamil by Pillai Nāyinar and

Identification
of Rājēndra-Chōla with Satyēndra-Chōla of literature.

progresses First among these is Gangaikonda-Chōlapuram, which appears to have been founded by him to commemorate his victories over the kings on the Ganges border The consecration of the great tank he built at it has been referred to above He beautified the city by the construction of a great temple and a fine palace whose remains are still to be seen at the place, now included in the Trichinopoly District The sculptures in the temple have been described as of "singular excellence" (Vincent Smith, History of Fine Art in India and Ceylon, see figs. 159-61) The Linga in the temple is of black granite, a monolith nearly thirty feet high The circumstances under which Tanjore was deserted in favour of Gangaikōnda-cholapuram are nowhere stated Al-Būnī, the Arabian traveller, states that in the beginning of the 11th century (see Sewell's Lists II 155) Tanjore was "in ruins" Apparently the royal residence was removed to Gangaikonda-chōlapuram and we hear no more of Tanjore as a place of importance The great temple at Tanjore continued to receive royal support and was under the direct eye of the king's guru Isāna Pandita (see below). The town of Kānchi, the old Pallava seat, was apparently one of Rājēndia's provincial capitals Seated in a temple at that ancient city, he made one of his many grants to the goddess Pīḍāṇṇiyār at Kuvalāla or Kolai with effect from his 7th year (EC X Kolar 112a) A third capital of his was Vikramachōlapuram in Kaivāra-nād (Chintāmani Taluk), from where he made another grant to the same goddess in his 16th year (Ibid Kolar 111) Talkād should also have continued as one of the provincial capitals during his reign

His religious faith—Sai-
vism

Rājēndia-Chōla seems to have been a devout Saiva and a reformer of temple worship His war against the Pāla kings of Bengal, who were patrons of Buddhism, need not, however, necessarily mean want of toleration conqueror greater in some respects than even his more famous father a wise administrator and a pious and tolerant prince. His extensive conquests in Indonesia remain still to be carefully studied. That he should have carried on successful wars in distant places argues not merely peace at home but also the continued loyalty of his subjects in his home-lands. The discovery of Tamil inscriptions in the region to which he led his armies shows that his conquests in those regions were not of mere raids for plunder. He not only kept his vast kingdom together but also extensively added to it. He must have been served uncommonly well by his generals and governors, for some of his wars were fought exclusively by his generals. He leaves the impress of an ambitious ruler anxious to leave his mark on the pages of history. His interest in the Saivite creed was a personal one but he was no puritan or bigot. His attempt of reforming temple ritual by importing suitable religious teachers from upper India where that creed had an established following at the time shows he was a progressive prince. His greatness consisted in carrying through his father's plans of conquest to the utmost limits in almost every direction. Peace at home and conquest abroad seem to have been as much his motto as that of Rājārāja I.

Rajendra Chola was succeeded on the throne by his son Rājādhirāja I. He was apparently Rājendra Chola's second son his unnamed older brother being only known from certain references in inscriptions. (EC IX Devan halli 75 and 76 S I I III : No 28) Of Rājādhirāja we have numerous inscriptions both in and outside the State. Most of these are lithic in character though a copper plate one dated in the 31st year of his reign from Tirakkalur is also known (M.E.R. 1903 Para 17). The exact length of his reign is not yet satisfactorily settled. An inscription of his at Mīndigal (near

Rājādhirāja
I A II
1016-1065

instruments to the temple of Īsāna Īsvara Udayār—undoubtedly named after his guru Īsana Pandita—at Srōtiya-grāma (vulgo Suttū) by the Mahājanas and merchants of the place according to the sacred order of the king (M A R 1918, Para 85) The deserted Siva temple at Kūamvandal, in the Chingleput District, was also founded by Īsāna-Siva-Pandita It is remarkable as a well preserved specimen of Chōla architecture An inscription on its northern wall, dated in the 12th year of Rājēndia-Chōla, states that it was built by the priest Īsana-Siva-Pandita and records the grant of an allowance of paddy and gold to twenty-four dancing girls attached to it. The temple was dedicated to Gangaikonda-chōlēsvara, after one of the surnames of his royal disciple The same wall has another inscription dated in the 22nd year of Rājēndia-Chōla (M E R. 1893, Para 14) The deserted Aikēsvara temple at Hale Ālur, in Chamarājanagai Taluk, the materials of which have been put together in subsequent times from old ruins, apparently belongs to the same reign The figure sculpture on its pillars shows great artistic skill. Heggadadēvankote 16, dated in 1021 A D in Rājēndra's 9th year, mentions the re-construction of the ruined temple of Belatur, which, it says, had fallen level with the ground, by the chief of Nūgu-nād, who set up the linga in it, which had been pulled out. One Basavayya performed the Rudra-hōma, and gave a feast to a thousand people Basava Setti, the chief above referred to, is recorded to have made grants of land to the temple for maintaining the worship in it and for burning a perpetual lamp in it, on the occasion of the re-commencement of worship at the temple All this throws a sidelight on the advance Brāhmanism was rapidly making in displacing the competing faiths of Buddhism and Jainism In fact, under the Chōlas, Saivism received considerable impetus There is at least no doubt that so the date assigned to the battle of Koppam at which he is said to have died cannot be taken to be 1032 A D as fixed by Dr. Hirschhorn. Sir John Fleet who has fixed the date of this battle shortly before the 20th January 1060 (Kanarese Dynasties 111) is probably correct. (See ante under Western Chālukyas) He should therefore have lived down to that date.

He was also known according to the testimony of his inscriptions as Vijayarājendradeva and distinguished by the surnames of Jayangonda Chāla and Rājakesarivarman. Later for some reason or other the last title is found altered in his inscriptions to Parakesarivarman (V F R 1819 Appendix B, No 251). Similarly other inscriptions (see M E R 1916 Appendix B No 256) make the next king Rājendradeva a Rājakesarivarman while he is actually a Parakesarivarman. This confusion in titles may have been due to the usual overlapping periods of reign and the exercise of independent powers by the crown princes during the last days of their fathers' reign. He probably adopted the title of Vijayarājendradeva after his capture of Kalyānapura. (V F R 1907 08 Para 56 V.E.R 1910 Para 21 and M E R 1911 Para 23). The identity of Vijayarājendradeva with Rājādhirāja is decisively established by an inscription which begins with the historical introduction common to his inscriptions in which mention is made of the king by name thus Rājakesarivarman alias Udayār Sri Vijayarājendradeva (M E R 1910 Para 21). An unfinished record of his from Tiruviraisivaran (M E R 1911 Para 23 No. 123 of 1911) dated in the 35th year of his reign also calls him Rājakesarivarman Vijayarājendradeva. It is, perhaps, not unlikely that the conquest of Kalyānapuram subsequent to which Rājādhirāja changed his name happened in or before the 35th year of his reign. (Ibid) This inference is supported by a few other inscriptions. Thus name, Vijayarājendradeva,

His other
and his
urnames

piece of land for a flower garden for the temple (M E.R 1913 Appendix B 155 of 1912) Under Rājēndra's own patronage, the vimāna (central shrine) of the temple was built. It was "constructed of black granite without the least technical flaw, by the architect Ravi, surnamed Vīra-Chōla-takshan in three tiers decorated with charanas, tōranas, kūtas, kōsthas, nivas (big and small), lion faces and nāsikas" (M E.R 1913, Appendix B 126). Chatuānana Pandita was at the head of the temple (see above) and the construction seems to have been left to him by the king, for we are told in the inscription that it was at the bidding of Chatuānana that the architect built the vimāna. An important festival in this temple, which commenced with Ārdra in the month of Mārgaśīrṣa (December January) each year, was called Rājēndrasōlantirunāl, either in honour of the king or on account of the coincidence of the asterism with that of his birthday (Ibid Appendix B No 104). An officer of the king named Rājēndrasīnga-Muvēndavēlan instituted inquiries into temple affairs at the Vakkānikkum-mandapa of the temple and made provision for meeting the cost of some detailed items of worship from the fee kuṭradandam (fee for wrongs done) which he appears to have collected from the residents of all the dēvadāna villages, servants and the worshippers of the temple, and also from a discount in kind for errors in measuring, which he imposed on all paddy received into the temple treasury annually. These items of expense included ghee, camphor, food and cloths for garland-makers, food and cloth for Brāhmins who recited the Vēdas, rice, sugar, dhall, vegetables, curds, pepper, nuts and betel-leaves. Such articles as were not indigenous were evidently paid for in gold, while others were purchased for paddy (M E.R 1913, Appendix B No 146). Another famous temple of the time was that of Viḍivitankan, now known as the Tyāgarāja temple at Tuvūni, in the Tanjore his distinguished younger brothers and his royal sons who knew the (right) path (along with the titles) Vanavan of great beauty Villavan, Minavan, Gangan the king of the people of Lanka, Vallavan (whose name) golden anklets, (and) the protector of the people of Hannakucheli (Hanyakulija) and granted to those (relatives) of great renown the dominions of those (hostile kings)

Among the three allied kings of the South (the) Pândyas — (he) cut off on a battle-field the beautiful head of Manabharanan (richly adorned with) large jewels (and) which was inseparable from the golden crown seized in a battle Vira Kêralan (whose) ankle rings were wide and was pleased to get him trampled down by his furious elephant Attiravana and drove to the ancient Mullaiyôr Sundara Pândiyan of endless great fame who lost in a hot battle the royal white parasol the bunches (of hairs) of the white yak and the throne and who ran away — his crown dropping down (his) hair being dishevelled and (his) feet getting tired

(He) sent the undaunted king of Vondlu to the country of heaven and destroyed in anger the three (princes) of the famous Iramangudam.

While the strong Villavan (the) Chêra was attacked by pains to the bowels fled from his country and hid himself in the jungle (the) Chôla king destroyed (his) ships (at) handalôr Silai on the never decreasing ocean as (easily as he) would have put on a beautiful fresh flower of the rangi (tree)

When even Vhavamallan became afraid when Gand appayan and Gangâdharan (who belonged) to his army fell along with (their) elephants (whose) temples swarmed with bees, (in a battle) with the irresistible army of Lovudao (and) when the (two) warriors of great strength and others retreated like cowards, (the) Chôla king seized (them) along with gold of great splendour and with horses, elephants and seeds achieved victory in his garment, and caused the centre of Kollippakkai (a city) of the enemies to be consumed by fire.

With a single unequalled army (he) took the crown in Vikramabâhu the king of the people of Lanka on the described in one inscription of the 8th year of his reign at that place as the mūladaivam (chief deity) of the Chōla kings. Among gifts recorded to it are by one of his queens, who consecrated two images (of Chandiasēkhara and his consort) in it and by certain of the Kaikkōlais of the village who presented to it an umbrella consisting of 19,908 pearls and a gold ornamental handle weighing 275 kalanju (of gold). The magnitude of these gifts shows the esteem in which the temple was held in Rājendra's time (M E R 1921, Para 32 Appendix B No. 629).

Worship of Sūrya, and other gods

The worship of Sūrya (the sun) appears to have been common during this period. A shrine in his honour was built at Alagādiputtūr in the 4th year of Rājendra (M E R 1909, Para 43). The worship of Ganapati and of Kshētrapālai is referred to as prevalent in his time. Thus a grant dated in 1013 A.D. (E C IX, Channapatna 135) registering a grant of land for the festival of the god Arumolidēvisvaram-udaiya Mahādēvar of Nagarili-sōlapuram, a portion of Manalur, states that the festival of that god should commence after the festival of Ganapatiyār was concluded. A tank was built at Puttandur in 1043 A.D., with three sluices by the local gamunda, who, it is recorded, set up three images on the occasion of Duggai, (i.e., Durga), Kettirapālar (Kshētrapālai) and Ganavatiyār, (i.e., Ganapatiyār) and made a grant of 700 kuli of land for it. (E C IX, Hoskote 142)

Features of his administration

Rājendra-Chōla seems to have administered the vast tract of country under his rule much on the lines laid down by his father. Rural administration continued as of old. Frequent references to village assemblies occur in the inscriptions of his period, both in the Tamil Districts of what is now the Madras Presidency and in the parts of Mysore in Chōla occupation since the 10th was a native of it. Next he is said to have defeated three Pandya kings. The first of these Manabharana was decapitated on the battle-field the second, Viraherala was trampled down by his furious elephant called Ativarana and the third Sundara Pandya was compelled to flee to ancient Mallaiyur his kingdom and thus his was lost. Further Rajadhiraja is said to have killed also in battle an unnamed king of Venadu (i.e. Travancore) and caused the ruin of the three princes of Iravagudain. Having routed and put to flight the Chēra king he following in this respect the example of his grandfather Rājaraja I destroyed the ships at Kāndalur salai. This would seem to show that the Chēras had, since their last defeat largely recovered their ground and had opposed the incursions of Rājadhiraia on them. It is particularly mentioned of the Chēra king that he was suffering from pains in the bowels and had hid himself in the jungles at the time of Rājadhiraia's attack on him. Then followed a victorious war against Āhavamalla Vikki Vijayāditya and Sungatayan which was led by a general named Kōvudan and in the course of which two of Āhavamalla's officers named Gandappayan and Gangadhara were killed and the City of Kollippukai (which had been taken by Rajendra Chola I and had apparently rebelled) was set on fire. The Āhavamalla referred to here has to be identified with the Western Chāluzyan king Āhavamalla Somesvara I and Vikki and Vijayāditya, his two sons, with Vikramāditya VI and Vishnuvardhana Vijayāditya. In this war apparently many enemy elephants were killed others fell into the hands of the conqueror with the golden ornaments they had on them with many horses as well. The victory over Āhavamalla is described as having been an easy one and his generals are stated to have retreated from the field of battle like cowards. The next expedition of Rājadhiraia cost their crowns to four Ceylon kings—Vikramabāhu Vikrama-Pāndya, item (in which they so behaved) and still continue to submit to the same rules. The last two conditions, queer though they are, speak for themselves and explain why even village assemblies had to penalise the behaviour of refractory members. The two other classes of village assemblies appear to have consisted of all the residents of a village (ñom) including cultivators and professionals, and of merchants (nagarattom). No rules regulating the management of these two classes of assemblies have been discovered so far. It is not unlikely that all the conditions pertaining to membership in the Brāhmanical subhas prevailed, except perhaps the knowledge of the Vēdas. Three inscriptions copied at Nattam, a hamlet of Paramēsvaramangalam (otherwise called Nigarilōlachaturvēdimangalam) in the Chingleput District, refer to the hall (chatussala) known as Rājēndrasōlan, in the village where the assembly used to meet and mention the committee of 'annual supervision' (samratsara-vāṇyam) which was constituted to look after village affairs, from and after the month of Tulā in that year. The committee consisted of twelve members and formed a part of the great village assembly (mahā sabha). Ūr-vāṇyam was the name of one of the village officers or of a committee of officers whose function, according to another record, was, evidently, to see the lands of the village properly cultivated and to collect the produce. These facts confirm the statement contained in the Uttaramallur inscriptions, viz, that the 'members comprising the committees should change every year' and that a village assembly consisted of several subordinate committees.

A few of Rājēndia's inscriptions found in the State afford curious details regarding local fights and the justice administered by the king's representatives in the interior of the kingdom. Death was the punishment for murder

Rājadhīrāja is said to have chased away (i.e., defeated and put to flight) many other kings, of whom four are specially named. These are Gandar Dinakara (i.e. Gandarāditya) Nāranaṇa (i.e. Nārāyaṇa) Ganapati (i.e. Ganapati) and Madhusudanaṇa (i.e. Madhusudana). These have not yet been identified though they may be taken to be fondatories of the Chalukya king. During this raid Rājadhīrāja is said to have also destroyed the palace at Hampī surrounded by fragrant gardens. Hampī was one of the principal capitals of the Western Chālukyas. It is also mentioned in Western Chālukya inscriptions and has been identified with the modern town of the same name in the Bellary District.

From the above it will be seen that Rājadhīrāja was a warlike prince. Some at least of his expeditions were personally led by him while in others, he seems to have employed his trusted generals. His wars were directed against the Pāndyas Chōras and Vēṇāḍu in the South against the Western Chālukyas, in the North and against the kings of Ceylon. There is hardly any doubt that he had a foothold in the territories forming these kingdoms. Indeed we know that his father and grandfather had carved out provinces of their own in them. So the boast that he appointed his relatives as governors to these provinces and to the Ganga (i.e. Western Ganga) and the Pallava countries may be taken to be not without foundation. The statement relating to Kanyākubja is, as already stated above, an evident exaggeration for there is no record of Rājadhīrāja leading an expedition against Kanauj though he did succeed in battle against a native of Kanyākubja who was a king of Ceylon.

That Rājadhīrāja actually captured Kalyānapora is proved from Western Chalukya and Chōla records. The dark deeds he perpetrated in this war are referred to in

His conquests.
First war against the Chālukyas.

in 1280 A D) This grant states that the charity recorded in it "is under the protection of all Mahēśvarās" and adds the tag "There is no guide but virtue to those who understand virtue" The Kolattū copper-plate grant, dated in the 15th regnal year of this king, states that the gift recorded in it is under the protection of the Earth, Water, Fire, Air, the Sky, the Moon, the Sun and the Stars (E C III, T-Narsipur 94) An inscription dated in 1014 A D, found at the Nārāyaṇa temple at Malūrpatna, recording a grant to the god Jayangonda-Sōla-Vinnagar-Ālvāi, states if those bound by its terms fail to supply annually the paddy required of them, the Śīvaishnavas and the Five Hundred charged with the protection of the charity, shall levy a fine of 1000 Kalanju of tax-free gold and compel them to supply it It appears from the record that they received from the hands of pūjaris of the temple 320 *kalam*s of paddy, measured by Jayangonda-Sōlan (a measure), and were to pay into the temple treasury, as interest, every year on it at the rate of 3 Kuruni and 6 *nāl*i of rice, 100 kalam of clean paddy and 50 *kalam*s of white paddy at the time of the spring harvest and 50 more at the time of the summer harvest—freed from stones, chaff, sprouting and diseased grains They were also to give two full meals every day to those who went to them for collecting this paddy If they made default even then, those who went to collect the paddy, were entitled, it is recorded, to forbid the entry of fire and water into the village, cut off communication with other villages and detain cattle for collection purposes Any obstructing them in the work of collection were to be responsible for any injury that might be caused by such obstruction (E C IX, Channapatna 129)

In another record relating to the same temple, dated in 1014 A D, the fine is fixed at 50 kalanju of gold on those who obstructed the members of the Assembly of

The war against the Pāndyas was apparently a successful one, king Mānābharana being killed and his two sons being taken captives. As his Sēnāpati (general) Jaya marindālvar, who is a signatory in an inscription of Rajendra Chōla I at Karūr (S I I III 39) is mentioned in a Ceylon record (M.E.R. 1913, Appendix B No. 612) he must be taken to have led the expedition against Ceylon. The powerful Ceylon king Vijayabahu I sur-named Sanghabōdhi about this period drove out the Cholas from the island and re-established the Singhalese rule in the island. During his reign a chief named Devasena built a Tooth relic temple and set up a Buddha image and invoked the Vēlaikkara army to protect it. (M.E.R. 1913, Para 27 also Appendix B 600) The Vēlaikkara troops, however, rebelled against him in the 80th year of his reign on being asked by him to go to war against Cholas. They were Indians who had emigrated to Ceylon and had embraced Buddhism as their religion. They would not however fight against the Chōla king under whose auspices they had entered the island. The rebellion however was quelled and the Vēlaikkaras entered into a friendly compact with Vijayabahu I in regard to protecting the new Tooth relic temple built under his orders by his general Devasēna (Ibid Para 29-30).

War against the Pāndya and Ceylon
kings.

The Tirumalayādi record of the 26th year of his reign, the Cape Comarin inscription of his 31st year and the Baṁnikonda inscription of his 32nd year mention among other things that Rājādhirāja drove the king of Vēṇāḍu (i.e. Travancore) to Sēṇāḍu (i.e. the Chēra country) relieved the Knpaka king of his subordination and destroyed the ships of Kāṇḍalur sālai. The statement about obtaining liberty to the Knpaka king shows that the Vēṇāḍu sovereign whose subordinate he appears to have been had overrun his country and occupied it and that Rājādhirāja drove the Vēṇāḍu king out and restored to

War against the Vēṇāḍu
king

Srīvaishnava-vāriyam (M.E.R. 1923, No 188 of 1923). Similarly we come across the Sattaganattā comprising ten members evidently constituted for the management of the Sasta temples, (M.E.R. 1923, No 37 of 1923). Lands sold by the Assembly to temples were first exempted from taxes like siddhayam, panchavaram, villara, etc. (M.E.R. 1923, Para 31, No 194 of 1923, No 184 of 1923)

Rājendra-Chōla appears to have taken a keen interest in the management and supervision of temples. Thus in the 31d year of his reign, he instituted while on a visit to the temple at Palayara (Tanjore District), an enquiry into the accounts and other affairs of several temples in the outgoing districts. He then settled many points connected with their income, fixed their scale of expenditure and entrusted the management of their affairs as then settled to certain local committees composed of respectable people (Ibid Para 32 Appendix C Nos 15 and 102 of the 10th regnal year). He carried out a survey of Brahmadēya lands during his reign. (M.E.R. 1909, Para 43)

His domestic
life

As his father, Rājendra-Chōla, he seems to have had a number of queens. Among these the names of the following are known from inscriptions — (1) Tribhuvana-mahādēvi, (2) Vānamahādēviyār, (3) Mukkōkilānadigal, (4) Nakkan Karukkan-marudal alias Panchavan-mādēvi, (M.E.R. 1919, Para 17. Appendix B No 464), (5) Danti-Pirāttiyār who is mentioned in an undated fragmentary inscription of Rājendra-Chōla which records a grant to a temple at Nattam in order that queen Danti-pirāttiyār and Rājendra-Chōla might prosper (M.E.R. 1913, Appendix B No 269) and (6) Alindavan Mahādēvi, who is referred to in an inscription dated in his 17th regnal year. The last of these built a shrine of Kshētiapāla in the temple of Kōnēnājapuram in the Tanjore District, to which she made a grant in that year.

Tanjore District called the Jayangondacholēsvara and Iṣṭhīrājēsvara now called Jayangondanātha and Kidornātha after the well known title and name of the king (M.F.R. 1897 Para 11) Among his grants was one to the Mahāviṣṇu temple at Tiruvadandai (M.F.R. 1911 Appendix B Nos. 258) This shows the toleration extended by him to the rival Viṣṇu faith which was indeed a marked characteristic of the Chōla kings. He was apparently the founder of hallur alias Rājādhirājachaturvedinangalam which is referred to in an inscription of his near the ruined Mulasthāna temple at Jodi Kempapur Chaturajnagar taluk It refers to an agreement entered into by certain warriors of this village which indicates how the war spirit of the time had caught hold of even the mercantile classes. Thus we are told that these warriors who belonged to the mercantile classes, made a grant for lamps at Iṣṭhīrājēsvara temple. They deemed the sceptre as their God. The record points the moral thus — 'There is no guide but virtue to those who understand virtue. (M.F.R. 1917 Para 95)

An inscription of Rājādhirāja dated in his 30th year found at Tribhuvani, in the South Arcot District, throws an interesting side light on the education given during his period This inscription dated in 1018 A.D. records the purchase of land by the village assembly in the name of the God Viranārāyaṇa-Vinnagara Ālvar to meet all the requirements of the charity known as the Rājendra Cholan uttamāgrāma established in the village by the general of Rājendra Chola Māvali Vānaraja, in order to secure the health of king Rājendra Chola Evidently the charity had been instituted while Rājendra Chola was yet alive but the necessary arrangements for giving effect to it were made by the village assembly only in the 30th year of the reign of his son and successor. We

Brahmanic education in the 11th
century

Narakkan Krishnan Rāman of Kēralāntaka-chaturvēdi-mangalam was still another military officer of the time. A gift of his, made in the 32nd year of Rājēndra-Chōla, in favour of the Siva temple at Tirunāgēsvaram, is known. He was the Commander of Rājaiāja's army and superintended the building of the enclosure of the great temple at Tanjore. (SII II 139, No 31). He set up an image of Ardhanārīsvaia in that temple (Ibid No 39)

His coinage

So far as could be made out, Rājēndra-Chōla does not appear to have added anything notable to the coinage of his time. The coinage of his father's time seems to have been current, though a Rājēndra-Sōlan-Kāsu, a coin apparently issued by Rājēndra-Chōla I, is referred to in an inscription of his dated in his 31d year and found at Kolai (M E R. 1912, Para 24, Appendix B No 478). An inscription dated in his 31d regnal year, found at Tirumukkūdal, Chingleput District, supplies the information that the Kāsu was a gold coin and when weighed by the weighing stone (nirarkallu) was found to be equal to three Kalanju (M E R 1916, Para 12; Appendix B No 176). It fetched an interest of 9 manjādi per year. Paddy was sold at 40 Kadi per Kalanju. From another inscription, dated about 20 years later (in Rājēndra-Chōla's 25th year), it would seem as though the rate of interest had nearly trebled itself and that 70 Kalanju and 2 manjādi fetched an interest of 3 Kalanju and 8 manjādi. The rate of exchange of paddy was $13\frac{1}{2}$ kalams per Kalanju. A grant to a tank, dated in 1023 A.D., is said to have consisted in 57 gadyāna in gold, 359 golden grains of rice and 42 poral. A grant of 37 poral is also mentioned. (E C IX Hoskote 10)

His titles

Among the titles and surnames of Rājēndra Chōla I are a few of some historical interest. He is referred to who learnt the Vēdas etc. were also exempted from certain payments or obligations. The rest of this huge record is damaged. Nevertheless it adds to the epigraphical evidence available to show that temple charities were not exclusively meant for ceremonials in the temple but also for scientific (śāstraic) and religious (Vedic) education. These details give us a glimpse of the Brahmanic education of the time. What teachers instructed their pupils in and what students read and learnt are alike made plain from this record which is, in certain respects fully in accordance with what we learn from the Ennāyiram record of Rājendra Chōla (see ante).

The second war against the Western Chālnkya appears to have occurred towards the close of Rājādhirāja's reign. Evidently this expedition was led in person by him, his brother Rājendra being second in command with him. The cause of this war may be inferred from E. C. I. Kolār 107 and Mulbagal 107. Though these inscriptions belong to the 3rd and 6th years (1051 and 1057 A.D.) of Rājendra Chōla the brother and successor of Rājādhirāja they give particulars relating to the war which occurred in Rājādhirāja's time, in which both were engaged. From Mulbagal 107 it would appear that Rājendra Chōla backed by the army of his elder brother led his own forces against the Western Chālnkya territories (Irattapādi 7½ lakh country) and erected a pillar of victory at Kollāpuram (modern Kolhapur). Later to take revenge Āhavamalla (Sōmesvara I) attacked the Chōla army at Koppam identified with modern Khidrāpur, 30 miles off Kolhapur where there is a well known temple of Koppēvara on the Pērār or big river a name by which the Krishna is probably meant. The battle was apparently a hard fought one. Rājādhirāja apparently riding an elephant, was killed and his brother Rājendra Chōla marched up to take his position and

Second war
against the Western Chālnkya;
Death of Rājādhirāja
1051-55 A.D.

then in Kannada by Gubbiya Mallanāya in his Bhāva-chinta Ratna (1513 A D Narasimhachār, Karnataka Kavi-charite, 1919 Edition, 443, 193, see also Wilson, Mackenzie Mss 324) Satyēndra-Chōla is one of the Nava-Chōlas (or Nine Chōlas) celebrated in the Vīrasaiva work Nava-Chōla Charita. There is a Telugu version of this work mentioned by Wilson (Mackenzie Mss, 273)

If it is granted that Satyēndra-Chōla's story as told in the Rājasēkharavilāsa has some historical basis, then Rājasēkhara of that work should be Rājādhirāja I, who was the second son of Rājēndra-Chōla, and was entitled Rājakēsarivarman and not his unnamed elder brother, whose title too is not known. Rājasēkhara in that case may be either a corruption, wanton or real, of Rājakēsari. According to the more prosaic story told in inscriptions, Rājādhirāja survived his father many years and ruled from 1018-1050 A D

His death,
1044 A D

Apart from the above poetical story of his translation to Siva's own regions, Rājēndra-Chōla probably died at Brahmadēsam, Cheyyū Taluk, North Arcot District, in A D 1044. His latest date is 1042 A D. It is not unlikely that his queen Vīra-mahādēvi, sister of the general (senāpati) Madurāntakan Parakēsarivēlar committed sati and was buried with him. In a record dated in the 26th year of Rājādhirājādēva, which corresponds to 1044 A D, it is stated that this general made a gift of land for maintaining a water-shed in order that the thirsty spirit of his sister, the above mentioned queen, might be appeased. It is stated that she entered the supreme feet of Brahma, i.e., died, in the very same tomb in which the body of King Rājēndra-Chōlādēva was buried (M.E.R. 1916, Appendix B, No 260, Para 14)

Estimate of Rājēndra-
Chōla's
career

Rājēndra-Chōla I must, from the information available from his many lithic inscriptions, be judged to be a great

When the impetuous and angry Salukki Vhavamalla having heard the report that the Valavan (Chôla king) desirous of war had marched upon Irattamandalam of superior strength and had destroyed its fame and many districts and towns exclaimed, "This is a disgrace to me!" sprang up his eyes burning with rage went to the beautiful great tirtha Koppam the strength of which place is hard to describe and commenced hostilities though the shower of Vhavamalla's straight arrows pierced his (Rājendra-dēva's) elephant's forehead his own thighs and mound like shoulders, and though the warriors wearing ankle rings, who had mounted the warlike elephants along with him fell—not minding all this (he) distributed on the battle-field many matchless warlike regiments which had not yet been detached and transported to heaven Jayasimha the younger brother of the valorous Chalukki the warlike Pulakēsin (i.e. Vhavamalla) the garland wearing Dasapanman (or Dassiarman) among proud princes the Manjalika Madan Araiyān who ruled with great renown which was well deserved Mottayao who wore a garland of opening buds full of honey the uoailing Naoor Vulamban and other princes without number whereupon the terrified Silokki (Vhavamalla Sōmēsvara I) having been utterly routed along with the steady Vaooliya, Rāvan Tuttan who had a powerful army Gadamayān whose army threatened death and many other furious princes fled trembling vehemently with dishevelled hair turning his back looking round and tiring his legs and was forced to plunge into the Western ocean. At that time the Chôla king captured in battle Satrubhayanakara Karabhadra Mūlabhadra and many other excellent elephants of noble breed horses of lofty gait herds of camels the victorious banners of the boar and the other insignia of royalty the peerless Sattiyarvai Sangappal and all the other queens a crowd of women and other booty which he (i.e. Vhavamalla) had abandoned on that battle-field and performed the anointment of victory.

The above realistic account is taken from an inscription found at Volagerohalli hamlet of Kengeri near Bangalore. (EC IX, Bangalore 108) The date is lost, but it probably belongs to the 4th year of Rājendra Dēva

Chintāmani, Kolar District) is dated in his 30th regnal year, which is coupled with Saka 870, Cyclic year Sarvajit. He must accordingly have ascended the throne in or about 1018 A.D., during the life-time of his predecessor Rājēndra-Chōla I. (M E R 1895, Appendix B No 279 of 1895). The year 1018 A.D. would be the 17th regnal year of Rājēndra-Chōla I. This conclusion is corroborated by an inscription of his (Rājādhirāja's) own dated in his 26th regnal year in which the people of Tnūmalapādi speak of 'our emperor Rājēndra-Chōladēva' (M E R, 1895, Appendix B No 75 of 1895). In the introduction to the same inscription, Rājādhirāja describes himself as the co-regent of his father (M E R 1895, Appendix B No 75 of 1895). It is thus clear that he began his rule while his father was still king. Being thus associated with his father in the Government, or as certain inscriptions (E C IX, Nelamangala 25 and E C X Chikballapur 21) put it, having planted his own umbrella under the white parasol of his father, he doubtless shared, as the inscriptions state he did, in his career of conquest. There are inscriptions of his dated from at least the 11th year of his reign (M E R 1896, Appendix B, No 123 of 1896) to his 36th year (M.E.R 1922, Para 17 Appendix B, No 262, M E R 1925, Appendix B, Nos 48 and 244 of 1925). One dated in his 35th year is at Kōyil Tēvarāyanpēttai in the Tanjore District (M E R 1910, Para 21). Several dated in his 32nd year are also known (e g, M.E.R 1895, No 221 of 1894, M E R 1913, Appendix B, No 342, M E R 1922, Appendix C, No 239 and M E R, 1918, Appendix C, No 55 of 1918). One of his 31st regnal year is known (M E R 1896, Appendix B, No 96 of 1896). There are a few also dated in his 30th regnal year (e g, M E R 1918, Appendix B, No 330 of 1917). These inscriptions ought to suffice to show that he did rule at least up to the 36th year of his reign, i e, to 1054 A.D. If this is

The village assemblies continued to function as usual throughout his reign. Though they usually met in mandapas built specially for the purpose, we are told in an inscription of Koncirājaputram that the assembly of the brahmadeya village of Pāvaikkudi met under a tamarind tree called Rājendra solan and made a grant to a Siva temple. (M.E.R. 1910 Appendix B, No. 653 of 1909 Para 21). The king's officers called idhikāris could when they required for any purpose convene meetings of the Village Assembly. In one case we are told they convened such a meeting and ordered the re-survey of the village land at the request of the assembly. Certain inscriptions show that the assembly could not impose more than a specified number of taxes on public charities. The exemption from taxation in cases of this kind was apparently under royal direction. Similarly teachers and students of the Vīda were exempted from taxes of certain kinds. (M.E.R. 1910 Para 18 see Appendix C No. 176)

Rajendra
Deva
1062-1064
A.D.

Rājadhīrāja was succeeded by his younger brother Rājendra Devo. His reign overlapped that of his older brother as his own was overlapped by that of his successor Vīra-Rājendradeva. This may be inferred from the Tirumalovādi inscription of the 9th year of Rājendra Devo which refers to a gift made in the 3rd year of Vīra Rājendra Devo. (M.E.R. 1895 No. 87 of 1895). He is styled Parakēsarivarmān in his inscriptions. According to Dr. Kiehlhorn he ascended the throne on 28th May 1062 A.D. His inscriptions have been found as far south as Cape Comorin where in the temple of Kumāri is one of his 4th year. (M.E.R. 1896 Appendix B, No. 105 of 1896). Inscriptions of his 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 8th and 12th years are known. The last is, perhaps, the latest known of his reign. His 12th regnal year corresponds to 1063-64 A.D. (M.E.R. 1899 Para 49)

Rajendra
Deva,
1062-1064
A.D.

in an inscription, whose date is lost, he is stated to have taken the head of Vīra-Pāndya, the Sālā of the Sērala (Chēra king), Ilanga (Ceylon) and Rattapādi 7½ lakhs and performed the anointment of victors at Kalyānapura. Another, dated in his 36th year, states definitely that the king had the anointment of heroes under the (appropriate) name Vijaya-Rājēndradēva. (M E R 1925, Appendix B, No 48, and 244 of 1925) The surname Jayangonda-Chōla, (i.e., the Chōla who obtained the victory) probably dates from about the same time and signifies his success over the Western Chālukyas. He is said to have "acquired great fame under the title of Jayangorda-Chōla" (E C IX, Devanhalli 75 and 76)

Description of his reign

The reign of Rājādhirāja is described at length in several of his inscriptions. Among these are E C IX, Devanhalli 75, S I I, III 1, No 28 at Manimangalam in Chingleput District, which is dated in his 29th year, an inscription at Tiruvēnkādu, Tanjore District, of the same year (M. E R No 114 of 1896), an inscription at Tiruvorriyūr, near Madras, dated in his 31st year (M. E R. No 107 of 1892), an inscription of his 32nd year at Tiruvaiyāru, near Tanjore (M E R No 107 of 1892), and an inscription dated in his 33rd year at Devanhalli, near Bangalore (E C IX, Devanhalli 76). The historical introduction prefaced to his inscriptions dated in his 29th year gives a list of all his conquests, while those of his 31st, 32nd and 33rd years furnish some additional details. The reign of Rājādhirāja is thus described in the former --

"While the goddess of the earth was beaming under his fringed white parasol, which resembled the moon in beauty (the king) wedded the goddess of fortune, wielded the sceptre and destroyed the dark Kali (age)

(He) bestowed crowns of brilliant jewels, adorned with gold, on his father's younger brother, (his) glorious elder brother -- country including the destruction of temples and was met by Āhavamalla at Hoppai. At first the advantage seems to have been on the side of the Chalukya king Rājendra himself and his elephant were wounded by arrows and the men who had mounted the elephants along with him were killed. But fresh troops were advanced and turned the fortune of the battle. Āhavamalla fled and several of his officers fell. Among these the inscriptions mention a younger brother of the Chalukya king Jayasinha (who is unknown to Chalukya inscriptions) Pulakesin (apparently a subordinate chief) Dasapanman (which probably stands for Yasovarman), Aśokaiyan, Āraiyan, Mottaiyan and Nanni Nulamban who may have been a Pallava chief of Nulambapādi and among those who took part in the fight Vanniya Rāvan, Tuttan and Kundamaiyan. The first of these has been identified with the Haibaya chief Revarama who is mentioned as a feudatory of Sumesvara I in an inscription dated in 1051-55 A.D. (Eleet Kanarese Dynasties 439). Among the spoil of the battle were many elephants three of which are mentioned by name, the banner of the boar and two queens by name—Sattiyavvai and Sangappai. This defeat of Āhavamalla Sūmesvara I is not fully reflected in the Chalukya inscriptions. Though the Annigero record admits the devastation of the Chalukya territory it states that Rājādhirāja ultimately yielded his head in battle to Āhavamalla and thus losing his head, broke the succession of his family. He thus practically claims a victory for himself the date of which is fixed by an inscription at Sūdi in the Dharwar District to be shortly before the 20th January 1060 A.D. (Eleet, Bombay Gazetteer 441). The grant referred to in this record is said to have been made by them while halting, on his journey back after a conquest of the Chōla country and king Bilhana duly chronicles the war and claims that Sūmesvara I tempestuous ocean, the crown of large jewels, (belonging to) the lord of Lanka, Vikrama-Pāndiyan, who, having lost the whole of the southern Tamil country which had previously belonged to him, had entered Īlam (surrounded by) the seven oceans, the beautiful golden crown of the king of Simhala, Vira-Salāmēgan, who believing that Īlam (surrounded by) the ocean was superior to the beautiful Kannakuchchi (Kanyakubja) which belonged to him, had entered (the island) with his relatives and (those of) his countrymen who were willing (to go with him), and had put on the brilliant crown, who, having been defeated on the battle-field and having lost his black elephant, had fled ignominiously and who, when (the Chōla king) seized his elder sister along with (his) daughter and cut off the nose of (his) mother, had returned in order to remove the disgrace (caused) thereby, and, having fought hard with the sword, had perished in a hot battle, and the extremely brilliant crown of large jewels, (belonging to) the king of Īlam, Srīvallavan (Srīvallabha) Madanarajan, who had come to Kannaran (Kishna) and taken up (his) abode (with him)

Having led for the second time a warlike army into the northern region, (the Chōla king) defeated in battle Gandardinakaran, Nāranan (Nārāyana), Kanavādi (Ganapati), Madisūdanan (Madhusūdana), (who wore) a garland of flowers (surrounded by) bees, and many other kings, and caused to be destroyed the palace of the Salakkīyar in the city of Kampili, whose gardens diffuse fragrance "

An achievement attributed to Rājādhirāja by both sets of inscriptions mentioned above is that he "destroyed the palace of the Chālukya king in the city of Kampili," a statement which is amplified in the Kalṅgattu-parani (VIII 26) when it says that he "planted a pillar of victory at Kampili." He is further said to have appointed seven of his relatives to be governors over the Chōla, Chālukya, Pāndya and Ganga countries, the island of Ceylon, the Pallava country and Kanyakubja. His claim to the conquest to the last of these countries seems to rest on the fact that he killed a king of Ceylon, who the reason why Vīra Śalāmēgan is styled a Kalinga king in Rājendra Dēva's inscriptions might be the fact that his mother in law was a Kalinga princess according to the Mahāvamsa (S.I.I III : 59). On the other hand king Vijayabāhu I is supposed to have reigned from A.D. 1065 to 1120 and Vikramabāhu, in whose time Manabharana I and Kittisirimegha I usurped the government of Ceylon from A.D. 1121 to 1142 while Rājendra and Vīra-Rājendra I have to be accommodated between A.D. 1050 and 1070. Consequently, Manabharana and Vīra Śalāmēghan mentioned in the inscriptions of Rājendra Deva must be distinct from and prior to Manabharana I and Kittisirimegha I referred to in the Mahāvamsa. The conquest of Ceylon by Rājendra Deva however is independently established by the existence of an inscription of his found at Sangail Kanadarāva in that island. (S.I.I III : 39 f. n. 7). In this inscription he is mentioned Śēnāpati Jayamrinād alvār who was one of the five officers of Rājendra Dēva, who signs the grants recorded in Nos. 20 and 31 (S.I.I III, 1). In these inscriptions he is stated to have borne the name of Arayan Rājārājan, alias Virarājendra Jayamerina-ālvān. (Ibid 39).

One of the Manumangalam inscriptions (S.I.I III, 1 No. 29) which is identical in terms with EC IX Bangalore 108, gives a full description of his reign. The date of the latter is lost but as it is substantially the same as Manumangalam 29 it might be set down as before suggested to the 4th year of Rājendra-Dēva's reign. The following extract from the Manumangalam inscription is based on Dr. Hultzsch's reading of it as contained in S.I.I III : 61-63 —

Description of his reign.

"While the goddess of fortune and the great goddess of the earth became his great queens, (the king) raised on high (his) brilliant white parasol and uprooted the powerful Kali (age)

Vīra-Salāmēgan, and Srīvallabha Madanarāja The second of these is said to have ruled over the Southern Tamil country before taking possession of Ceylon, the third to have originally ruled over Kanyakubja and the fourth to have taken refuge with a certain Kṛṣṇa. Worst of all fared Vīra-Salāmēgan The Chōla king seized his elder sister and his daughter (or wife) and cut off the nose of his mother, while he himself fell in battle. It is said of him that he took fright and fled from the field of battle, on his strong elephant, but having heard of the fate of his relations, returned to wipe out his disgrace, but perished in his endeavour. His golden crown, set with large jewels, fell to the Chōla king. A somewhat different account of these struggles with the Ceylon king is given in the 56th Chapter of the Mahāvamsa (Wijesinha's Translation, 91), which mentions successively the reigns of Vikramabāhu, who is supposed to have reigned from A.D. 1037 to 1049, Vikrama-Pāndu (A.D. 1052 to 1053), Jagatīpāla (A.D. 1053 to 1057) and Parākrama-Pāndu (A.D. 1057 to 1059). Of Jagatīpāla, it is said that he came from the city of Ayōdhya, that the Chōlas slew him in battle, and that they carried his queen and his daughter to the Chōla country. As the names of the first two kings, Vikramabāhu and Vikrama-Pāndya, are the same in Rājādhirāja's inscriptions and in the Mahāvamsa, Dr. Hultzsch proposes to identify Jagatīpāla with Vīra-Salāmēgan, who came from Kanyakubja, who was killed by the Chōlas and whose elder sister and daughter were carried away by them. It remains uncertain whether he was a native of Kanyakubja (Kanauj) or Ayōdhya, as stated respectively in Rājādhirāja's inscriptions and in the Mahāvamsa. The fourth king Srīvallabha Madanarāja is perhaps the same as the Parākrama-Pāndu of the Mahāvamsa, who is said to have been killed by the Cholas. In his second expedition to the north,

At that time when the shower of his (viz Āhavamalla's) straight arrows pierced the forehead of his (i.e. the Chōla king's) elephant his royal thigh and (his) shoulders which resembled hillocks and when the warriors wearing anklorings who had mounted the elephant along with him fell (the Chōla king) distributed (on the battle field) many matchless warlike regiments (which had) not (yet been) detached and transported to heaven Jayasingan (who was) the younger brother of that strong Salukki the warlike Pulikēśi and Dasapanman (who wore) a garland among proud princes the chief (Mandalin) Asōkariyan Araiyan who ruled (with) great fame which was well deserved Muttaiyan (who wore) a garland of half-open (buds) full of honey Nanni Nulamban of great valour and other princes without number.

The Salukki was defeated —with Vannalāya Rāvaru Tuttan (who had) a powerful army, Kundamayan whose army spoke (i.e. threatened) death and other princes —fled trembling vehemently with dishevelled hair turning (his) back looking round and tiring (his) legs and was forced to plunge into the western ocean.

At that time (the Chōla king) captured in battle Satrabha yamkara, Karabhadra Mulabhadra and many (other excellent elephants of noble breed horses of lofty gait herds of camels the victorious banner of the boar and the other insignia of royalty the peerless Sattiyavai Sangappai and all the other queens) a crowd of women and other (booty) which he (viz Āhavamalla) had abandoned on that battle-field and performed the anointment of victory.

(The king) despatched a warlike army into the southern region captured in Lanka, (surrounded by) the black ocean Vira Salāmēgan the king of the Kaṅgingas (who had) a powerful army with (his) elephants (which resembled) the ocean caused to be cut off (his head which wore) a brilliant crown and seized on the battle-field the two sons of Manabharanan the king of the people of Lanka."

Not much is known of his domestic life. One of his queens is referred to in an inscription of his 3rd year as making a gift of gold ornaments to the shrine at Dakṣiṇakāśilasa (M.E.R. 1895 Appendix A No. 313

His domestic life etc.

the Annigere record dated in 1071 A D , already referred to (See under Western Chālukyas). It refers to the wicked Chōla, who had abandoned the religious observances of his family, penetrated into the Belvola country and burned the Jaina temples which Ganga-Perumadi, the lord of the Gangamandala, while governing the Belvola province, had built in the Annigeri-nādu. (Fleet, Kanarese Dynasties, 441) According to a fragmentary inscription built into the Dasikere oddu, to the east of Talkād, the destruction of Āhavamalla's army is attributed to Gandakayya and other generals. (M A R. 1912, Para 80) That in the first expedition he did take Kalyānapuram is testified to by an image at Dārāsūram, near Kumbakonam (M E.R. 1908, also Appendix D. No 28). The image is now standing on the platform to the left of the entrance into the inner gōpura of the Āirāvātēsvara temple at the village. It bears an inscription at its bottom to the effect that it was brought by Vijayarājēndradēva (i.e., Rājādhirāja) after the conquest of Kalyānapuram (M E.R. 1908, Para 50, also No 24 of 1908) It was apparently an image which was transported from Kalyānapuram to Dārāsūram. After his conquest of Kalyānapuram, the division of Amūr-kōttam received the name of Kalyānapuramgonda-chōla-kōttam. That he reckoned this victory a great one is proved by the importance he attached to it. His surnames Vijayarājēndra and Jayangonda-Chōlu apparently date from this conquest (M E.R. 1908, Para 76). In an inscription at the Nāgesvara temple at Kumbakonam, he claims to have destroyed Kalyānapuram and to have performed the anointment of heroes under the name Vijayarājēndra (Ibid and M A R. 1912, Para 80) This is confirmed by an inscription from Alangudi in the Tanjore District, which mentions that Vijayarājēndra took Kalyānapuram and Kollapuram (M.E.R. 1898-1899, Para 53)

remitted the taxes payable by the temple on the land alienated in its favour (VER 1899 Para 53)

The year in which Rājendra Dēva died is not known, though it is nearly certain he ruled till about 1062-63 A D

Rajendra Deva appears to have been succeeded by his son Rājamahendra Deva, with whom probably ruled jointly Virarajendra and Adhirājendra his paternal uncles. His reign seems to be covered altogether by those of Rajendra Deva and Virarajendra I. All these kings as successors of Rājendra Dēva have to be accommodated between A D 1063-64 and 1070 A D the date of accession of Kulōttunga Chōla I. Rājendra Deva a son in law (EI IV 266). It is not improbable that Rajendra Deva was ruling with one or more of these three princes as co-regents. (ME R 1897 Para 49). Of Rājamahendra, however nothing particularly to his credit is known except that he enforced the rules laid down by Mann (VER 1899 Para 53 No 5 of 1899). Very few inscriptions of his reign are known. An incomplete one has been published by Dr Hultzsch (S.I.I III : No 56). It is dated in his 2nd year and is to be seen on the south wall of the Mahāmandapa in the Bikanathesvara temple at Tiruvallam. It records a grant by a military officer named Sankaran Kandaradittanar alias Senapati Rājarājasōhiya-varaiyār lord of Inganur in Inganadu a district of Arumolidevavalanadu. Another inscription of his dated in the same (2nd) year is to be seen on the walls of the Vishnu temple at Pullalur Chingleput District. It records a gift of land made as Bharata vritti by the wife of a member of the directorate (Alumganam) of a village. (VER 1923 Para 32 Appendix C No 50 of 1929). Another inscription of his dated in his 3rd year has been found at Tirupāpalayur (M.E R 1902, Appendix B

Rājamahendra-Dēva,
Rājakesari
varman 1063-
1065 A D

the Kūpaka chief his kingdom (M E R 1895, Appendix B No 75 of 1895, M E R 1896, Para 26 and Appendix B No 96 of 1896, M E R 1913, Appendix B No. 342, and Para 26, and E I. IX 234 f n) The exact date of this restoration of the Kūpaka chief and the burning of the Kāṇḍalūr-sāla is not known, but may be set down to somewhere about the 26th year of his reign or A D. 1044 Kūpaka is part of the modern Travancore State The destruction of the sāla of Sēramān (i e, the Chēra king) apparently belongs to the same campaign A fragmentary inscription found at Ūttattūr in the Trichy District, substitutes for Sāla, the name Kāṇḍalūr-Sāla on the borders of the Western ocean and thus makes it clear that the place has to be looked for on the West Coast, in the old Chēra country (M. E R 1913, Para 24) Rājādhirāja boasts in his inscriptions (of his 29th year) of having collected the tribute due to him from the different kings "without remissions" Apparently he was an exacting king so far as his tributaries were concerned. He, however, received only the sixth share of the produce of the earth due to him. These riches, both tribute and his part of the revenue from land, he "gladly gave away" to those versed in the four Vēdas We are told that "in order to be famed in the whole world, he followed the path of Manu and performed the horse-sacrifice" From this we may infer that he had enough to perform the asvamēdha (horse-sacrifice), which indicates the booty he must have gathered from his many wars. Phrases indicative of his unbounded liberality occur in his inscriptions and show that though he might have been relentless in his methods of warfare, he knew how to endeavor himself to his people and to his army and how to win their goodwill

Rājādhirāja,
as a builder
of temples

Rājādhirāja, like his predecessors, was a builder of temples He built the two Śiva temples at Mannāṅgudi, of his dated in his 2nd, 3rd 4th 5th 6th and 7th years have been found in the Bangalore District and in the Districts of Chinglopt North Arcot and South Arcot (V.E.R 1910 Para 22 Appendix B No 718 of 1909 E.C IX Channapatna 85 M.E.R 1916 Appendix B No 182, and M.E.R 1925 Appendix B No. 139 of 1925) besides many of his reign at the Siva temple at Kiranur near Palni (M.E.R 1894 September Para 12) An inscription of his dated in his 7th year couples that regnal year with Saka 991 Cycle year Saumya corresponding to A.D 1069 70 The year of his accession would accordingly be 1063 4 A.D But a calculation made from the astronomical details furnished by this inscription shows that he must have ascended the throne in 1062 63 A.D Probably the Cycle year is wrongly quoted in this inscription (M.E.R 1904 Para 21 No 273 of 1904)

An inscription at Karavar in the present Coimbatore District, dated in his 4th year (S.I.I III, 1 No 20) which is in many respects similar in its historical introduction to an inscription of his dated in the same year and found at the Kailāśvara temple at Malur (E.C IX Channapatna 85) gives a graphic account of the events of his reign. He fought, it would appear three times against the Western Chālukya King Āhavamalla-Somēśvara I and his two sons Vikramāditya VI and Jayasimha III, or as they are styled in the Chola inscriptions, Vikkalan and Singanan. Virarājendra claims to have gained a decisive victory over them at Kudalaangamam a place at the confluence of the Tungabhadra and the Krishna. (I.A XIX. 340) The battle of Kudalaangamam was the third occasion on which Virarājendra I professes to have defeated the Western Chālukyas. He had already before driven Vikkalan from Gangspādi over the Tungabhadra and on a second occasion he had defeated an

His co-
quena.

are told that land was purchased to the extent of 72 vēḷi which could yield an annual rental of 12,000 kalam of paddy, which quantity was required annually to conduct the charity in all its details. Besides providing for offerings, worship, etc., on a grand scale to Vīrrirunda-Perumāl Alagiyaṁanavāla and Narasiṅga-Ālvār, for conducting the festivals of Māsi-tiruppunarpūsam Jayantyāshṭamī, Mārgalī-tiruvēkādaśī, for Uttarāyana, Dakṣhīnāyana, Aippasī and Sittirai Viṣṇus, for feeding the Śrī-Vaiṣṇavas and for reciting the Tiruvāymoli—all of which required 2,475 kalam of paddy annually, the grant made further provision also for (i) three teachers of the R̥g-Vēda, three of the Yajur-Vēda, one each of Chhandōgasāma Talavakārasama, Apūrva, Vājasaneyya Bōdhāyanīya and Satyāshṭa (adha) sūtra, thus making a total of 12 teachers with a daily allowance of 4 kalam of paddy, (ii) for one person each for expounding the Vēdānta, Vyākāraṇa, Rūpāvatāra, Śrī-Bhārata, Rāmāyana, Manu-Sāstra and Vaikhāṇasa-Sāstra, (iii) for sixty students each of the R̥g-Vēda and Yajur-Vēda, twenty of Chhandōgasāma and fifty of other Sāstras, thus making a total of 190 persons with a daily ration of 11 kalam, 10 kuruvu, 4 nāl, and (iv) for 70 other students of the Vēdānta, Vyākāraṇa and Rūpāvatāra. The provision thus made for feeding the teachers and students detailed above consisted of 9,525 kalam of paddy. In all, the total requirements for the year came to 12,000 kalam which were ordered to be measured out by the holders of the 72 vēḷi of land purchased and given for the purpose. It was stipulated that the taram (i.e., the class) of the land should not be altered even when the general classifications were undertaken, that on this land, except ēri-āyam, pādikāṇal, and ēri-amanyu, no other taxes or obligations should be imposed and that the teachers who gave instruction in the Vēdas, the Bhattas who expounded the Sāstras and the students

(1066 A D) adds that Virarājendra I killed the king of Pottappi the Kerala the Pandya and others. (S.I.I III No 30) The Manimangalam inscription of the 3rd year (S.I.I III No 30) notices further victories over the Keralas, Chalukyas and Pandyas a battle which had been fought on the bank of an unspecified river the burning of Rattapadi and the planting of a pillar of victory on the Tungabhadra the appointment (of Vikramāditya VI) as heir apparent of the Chalukya king (Āhavamalla) the conquest of Vēṅgai nāḍu Kalingam and Chakrakottam and the bestowal of Vēṅgai nāḍu on Vijayaditya VII There are several inscriptions with the shorter historical introduction which opens with Vīramatundīyagavam and of these those dated from the 2nd to the 5th years state Virarājendra I defeated Āhavamalla and his two sons Vikramāditya VI and Jnyasimha III at Kudalsangamam and seized Āhavamalla's queen treasures and vehicles. This brief statement corresponds to the long description of the battle of Kudalsangamam which appears first in the Tiruvēṅgādu inscription of the 2nd year In accordance with the statements in the longer introduction in which the battle of Kudalsangamam is said to have been the third encounter with the Chālukyas, the Tirunāmanallur inscription of the 4th year (S.I.I III n 81) attributes to Virarājendra the birudu who saw the back of Āhavamalla three times. Five inscriptions of the 5th year add that Virarājendra I terrified Āhavamalla yet a second time on the appointed battle-field fulfilled the vow of his own elder brother and seized Vēṅgai nāḍu The battle which had been appointed near the river and the conquest of Vēṅgai nāḍu are referred to also in the Manimangalam inscription of the 5th year The elder brother mentioned has been identified by Dr Hultzsch with Ālavandan surnamed Rājārāja or Rājādhirāja The vow which he is said to have made seems to have had the conquest of Vēṅgai for its object.

turned the fortunes of the war. The Annigere record, already referred to above, states that Rājādhirāja yielded his head to the Chālukya king Sōmēsvara (Āhavamalla) in battle and forfeited his life. This, however, clouds the real facts which are mentioned in other inscriptions. Thus, a Chālukyan inscription found in this State (E C. VII, Shikarpur 118) says that the Chōla king valiantly died in the battle-field (āhavanangadōl chōlkan ammisattan). In another inscription, found at Punjai in the Tanjore District, and dated in the 31d year of Rājēndra-Chōla (A D 1054), it is stated more explicitly that Rājādhirāja died on elephant back (ānaimēl-tunṇiyarulina). As he died fighting in the battle at Koppam, he must be taken, from the manner in which he is described in this inscription, to have died on elephant-back while fighting in the battle (M E R 1925, Para 10, also Appendix B, No 193 of 1925). This is confirmed by another inscription dated in the 36th year of Rājādhirāja himself and in the 3rd year of Rājēndra-Chōla, his younger brother. In this record Rājādhirāja is definitely described as ānaimēl tunṇiyarulina Vyayaarājēndradēva. This epithet cannot, therefore, be held to apply to Rājēndra-Chōla himself as has been suggested by some (T. A. Gopinatha Rao, Sōlavamsa Charitram, 22-23, and M E R 1925, Para 16). It is thus clear that Rājādhirāja fell in battle while fighting on his elephant. Notwithstanding his death, his brother Rājēndra-Chōla, who was himself severely wounded in action, and had lost many of his principal leaders, took command of the army and saved the day. He contrived to slay king Sōmēsvara's younger brother Jayasinga, Pulakēsi, Dasavarma, Nanni-Nulamba and many other princes, so that Āhavamalla (i.e. Sōmēsvara) fled in terror. The exciting nature of the fight will be perceived from the following account taken from an inscription —

(1066 A D) adds that Virarājendra I killed the king of Pottappi the Kerala the Pandya and others. (S.I.I III No 20) The Manimangalam inscription of the 3rd year (S.I.I III No 30) notices further victories over the Kerala Chalukyas and Pandyas a battle which had been fought on the bank of an unspecified river the burning of Rattapadi and the planting of a pillar of victory on the Tungabhadra the appointment (of Vikramāditya VI) as heir apparent of the Chalukya king (Āhavamalla) the conquest of Vēṅgai nādu Kalingam and Chakrakottam and the bestowal of Vēṅgai nādu on Vijayāditya VII There are several inscriptions with the shorter historical introduction which opens with Vīramatundīyagavam and of these, those dated from the 2nd to the 5th years state Virarājendra I defeated Āhavamalla and his two sons Vikramāditya VI and Jayasinha III at Kudalsangamam and seized Āhavamalla's queen treasures and vehicles. This brief statement corresponds to the long description of the battle of Kudalsangamam which appears first in the Tiruvēṅgādu inscription of the 2nd year In accordance with the statements in the longer introduction, in which the battle of Kudalsangamam is said to have been the third encounter with the Chālukyas the Tirunamanallur inscription of the 4th year (S.I.I III. n. 81) attributes to Virarājendra the birudu who saw the back of Āhavamalla three times Five inscriptions of the 5th year add that Virarājendra I terrified Āhavamalla yet a second time on the appointed battle-field fulfilled the vow of his own elder brother and seized Vēṅgai nādu The battle which had been appointed near the river and the conquest of Vēṅgai nādu are referred to also in the Manimangalam inscription of the 5th year The elder brother mentioned has been identified by Dr Hultzsch with Ālavandān surnamed Rājārāja or Rājādhirāja The vow which he is said to have made seems to have had the conquest of Vēṅgai for its object

as it bears the same introduction as his Manimangalam inscriptions (S I I III, 1. No 29) Kolar 107, dated in his 3rd year, and Mulbagal 107, dated in his 6th year, add a few more particulars to the above account The latter inscription says that Rājēndra-dēva

“Without meeting with opposition in battle, while his drums were sounding through the directions, converted the whole warlike army of Āhavamalla into reeking corpses that covered the earth, and when Āhavamalla turned his back and fled from the battle-field at Koppam on the banks of the Perāru, was pleased to take possession of his elephants, horses and camels ”

To the above booty, Kolar 107 adds “women and treasures ” and says that he performed, thereafter, the anointment of victory Manimangalam 22 (S I I III, 1) adds the further information that the news of the anointment of heroes spread in all directions

Such was the battle of Koppam, at which Rājādhirāja died His death was revenged by his younger brother, Rājēndra-dēva, whose reign is dealt with below.

Internal
condition,

Rājādhirāja undoubtedly maintained his father's reputation as a prince and as a soldier The kingdom seems to have enjoyed internal peace and there is evidence enough to believe that during his time the people were contented and happy The administration seems to have run smooth, despite the distractions created by the wars which the king either indulged in or possibly could not avoid His hard won names of the victorious (Jayangonda) Chōla and the triumphant king of kings (Vijaya-Rājēndradēva) seem to have been earned by him by his success in war His death on his warring elephant, on the battle-field, is one that he would naturally, as a keen soldier, have wished for himself in Gaagapādi (2) the first expedition into Vengai nādu (3) the battle of Kudalasangamam (4) the battle near the river and (5) the burning of Kampi. Then we have in one inscription of this (7th) year the re-conquest of Vengai nādu which according to another of the 6th year fell between the 4th and 5th encounters with Āhavamalla. According to one inscription of the 7th year Virarājendra bestowed the Vengaimandalam on the Chalukya Vijayaditya who has been identified by Dr Hultzsch with the Eastern Chalukya Vijayāditya VII. The same fact is mentioned in the Manimangalam inscription of the 5th year. We have then in an inscription of the 7th year the further additional fact that Virarājendra conquered the country of Kadaram in Burma. Finally Virarājendra drove Sōmesvara II out of the Kannara country invested his younger brother Vikramāditya VI with the necklace—the emblem of the dignity of heir apparent—and made Rattapadi over to him. The same transaction is referred to in the Manimangalam inscription of the 5th year by the statement Virarājendra had the necklace on the Ilar's neck and appointed him to the dignity of Vallabha (or Chālnkya). A comparison of the inscriptions of the 6th year suggests that the necklace bestowed on Vikramāditya VI was taken away from his elder brother Sōmesvara II and that Virarājendra I appointed the former as heir apparent of Āhavamalla in his place.

From the above comparative study of the inscriptions of Virarājendra I the following tentative deductions may be made.—The fight against the Kērala, and Pāndya and others took place early in his reign. There were five fights against the Chalukyas the third one being at Kudalasangamam sometime before 1064 A.D. The battle near the river and the sacking of Kampili probably followed between 2nd and 5th years i.e. 1064-1067 A.D.

Their order fixed by his inscriptions.

No 144 of 1898, see also M.E.R. 191c, Appendix B, No 57, M.E.R. 1895, Appendix A, No 213 of 1914; M.E.R. 1918, Para 31, Nos. 58 of 1918 and 318 of 1917, M.E.R. 1926, Appendix C, Nos 108, 115, 137 and 102). Several of these inscriptions give a description of the chief events of his reign. The great part he took in the battle of Koppam and the manner in which he retrieved the fortunes of the day have been narrated above. Though both Rājādhirāja and Rājendra-Dēva were present at this battle and took part in it, Rājendra-Dēva alone takes credit in his inscriptions for the victory achieved in it. (M.E.R. 1899, Para 49, No 144 of 1898) This claim has to be understood as referring to the final phases of that battle and no more.

His conquests War against the Western Chālukyas,
1054-55 A.D.

Some of his inscriptions, like those of his predecessor and successor, make mention of his relations on whom king Rājendra-Dēva is said to have conferred certain titles. The recipients of these honours were one of his own paternal uncles, his four younger brothers, his six sons and two grandsons. The fifth of the sons, Mudikonda-Chōla, who had the title Sundara-Chōla, has been identified with a prince of the same name and title, who is mentioned in the inscriptions of Rājendra's successor, Virarājendra I. His second son was also called Mudikonda-Chola, but he bore the title of Vijayālaya. A number of Rājendra-Dēva's inscriptions furnish us a detailed account of the part he took in the battle of Koppam, which is also briefly referred to in others belonging to his reign. His enemy Āhavamalla (Somēśvara I) is, in these inscriptions, expressly referred to as Salukki, i.e., the Chālukya king. The circumstances under which this battle came to be fought have been detailed in the account of the reign of his brother Rājādhirāja. The war began with the invasion by the Chōla king of the Rattamandalam. The advancing army did great damage to the enemy's

(He) was pleased to grant the Pāndi mandalam whose crown of jewels is exalted in this world to his royal son Gangaikonda Sōlan (along with the title) Sōla Pāndiyan (the leader) of an army of very tall elephants. (He) bestowed a brilliant crown on Mndikonda Sōlan whose hand (held) the sword (and) whose spear had a sharp point (along with the title) Sundara Sōlan and conferred endless great distinctions (on him) (Thus he) granted to each of his numerous relations suitable great riches

(He) drove from the battle field in Ganga pādi into the Tungabhadra the Mahāsāmantas whose strong hands (wielded) cruel bows, along with Vikkalan who fought under a banner that inspired strength

(He) attacked and destroyed the irresistible great and powerful army which he (viz Vikkalan) had again despatched into Vēngai nādu cut off the head of the corpse of the Mahādandanīyala Chāmundaśāja and severed the nose from the face of his (viz Chāmundaśāja's) only daughter called (Nā)galai (who was) the queen of Irugayan (and) who resembled a peacock in beauty

The enemy full of hatred, met and fought against (him) yet a third time, hoping that (his former) defeats would be revenged (The king) defeated countless Sāmantas together with these (too) sons of Āhavamalla, who were called Vikkalan and Singanan at Kūdaśangamam on the turbid river Having sent the brave van guard in advance, and having himself remained close behind with the kings allied to him (he) agitated by means of a single mast elephant that army (of the enemy) which was arrayed (for battle) (and which) resembled the northern ocean In front of the banner troop (he) cut to pieces Singan (the king) of warlike Kosal (ai) along with the furious elephants of (his) van guard While Kēśava Dandanīyaka Kettarasan, (Marayan) of great strength the strong Potta (ra) yan (and) (Irechechayan) were fighting, (he) shouted.—“(Follow) Muvendi (who wears) a garland of gold ! and cut to pieces many Sāmantas who were deprived of weapons of war Then Maduvanan who was in command, fled Vikkalan fled with dishevelled hair Singanan fled (his) pride (and) courage forsaking (him) Annalan and all others descended from the male elephants on which they were fighting in battle, and fled Āhavamalla too to whom (they were) allied, penetrated as far as Kānchi, the then Chōla capital, and stormed that town and drove the ruler of it into the jungles. (IA V. 328, and Vikramānka-dēva-charita, Introd 27) So, the statement made in the Manimangalam inscription (S II III 1. No. 29, line 10) that Āhavamalla, on his defeat by Rājēndra-Dēva at Koppa, retreated and "was forced to plunge into the Western ocean" cannot be taken to be literally true. It only means that he was compelled to beat back and with that the sun of his fame set. The fact that Sōmēsvaya I ruled to about 1068 A.D., shows that he survived the battle of Koppam by several years. At the same time, it must be added that Bilhana's boast of Sōmēsvaya's conquest of the Southern countries up to Kānchi is not reflected in the Southern inscriptions of this period.

War against
Ceylon

Finally, we are told that Rājēndra-Dēva despatched an army to Ceylon, where the Kalinga king Vīra-salāmēgan was decapitated and the two sons of the Ceylon king Manabharana were taken prisoners. Another Vīra-salāmēgan, who is stated to have migrated to Ceylon from Kanyākubja, had been killed by his predecessor, Rājādhuāja. The latter had decapitated another Manabharana, who was, however, a Pāndya king and not a king of Ceylon. The Mahāvamsa mentions two princes of the name Manabharana, and two others of the name Kittisirimēgha. Manabharana I (father of Parakramabāhu I) and Kittisirimēgha I were nephews and sons-in-law of the Ceylon king Vijayabāhu I. His queen Trilōkasundarī was a princess of Kālinga (Mahāvamsa, Chapter LIX, 49, 44 and 29). The Mahāvamsa mentions three of her relations, Madhukannara, Bhīmarāja and Balakkasa. Manabharana and Vīra-Salāmēgan of Rājēndra-Chōla's inscriptions may correspond, in Dr Hultzsch's opinion, to Manabharana and Kittisirimēgha mentioned in the Mahāvamsa, and

Having occupied (an island) surrounded by water (he) cut off in a hot battle which had been appointed near the river the great heads of the following Dandanīyakas — Malhiyanan of great valour Manjippayan Piramadōvan (i.e. Brahmadēvan) whose elephants dripped with rut, Veḍkāyan (who wore) a fresh garland Sattiyanan of brilliant valour Pattiyanan (the minister for) peace and war Vimayan (who wore) a fragrant excellent garland (and who resembled) a rutting elephant, and Vanganan of great wisdom (and the heads) of the Ganga (king) (who carried) a dreadful lance, of the Nulamba (king) of the king of the Kadavas and of the Vaidumba king, the rut of whose elephants was diminishing (through fear)

Before (the Chōla king) had nailed up (the heads of these princes in) the great city (called after) the great river Ganga, the Salukki who came from the race of the Moon reproached himself saying — “It is much better to die than to live in disgrace became troubled in mind and declared that the same Kudal where previously (his) sons and himself turned their backs and were routed (should be the next) battle field.

In order that all might know (it) (he) wrote as preamble of a letter which was hard to be despatched the words — “He who does not come to the appointed Kudal through fear shall be no king, (but) a liar (who incurs) great disgrace in war (and) gave (this letter) along with the order for despatch (?) to the liars of Iratta pādi who ordered Ganga(k)ettan (to deliver it)

He came, prostrated himself at the two feet (of the Chōla king) and declared (the contents of) the letter. The mind the face and the two royal shoulders (of the king) became doubly brilliant with surpassing beauty and joy

(He) started and entered that battle-field. Not having seen the king of the Vallabhas (i.e. the Chālukyas) arrive at Kandai (he) waited one month after the appointed day. Then the liar ran away until his legs became sore, and hid himself in the western ocean and each of the three Dēvanāthan Sitti and Kēd turned their backs.

(The Chōla king) subdued (in) war the seven and a half lakshas of the famous Iratta pādi kindled crackling fires. In order that the four quarters might praise (him) (he) planted (on) the bank of the Tungabhadra a pillar (bearing) a description

(He) bestowed high crowns, resplendent with large jewels, on Gangaikonda-Sōlan, who was the younger brother of his father (and who was) powerful in defeating (his enemies), (with the title) 'Irumadi-Sōlan of exuberant valour,' among his royal younger brothers of warlike strength, on the victorious Mummaḍi-Sōlan, (with the title) 'Sōla-Pāndiyan whose valour conquers (enemies) on the battle-field,' on Vīra-Sōlan, the lord of Kōli (i e, Uraiyūr), who wore ankle-rings, (with the title) 'Kaṇikāla-Sōlan (who is) praised on earth,' on Madhurāntakan, whose strong and broad hand (wielded) the sword in warfare, (with the title) 'Sōla-Gangan,' on Parāntakadēvan, whose valour was combined with strength of shoulders, (with the title) 'Sōla-Ayōttiyārājan,' among (his) sons, who regarded with kindness (their enemies?) in distress, on Rājendra-Sōlan, (who was) praised on this earth, (with the title) 'Uttama-Sōlan,' on Mudikonda-Sōlan, (who wore) a garland of opening buds (as) an ancient (i e, hereditary) ornament, (with the title) 'the brave Vijayālayan,' on Sōla-Kēralan, (who possessed) very tall elephants with spotted foreheads, (with the title) 'Sōla-Kēralan (who holds) a long bow,' on Kadaran-konda-Sōlan of great valour, (with the title) 'Sōla-Janakarājan in whom the eminence of the race of the Sun rests,' on Mudikonda-Sōlan, who conquered the earth (surrounded by) the roaring ocean (and who was) praised by many, (with the title) 'Sundara-Sōlan,' on Irattapadikonda-Sōlan, (who was) the rock of support to pure Tamil, (with the title) 'Sōla-Kannakuchchiyārājan, the lord of the ancient earth,' then, among the sons of his sons, on Madhurāntakan, who was (i e, resembled) the great sun (and who wore) sounding ankle-rings, (with the title) 'Sōla-Vallabhan (who leads) a victorious army,' and on the matchless Anaichchevagan, whose hand (held) a strong bow, (with the title) 'Nripendra-Sōlan'

While (the Chōla king) was resplendent on earth, the proud and furious Salukki (i e, Chālukya king) Āhavamallan,—having heard the substance of the report that the Valavan (i e, the Chōla king), desirous of war, had started (from his country) had reached Iratta-mandalam, (whose inhabitants are) very brave, and had destroyed many rivers (!), districts and towns, exclaimed, "This (is) a disgrace to me!" sprang up, (his) eyes burning (with rage), went into Koppam, the strength (of whose position is) hard to describe, (and) commenced to attack the enemy

Virarājendra's wars appear to have cost him heavily. To meet the war expenditure he seems to have resorted to taxation. We get a few glimpses of this attempt on his part from some of the inscriptions of his reign. Thus on the occasion of his invasion of Vāṅgi mandalaṁ he is known to have imposed on every rēḷi of land a war tax of one kaḷanju of gold. The tax was a general one. Apparently its incidence was found to be heavy. Some of the village assemblies sold certain of the jewels belonging to the temples in exchange for communal lands. Later on in the reign of Rajaraja II these lands were made tax free. (M.E.R. 1921 Para 35 Appendix B No 521 Inscription of the 10th year of Rajarāja II)

Imposition of a war-tax.

Despite the wars indulged in by Virarājendra at some cost to his subjects there was so far as the Chōla empire itself was concerned peace at home. The administration appears to have gone on as usual and rural life too seems to have run its even course. Virarājendra had eight executive officers who are referred to in an inscription dated in his 5th year (M.E.R. 1916 Appendix B No 182). His capital seems to have been Gangaikonda sōlaparam. His throne in this city was located in the place called Sōla keralan. This throne was known as Rājēndra Sōla Maral Vānarājan. (M.E.R. 1916 Para 16). Among the principal capitals, Kānchi is mentioned in an inscription of his 3rd year corresponding to 1073-1074 A.D. (S.I.I. III, i 117) as being in his son's possession. Title to property was protected by what has been inferred to be a system of registration as it prevails to-day. Of course it should have been in vogue for many years before Virarājendra for there is nothing whatever to show that he introduced any innovation of the kind. It appears from an inscription of the 3rd year of his reign that a man had to pay 80 Kāsu for obtaining a copy of the title deed that he had lost. (M.E.R. 1925 Para 16)

Internal conditions in the Chōla
Empire

of 1914) He had a daughter by name Madhurāntaki She subsequently became one of the queens of king Kulōttunga-Chōla I (M E R 1910, Para 22) After her, the temple at Kōneināapuram was called Madhurāntakī-Īsvara (M E R 1910 Para 22, Appendix B No. 633 of 1909).

His military officers

His chief military officer, who had control over the Dandanāyakas, was Vēttan Panchavēdi Vanan alias Madhurāntaka-Tamīl Appaṭuraiyan A sēnāpati of his was Sēnāpati Jayankonda-Chōla-Brahmādnāyaī, the father of Kāmakkaraīyal, the donor of the grant recorded in the Manimangalam inscription (S I I III 1 No 29) He was apparently a Brāhman

Floods and Famine

An inscription of his reign, dated in his 2nd year, mentions a flood in the Cauvery which appears to have caused damage to the irrigation channels It does not seem that its ravages extended beyond Tanjore District In the next (3rd) year of his reign, there also occurred in this district a famine caused probably by failure of rain. The people seem to have had no funds to purchase paddy for their own consumption, seed-grains and other necessities of consumption. Either Rājēndra-Dēva's granary was empty, owing to the performance of the horse-sacrifice of his predecessor, or the hosts of relatives for whom he had to provide (S I I III 1. No 29) left him too impoverished to help the people in their distress Whatever the cause, Rājēndra-Dēva was apparently not remarkable for his liberality. The inhabitants of Ālangudi, a village in the Tanjore District, one of the villages affected by the famine, had accordingly to shift for themselves They made over to the temple 3½ vēli of land and obtained gold and silver from its authorities, the annual interest due on the money being repaid from the produce of the land Later, the village assembly

The following medicines required for one year were stored in the hospital —

(1) sabaritaki 3 ped	(11) laksak ghritam —1 padakke
2 g mutra-haritaki —2 ped	(12) m uñak ras 1 kan 2,000,
(3) da amula karitaki 1 ped	(13) dri 11—1 ad
4 lhallalak bar 1 ki—1 ped	(14) vimalaki —2,000,
1 gatalak u—1 ped	(15) tanuraki —2,000,
(6) bal kowanda tailam —1 l	(16) 2 jrakalpain —1 l and
(7) ucha —tail u—1 l	1 padakke
(8) 2 mala-tailam 1 l	(17) kalyāṇa 1 vanasa 1 l
(9) nitamak ruñak-tailam —1 l	and 1 ped 1 l and
(10) ghritam —1 padakke	(18) other drugs required to admix to these

Cows ghee for making purimistippi and oil for burning one lamp throughout the night were also provided for. Water from Parambalur scented with cardamom and khas khas roots was supplied to the inmates of the Jannātha mandapa. This provision from temple funds for a hospital an educational institution and a hostel clearly indicates the lines on which these funds were usually managed and the charities directed. Without such specification in inscriptions it would be quite possible to imagine that temple funds were meant exclusively for rituals and processions.

A similar hospital Sundara sola Vinnagar Itulasālu (apparently located in a Vishnu temple dedicated in the name of Sundara Chōla and so dating from his reign) is known to have existed at Tanjore. As Sundara Chōla reigned from about 919 to 966 A.D. that hospital should have been in existence from about the middle of the 10th century A.D. Kandovai sister of Rājorājo the Great, made a grant of land for its upkeep in 1015 A.D. so that the hospital had continued for nearly sixty years already. The founding of hospitals of this kind for the treatment of the sick with beds, medicine and other conveniences shows that the recurring wars which should have accustomed people to loss of life and bloodshed had not blunted the moral feelings of the people. The founding of a hospital by Mādhoṇa, the Vaisya in the name

No 119 of 1902). The very rarity of his inscriptions indicates that he could not have ruled long—probably not beyond three years. Olakkaiyūr (modern Olakkūr in the South Arcot District) received the surname of Rājamahendranallū apparently after him (M E R 1910, Para 22). He must be the king who is said in the Kalingāttu-Parani and Vikkirana-Sōlan-Ulā to have ruled between kings Rājēndia-Dēva and Vīrarājēndra. This identification is the more probable as the Kalingāttu-Parani speaks of Rājamahēndia in the same manner as does a description of him occurring in his inscription above referred to. While the latter praises him for guiding the goddess of the earth on the path of Manu, the Kalingāttu-Parani refers to “the Chōla who dispensed justice three or four times better than the ancient Manu” (S I I III 1 41). An inscription of the 9th year of Rājēndia-Dēva mentions among the boundaries of a village “the road of Rājamahēndia” (I A. XIX 331). Dr. Hultzsch seems to be on firm ground when he suggests that Rājamahēndra was, perhaps, the co-regent of Rājēndra-Dēva. The inscription of Rājamahēndia dated in his 31d year, referred to above, states that he fought with Āhavamalla. As both Rājēndia-Dēva and Vīrarājēndra were at war with the Western Chālukya king Āhavamalla-Sōmēsvara I, it is very probable that Rājamahēndra took some part in their campaigns against their northern enemy.

Since no records of Rājamahēndra beyond his 31d year have been found, it might be suggested he died about 1065 A D.

Vīrarājēndra
Dēva I, Vīra-
Chōla,
Karikūla-
Chōla, 1062-63
to 1070-71
A.D.

Vīrarājēndra-Dēva, I, younger brother of Rājēndia-Dēva, next ascended the throne, in 1062-63 A D, and ruled up to 1070-71 A D. The 2nd year of his reign is referred to in an inscription dated in the 20th year of Kulōttunga-Chōla I (M E R 1910, Para 22). Inscriptions been borne by him (S III III ii No 811) indicative of royal interest in it or its author. In any case it is Virarajendra in the light of a portion of Tamil literature. There can be little doubt of this for the text of the work refers to a Chola king Virarajendra as the author's patron. In the commentary which was written by Perumalvarar admittedly a pupil of the author himself the first few words of the historical introduction of the inscriptions of Rājendra Chōla I are quoted as an illustration of a particular kind of metre. The battle of Koppin is mentioned in a verse cited as an illustration of another kind of metre and that of Kulakamam in another quoted as an illustration of a figure of rhetoric. These references prove in Rao Bahadur V Venkayya's opinion that the commentary at least could not have been composed before the time of Virarajendra who fought the battle of Kulakamam. The author of the work Buddhamitra is stated in the commentary to have been a native of Ponparri a village in Malakkuram identified with Malakuta the Malakuchit of Huen Tsang. Dr Burnell located it in the Cauvery delta (I I VII 12). Rao Bahadur V Venkayya has suggested that as Buddhamitra was according to the author of the commentary on his work the lord of Pondi a sea port in Madura District his native village of Ponparri must probably be looked for in the Pāndya country. It has perhaps to be identified with Ponpetti about ten miles south west of Mayarimelkudi in the Pattukottai Taluk which in ancient times was also in the Pāndya country.

An inscription of his 13th year attributes to Virarajendra a number of titles the first three of which—Sakalabhuvanāśraya, Srīmadīśvarābhaya and Mahārājādhirāja—must have been taken over from his Western Chōluka enemies. Another Rājāśraya had been borne by his ancestor Rājaraja I. The next two

His title and probable relationship to Rājendra Chōla I

army which his enemy had sent into Vēngainādu under the Mahāmandanāyaka Chāmundaiaja. The latter was killed and his daughter Nāgalai, who was the Queen of Irugayan, mutilated. Chāmundaiaja is probably identical with the Mahāmandalēsvara Chāvundaiaja of Banavāsi, who is referred to as a feudatory of Sōmēsvara I with the dates 1045-46 A.D. and 1062-63 A.D. (Fleet, Kanarese Dynasties, 439). Two other chiefs whose names occur in the account of the battle of Kūdalsangamam—Kēsava-Dandanāyaka and Marayan—have been identified by Dr Hultzsch with two other feudatories, the Dandanāyaka Kēsavāditya-Dēva and Mārasimha. At this great battle—it seems to have been a hard fought one—the whole Chālukya camp fell into the hands of Virarājēndra I, including the wives of the enemy, the boar-banner, and the female elephant Pushpaka. Virarājēndra claims to have killed the King of Pottappi, identified with the country round Kālahasti in the North Arcot District (S I I III 1 33 f n 1), the King of Kērala, the younger brother of Jananātha of Dhāra, the Pāndyan king and others. Exact information is lacking as to when these conquests took place. But an approximation may be made as to the sequence in which they followed. The earliest form of the longer historical introduction beginning with Tiruvallara affixed to his inscriptions, is found in an inscription of the 2nd year at Tirūvengādu. (M.E.R. 1896, No. 113a of 1896). Three battles of the Chālukyas are referred to in it.—(1) Vikramāditya VI was driven from Gangapādi over the Tungabhadra; (2) an army which he had sent to Vēngai-nādu was defeated and (3) Āhavamalla with his two sons Vikramāditya VI and Jayasimha III was put to flight at Kūdalsangamam. It would seem to follow from this that the battle of Kūdalsangamam should have been fought before 1064 A.D., which corresponds to his 2nd regnal year. To the above conquests, the Karuūr inscription of the 4th year in marriage to the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI. (S I I III (ii) 129)

Adhirājendra Deva succeeded Virarājendra I on the throne. He was his rightful heir. His exact relationship however to his predecessor is not known. If Bilhana can be trusted we might set him down as the son of Virarājendra and the brother in law of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI (S I I II 231 S I I III (i) 115). He was styled Parakesarivarman. His inscriptions are rarely met with. Those that have been found are situated in the Chingleput, South Arcot and Tanjore Districts. One has also been found at Polannarua in Ceylon. One at Tiruvilakkudi Tanjore District is dated in his 2nd year another at Tiruvallam in the Chingleput District is dated in his 3rd year a third at Knhur in the Tanjore District is also dated in his 3rd year and a fourth at Panaiyavaram in the South Arcot District is also of the same year (M E R 1918) Appendix B Nos. 280 and 322 of 1917). The regnal year in which the inscription at Polannarua is dated is not known. The Knhur inscription above referred to registers curiously enough a gift of land to an individual who had daily to recite the Tiruppadiyam twice before the local god for what seems to be the recovery of the health of the king (M E R 1918 Appendix B No 280 of 1917). Apparently Adhirājendra did not recover from this illness. His reign was accordingly a short-lived one. It probably did not extend beyond his 3rd year though other considerations may suggest that he ruled up 1070 A D. It is indeed neglected by Kñottunga Chōla I who counts his period in continuation with Virarājendra. (M E R 1913 Para 33 Page 105). In the 2nd year of his reign the central shrine of the Varadarāja temple at Tiruvakkara in the South Arcot District was re-built of stone (M E R 1904

Adhirājendra
deva-Parakesar
varman 1071-
1070 A D

army which his enemy had sent into Vēngainādu under the Mahāmandanāyaka Chāmundaiaja. The latter was killed and his daughter Nāgalai, who was the Queen of Irugayan, mutilated. Chāmundaiaja is probably identical with the Mahāmandalēsvara Chāvundarāya of Banavāsī, who is referred to as a feudatory of Sōmēsvara I with the dates 1045-46 A D and 1062-63 A D. (Fleet, Kanarese Dynasties, 439) Two other chiefs whose names occur in the account of the battle of Kūdalsangamam—Kēsava-Dandanāyaka and Marayan—have been identified by Dr Hultzsch with two other feudatories, the Dandanāyaka Kēsavāditya-Dēva and Mārasimha. At this great battle—it seems to have been a hard fought one—the whole Chālukya camp fell into the hands of Vīrarājēndra I, including the wives of the enemy, the boar-banner, and the female elephant Pushpaka. Vīrarājēndra claims to have killed the King of Pottappi, identified with the country round Kālahastī in the North Arcot District (S I I III 1 33 fn 1), the King of Kēiala, the younger brother of Jananātha of Dhāra, the Pāndyan king and others. Exact information is lacking as to when these conquests took place. But an approximation may be made as to the sequence in which they followed. The earliest form of the longer historical introduction beginning with Tiruvallara affixed to his inscriptions, is found in an inscription of the 2nd year at Tirūvēngādu. (M E.R. 1896, No, 113a of 1896) Three battles of the Chālukyas are referred to in it.—(1) Vikramāditya VI was driven from Gangapādi over the Tungabhadra, (2) an army which he had sent to Vēngai-nādu was defeated and (3) Āhavamalla with his two sons Vikramāditya VI and Jayasimha III was put to flight at Kūdalsangamam. It would seem to follow from this that the battle of Kūdalsangamam should have been fought before 1064 A D, which corresponds to his 2nd regnal year. To the above conquests, the Karuūr inscription of the 4th year provided for. A larger Committee then assembled and made allotments from this revenue for various heads of the temple expenditure. This shows a praiseworthy concern for rural administration and temple worship which is in keeping with the spirit that animated the generality of Chola kings (S I I III (i) No 57). The Tirovilakkadi record refers to the remission of taxation by the village assembly in favour of a temple. This would seem to indicate that rural administration was running as smoothly as ever on the traditional lines.

The exact end of Adhirājendra is not known. The Vikramānka dēva Charita states that he survived his accession only for a short time (Bälher's Introduction 31-37). He seems to have lost his life in the anarchy that followed on his being placed on the throne by his brother in law Vikramaditya II. His Tiruvallam inscription dated in his 3rd year refers also to the 7th year of his father Virarājendra. We are free to infer from this that the double date refers as Dr Hultzsch has suggested to the same year and that Vira Rajendra had appointed his son Adhirajendra as co regent in the 4th year of his own reign. As the usurpation of Kulōttunga was not complete before 1070 A.D. we may take it that Adhirājendra was put out of the way with the rest of the Chōla princes in the regular male line, by Kulōttunga I about that date. (See under Kulōttunga-Chōla I.)

Adhirājendra as the son of Virarājendra, was as we have seen above the rightful heir to the throne. But when exactly his reign came to a close is not clear. Rai Bahadur V. Venkayya has suggested (M.E.R. 1899 Para 51) that Adhirājendra the thirteen Chōla princes mentioned in the Manimangalam inscription of Rajēndradēva (S I I III (i) No 20) and the world of relations referred to in the Karuvur inscription of Virarājendra I (Ibid Page 7 fn 1)

His death

Rajēndra-Chōla II was Kulōttunga-
Chōla I Rajakēari
varman, A.D.
1070-1120.
The story of his usurpation

In two inscriptions of the 6th year (S I I III n 83 and M E R 1890, No. 16 of 1890), several fresh details are given. On a third occasion, i e, after the two encounters at Kūdalsangamum and near the river, Vīrarājendra I "burnt (the city of) Kampili" before Sōmēsvara could untie the necklace which (he) had put on, and set up a pillar of victory at Karadikal, a place not yet satisfactorily identified. In the Manimangalam inscription of the 5th year, the same expedition is referred to by the statement that Vīrarājendra I conquered Rattapādi, "kindled crackling fires" and set up a pillar of victory on the bank of the Tungabhadra. The Kampili referred to here has been identified with the place of that name on the southern bank of the Tungabhadra in the Bellary District. Karadikal is probably to be sought on the northern bank. The Sōmēsvara mentioned in the inscription must have been Sōmēsvara II, the eldest son of Āhavamalla and elder brother of Vikramāditya VI and Jayasimha III. The necklace referred to was the emblem of the dignity of Yuvarāja. The Vikramāṅkadēvacharita states that Āhavamalla had actually appointed Sōmēsvara II as his heir-apparent. As Sōmēsvara II is still described as heir-apparent in the 6th year of Vīrarājendra I, it follows that at this time Āhavamalla was still alive. Finally, Vīrarājendra is stated to have expelled Devanatha and other chiefs from Chakra-kōttam and to have "recovered" Kanyākubja, i e, Kanauj. Both Dēvanātha and the expedition into Chakra-kōttam are referred to in the Manimangalam inscription of the 5th year. The introduction of the inscriptions of the 7th year differ considerably from that of the preceding years. It first mentions that Vīrarājendra defeated the Pāndya, Chēra, and Simhala kings, but does not mention their names. Āhavamalla is said to have been put to flight in battle five times. As the earlier inscriptions show, these five occasions were —(1) the battle on the Tungabhadra the records of Virarājendra I and then breaks off suddenly and then begins the usual introduction of Kulōttunga I himself (M E R 1921 Appendix B No 281 of 1923). Accordingly we have to fix the accession of the Chālnkya Chola usurper Rajendra Chola II or Kulōttunga I in 1070 A D. Inscriptions of his 2nd year have been found at Linnortiyar Tiruvalangādu and Kolar while records of his 3rd and 11th years are found closer to Conjeevaram. A record of his dated in his 4th year has been found at Mahadanapuram in the Trichinopoly District and shows that his influence had extended into the Chōla country in that year. The war between Adhirājendra and the usurper must have taken place subsequently and was followed by the invasion into the Chōla country of the Western Chalukyas. But the usurper was actually in possession of Conjeevaram and the Chōla country in A D 1074-1075 when he changed his name from Rajendra Chola to Kulōttunga Chola. His inscriptions found at Māramangalam and Akkāśilai which are situated on the site of ancient Korkai establish the conquest of the Pāndya country which he claims to have effected (M E R 1901 Nos 157-161 and 162 to 165 of 1903). If as suggested by Dr Hultzsch Rājādhiraja Rajendradēva and Virarājendra I were the sons of Rājendra Chōla I (see above) the story of the adoption of Kulōttunga I by Rājendra Chōla I is pure invention started for political purposes to give an apparent locus standi to the usurper. This would afford the necessary explanation for the deliberate efforts made by the genealogists to connect him directly with Virarājendra by combining the introductions in his epigraphs as pointed out above.

Kulōttunga-Chōla I had thus a long reign of half a century. The chief sources for his history are of course his own inscriptions which have been found from Mysore

Sources for the history
of his reign

It was probably in one of these encounters that Āhavamalla was terrified and Rājādhirāja's vow fulfilled by the conquest of Vēngai-nādu. At this time—between the 4th and the 5th years, Āhavamalla must have been yet alive. The change of the necklace from Sōmēsvara II to Vikramāditya VI should have taken place after the battle on the river and the sacking of Kampili. The expulsion of Dēvanātha and others from Chakrakōttam and the reconquest of Kanauj must have been a little before the 5th year or A.D. 1067. The bestowal of Vēngai-nādu on Vijayāditya VII took place probably before the 5th year, while the conquest of Kadaim followed in the 6th year. This was probably one of his last conquests.

Apparently to secure his position, he seems to have bestowed honours on near relations. Thus on his elder brother Ālavandān (probably a cousin) he bestowed the title of Rājārāja, on his son Madhurāntaka the Tondaimandalam (i.e., the Pallava country) and the title of Chōlēndia, on his son Gangaikonda-Chōla, the Pāndimandalam (i.e., the Pāndya country) and the title of Chōla-Pāndya, and on Mudikonda-Chōla, the title of Sundara-Chōla.

Description of the battle of Kudalsangamam

The following extract from the Karuvu inscription is descriptive of the battle of Kūdalsangamam and is worthy of transcription here.—

While the goddess of fortune was prospering, while the circle of the great earth rested on (the king's) round arm (as lightly) as his bracelet of jewels, and while the shadow of (his) royal white parasol (set with) numerous jewels protected the living being of the circle of the earth (more tenderly) than the mother that bore (man), while (all) other kings (asleep) guarding able rings took shelter at his feet, (and) while the Kūdi (or), in despair, retired to (his) natural abode, the king,—(the king) duly bestowed a splendid crown of jewels (on) his innumerable other brother, (Āla), and so, (to) gain (the) 'Rājārāja' who is pre-ced on the great earth.

No.	Regulation	Date of issue	Reference to place of inscription	Remarks
7(a)	17th year	Nil	On the wall of Durgh temple Agur Taluk, Madras District. M. I. R. 1917 I 14 91	This grant like the date 31th regnal year also appears. It was only granted in the 31st year. Its introduction is like Mulbagal 42(b), 47 and 1 and Channarayana 7.
7	13th year	Nil	L. C. X Kuar 43
8	14th year	Nil	L. C. IX Channarayana 77	Contains historical introduction Mahasabhal.
9	16th year	Nil	L. C. IX Hengal desah to 100.
10	20th year	Nil	L. C. X K. I 110 (1)
11	21st year	Nil	L. C. X Chikballapur 24	1st to grant to temple
12	27th year	Nil	L. C. X Mulbagal 42(b)
13	27th year	Nil	L. C. X Howeringpet 16
14	29th year	Nil	L. C. X Mulbagal 42(b)
15	31st year	Nil	L. C. III Nanjangud 29
16	32nd year	Nil	L. C. III T. Narasapur 7
17	33rd year	Nil	L. C. III T. Narasapur 8
18	33rd year	Nil	L. C. X Siddaghatta 91
19	33rd year	Nil	L. C. X Mulbagal 51
20	33rd year	Nil	L. C. IV Yedatore 53
20(a)	33rd year	Nil	Bannur (grahara near Berrigapatam) M. I. R. 1912, Para 61
21	35th year	Nil	L. C. X Mulbagal 49 (r)
22	35th year	Nil	L. C. III T. Narasapur 71
22(a)	35th year	Nil	At N. garekanhalli, Chikballapur Taluk, Holar District, M. I. R. 1918-14 Para 79
23	37th year	Sale 10.10. Cyclic year 1799	L. C. III Nanjangud 51	Records the erection of the Mahasabha temple

fled before them (The king) stopped his fast furious elephant, put on the garland of victory, seized his (viz, Āhavamalla's) wives, his family treasures, conches, parasols, trumpets, drums, canopies, white chāmaras, the boar-banner the ornamental arch (makara-tōrana), the female elephant (called) Pushpaka, and a herd of war elephants, along with a troop of prancing horses, and, amidst (general) applause, put on the crown of victory, (set with) jewels of red splendour

His other conquests have been referred to in the passage below —

(He) despatched (the banner of) the ferocious tiger into all directions and cut off the beautiful heads, surrounded by garlands (won) on battle-fields, of the king of Pottappi, whose horses chafed under the bridle, of Varan, of the (Kērala), (who wore) large ankle-rings, (and) of the younger brother of Ja(na)nātha of Dhāra. (He caused to be) trampled down by a furious mast elephant the king of the South (i e, the Pāndya), (who wore) golden ankle-rings, the young son of Srivallabha, (and) Virakēśarin, whose crown jewels glittered as the lightning, and captured Madakodu (?) According to the Takkolam inscription, the translation would run —“ (He) caused to be trampled down by a mast elephant Virakēśarin, the son of the Pāndya Srivallabha ”

(He) wielded the sceptre beyond (all) limits and illustrated the laws of the Vēdas (by his conduct)

Narrative of the battle
continued

One of the Manimangalam inscriptions (S I I III, 1 No 30), which opens with the same passage as the Karuvur inscription, continues as follows, and narrates the re-conquest of Vēngi country thus —

When at Ulagai the Kēralas were uprooted along with the infants of their family, ran away and plunged into the western ocean, (the Chōla king) despatched (his) elephants for a rare bath (in the ocean) (He) tied in the stables the Liattas (i e, the Chālukyas) whose elephants were numberless, along with the elephants of the Kanniya, which (he) had seized (He) took the tribute which they paid, along with female elephant (which had) trappings, and returned will show that while inscriptions of the regnal years 1, 4, 5, 14, 15 and 18 are not represented in the Mysore list those bearing the regnal years 27, 29, 33, 37 and 41 are not represented in the Malhar list. In the Malhar list there are no inscriptions with Saka dates, whereas in the Mysore list there are four inscriptions with Saka dates and one with the Cycle year mentioned in it. These latter generally record private grants. What is more important in every case the Saka date and the regnal year as given in each record correctly agree taking 1070 A.D. as the initial year of Kulottunga Chola I.

The parents of the king's father were the Eastern Chalukya king Virualaditya who ascended the throne on the 10th May A.D. 1011 and Kundava or Kundavai (Kunt Devi) the daughter of the Chola king Rajaraja I (whose reign commenced between the 20th June and the 20th July A.D. 999) and the younger sister of his successor Rajendra Chola I (whose reign commenced between the 20th November A.D. 1011 and the 7th July 1012). The parents of the king were the Eastern Chalukya king Rajaraja I who ascended the throne on the 16th August A.D. 1022 and Virmangadevi or Virmangayamba the daughter of the Chola king Rajendra Chola I. Thus he was a descendant of the lunar race on his father's side and of the solar race on that of his mother and grandmother. A younger sister of his named Kundavai after her grandmother is known from an inscription at Chidambaram. The Kulingattu Parani which usually is veryaverse to mentioning proper names records curiously enough the name of Kulottunga's maternal grandfather Gangalkonda Chola I and that of his father the Eastern Chalukya king Rajaraja I. The verse which contains the second reference has been hitherto misunderstood and Rajaraja has been considered a mistake for the Chola king Rajendra Chola I. Now Mr. Venkayya has found that of (his) victory, while the male tiger, (the crest of the race) of the Sun, sported joyfully

(The king) appointed the liar, who came on a subsequent day, as Vallabha (i e. Chālukya king), and tied (round his neck) a beautiful necklace (hantika) (He) wrote unmistakably on a board how (the Chalukya) had escaped the trunk of an elephant (which had) a cord (round its neck), and had run away with the knowledge (of all the people) of this earth. Then, on the auspicious day on which (the latter) attained to the dignity of Salukki, (the Chōla king) tied on (his) breast (that board) and a quiver (of arrows) which was closed (and hence useless)

Having moved (his camp), he declared — “(We) shall not return without regaining the good country of Vēngai, which (we had formerly) subdued. You, (who are) strong, come and defend (it) if (you) are able!” That army which was chosen (for this expedition) drove into the jungle that big army, which resisted (its enemies) on the great river close to Visaiyavadaṁ (and) which had for its chiefs Jananāthan, the Dandanāyaka Rājamayan, whose maṣṭ elephants trumpeted in herds, and Mupparasan

His elephants drank the water of Godāvari. (He) crossed even Kalingam and, beyond (it), despatched (for) battle (his) invincible army as far as the further end of Sakkara-kōttam (Chakra-kōtta)

(He) re-conquered the good country of Vēngai and bestowed (it) on Vijayādityan, whose broad hand (held) weapons of war, (and) who had taken refuge at his lotus-feet

Having been pleased to return speedily, (the Chōla king) entered Gangāpuri with the goddess of victory, who had shown hostility in the interval, and there made (himself) the lord of the earth, (with the title) Rājādhirājārājan, in accordance with the observances of his (family)

While (all) the kings on earth worshipped (his) feet and praised (him), (he) was seated on a throne of bright jewels and exhibited in order the heap of the great treasures which (he) had seized in the good country of Vēngai. (He) unlocked the rings and chains (of prisoners) and altered (his previously made) vow, according to which they ought to have lived (in confinement). (He) wielded a sceptre which ruled (as far as) the limits of (the mountain) surrounded by snow (i e. the Himālaya) and of Setu (i e. Rāmēsvaram), and illumined the earth

Verse 62) calls Kulottunga's father Pandita Chola this can hardly refer to his real father the Eastern Chalukya king, but must mean his adoptive father Nāendra Chōla. That the latter had the surname Pandita Chola may be concluded from two of his Tanjore inscriptions which mention a regiment entitled Pandita Sola terinda-vilhal i.e. the chosen archers of Pandita Chola. While still heir apparent Kulottunga distinguished himself by capturing elephants at Vayiragaram and by defeating the king of Dhara at Sakkarakottam. His early inscriptions of the 2nd, 3rd and 4th regnal years confirm these conquests mentioned in the Kulajattu Parani (N. verse 23). Sakkarakottam has been identified with Chakrakṛtya in the modern Bastar State (I / I N. 17b) and Dhara-varsha who has been mentioned in this connection with the Hindu king Dhara-varsha who was ruling in or about A.D. 1060-61 (See M. E. R. 1909 Para 66). These conquests should have taken place long before Kulottunga succeeded to the Chōla throne. There is no evidence available from inscriptions to show as to when and in what capacity Kulottunga undertook this campaign into Sakkarakottam and Vayiragaram. Mr. Venkayya has suggested that the latter place should be looked for somewhere in the Central Provinces. (M. E. R. 1909 Para 45)

According to the copper plate grants his first charge was the country of Vengai which had been ruled over by his father and paternal grandfather. Instead of the Vengai country Kulottunga's family inscriptions use the expression the region of the rising of the Sun, and the Pithapuram pillar inscriptions employ the term Āndra mandala or Āndra vishaya i.e. the Solugu country. Kulottunga is stated to have entrusted this province to viceroys first to his uncle Vijayaditya VII then to his second son Rājaraṇa II next to his third son Vira Chōla who assumed office on the 23rd August A.D. 1078 and

His rule over Vengai

Appendix B No 190 of 1925). Personally, Vīrarājendra seems to have enjoyed a popularity that might well have been the envy of any prince. By inflicting repeated defeats on the Western Chālukyas, he seems to have brought peace and prosperity to the Cholas. That was evidently the chief reason for the popularity he seems to have enjoyed. The people could not, in such a case, have minded the pressure of a water-tax. They might well have been tired of the Chālukyan incursions and the fact that Vīrarājendra defeated them time after time should have enhanced his reputation with his own people. Like other Chōla kings, a festival was annually celebrated in his honour in the temple in the particular month in which the asterism under which he was born fell. In the 5th year of his reign, about which the wars against the Chālukyas were over, a Vaisya, named Mādharā, provided for the celebration of this festival in the month of Srāvana, at the temple of Tṛumukkūdal, in the Chingleput District. What is of greater interest is that this loyal Vaisya donor revived the charities in this temple and constructed the surrounding walls and a mantapa called Jananātamantapa (i.e., Royal mantapa). In this mantapa, named after the king and probably dedicated in his name, were located a school for the study of the Vēdas, Sāstras, Vyākaraṇa, the Rūpāvatāra, etc., and a hostel for students and a hospital (Ātulasāla) as well (M E R 1916, Para 16 Appendix B No 182). We have details of this charity. The students were provided, we are told, with food, bathing-oil on Saturdays and oil for lamps. The hospital was named Vīrasōlan, after a title of Vīrarājendra, and was provided with 15 beds for sick people. The following items of expense were set apart for their comforts —

- | | | |
|----------------------------------|--|-----------------------------------|
| (1) rice, | | (4) 2 servants who fetched drugs, |
| (2) 1 doctor in whose family the | | supplied fuel and did other |
| privilege of administering | | services for the hospital, |
| medicines was hereditary, | | (5) 2 maid servants for nursing |
| (3) 1 surgeon, | | the patients, and |
| | | (6) a general servant for the | | | | school hostel and hospital |

expression the five Dravidas (F I IV P 228). The first inscription in which he is called Kulottunga Cholaadeva is one of the 5th year of his reign i.e. A.D. 1071-75 at Conjeeveram. It states that he defeated the king of Kuntala that he crowned himself as king of the Chola country and that he decapitated an unruled Pandya king. In speaking of the prostitution of the Lakshmi of the Southern region and the loneliness of the Goddess of the country on the banks of the Kaveri the inscription suggests that before Kulottunga's arrival in the South the Chola country had lapsed into a state of anarchy and lost its ruler. A similar account of the condition of the Chola country is given in the Kalingattu Parani which states besides that Kulottunga defeated Virudaraja (Canto IV verse 6 and canto V verse 2) and that the king of kings had met with his death. A third account of the same events is furnished by Bilhana in his Vikramāditya-īra-charita (Professor Bühler's Introduction pp 31 to 37). During the reign of his elder brother Somesvara II (A.D. 1069 to 1076) Vikramāditya VI married the daughter of the Chōla king. Shortly after the news reached him that his father-in-law was dead and that the Chōla kingdom was in a state of anarchy. He immediately started for Kanchi and Gangakundapura (i.e. Gangaikondachōlapuram) and put his wife's brother on the Chōla throne. A few days after his return from this expedition he learnt that his brother-in-law had lost his life in a fresh rebellion and that Rājiga, the lord of Vēngi had taken possession of the throne of Kanchi. Rājiga found an ally in Sōmēsvara II but Vikramāditya VI put Rājiga to flight took Sōmēsvara II prisoner and ascended the throne himself in A.D. 1076. Dr Fleet was the first to recognise that Rājiga is a familiar form of Rājēndra-Chōda, the original name of Kulottunga I. The Chōla king whose daughter became the wife of Vikramāditya VI is identical with Virarājendra I one of

of the king indicates to some extent the regard and affection with which Vīraājēndīa was held by his people

The temples, with which charities of this kind were closely connected, always received close attention at the hands of royal officers. Thus, we are told in an inscription that one of the adhikāris (agents) of Vīraājēndīa, Rājēndra-mūvendavēlai by name, built in the 5th year of his reign the shrine of Padanipakkadēva, which is included in the temple at Tīruvōṇṇiyūr near Madras. He also presented a flower garden, named after the king, to this temple. He made another grant to the deity Padanipakkadēva. The image of this deity has been suggested to be one of Lakulīsa of Karohana (Kāivān) with whom the temple at Tīruvōṇṇiyūr is intimately connected. The stone pedestal of Natarāja (dancing Siva) in this temple was called Vīraājēndīan after the king and was got made by a chief named Sivalōkanādan of Tīruvēnkādu. Another piece of land, called Vīrarājēndra-vilagam, was granted in the name of the king for the increase of his race, for the prosperity of his queen and the glorious health of their children (M. E. R. 1913, Para 32, Appendix B Nos 217 and 218). Vīrarājēndra appears to have been known as Jayasīnga-Kulakāla, as he was opposed to the Western Chālukya king Jayasīma III and so the enemy of the whole of his race. The quarter in which the weavers had settled in Tīruvōṇṇiyūr was called after this title and his officer at Tīruvōṇṇiyūr was called Jayasīnga-Kulakāla-Vilup-paraiyār. All these facts seem to indicate the personal popularity of Vīraājēndīa as a sovereign (M. E. R. 1916, Para 32).

Vīrarājēndīa, as a literary patron

During his reign, the well-known Tamil grammar Vīra-Sōhiyam, named after his title Vīra-Sōla, was composed. The fact that it bears his title of Vīra Chōla, which title is known from a lithic inscription to have before entering his capital of Kalyāna (Professor Bühler's Introduction p 38) and that after a long period of peace he again put the Chōla to flight and took Kunchi (Ibid p 44)

An inscription of the 14th year adds that Kulōttunga I put the five Pandyas to flight and subdued the western portion of their country including the Gulf of Mannar the Podiyil mountain Cape Comorin and Kōttāru He limited the boundary of the Pandya country and placed garrisons in the strategically important places of the newly acquired territory e.g., at Kōttāru Along with the Pandya country he conquered Kudamalai oādu i.e. the western hill-country (Malabār) whose warriors, the ancestors of the Nairs of the present day perished to the last man in defeating their independence. Of special places occupied on the western coast the Kalingattu-Parani (XI verse 71) mentions Vilhoam (according to the late Professor P Soodaram Pillai Vilhoam is about 10 miles to the south of Trivandrum I A XXIV p 254) and Solai and the Vikṣirama Sōlan ulā states that at Solai Kulōttunga I twice destroyed the ships (of the Chōra king) (I A XXII p 142) The defeat of the five Pāndyas and the burning of Kōttāru are referred to also in an inscription at Chidambaram (E I V p 104) and in the Kalingattu Parani (Canto XI verse 69 and Canto III, verse 21) That Kulōttunga-Chōla I conquered and colonized Kōttāru 10 miles north of Cape Comorin is confirmed by inscriptions found near it A Chōla temple is close to it in the quarter called Chōlapuram Inscriptions in it call it Kottam and Munmudi Chōlanallur or Munmudi Chōōlapuram after a surname of Rājārāja. From inscription No 31 of 1896 (M E R 1896 Para 14) we learn that the temple was founded during the reign of Kulōttunga I by a certain Madhuranthaka and received the designation Rājendra Chōlēśvara after Rājendra-

surnames, Vīra-Chōla and Karikāla-Chōla, suggest that Vīrarājēndra may have been one of the younger brothers of Rājēndradēva, for, the latter is stated to have conferred the title Karikāla-Chōla on his younger brother Vīra-Chōla (S I I III 1. 62). If so, Vīrarājēndra should have been a younger brother of Rājādhirāja I, who was the elder brother of Rājēndradēva. In a mutilated inscription of his 5th year at Gangaikondachōlāpuram (M E R No 826 of 1892), Vīra-rājēndra I quotes

“ the twenty-third year of (my) father, who was pleased to conquer the Eastern country, the Ganga and Kadamam ”

Commenting on this Dr. Hultzsch (S I I III 11, 195) writes —

“ This can refer to no other of his predecessors but Rājēndra-Chōla I, whose conquests are in the same words in an inscription at Suttūru (E I IV 69), and who bore the surname Gangaikonda-Chōla. Consequently, Vīrarājēndra I and his two elder brothers Rājēndradēva and Rājādhirāja seem to have been the sons of Rājēndra-Chōla I. I do not consider this result as absolutely final, because the South-Indian languages employ the words of relationship in a very loose manner. Thus the words ‘ younger brother ’ (tambī) might also mean ‘ cousin ’ and the word ‘ father ’ (aiyāi) might designate ‘ an elder brother ’. If it is granted that Vīrarājēndra I was the son of Rājēndra Chōla I, it would follow that the story of the adoption of Kulōttunga I by the latter (S I I III 11 127) is a pure invention, which was started for political reasons in order to give an apparent locus standi to this usurper ” (S. I I III 11 195-196)

According to the Tanjore inscription of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, the name of Vīrarājēndra's wife was Aṇumoli-Nangai (S I I II 232). Most of his inscriptions mention his queen by her title Ulagamulududaiyāl, i.e., “ the mistress of the whole world,” and state that she was seated with him on the throne. His daughter was given of his reign dated probably in Saka 1021 (1099 A.D.) still exists. The record mentions his conquest and his minister Madhurantaka Brahmanavarayar (M.E.R. 1900 Page 22 No 163) of 1899). Perhaps Kulōttunga's conquest of southern Kalinga was also undertaken on behalf of his grandson Anantavarma Chodaganga. As however the record of Anantavarma at Vizagapatnam is translated into Tamil (M.E.R. 1910 No 90 of 1909) and as the donee mentioned is a merchant of Malamandala (i.e. Malabar) it has been inferred that Kulōttunga's interest in southern Kalinga was limited to the settling of a few of his followers from the southern country in the dominions of Anantavarma Chodaganga. That these settlers continued even at the turn of the Eastern Ganga prince Narasimha I is proved by another Tamil record at Vizagapatnam dated Saka Samvat 1172 and the 15th year of Vira Narasingadeva. The donor was a native of Padalayanallur a village north of Quilandi (Malabar Gazetteer 436). The gift made by him was to the temple of Karumānikka Alvar at Vizakapattinam alias Kulōttunga sōlapattinam (M.E.R. 1909 Para 45). The existence of these records of Kulōttunga's reign in the Kalinga country establishes beyond doubt the conquest of Kalinga which is claimed for him both in inscriptions and in Tamil literature. Mr Venkayya has remarked (M.E.R. 1899 Para 52) that as Vikrama Chōla the son of Kulōttunga Chōla I ruled with his father as co-regent from 1108 A.D. there is reason to believe that the second expedition against Kalinga which is mentioned in an inscription of Kulōttunga Chōla I dated in his 45th year (=1114-1115 A.D.) and in an inscription of the 4th year of Vikrama-Chōla (A.D. 1112-1113) was actually undertaken by Vikrama-Chōla about the end of his father's reign and that both claimed credit for it. It is for this reason that the Kulōttunga sōlan ulā a Tamil poem composed in honour of Kulōttunga II the son of Para 21, No 204 of 1904) In the 3rd year of his reign, he was in possession of the principal capital of Kānchi. (S I I III 117.) In the Ceylon record Polannāruva is called as Jananāthapuram. The Siva temple in which it is engraved is named in it as Vānai-vanma-dēvisvaram-udaiyāi. As village names beginning with Jananātha and Vānavanmadēvi occur frequently in the Tanjore inscriptions of Rājarāja I, the Siva temple at Polannāruva in which Adhirājēndra's inscription has been found should have come into existence not later than the end of the 10th century A D. (M E R. 1910, Part I, Para 8; and Part II, Para 23) How Adhirājēndra's gift came to be made at this temple is not clear. Probably he was in Ceylon on its invasion by his uncle Rājēndra-Dēva and made a grant to the temple founded in the time of his famous ancestor Rājaiāja the Great. Evidently, in the days of the Imperial Chōlas, great facilities existed for a free communication between India and Ceylon and Indian influence, consequently, appears to have been strong in the Buddhist island. Ceylon, indeed, has been included in the conventional fifty-six geographical divisions into which the Puranās divided India. Of even greater interest is the fact that two of the more important Saiva temples referred in the Saiva hymns included in the Dēvāram are supposed to be situated in that island. These two temples may yet be discovered as recent researches have brought to light such other Saiva temples (M E R 1910, Para I, Para 8). If the Tiruvallam inscription is any guide in the matter, Chōla administration continued to be as strong as ever during the days of Adhirājēndra. In that record, it is stated that two royal officers met at Kānchipuram and called for the accounts of the villages which belonged to the Bilvanāthēsvara temple at Tiruvallam. One of the two decided that the revenue from two villages named in it should be assigned to the temple for expenses not previously Tribhuvana chakravartin the emperor of the three worlds which occur first in inscriptions of the 14th 18th and 20th years.

Kulottunga's capital was Gongapuri or Gangakonda His Capital
 pura i.e. Gangaikonda chōlapuram which had been founded by his grandfather Rājendra Chola I alias Gangaikonda Chola, and which had been the residence of the latter and of Vīrarājendra I. This is confirmed by an inscription of his 49th year (M E R 1913 No 200 of 1912). He is said to have issued certain of his orders in the 42nd year of his reign while occupying the seat Vānadhīrājan in the Hall Rājendra Solan within the inner apartments of this Palace (V E R 1910). His palace was at Vikramachōlapuram. His throne under the pearl canopy is also mentioned (M E R 1926 Appendix C. No 261). The city second in importance was Kanchi. An inscription of the 30th year of Kulottunga's reign is dated from his palace at Kanchipuram.

The copper plate grants state that Kulottunga I His Queen.
 married Madhurāntoki the daughter of Rājendradēva of the solar race and had by her seven sons. The eldest Vikrama-Chōda was crowned (most probably) on the 18th July A D 1108 (E I IV p 266). The second Rājārāja II was viceroy of Vēṅga from 1077 to 1078 A D and was succeeded by the third brother Vira Chōda.

Kulottunga's queen Madhurāntaki is not mentioned by name in his inscriptions. But she is probably intended by the mistress of the whole world or the mistress of the whole earth to whom many of his inscriptions refer. An inscription of the 26th year gives the names of three additional queens—Dīnochintāmani, Elisai Vallabhi and Tyugavalli. In the 30th year Dīnachintāmani seems to have been dead and Tyugavalli to have taken her place. The Kalingattu Parani (X. verse 55)

must have ceased to exist before a comparative stranger like the Chālukya Kulōttunga I, whose only claim to the Chōla throne was that he was the daughter's son of Rājēndia-Chōla I, and the son-in-law of Rājēndiadēva, could succeed. When it is remembered that Adhirājēndra, had the strong support of a powerful king like the Western Chālukya Vikramāditya VI, who was his brother-in-law, it might be easily imagined how Kulōttunga I should have struggled and how many royal princes he should have killed in open battle and how many he should have secretly despatched before he could feel secure on the Chōla throne. That he effectively succeeded in putting the genuine Chōla princes out of his way is shown by the fact of his long reign extending to half a century (IA XX 278-283, and SI.I I 32). Adhirājēndia apparently did not live beyond his 3rd year, as his inscriptions do not extend beyond this period. Kulōttunga I, in fact, neglects his reign and counts his own reign from that of Vīrarājēndra I. Thus in an inscription of his 43rd year, Kulōttunga is represented as the immediate successor of Vīrarājēndra I. The historical introduction of this inscription begins with that associated with Vīrarājēndra I. The significance of this combination seems to be that Kulōttunga I claimed to be the immediate successor of Vīrarājēndra I, ignoring thus the short reign of Adhirājēndra in the interval. This inference drawn by Rao Bahadur H. Krishna Sāstrī seems well founded, for the latest year of Vīrarājēndia I found from inscriptions is his 7th year, roughly corresponding to A D 1069-1070, which coincides with the initial date of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, i.e., 1070 A D. As we have seen, Adhirājēndra was the brother-in-law of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI and was killed by Kulōttunga I before the latter succeeded to the throne (ME R 1913, Para 33, Appendix B No 434). Similarly, an inscription of Kulōttunga-Chōla I dated in 49 + 1st year commences with the introduction generally prefixed to

(M E R No 206 of 1901) An inscription of his 50th year is however now known. This is the highest regnal year known for him. The astronomical details furnished in this epigraph correspond approximately to April 26 1120 (M E R 1921 Appendix B No 20) Other inscriptions of his 50th year are also known (M F R 1911 Para 33 Appendix B Nos. 282 and 459 of 1912)

A couple of his inscriptions may be quoted below to indicate how his conquests are described in his inscriptions. The following is from E C IX Channapatna 77 dated in his 17th year —

His conquests
as described in his
inscriptions.

"When till Kurudya wedded for the first time the brilliant goddess of Victory by his heroic deeds at Rakkara gottam and captured troops of rutting elephants at Vayura garam who having spurred his war steed unsheathed his sword and displayed the strength of his arm put to flight the army of the kings of Kontala who were armed with sharp lances, and put on the garland of victory over the Northern region who freed the goddess with the sweet and fragrant lotus flower (Lakshmi) of the Southern region from being common property and the goddess of the good country whose garment was the Ponnai (Cauvery) from being lonely and put on by right of inheritance the pure and excellent crown of jewels while the other kings of the ancient earth wore on their heads his two feet as a large crown whose sceptre swayed over every region so that the river of the ancient Manu's rules swelled and the river of halla oil dried up, while the sacred shadow of his white umbrella shone like white moonlight everywhere over the wide earth and his tiger banner fluttered on the matchless Micru before whom stood in many rows rutting elephants given as tribute by the kings of remote sea girt islands outside whose golden town lay the big head of the runaway king of the South (the Pandyas) pecked by kites who made Vikkalan—his words to Kulottunga, viz To-day your stain shall be like that on the crescent moon of your former family only proving false so that without even bending the bow in his hand against the

in the north to Cape Comorin in the South and on the east as far as Vizagapatam. A list of his principal inscriptions will be found in S.I.I III (ii) 125-126, E C Kolar, Bangalore and Mysore and in the Reports of the Mysore Archaeological Department and in the Madras Epigraphy Reports. These range in date from the 2nd to the 50th year of his reign. His inscriptions in the Telugu country are in Sānskrit and Telugu, while in the southern districts of Madras and in Mysore, they are generally in the Tamil language. Besides his inscriptions, some valuable information regarding his reign is to be found in the Kalingattu-Param, a Tamil poem of which he is the hero (I A. XIX 329, M E R August 1892, Pages 5-6). This poem is perhaps, the best of its kind in Tamil literature. It was composed by one Jayankondān in honour of Karunākara Tondaimān who was probably the general of Kulōttunga-Chōla I in his campaign against the Kalingas. The slaughter in this war must have been great, as the name Param is not given to a poem unless its hero has killed at least one thousand elephants on the battle-field.

HIS
inscriptions
in Mysore
State

The following is a tabulated list of his inscriptions found in this State with dates arranged in the chronological order —

Sl No	Regnal year of grant	Saka Date, if any, mentioned	Reference to place of inscription	Remarks
1	2nd year	Nil	E C X, Kolar 108	Contains short historical introduction Private grant
2	6th year	Saka 997	E C IX, Hoskote 101
3	7th year	Saka 998	E C X, Kolar 91
4	7th year	Nil	E C III, Nanjangud 43	Virgal
5	10th year	Nil	E C X, Mulbagal 47
6	11th year	Nil	E C X, Sidlaghatta 66

"While the galleys of Fame became conspicuous while the goddess of Victory adorned him while the goddess of the Earth became bright at him while the goddess of Fortune adorned him her highness wore the excellent crown of jewels caused the wheel of his authority to roll over all regions so that the Hoysalar (Haidiyar) lost their position the Villavar (Cheras) became disconcerted, and the other kings retreated with disgrace performed the anointment of victory and was graciously seated on the throne of heroes along with his queen Arani mulu ulaiyal."

But neither the above nor the other inscriptions of Kulottunga reflect the reverses he appears to have sustained in Mysore about the close of his reign. By the 16th year of his reign (i.e., 1116 A.D.) Talkād the old Ganga capital had been retaken by the Hoysalas and the Chola dominion in the Mysore country brought to an end. This important capture was effected by Gan̄ga Rāja a general of the Hoysala king Vishnuvardhana and probably a descendant of the old Ganga Rāja being (as Sravana Belgola 1, puts it) a hundred times more fortunate than the former Rāja of the Gangas under whom Talkād and the kingdom were lost. Further point is given to the event by his original name Rājendra Chola being given to the Chola king though he was then in the 46th year of his reign in E.C.V. Belur 58 which sets out in grand style the conquests of Vishnuvardhana. This inscription referring to the incident suggests that the battle which preceded the fall of Talkād was a most sanguinary one. It states that god Vishnu so helped Vishnuvardhana's cause that by the power of his arm he threw all the corpses of Vishnuvardhana's adversary into the stream of the river so much so that inspired of the Chōla

from Mysore
1116 A.D.

Rājendra Chola disgusted at the water of the Cauvery suddenly becoming polluted was driven to the use of water from wells in the vicinity (E.C.V. Belur 58). A spirited account is contained in Sravana Belgola 90

Sl No	Regnal year of grant	Saka date, if any, mentioned	Reference to place of inscription	Remarks
24	39th year	Nil	LC X, Sidlaghatta 83
25	40th year	Nil	EC X, Sidlaghatta 30
26	40th year	Nil	EC IV, Channarayana 197
27	41st year	Nil	EC IX, Nelamangala 3
27 (a)	42nd year	Nil	At Doddasivara, Malur Taluk, M A R 1913 14 Para 79
28	43rd year	Nil	EC X, Malur 101
29	43rd year	Saka 1035 Cyclic year Jaya	EC III, Nanjangud 44
30	43rd year	Saka 1035	EC IX, Nelamangala 38 (a)
31	44th year	Nil	EC X, Chikballapur 25
32	45th year	Cyclic year Jaya	EC IV, Krishnarajapete 34
33	46th year	Nil	At Annu, Hoskote Taluk, Mysore District, M A R 1912-13, Para 70
34	49th year	Nil	EC IX, Nelamangala 12
35	Undated	Nil	EC IX, Bangalore 32	Refers to a Boar hunt
36	Date lost	Nil	EC IX, Channarayana 188
37	Undated	Nil	EC X, Mulbagal 49 (c)
38	Undated	Nil	At Durga Temple at Agara, Yelandur Taluk, Mysore District, M A R 1917, Para 98	Conquest of Kerala referred to
39	Date worn out	Nil	At Matakere, Heggaddevankote Taluk, Mysore District M A R 1912-13, Para 70	Has short historical introduction

A comparison of the above list of inscriptions found in the State with the list of those found in the Madras Presidency given by Dr. Hultzsch in S I I III 11 125-26 from the remission seem to have really great. It appears to have been one of those vexatious taxes which seems to have given as much trouble to the assessee as to the collector. Ulagalandan Tiruvaramba Devan of Kulattur one of the officers engaged in the revenue survey referred to above is referred to in an inscription dated in his 7th year (M.E.R. 1918 Appendix B No 310). In this survey Kulottunga Chola's royal foot (Sripada) was taken as the unit (M.E.R. 1900 Para 26). This statement is confirmed by inscriptions found at Tiruvallangadu (M.E.R. 1900 Nos 466 and 455 of 1906) and Tiruvadamardur (M.E.R. 1900 Nos 303 and 487 of 1907). There was besides a revenue settlement in the 18th year of his reign (1107-1108 A.D.). Though Kulottunga Chola I remitted taxes, he was not lax in the collection of what was actually levied. There is reason to believe on the other hand that he was rigorous in collecting the State revenue. Thus we are told that he ordered the confiscation by the village assemblies of the lands of defaulting tenants (M.E.R. 1910 Nos 620 and 647 of 1910). This power however, the village assemblies had possessed already (S.I.I. III (i) 14) but its exercise had apparently fallen into desuetude. There is no reason to believe that he introduced any change in the civil and criminal administration of the country. The punishments for the different offences appear to have continued the same. Thus a man having killed accidentally another gave 128 cows to a temple for maintaining 4 lamps in it in order to expiate the sin incurred (M.E.R. 1918 Appendix C No 115 of 1918). This punishment does not differ from what was inflicted in similar cases a hundred years prior to Kulottunga-Chola I. There is reason to believe the village assembly was functioning during Kulottunga's reign. There is reference to an irrigation committee as well during his time (M.E.R. 1925 Para 17).

Mr Kanakasabhai's translation of the verse may be modified as follows —

"Vishnu appeared again in the royal womb of the queen of him of the race of the Moon which dispels all darkness, Rājajāja's gracious Lakshmi (who was) of the rival race of the Sun"

Here both 'the queen' and 'Lakshmi' refer to Am-mangadēvi, and her husband is the Eastern Chālukya king Rājajāja I

Period of his
Rule

The copper-plate grants allot to the Eastern Chālukya king Rājajāja I a reign of 41 years, while the Pithapuram inscription of Mallappadēva gives him 40 years. Accordingly, his death and the accession of his son Kulōttunga I would prima facie fall in A D 1061-62 or 1062-63. This date is not borne out by the Telugu inscriptions of Kulōttunga I which contain both a Saka date and a regnal year, and according to which the accession took place in Saka-Samvat 991-92, i e, A D 1069-71. For example, an inscription at Sindhuvali, dated in his 37th year, couples Saka 1030, with the cyclic year Vyaya or A D 1107-1108 (E I I 191). The date of his accession should therefore be fixed at about 1070 A D. Professor Kielhorn's calculations of the dates of Tamil and Kannada inscriptions prove that his reign commenced between the 14th March and the 18th October A D 1070.

Birth and parentage

The original name of the King was Rājēndra-Chōḍa, and in the Tamil inscriptions of his 2nd, 3rd and 4th years he is actually called Rājakēsari-varman alias Rājēndra-Chōḷadēva (II). The account of Kulōttunga's birth and youth in the Kalingattu-Parani seems to imply that he was adopted by Gangaikonda-Chōḷa (i e, Rājēndra-Chōḷa I), who apparently had no son of his own, and that he was nominated the heir-apparent of his grandfather. If the Kalingattu-Parani (XIII his reign in front of the eastern gate way of the temple at the place and in it a number of Sitayojins well versed in the Vēdas were fed for the welfare of the king. It was called the Tirunīṣakanān. It was brought into existence by his sēndpati Īḍittan Tiruchittambalam Udayār alias kāḍavarāyan (M.E.R. 1925 Appendix B No 141 of 1925 and Nos 43 and 11 of 1903). Similarly a Vaiṣṇava math called Kalichchingan madam appears to have been established at Tiruvadandai by the residents of that village who provided for the feeding of Brahmins at it. (M.E.R. 1911 Para 26). In the temples there were places directly connected with the king. Thus there were mandapas or halls in them from where the ruling king issued his orders e.g. the Chedirūjan at Chidambaram and the Ṣṭajadhīrūjan in the northern portion of the palace called Jayangondasolan in the temple at Kāñchipuram. (M.E.R. 1921 Para 33). In what formed the Chola province in Mysore there was the same tendency exhibited in regard to the construction of temples during this reign. Thus an inscription dated in his 37th year refers to the building of the temple of Mulasthānam Udayār and a sluice in the tank bund another well known form that charity took in olden days. (E.C. IV Nanjengud 51). An inscription dated in Kulōttunga's 10th regnal year refers to the building of a temple to the great god Rāmaṣvara Udayār and records a grant of land to it. It was apparently built by the Udayār of the local matha and his four brothers who are described as the sons of Devaṣiva Pandita. (E.C. IV Chamarajanagar 197). The grant in favour of the temple builders included the tax on grazing the tax on digging and other taxes. Another inscription dated in his 45th year records the construction of two temples of Kannēsvara by one Madiyanna of Vadaguvilo. This was probably the Kannēsvara at Kannambūdi where was a great agrahāra. (E.C. IV Krishnarajpet 35).

finally to Chōda of Velanādu. Vijayāditya VII is said to have governed Vēngi for 15 years and Rājaraṇa II for one year. If we deduct the sum of these two reigns from A D 1078, the year of Vīra-Chōda's appointment, the result is A D 1062 as the date of Vijayāditya's accession. This year coincides with the end of the reign of the Eastern Chālukya king Rājaraṇa I, but is 8 years prior to Kulōttunga's coronation. This discrepancy may be explained in the following manner. The Chōla king Vīrarājēndra I claims to have conquered the country of Vēngi and to have bestowed it on Vijayāditya. This expedition may have taken place just after the death of Rājaraṇa I who was succeeded in A D 1062 by his brother Vijayāditya VII. It looks as if the rightful heir Kulōttunga I had been ousted by the latter with the assistance of Vīrarājēndra I. This would explain the fact noted before, that Kulōttunga came to the throne 8 years after his father's death. As noted by Dr Fleet, Vijayāditya VII had later on to apply to Rājaraṇa of Kalanganagara (A D 1071 to 1078) for assistance against the Chōda who threatened to absorb his dominions. This Chōla enemy was no doubt Kulōttunga I who, after Vijayāditya's death, replaced him by Rājaraṇa II and soon after by Vīra-Chōda.

His conquests

The localities in which the inscriptions of Kulōttunga's 2nd year (A D 1071-72) are found show that he was then in possession of Tiruvorriyur, Tiruvālangādu and Kolar. An inscription of his 3rd year is found at Somangalam (near Manimangalam), and one of his 4th year at Kavantadalam (between Conjeeveram and Uttaramallur). The Chellur plates of Vīra-Chōda state that Kulōttunga I conquered the Kērala, Pāndya and Kuntala countries and was anointed to the Chōda kingdom under the name Kulōttungadēva. Instead of 'the Chōda kingdom' the Pithapuram inscription of Mallappadēva uses the

Pora 33 Appendix B No 519 of 1922) Another was Vadhurantaka Brahmaravar who appears in the Simhā chalam inscription. (V & R 1900 Para 12)

During Kulottunga Chola's reign Hindu society social life appears to have been still in a state of flux. Inter marriages between the different castes seem to have been common. Thus in an inscription of the 48th year of Kulottunga Chola I we hear of Brāhman assemblies being convened for settling the status and occupation of different mixed castes. They laid down also the ceremonies these mixed castes should follow and suggested the manner in which they could earn not only on honest living but also prove themselves useful members of society (M.E.R. 1909 Pora 45). Sati was commonly practised during this period. We read in an inscription dated in the 18th year of Kulottunga I that when Novolādhi Raja son of Alagiyo Chola the nāḍgarunda of Novalenād died his young wife Topare kammārī leaped (into the flames) and died. The father made a grant on the occasion for the maintenance of a flower garden of 1 000 ghattas of land under 300 tank and 100 kolaga of dry and wet land under another (E.C. IV Heggodadevan kote 100). The affecting idyl of Dēkabbe narrated in Heggadadevan kote 18 dated in 1057 A.D. in the reign of Rājendra Chōla is perhaps not surpassed by this tale of Kammārī. (See E.C. IV)

Boar and other similar hunts appear to have been popular. An inscription dated in the 6th year of Kulottunga refers to one such hunt and records a grant made on the occasion of the killing of an old boar (E.C. IX, Bangalore 32).

During the reign of Kulottunga-Chōla I, there appears Literary activities during his reign. to have been considerable literary activity in the Tamil country. The Periyapurānam, which gives the history of whose inscriptions proves that he entered into friendly relations with Vikramāditya VI. In an inscription of the 6th year of Virarājendia I at Tiruvallam (No 16 of 1890) he is stated to have deprived Sōmēsvara II of his necklace. The son and successor of Virarājendia I and the brother-in-law of Vikramāditya VI was Parakēśarivaiman, alias Adhijājendia. He is probably 'the king of kings,' whose death, according to the Kalingattu-Parani, preceded Kulōttunga's arrival in the Chōla country. Finally, the Virudarāja of the Kalingattu-Parani, and the king of Kuntala whom Kulōttunga claims to have defeated, is Vikramāditya VI. The war between these two kings must fall before A D 1074-1075.

An inscription of the 11th year—A D 1080-1081—adds that Kulōttunga I drove Vikkalan (z e, Vikramāditya VI) from Nanguli (in the Kolai District) by way of Manalur to the Tungabhadra river, and that he conquered the Ganga-mandalam and Singanam. A later inscription substitutes Alatti for Manalur and 'the country of Konkāna' for Singanam. Neither Manalur nor Alatti can be identified. Singanam seems to refer to the dominions of Jayasimha III, Vikramāditya's younger brother, to whom he had given the office of viceroy of Banāvāsī. Other inscriptions assert that Vikkalan and Singanam had to take refuge before Kulōttunga in the Western ocean. It may have been in the course of the war against the two brothers that Kulōttunga "captured a thousand elephants at Navilai which was guarded by the Gandanāyakas" which must be read as Dandanāyakas (Kalingattu-Parani, XI, verse 74). For, Navilai is probably the capital of Navale-nādu, a district of Mysore, which is mentioned in inscriptions at Kattemanuganahalli and Beltūru (E.I. VI, p 69 and p 214 f). In the Vikramānka-dēva-charita we of course look in vain for an account of reverses experienced by Vikramāditya VI, but are told that he "had once more to extinguish the Chōla" instance of the Tamil language being used in Tamil documents of the 11th century even in distant Sumatra. Unless there was a large resident Tamil colony to use and understand the Tamil language there would have been little use in recording the contents of this inscription in that particular language.

There is no doubt that the coinage established by Rajaraja I continued current in the reigns of his successors. There is reason to believe that the Greek drachma also circulated in the Chōla country during the time of Kulottunga Chōla I and his successor Vikrama Chōla which indicates contact with the West through growth of foreign commerce. It is seen from an inscription dated in the 19th + 1st year of Kulottunga Chōla I that a Kāsu was equal in his time to 7 tiraman (dirāman) i.e. the Grecian coin drachma. The average value of the Attic drachm is said to have been 97 d (M.E.R. 1924 Para 16 Appendix B No 281 of 1923). The dramma continued to circulate in the reign of Vikrama-Chōla as well. There are references to it in inscriptions of his 5th and 14th regnal years. That these were used in making money gifts to temples for maintaining perpetual lamps etc. shows their popular use. (M.E.R. 1909 Appendix B No 578). This coin is also mentioned in a record of the Pāndyan king Maravarman Parākrama Pandya found at Tirupattur in the Madura District. (M.E.R. 1909 Para 29). This record mentions the presentation by a local chief of 300 drammas at the rate of one dramma each day for the sandal paste to be prepared for the god. What relation the dramma bore to the current indigenous coinage may be inferred from an inscription dated in the reign of Rājendra Chōla I which makes one gold kāsu equal in value to three Kalanju (M.E.R. 1916 Appendix B No 176). But an inscription of his successor Vijayarājēndradeva (i.e. Rājādhirāja I) (coinage and currency)

Chōla, a name which Kulōttunga-Chōla I bore in the earlier years of his reign. Then there are several inscriptions of Ko-jatāvarma Sundara Chōla-Pāndya, (11th, 12th and 19th years) apparently a Chōla-Pāndya, who ruled under Rājēndra-Chōla I (32, 34, 38, 39, 43, 44 and 45 of 1896, M E R 1896, Appendix B.) As regards the Chēras, they continued to be feudatories under the Chōlas. In the 34th and 36th years of Kulōttunga-Chōla's reign, Vīra-Kēralan Adhūñājarājadēvar (also called Kērala-Kēsari Adhīrājādūñājadēva) made certain gifts to the Vishnu shrine at Tirukannapuram. An inscription of the latter, dated in his 22-18th year, has been found at Palni (M E R 1923, Para 33, No. 711 of 1905, see also M E R 1905, Para 14).

Before the 26th year of his reign, i.e. A.D. 1095-1096, Kulōttunga conquered the country of Kalinga. This expedition is described in detail in the Kalingattu-Parani. It would fall into the reign of Anantavarman, alias Chōdaganga of Kalinganagara (A.D. 1078 to about 1142). According to inscriptions, this was the first expedition against Kalinga undertaken by Kulōttunga. The other one is the expedition mentioned in the Kalingattu-Parani, which took place about the end of his reign. It has been suggested that in his first campaign he confined his conquest to southern Kalinga in which the grandson of the Eastern Ganga king Anantavarma Chōdaganga was not directly interested and in the other, helped the latter against the rebellious chiefs of the "seven Kalingas" in the north. A record of Anantavarmadēva (i.e. the Eastern Ganga king Anantavarma-Chōdaganga), who succeeded to the throne in A.D. 1078, has been found at Vizagapatam in which the latter town is called Visakhāpattana alias Kulōttunga-Chōdapattana. There is no doubt that the town was so named after Kulōttunga-Chōla I who, in his first campaign against Kalinga, must have proceeded as far as Simhāchalam, where a record that of Madurāntakadevan mūḍai (M E R 1916 No 157) The Madurāntakanmūḍai was being circulated in the Chola province in Mysore. Thus an inscription dated in the 23rd year of Kulōttunga Chōla I refers to the grant to the Tirunandīyara Udaya Mahādeva of one plate weighing by the standard weight of the City, eight Kalanju and one Kunri of gold which was superior in fineness to the gold coin named after Madurāntakan (E C \ Chikballapur 21) Another inscription dated in his 41th year refers to a grant to the same god at Nandi of a Kalanju of gold of the fineness of the gold coin named after Madurāntakan (E C \ Chikballapur 25) Ilam (i.e. Ilamkūṣu) is stated to have been of the same fineness. (U E R 1916 Para 15 No 252) This brings us to the coinage of Ceylon and the relation it bore to the coinage of the Chola country. An inscription of Parantaka I at Tillasthānam dated in his 3rd year states that a son of his deposited for the maintenance of a perpetual lamp 40 Ceylon Karanju which were reckoned as equivalent to 20 current Karanju. This shows that the Ceylon Karanju was equal to 10 Manjadī while the Chōla Karanju was equal to 20 Manjadī (M E R 1895 Appendix B No 25 of 1895) The same relation between the gold weights of Ceylon and the Chōla country is implied by an inscription registered in 1895 (See M E R 1895 Appendix B No 150) Village assemblies took care to see that they received gold coins of the proper weight and fineness in their transactions. The standard gold was called Orlāḷaṣenmaippon (U E R 1925 Appendix B No 50 of 1925) It was also called Tippūkkuch cheṃpon (S I I III. li 229) The phraseology used (palankūṣinōḍun oppadu) shows that the coin tendered was to correspond or agree with the old coin which had been tested with fire. The current coins seem to have varied in weight and fineness which necessitated the detailed definition in inscriptions of the Akalanka (a surname of Vikrama-Chōla,) and grandson of Kulōttunga I, refers to the conquest of Kalinga as having been achieved by Vikrama-Chōla, while the Kalingattu-Parani, claims the same achievement for its hero, Kulōttunga I.

Three inscriptions of his found at Tripulāntakan show that Kulōttunga-Chōla's dominion extended also into the present Kurnool District (M E R. 1906, Para 22).

His other names and titles

Rājakēśari-varman, alias Rājendra-Chōladēva II or Kulōttunga-Chōladēva I, had various other names. The Chellū and Pithapuram plates mention his surname Rājanārāyana (E. I V No 10, verse 11), from which the designation of a temple at Bhīmavaram was derived (E I IV, p 230). Hence certain coins with the legend Chōlanārāyana have perhaps to be assigned to him (I. A XXV, p 321). The Kalingattu-Parani calls him Kulōttunga-Chōla, Kaṭikāla-Chōla, Vinudaiñjabhayamkara, (Canto VI, verse 14, and X, verse 25, where the context suggests that Vinudaiñja was a biruda of Vikramāditya VI) Abhaya and Jayadhara (Canto XI, verse 18 and passim). The last name is applied to him in two inscriptions at Chidambaram and Thuvoraiyur. (E I V, p 105 f) An inscription at Pallavaram belongs to the 39th year of Sungandavirtta-Kulōttunga-Sōladēva, i e., 'Kulōttunga-Chōladēva who abolished tolls', and three later inscriptions (No 5 of 1899, No 125 of 1896 and No 84 of 1897) mention the same name of the king. As the Vikkirama-Sōlan-ulā and Rāja-Rājan-ulā state that Kulōttunga I abolished tolls (I. A XXII, p. 142), it has to be assumed that Sungandavirtta was another of his surnames. A list of the surnames which appear in his inscriptions in the Telugu country have been given in E I VI, p 220 f. From his Chōla predecessors he inherited the title Udayār, 'the lord'. Later on, he assumed the titles Chakravartin, 'the emperor,' and

one) VER 1699 Para 52 VER 1900 Para 23) This title is mentioned in connection with him in the Kulōttunga Sōlan uli (SI I III n. 160) He is called in his Telugu and Tamil inscriptions Tribhuvana chakravartin though in a couple of inscriptions he is referred to merely as Chakravartin and in one as Udayār He appears to have been co-regent with his father at least for a few years. The Pithapuram plates suggest that he was originally the ruler of Vengi country and that he went to govern the Chōla country on which the Vengi country became devoid of its ruler On the strength of these statements Vikrama Chōda of the Pithapuram inscription has been identified by Dr Hultzsch with the hero of the Vikramasolan uli in which his surname Tyāgasamudra occurs and with the Chōla king Parakesarivarman alias Vikramachōladeva whose inscriptions state that he originally resided in the Vengi country and that he left it to ascend the Chōla throne (SI I II 308) The Taki plates show that Vikrama Chōla was not the eldest son of Kulōttunga but the younger brother of his third son Vira Chōda. (E I VI 335) It is not known whether he was the son of Madhurantaki, one of the queens of Kulōttunga and if so whether he was the immediate younger brother of Vira Chōda or only one of the four younger sons of that queen (SI I I No 39 E I V No 10 and SI I III ii 179)

His Tamil inscriptions state that Vikrama Chōla left the north for the south and was crowned a Chōla king (SI I II 308 and SI I III No 179) The Pithapuram inscription of Mallapadeva states that he went to protect the Chōlamandala. Other inscriptions say that he went from the northern to the southern region adopted the crest of the tiger (the Chōla crest) and put on the hereditary crown (SI I III. ii No 79)

Period and extent of his
rule.

states that Tyāgavallī exercised equal authority with the king himself. After her name was named the Tyāgavallī-valanādu. Several other queens of his are also known. Thus one is mentioned in an inscription dated in his 18th year and referred to as Solansorudaiāl alias Kādavan Mahādēvaiyāi, apparently a princess of Pallava descent (M E R 1913, Para 33, Appendix B No 111). Another of his queens Trailōkya-Malladēviyār is mentioned in an inscription of his 2nd year. (M E R 1923, Appendix C. No 138 of 1923). Her mother Umai-nangai is also mentioned. As the gift of these two was for the merit of Vikramakēśari-pallavaraiyāi, it might be inferred that the latter was the father of Trailōkya-malladēviyāi. He was apparently of Pallava descent. His queens, Ādittan Kampamadēviyāi alias Tribhuvanamudaiyār and Ādittan Andakuttiyār alias Anukkiyur Sōlakulavalliyār, are described as the devotees (adīya) of the god Tiruvaiyagattālvār at Kānchi. They apparently showed leanings towards Vaishnavism, as they are also stated to have made donations to that temple for festivals and worship to be conducted therein. They also made the king to restore certain lands to the temple which had been previously granted to it but had fallen into the hands of local people (M E R 1921, Para 33, Appendix C Nos. 39 and 45).

Duration of his rule
fifty years

Kulōttunga I is stated to have reigned for 49 years in the Chellur plates of his grandson (I A. XIV, pp 55), and for 50 years in the Pithapuram inscription of Mallapadēva (E I IV, p 227). This would carry us to A D 1118-1119 or 1119-1120. Hence he must have appointed his son Vikrama-Chōla co-regent during his life-time (in A D 1108). Until recently, the latest epigraphical date known of Kulōttunga I was the 49th year of his reign in two inscriptions at Gangaikondachōlapuram (M E R No 80 of 1892) and Achcharapikkam.

inscription of his found in this State is one of his 12th regnal year. Tamil inscriptions found at Pallavaram, Uttaramallur and Tirumalavādi go up to his 11th and 15th years. While his Sānskrit record at Sevilmedu is dated in his 16th year (E.I. VII 5) his Nidnbrolu inscription has been calculated to fall in 1135 A.D. or in his 17th year (E.I. VI 281 VII 5). Though the Chollur plates of Kulōttunga Chōla II assign a reign of only 15 years to Vikrama Chōla, it is clear he ruled two years longer than that period (I.I. XIV 55).

His expedition against the Kalinga country is one of the exploits mentioned in his Tamil inscriptions. Thus Chintamani 160 dated in his 5th year refers to his destruction of Kalingam and Kadai malai. This war is also referred to in the Vikrama Sōlan ulā which specifically states that the army of Vikrama Sōlan effected the conquest of the seven Kalingas. (S.I.I. III n 180 f n 4). With the conquest of Kalinga is associated in some records (at Tanjore, Tirumalavādi etc. S.I.I. II No 68 III n No 79) his inflicting a defeat on Telunga Bhīma at Kulam. The Kulōttunga Sōlan ulā, a poem in honour of Kulōttunga II, states that Vikrama Chōla accepted (from the author) "the great poem (parani) about Kalinga" (Ibid f n 6). This is undoubtedly a reference to the historical poem Kalingattu Parani which describes the conquest of Kalinga by Kulōttunga I. As Vikrama Chōla's inscriptions place the Kalinga war not only before his coronation in A.D. 1118 but also before his stay in Vēngi, Dr. Hultzsch suggests that it must have taken place before the end of the reign of his father Kulōttunga I and is perhaps identical with that expedition into Kalinga, which is ascribed to Kulōttunga I himself in his inscriptions and in the Kalingattu Parani. As already stated, Vikrama Chōla probably effected the conquest, which is mentioned in only one of Kalinga about A.D.

His conquest
1093-1096.

enemy, he was glad to find himself in his own dominions in the Western region, leaving his furious elephants which lay dead everywhere, from Nangili facing the mountains, as far as the Tungabattirai, with Manalur in the middle, his pride being broken, his boasted valour disappearing, the mountains he ascended bending their backs, the rivers he descended into eddying and breaching their banks in their course, and the seas he plunged into becoming troubled and agitated (who made Vikkalan) turn his back, together with his army, and seized at one and the same time the great goddess of Victory who through fear changed over from the opposite side, the goddess of Fame who was surrendered with humiliation, crowds of women left behind with indifference, troops of furious elephants irretrievably abandoned, and the two countries (pani) called Gangamandalam and Singanam, who, having resolved in his mind to acquire Pāndimandalam, along with much fame, led his great army, which, with its innumerable horses resembling the waves, with its war-elephants resembling the billows, and with its troops resembling the expanse of water, marched as though the northern ocean was about to overflow the southern ocean, and who, when the five Panjavas (Pāndyas) that approached the battlefield to fight turned their backs, fled in terror, and took refuge in jungles, completely destroyed those jungles, put them (the Panjavas) to shame, drove them to hot jungles near hills where treacherous people roamed about, and planted pillars of victory in every direction, who was pleased to take possession of the pearl fisheries, the Podiyal (mountain) where the three forms of Tamil flourished, the middle Sayyam (Sahya) where furious rutting elephants were captured, Kannu and Gangar; who was pleased to establish settlements of people on all sides (in the conquered country) including Kōttāra in order that the enemies might be scattered, who was pleased to occupy the throne just for receiving tribute, and who was graciously seated on the throne of heroes along with his queen, Puvani-mulud-udaiyāl, while his enemies prostrated themselves on the earth "

Later inscriptions, down to those dated in his 49th and 50th years, describe him as universal emperor, Thus E C IX, Kankanhalli 12, dated in his 49th year records —

Western Chalukya king, Vikrāmaditya VI (F I IV 37) As the latter's inscriptions have been found in Drākshārama, it has been inferred he took advantage of the absence first of Vikrama Chōla and then of the death of Kulottunga I and conquered the Vengi country (See under Western Chalukyas) His inscriptions range from A D 1120-1121 to 1123-1124 Shortly afterwards Vikrama Chōla must have reconquered his northern territories as his inscriptions (at Chebrulu and Nidubrolu) dated in A D 1127 and 1130 have been found in them It is probably for this reason that Vikrama Chōla appears to have been as Satyāśraya Kula Kādī i e death to the family of Satyāśraya or the Western Chalukyas A village named after this surname of his is referred to in one of his inscriptions (M F R 1911 Para 27)

Vikrama Chōla appears to have been a devout follower of the Saiva faith His religious faith He is said to have covered with gold the shrine and the gopura at Chidambaram (See above also M E R 1913 Appendix C No 16) In his reign the ancient temple of Parasurāmesvara at Gudi-mallam near Konugunta, was re-built. Though it is mentioned in M E R 1904 No 212 of 1903 that it was built during Vikrama Chōla's reign it can only be understood to have been re built as the temple is found mentioned already in Pallava and Early Chōla records. (See M E R 1904 Para 21) Vikrama Chōla built the first prākāra round the central shrine of the Magalesvara temple at Tiruvalam The temple of Akalankeśvara at Madhurantakam Chingleput District which is named after his surname, appears to have been built during his reign (M E R 1913 Para 35 M E R (August) 1896 Appendix B No 127) At Chidambaram besides covering with gold the shrine and the gopura as above mentioned he is known to have built a wall round the Kanaku Sabha (including the famous shrine of (New Edition) and Malavalli 31, (E C III) of how Ganga-Rāja summoned the fort to surrender, and how the Chōla governor Adiyama returned a defiant answer, saying, "Fight and take it (if you can) " This, Ganga-Rāja did, driving out the Chōla chiefs who were present, and followed up his success by bringing under one umbrella all the districts which had become Chōla nāds. Putting to flight the Tigulas (i.e., the Tamil Chōlas) of Gangavādi, he caused Vīra-Ganga (the Hoysala king Vishnuvardhana) to stand erect, i.e., assert his independence. After this expulsion of the Chōlas from Talkād, the Chōla dominion in Mysore was restricted to the north-east of the Kolar District, where we have inscriptions of Vikrama-Chōla down to his 12th year (E.C X, Chintāmani 70, see below).

The date of Chōla-
expulsion
from Mysore

The approximate date of the expulsion of the Chōlas from Talkād is determined by Yedatore 6 (E C III), which is the first to give Vishnuvardhana the title of Talakādu gonḍa, dated in Saka 1038 (expired), 'Cyclic' year Durmukhi, and Chamarājnagai 83 (E.C. IV), which describes him as in the same year ruling in Talkād and Kōlāla (Kolar) over the whole of Gangavādi as far as Kongu. Moreover, a village which Ganga-Rāja received as a reward for his great exploit he made over to a Jain priest in 1117 A.D. (E C III, Malvalli 31).

Features of
his administration

Kulōttunga Chōla I conducted a land survey in the 16th year of his reign (1085 A.D.) and ordered the remission of certain taxes which earned for him the title of Sungandavīra-Chōla, by which he came to be well known for many generations afterwards (M E R 1908, Nos 377 and 379 of 1907). The levy of this tax appears to have weighed heavily on temples. Though temples were exempt from the tax known as antarāya-pattam, it had been levied on some of them (M E R 1913, Para 33). These were swept away by him and the relief obtained

Appendix B No. 508 of 1923) This record is interesting besides as showing the interest which rural assemblies took in encouraging industries. Thus the local assembly of this village exempted from all taxes the weavers who were to be transplanted into it by the merchants of the five towns near about in order that they might do service in the temple. In return for supplying the cloth for the sacred banners and other services on festival occasions including the feeding of Sri Vaishnava Brahmins in a special Sāla of their own they were exempted from all taxes. Similarly another village assembly consisted of 321 members and ran a feeding house in its name (called Munnārirubattundān) where Brahmins, tapascins and the destitute were entertained (M E R 1925 Para 18 No 108 of 1925). This throws some light on the interest taken in the work of the assembly and its highly democratic constitution. In his 3rd regnal year a severe drought was experienced in parts of the Chōla kingdom and some of the temple jewels were sold by a village assembly to meet the cost of artificial irrigation (M E R 1921 Para 35). According to an inscription found at Kōvilādī near Kumbakonam dated in his 11th year the conditions became so bad, it would appear that the village was ruined and the ryots fled (V E R 1901 No 276). It is not clear however whether the distress referred to was a purely local one or one of a widespread character. That no remission of land revenue was ordered even in the case of destruction of crops due to vis major may be inferred from certain records. (V.E.R 1900 Para 34)

Towards the close of his reign Vikrama Chōla seems to have carried out a land survey. The circumstances under which this survey was carried out are not known but it is possible that it was not a general one. (M.E.R 1925 No 183 of 1925)

Re-survey of Land A.D 1151

Temple
construction and administration

During the reign of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, many of the temples in South India were rebuilt in stone or repaired, the old inscriptions in them being copied in books and then re-engraved after the renovation or repair was over. Among these were the Siva temple at Siddhalingamadain, the Chandēsvaya shrine in the Umamahēsvaya temple at Konērīrājapuram, and the central shrine at the Agastēsvaya temple at Olakkui, in the South Arcot District. The temple at Melappalavūi was similarly rebuilt in his reign, for the prosperity of his reign, by a subordinate chief and dedicated to Kulōttunga-Sōlēsvaya after the king (M E R 1925, Nos. 390 and 393 of 1924). The mandapa in front of Kaikātakēsvaya temple near Veppattūi was named Kulōttunga-Sōlan, after the king, in whose time probably it came into existence (M E R 1910, No. 53 of 1910). This supposition is confirmed by the existence of an inscription of Kulōttunga-Chōla I which is engraved on its north wall. He founded the Vishnu temple of Kulōttunga-Chōla-Viṇnagaraiam (now Rājagōpāla Perumāl) at Mannāigudi in the Tanjore District (M E R 1897, Para 11). His grants and gifts appear to have been evenly distributed between the Siva and Vishnu shrines. The gifts made to Vishnu temples were placed under the protection of the Srīvaishnavas of the Eighteen nāḍus. The gifts made to deities in the Siva temples were placed "under the protection of all Mahēsvayas". They are referred to as guardians of grants made to temples. Their permission appears to have been sought by the temple authorities for receiving gifts or entering into any transaction with the donors regarding their management (M E R 1923, Appendix B No. 51 of 1922, and Appendix C No. 168 of 1923). As adjuncts to the temples, Siva and Vishnu, there were maths, where pilgrims and others were fed. Thus at Thuvādutturai, there were a number of maths, where pilgrims and the destitute were fed. A feeding house was established in the 31st year of record gives a list of the flower plants planted—and built a pond as well to the west of the temple for the use of the priests, after having fetched water and earth from the Ganges (cf Rājendra Chōla's consecration of a well at Gangaikonda śalapuram see above). He also made we are told to the joy of the Tamil people grants of land as well for the maintenance of the gods he set up. These included besides Śiva, Gaṇapati and Śūrya Devar which shows that the worship of Śūrya was in greater favour in the 12th century than now. (See E C V. Śiḍḍaghatta 9 dated in A D 1120)

We have seen above that Sūgatur was famous for its dancing schools. Apparently about this period the sale of women to temples for purposes of service in them seems to have become quite common. (M.E.R. 1925 Nos. 216 19 of 1925). Generally speaking women appear to have volunteered their services to the temples in perpetuity. One record (No. 76 of 1925) gives a list of such servants attached to the matha of the god at Kilaṭiyur. In another (No. 218 of 1925) we have the example of a lady selling herself along with six of her sons and grand-children to the local god. In another record (No. 219 of 1925), we have another instance of nearly the same kind. Such sales of persons to temples must not be taken to mean that they sold themselves from the sordid motive of making a little money for themselves; rather they appear to have dedicated their entire services to the temple for a small consideration. This is evident from one of the records where it is stated that fifteen persons were sold to a temple for the low sum of 30 kāṣu. (V.E.R. 1926, Para 18). From an inscription of Vikrama-Chōla, dated in his 15th year we gather that one kāṣu during his time weighed 3 Kalanju of gold, and that 4 vēḷis of land were sold for 90 such kāṣu. (M.E.R. 1913 Para 84 Appendix B No. 509)

Sale of women to temples.

Among the gods worshipped during this period are mentioned some which should have been popular in the 11th century, though they have long ceased to be so. Thus in an inscription at Kolar (S I I III. 11 No 66) we are told that there were in the Pīḍāṇi temple there, shrines for the following gods, for allotments were made for them in the 2nd year of Kulōttunga-Chōla I — Vīrabhadra, Brāhmaṇi, Īsvari, Vaiṣṇavi, Indrāṇi, Ganapati, Chamundesvari (of the chief shrine or mūlasthāna), Kshēṭrapāladēva, Mahāsasta, Sūryadēva, Yōgini and Yōgīsvara. At the worship of the two last deities intoxicating drinks (madya-pāna) were consumed. This interesting detail is referred to thus — “One kalam of paddy for two kalam of intoxicating drinks for the worship of Yōgini and Yōgīsvara.” To Brāhmaṇiyār, at each of the three times of the day, “four nal of rice, two dishes of vegetables, two areca-nuts and four betel-leaves,” were allotted. The details of the provision made for Īsvariyaṇi seem to have been similar, though the details are lost (S I I III 11. No 67, page 139, see also E C X, Kolar 110, dated in 1071 A D). Instances of the dedication of women for service and devotion to gods are known from the inscriptions of this period (M E R 1922, Appendix B No 230 and Appendix C No 141). These later degenerated into the modern dancing girls, but at the time of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, they were specifically devoted for a spiritual life of divine service. Even the royal household which had impressed a few of them into its service, was made to revert them to temple service (M E R 1922, Appendix C No 141).

His ministers. Kulōttunga-Chōla seems to have had the usual complement of eight ministers. His chief minister seems to have been a Brāhmaṇ. He is described in one of his inscriptions as Tirupputtū Bhāradvājan Māranārāyanan alias Vīra Santōsha Brahma-chakravartī (M E R 1923,

15th years, while another queen Dharaminlududaiyal appears to have taken her place. (S.I.I III ii 182) In the Tirumalavudi inscription, Tvagapataka is described as the ornament of women who had curly hair who possessed the gait of a female elephant a lady of pure virtues etc. In the same record Dharaminlududaiyal is spoken of as the peacock among women an Arundhati on earth a wife adorned with chastity etc. (S.I.I III ii 185) A son of Vikrama Chōla called Vēlan Tiruchittambalun ndaiyār alias Vadanattaraiyann described as nam magandr (i.e. our son) is mentioned in one record. He appears to have been the headman of a place called Mnnalur (M.E.R. 1921, Para 31 Appdx B No 622.) Another son of his was Anapāya surnamed Kulottunga Chōla II who succeeded him on the Chōla throne. A third son of his was Rajaraja II who succeeded Kulottunga Chōla II on the Chōla throne (See below)

Vikrama Chōla was succeeded by his son Kulottunga Chōla II surnamed Anapāya. His Chellūr plates dated in Saka 1065 (A.D. 1113) leave no doubt that he was the son of Vikrama Chōla. (I.A. XIV 55) It is now settled that he began to rule as co-regent with his father from 1133 A.D. (M.E.R. 1913, Para 27) He had besides the distinctive title of Tirunirruṣolan (the Chōla of the sacred ashes) whose significance is not quite clear. Probably he was a devout Saiva in his religious faith (M.E.R. 1901 No. 196 of 1901) He was also known by the names of Vīra sēkhara (M.E.R. 1923 Para 36 Appdx. C No 156 of 1923) and Kalikadini Sōla. A record of his dated in his 8th year terms him Tribhuvana-Chakravartin. (S.I.I III ii No 34) His queen Bhuvanamalududaiyal is mentioned in most of his inscriptions (Ibid) His inscriptions, ranging from his 2nd to the 10th year are known. If the inscriptions

Kulottunga-
Chōla II
Anapāya,
A.D. 1113-1143.

the 63 Saiva saints, was composed during this reign. It is a quaint and valuable work whose subject matter is much more ancient than the time of Rājārāja I, whose inscriptions record that he set up images in honour of a number of these 63 saints in the great temple he founded at Tanjore. The Chōla king Anapāya mentioned in this Purāṇam is none other than Kulōttunga-Chōla I himself. The hymns of the Dēvānam and the Tiruvāimozhi were highly popular during his time. An inscription of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, found in the Siirangam temple, makes provision for offerings on three nights during which certain hymns of Kulasēkhara Ālvār, one of the 12 Ālvārs, was to be recited. This shows that Kulasēkhara's hymns were already well-known at about the close of the 12th century A.D. In the 27th year of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, a royal order was issued convening the village assembly of Tribhuvanamahādēvi-chaturvēdimangalam to adjudge the merit of a work called Kulōttungasōlan-charitam, named after the king (Perumāḷ). It was composed by a poet named Tirunārāyanabhattachan alias Kavikunudachandrapandita, of Mānakulāsanichehēri. The work was heard and the author was given a grant of land to be enjoyed in perpetuity. It has not so far been discovered and as a historical work, it would, if discovered, throw much light on the king and his times (M.E.R. 1919, Para 20, page 98). The poem Kalīngattu-Parani, which throws considerable light on the Chola history, celebrates the exploits of this king. It is, perhaps, the best war-song known in the Tamil language. (M. Srinivas Aiyangar, Tamil Studies, 221)

A Tamil inscription dated in Saka 1010 (A.D. 1087), falling in the reign of Kulōttunga Chōla I, has been found at Lohore Taunt, Bora, Sumatra. It records a gift by a king of 17000 slaves who are styled "the one thousand and one hundred" (M.E.R. 1902, Para 11). This is an unique of an elephant.) Apparently, Tirumalarasa pretended independence of the Chola sovereign whose authority had practically ceased to exist over him. Hence his new crest combining the elephant and the lion so totally different from the Chōla tiger crest.

As mentioned above, his title Tiruvīru-sōlan is indicative of his devout faith in the Saiva tenets. Sekkilar who states he compiled the famous Periyapurānam under the patronage of Anapāya, must have done so under Kulōttunga Chōla II, Anapāya being as already set out, one of his surnames. The date of this work, long in dispute, may now be definitely taken to be about 1145 A.D. or the middle of the 12th century A.D. Compilation of this work perhaps the most popular in the whole range of Tamil Saiva literature shows that in the reign of Kulōttunga II the Saiva creed reached its most pre-eminent position. This work largely based on Nambiyāndar Nambis Tiruttondar Tiruvandadi was laid under contribution in later times by Virasaiva writers for popularising their own faith.

His religious
faith

Meanwhile, the Vaishnava faith which had co-existed and flourished with the Saiva, received a fresh impetus from the activities of Rāmānja, the great religious reformer. Rāmānja's traditional date is 1017 to 1187 A.D. Historically he is closely connected with the Hoysala king Bitti Dēva, later called Vishnvardhana, who ruled from 1111 to 1141 A.D. The period 1111 to 1141 A.D. is covered by the reigns of the three Chola kings Kulōttunga-Chōla I 1070 to 1120 A.D. Vikrama-Chōla, 1118 to 1135 A.D. and Kulōttunga-Chōla II 1133 to 1145 A.D. The popular story of Rāmānja's persecution by a Chōla king named Karikāla-Chōla in whose dominions Srirangam the centre of his activities lay seems from a careful examination devoid of any real foundation. The

Sri Valahna
vism Rāmānja
and his activities.

dated in his 35th regnal year, states that a Kalanju was equal to two Kāsu (M E R 1924, Appendix B No 226 of 1923) We may take it that the rate of exchange did not much differ during the days of Kulōttunga-Chōla I or his successor From an inscription dated in the 15th year of Vikrama-Chōla, we learn that one kāsu weighed three-fourths of a Kalanju of gold (M E R 1913, Para 34, Appendix B No 509 of 1912) This term Kalanju, which often occurs in inscriptions, has however, to be interpreted sometimes as coin and sometimes as gold weight of the proper standard and fineness (M E R 1912, Para 21, M E R 1916, Para 8) In an early Pāndya inscription, it appears as the equivalent of the Sānskrit Krishna-Kacha, (M E R 1908, No 690 of 1908) In Ceylon, it appears that a coin of the Kalanju weight was called Kahāpana An inscription of the 13th year of Pārthivēndrādhīpati gives Kalanju as the equivalent of nishka (M E R 1916, Para 8) .

According to Rao Bahadur H Krishna Sāstri, Madurāntakandēvan-mādar weighed exactly one Kalanju of gold (M E R 1913, Para 22) Rājarājan-kāsu referred to in certain inscriptions (M E R 1913, Appendix B. No 141) appears to have been a gold issue of Rājarāja I, which must have been in weight and in value half of the Madurāntakandēvan-mādar This coin may have been an issue of Rājēndia-Chōla I, who was called Madhurāntaka, or may be identical with the coins which bear the legend Uttama-Chōla in Grantha and Nāgarī characters and belong to the time of Uttama-Chōla Madhurāntaka, the immediate predecessor of Rājarāja I. (M E R 1913, Para 22, see also M E R 1903-I, Para 11) The coin Madurāntakandēvan-mādar appears to have set the standard of fineness and purity in gold (M E R 1916, Appendix B No 252 and Appendix C. No 157) Thirty-seven Kāsu were equal to 10 Kalanju and nine manjadi of gold, whose fineness was equal to dated in the 3rd regnal year of Kulottunga Chola III or about 1160 A.D. (M.F.R. 1922 Appdx. B No 315). It records a gift in his favour. The local chief mentioned in this inscription is also referred to in two other records in one of Kulottunga III (M.F.R. 1922 Appdx. B No 311 dated in the 5th regnal year) and in another of Rajaraja III (Ibid Appdx. B No 318 dated in the 2nd regnal year). Apparently Tiruvarangatamedanar survived his guru for over forty years. So Ramanuja's last period of life should have fallen in the reigns of Vikrama-Chola and Kulottunga Chola II in whose reigns there is no suggestion whatever that there was either religious persecution or political warfare of any kind.

Kulottunga Chola II probably died in or about the 13th year of his reign. His last known record is dated in his 13th regnal year and the 12th day. It is found engraved on a temple dedicated to Kulottunga-Sola Isvara at Ottattur near Trichinopoly. This temple is now known by the name of Chollavara and was built in this king's 13th year by a certain Bāna-Vidyādharā Nādālvār. He is described as the brother of one Brahmamārāya Minttaraiyar. The income from a village named in it was assigned for its maintenance. The Royal Secretary Anapāya Muvendavulan drafted the order and the charter which made the lands of the village tax free was signed by five officers of the Puravaris (i.e., Revenue Department) and the three chiefs Singalarāyan, Iladattarāyan and Villavarāyan. It would seem as though the king had died during the time the temple was in construction. He probably died leaving no sons, as the succession devolved on his brother Rājārāja II.

Death of Kulottunga-
Chola II
1143 A.D.

Kulottunga Chola II was succeeded by his younger brother Rājārāja II. The latter was probably a son of

Rajaraja II
AD 1146-1172.

coins which the assemblies would accept (See M E R. 1925, Para 10) Dr Hultzsch attributed to Kulōttunga-Chōla I coins struck in repousse on very thin gold, like those of the Eastern Chālukyas, Chālukyachandra and Rājārāja II. (I.A., 1896, 321, Plate II, 26, 27)

Death of Kulōttunga-
Chōla I, 1120
A D

Kulōttunga-Chōla I probably died in the 50th year of his rule. No inscriptions of his reign beyond his 50th regnal year are known. He might be taken to have died in or about 1120 A.D. An inscription of the 7th year of Vikrama-Chōla (=A.D. 1125) at Tiruvidaimarudur, refers to the temple of Kulōttunga-Chōlēsvara at Mangalakkudi, near to that place, which had been built in memory of Kulōttunga-Chōla I. It would seem to follow from this that he might have died at this village and that the temple in his name was erected there to mark the place of his death. (M E R. 1895, Appendix B. No. 139 of 1895)

Vikrama-
Chōla
Tyāgasamudra, Akalanaka, etc., A D
1118-1135

Kulōttunga-Chōla was succeeded on the throne by his son Vikrama-Chōla. His Tamil inscriptions have been found mostly in the Madras, Chingleput, North Arcot and Tanjore Districts. A couple of Telugu inscriptions and a Sanskrit inscription of his are also known. They come from the Godāvāri District (M E R. 1891 (June), Para 3, M E R. 1894, No 165 of 1894, S I I III. ii 178-179, M E R. 1926, Para 27, M E R. 1918, Para 35) In the Tamil inscriptions he is indifferently styled Parākēśarīvarman and Rājakēśarīvarman (M E R. 1911, Para 27, M E R. 1918, Para 35) In the Telugu inscriptions he is mentioned as Vikrama-Chōla. According to the Pithapuram inscriptions of Mallapadēva, he bore the surname of Tyāgasamudra (the ocean of liberality) (E I. IV 228) A variant of this title Tyāgararakara is mentioned in another inscription (M E R. 1900, No 43). He was also known by the name of Akalanka (the spotless

An inscription dated in the 14th year of this king (A D 1160) is interesting for its long passages resembling those in Bīṇa's Kadambari and replete with different alanidras. The king is eulogised in them as the very life of the people the face of the dgeme the foremost in the three worlds and the head of the three Tamils. He is also spoken of as having received homage at the hands of several kings such as the Kannadar Halingar Tennavar Singalar, Kaikayar Honganar Knpakar hālikar Hambodar, Kosalar, hondalar Pappalar Pānchalar Poppular (Pulnvor) Maddicar Mārattar Rattavar and Māgarar. It is obviously impossible to take this boast literally (M E R 1925 Para 20 Appendix B No 257 of 1925). As a matter of fact the Chola Empire at the time this panegyric was being composed had already begun to decline and had lost ground in different directions (See below)

An eulogy of
his reign.

This political decline was reflected in the social and religious life of the people. Thus in an inscription dated in the 14th year of this king there is mention made of the assembly of Tirrakkādayar meeting in its Assembly Hall called Kulōttungosōlan Tiruvēdattulatti, in the temple of Kālākālādevar, and censuring the conduct of the Mahāśvaras who it is said besides wearing and distributing among themselves the red lilies distinctly exhibited it would appear their leanings towards Vaiṣṇovism. The assembly seeing this outrage resolved to confiscate their lands in favour of the temple (M E R 1925 Para 20 Appendix B No 257 of 1925). Religious feeling apparently was crystallizing into rank sectarianism almost the first sign we have of it in the Chōla period. This intolerance of Vaiṣṇavism is the more inexplicable as the Kālāmukha form of Saivism, which was more catholic in its tendencies of belief deities and worship was still in high favour both royal and popular

Political decline reflected in social life

Dr Kielhorn has worked out from his Tamil and Telugu inscriptions that his coronation took place on approximately the 29th June 1118 A D (E I VII 5). If Kulōttunga I ruled for fifty years from 1170 A D, and the coronation of Vikrama-Chōla took place in 1115 A D, it should have preceded Kulōttunga's death by a year or two. According to the inscriptions found in this State, mainly in the Kolar, Chintāmani and Srinivasapur taluks of the Kolar District, his rule should have been confined solely to that part of the State and that he should have begun to rule from about 1118 A D. As in the Telugu inscriptions at Chēbrōlu and Nidubrōlu, the inscriptions found in this State give in some instances not only the regnal years but also the Saka dates. The following is a list of his inscriptions found in this State —

No	Saka date	Regnal year	Reference
1	Saka 1042 (A D 1120)	2nd year	E C IX , Sīdlaghatta 8 b
2	Saka 1042 (A D 1120.)	2nd year	E C IX , Sīdlaghatta 9
3	Nil	3rd year (A D 1121)	E C IX , Chintāmani 78
4	Nil	5th year (A D 1123)	E C IX , Chintāmani 169
5	Saka 1049 (A D 1127)	10th year	E C IX , Srinivasapur 61
6	Nil	10th year (A D 1127)	E C IX , Kolar 186
7	Nil	12th year (A D 1129)	E C IX , Chintāmani 70

In Sīdlaghatta 81, Vikrama-Chōla is given the title of Srī Rājārāja, while in Sīdlaghatta 9 he is given the alternative name of Rājayār. It is possible Srī Rājārāja was one of his surnames. In Chintāmani 160, he is styled Kō-Rājahāsaranmar, while in Srinivasapur 61 and Chintāmani 70 he is called Kō-Parahāsaranmar. In Chintāmani 160, Srinivasapur 61, Chintāmani 60 and Chintāmani 70, his queen Mukkōkīlan-adigal is represented as sitting with him on his throne. Though the latest will show. If however the identification is proved by future research to be correct then the Komāran Kulottunga should have been a different son who died prematurely and in whose name the village of Komaran Kulottungasōla-chaturvedimangalam was founded in the 2nd year of Rājārāja II. Rājādhirāja seems to have adopted the historical introduction of Rājārāja II simply as his successor and not as his son though Kulottunga Chōla III did so as his son. It is now definitely proved that Rājādhirāja was not the son of Rājārāja II but a grown up grandson of Vikrama Chōla the grandfather of Rājārāja II as well (M E R 1921 Para 19 Appendix C No 133 of 1921). Rājādhirāja accordingly was the cousin of Rājārāja II. Apparently Rājādhirāja was the son of an unnamed daughter of Vikrama-Chōla, who married one Neriyaḍaiya Perumāḷ of whom nothing is known. Rājādhirāja's original name was Eḍirip-perumāḷ and he was raised to the throne on Rājārāja's death by Pallavarāyar the chief minister of the time. That Vikrama-Chōla had a daughter is independently proved by an inscription dated in the 16th year of Vikrama Chōla's reign found at Punjai in the Tanjore District which records the gift of a piece of tax free land at her instance for growing betel leaves for the use of the goddess at Rājārājasttur and for the maintenance of two gardeners for maintaining the same. (M E R 1925 Appendix B No 181 of 1925). As her name is not mentioned it is not possible to state whether the donor in this record is identical with the mother of Rājādhirāja.

How Pallavarāyar came to effect a silent revolution is detailed at length in the above-quoted record which comes from Pallavarayanpēttai and is dated in the 8th year of Rājādhirāja (A.D. 1180). At the time of the death of Rājārāja II, Pallavarāyar the chief minister years. Accordingly it must be understood he was only appointed in that year co-regent with Rājādhirāja, who ruled we know for 19 years. As Rājādhirāja was crowned in his 15th regnal year in 1172 A D. he should have begun his own co-regency with his predecessor in or about 1168 A D. and ended his rule in or about 1187 A D. when Kulottunga-Chōla III should have begun his rule by himself. It would seem to follow from this that when Rājādhirāja was made co-regent in 1168 A D. there was no immediate prospect of any son being born to Rājārāja II. The subsequent birth of two sons apparently in 1170 and 1171 A D. upset these calculations and necessitated in view of the critical times to supersede them for the time being and appoint Rājādhirāja to the throne. There appears also no doubt whatever that Kulottunga Chōla III himself was co-regent with Rājādhirāja from 1178 A D. when he ascended the throne to 1187 A D. when he actually began his rule on the death of Rājādhirāja.

Pallavarāyar's Revolution.

The policy adopted by Pallavarāyar seems justified both by the circumstances of the hour and by the events which followed his revolution. The Pāndyan war had broken out and the times were not apparently propitious for the rule of an infant king. The success that attended the efforts of Pallavarāyar in driving out the Ceylooneso forces indicates that the steps he took were both necessary and effective. At the same time it must be remarked that Pallavarāyar, though he appears to have taken strong measures in suppressing the incipient revolt that broke out against his policy even going to the extent of imprisoning his opponents and thus silencing all adverse criticism of it did not do any injury to the late king's wife and infant sons. On the other hand he wisely took steps to safeguard their personal safety and eventually secured when the Pāndyan war was over, the succession

Justification of his policy

Natarāja) and the Rahasya. His inscription dated in his 3rd year is the earliest in this temple. Three inscriptions on this wall call it Vikramasōlan-tirumāligai. Four others, however, refer to it as the Kulōttungasōlan-tirumāligai. Mr. H. Krishna Sāstrī suggests that the pious act of building or rebuilding this enclosure was the work of Vikrama-Chōla, who might have called it after his father Kulōttunga I. Vikrama-Chōla is also referred to as having built the second enclosure as well. It is called by the same name of Vikrama-sōlan-tirumāligai. He also appears to have re-built the mūlasthāna shrine. (M.E.R. 1914, Para 13). The gate-way over the south wall of the Tanjore temple was called as Vikrama-sōlan-tiruvāsai apparently after him. As an inscription found over it mentions this fact, it may have been built by him or in his honour (M.E.R. 1924, Para 17, Appendix C, No. 414). He seems to have favoured, as his predecessors did, Vaishnava shrines as well. An inscription of his dated in his 9th year, found at the Arulāla Perumāl temple at Conjeeveram, provides for the expenses of the annual celebration of the birthday of the two Vaishnava saints Pudattālvār and Poygaiyālvār and mentions six of the ancient Vaishnava temples of Kānchi by name. (M.E.R. 1893 (August), Para 13). Similarly, mention is made of the erection of a temple for Tirumangai-Ālvār, another of the more famous Vaishnava saints, with provision for worship in it. (M.E.R. 1923, Appendix B. Nos 510 and 511 of 1922). The popularity at about this time of the Saiva Saints and the Vaishnava Ālvārs seems to have reached its high water-mark.

Rural Administration

During Vikrama-Chōla's reign, rural administration continued to be entirely in the hands of the village assemblies. An inscription of his 10th year states that the Mahāsabha of Tirakannapura (Tanjore District) consisted of 350 (? 750) members (M.E.R. 1923,

This war as will be seen below proved one of the contributory causes to the break up of the Chōla Empire.

The war against the Pandya country arose through Rājādhirāja offering help to Kulasekhara the fugitive Pandya king against his rival Parākrama Pandya whose cause was taken up by the Ceylonese king Parākramabāhu the Great. The Singhalese chronicle Vaḥḍraṃsa (Chapters 76 and 77) gives an account of the expedition led by Lankāpura Dandanātha the Ceylon general against Kulasekhara. The account contained in the Vaḥḍraṃsa has been proved to be an one-sided one attributing as it does all the victories to Lankāpura Dandanātha and all the defeats to Kulasekhara. (See M.E.R. 1899 Para 36). A stone inscription found at Arpakkai 8 miles off Conjeevaram refers to this war and while it confirms the main incidents it is more just to Kulasekhara and his attempts at driving the foreign invaders away from the mainland of India. As the inscription recording this fact is dated in Rājādhirāja's 5th regnal year the war should have ended about that time, i.e. about 1173 A.D. The date of the expedition may therefore be set down to about 1171-2 A.D. when the war of the Pāndyan succession as surmised by Mr V. Venkayya, began (M.E.R. 1899 Para 37). As the earliest record in which Rājādhirāja is described as who was pleased to take Madurai and Ilam (i.e. Ceylon) is dated in his 12th regnal year (A.D. 1180) it might be inferred that he took it because of the victory that his troops achieved in assisting the claimants to the Pandyan throne against their rivals and their Ceylonese confederates (M.E.R. 1900 Para 28 No. 471 of 1910 M.E.R. 1910 Appendix B No. 731 of 1909 and M.E.R. 1912 Appendix B No. 300).

Pandyan War of succession
1171-2 A.D.

The cause of this war, in which the Chōlas became embroiled may be briefly told. Owing apparently to a

Cause of the War

Social Conditions

There is nothing to show that during Vikrama-Chōla's reign the even tenor of civil life was disturbed. His wars were few and there seems to have been general peace throughout the empire. In the rural areas, organised hunts appear to have been common, especially of the wild boar. Thus in Chintāman 78 (E. C. X), dated in the 3d year of Vikrama-Chōla, we have one mentioned. The boar died and a memorial stone was set up for it. The festivals connected with the numerous temples that were dotted over the country afforded the necessary diversion to the people. We have an interesting account of the consecration ceremony of the newly erected Sōmēśvara temple at Sugattur, in Sadlaghatta 9 (E. C. IX), which indicates the popular interest that such events should have enrolled. Udayamūtānda-Brahma-mārayan, the person to whose liberality it owed its origin, is described as a resident of Arumohideva-chaturvēdimangalam. He was the chief of Nallūr, a town praised by many. His father is stated to have been "well versed in pure Tamil," in what is now a Kannada district. He was the head of the Atiēyas (i. e., of the gōtra of Atrēya Rishi). He was doubtless a high-placed Brāhman official and a rich man. He is said to have been highly generous, in fact, as liberal as a rain-cloud to mendicants, who, it is added, came to him from all quarters. He erected the temple in honour of his brother, who apparently had died sometime before. Sugattur itself is described to us as a place "where damsels learn dancing" and Pagattur is spoken of as abounding in "halls, palaces, mandapas, lofty pinnacles, and ? gilded gates." The consecration of the new temple was, it is added, "conducted to the sound of musical instruments." To mark the occasion, Udayamūtānda presented a sacred foot-stool made of pure gold and caused to be set up (i. e., consecrated) the image of Siva with Pārvatī so that it might be worshipped by all the world. He also got a flower-garden planted—the proceeded Lankapura taking more places some of them putting up, on behalf of Kulasekhara a good fight. A few of these were taken and re-taken more than once which indicates to some extent the resistance offered. Kulasekhara was not all this time idle. He had brought up forces from Tinnovely and other parts of his kingdom. Certain of the Tamil chiefs who had submitted to Lankapura, also revolted and went over to him. Apparently even according to the Mahāvamsa the tide turned in favour of Kulasekhara. Parakrama-Bāhu accordingly despatched another contingent from Ceylon, under his general Jagad Vijaya to help Lankapura. Thus reinforced, Lankapura resumed his advance on the Pāṇḍyan capital himself and Jagad Vijaya proceeding in different directions taking the places en route. Jagad Vijaya captured, among other places Sirivāla where he burnt down the two-storeyed palace and razed to the ground the fortress. He then joined Lankapura at Tirapalli which was taken with great loss to Kulasekhara. Next the Ceylon forces once again separated Lankapura marching on Rājina where Kulasekhara offered battle. Lankapura apparently caught unawares sent a message to Jagad Vijaya to join him. In the meanwhile the fight proceeded with dire consequences to Kulasekhara. Being defeated he took refuge in the fort which was next attacked. Kulasekhara leaving behind him even the clothes he wore fled to Tondamāna. It is evident he fled in disguise his life being in danger. Lankapura and Jagad Vijaya now continued their march unopposed and took Madura which they made over to Vira Pāṇḍya. After rewarding the friendly chiefs with presents, Lankapura next endeavoured to put down the malcontents who had gathered strength at Tirupattur (in the present Madura District). Here Kulasekhara's forces augmented by certain Chōla chiefs offered resistance. The battle of Pon Amarāvati was fought in which the victory was on

Thirty Kāsu for which fifteen persons are said to have sold themselves could, taking the value of the Kāsu was fairly steady during the period, have fetched only $1\frac{1}{2}$ vīl of land

Administration of Justice

There appears to have been little or no change in the traditional mode of administering justice. A few records show how closely the local temple was connected with this phase of Chōla rule. The fines, if any, never went to the treasury but benefited the temple, which shows that no profits were made by the State as such from the administration of justice. Thus, in a case of accidental homicide, the culprit was ordered, in the absence of adequate confirmation, to burn at his expense a lamp in the local Siva temple for the merit of the deceased boy (M E R 1922, Para 20, Appdx B No 554). Burning lamps in the temples were resorted to for other purposes as well. Thus, a servant of a captain in the army having died, his sister put up a metal likeness of his in the temple at Kālahasti with a lamp stand attached to it for burning a lamp before the god (Ibid Para 21, Appendix C. No 95).

House-
life

Vikrama-Chola had at least three queens, all referred to in his inscriptions. Inscriptions dated from his 5th to 12th regnal years make mention of his queen Mukhakilīn-adigal. She is said in these records to have shared his throne. Dr. Hultzsch has suggested that she should have died in the course of the 9th regnal year (A.D. 1126-27), as she is not mentioned in the records beyond the 9th year (S I I III, n, 1-11). This does not appear to be correct. We have in stone of her in Chintamani 70 (E C X), which is dated in the 12th regnal year. In his inscriptions from the 11th to the 12th years, his favourite queen Tīgappālā is mentioned. In a record from the 11th year, she is mentioned. She is said to have shared the throne from about the 11th to the fresh aid from him. The latter helped him with a large army consisting of the forces of various chiefs among whom were Pallavaraiyar and the brave Narasimha (Narasimha) Pannavaraiyar. These troops marched on to Pondi and Laccu. Learning of this movement, Lankaputratation Jagaj Vijaya at Madura and him self advanced on Kulasekhara. A battle was fought at Kulenilaya on the borders of the Pandyan kingdom and Kulasekhara was badly beaten. The slaughter was so great that the dead covered four leagues. Lankapura then burnt several of the adjoining places and turning back halted at Velankudi. A second battle was fought at Pon Amaravati against what remained of Kulasekhara's forces and those of his allies. Kulasekhara was again put to flight. This ended the campaign. Lankapura claimed that he had taken the country of the enemy made it over to Virapandya and returned to his island home.

The Vahurama account above summarized has been justly criticised by Mr V Venkayya as a one-sided one. Though the victory is always claimed to the Singaleso generals yet Kulasekhara was not so utterly routed as to be incapable of further resistance. The presents offered to those who submitted to his authority by so able a general as Lankapura, who never sustained a single defeat in the whole campaign have a suspicious look about them. They were more probably bribes intended to win them over to his side. That Lankapura should have thought of going back to his country after the second battle of Pon Amaravati while Kulasekhara was still at large and able to continue the fight shows that he was exhausted by the harrying nature of the campaign he was engaged in. This is indicative of the tactics played by Kulasekhara, whose object seems to have been to prolong the struggle and tire out his adversary. After the final help he received from the Chola king Kulasekhara

Critical of the Mahā Jātaka
Narrative

dated in the 12th year of Kōnērīnmaikondān, identified with this king, are rightly attributed to him, then his reign should have extended to twelve years. An inscription of his 13th year has also been found. (M E R 1913, Para 35, Appdx B No 531) As in the case of Vikrama-Chōla, the titles of Rājākēsari and Parakēsari are found applied to him in an indifferent manner. Thus Kulōttunga-Chōla II is called three times by the one and four times by the other (M E R. 1910, Para 26) In Telugu records, he is described by both the titles (E I VI 224) His capital was Vikrama-Chōlapura and his throne is spoken of as having been of gold with a canopy of pearls over it

His peaceful reign

The reign of Kulōttunga II appears to have been, on the whole, a peaceful one. He bore a quiet rule of some thirteen years, which was destitute of any political events of note. The Chōla power had so far declined in Mysore that hardly a single inscription of his has been found even in the Kolar District, where Chōla rule lasted the longest time. (It should be noted here that E C X Mulbagal 44 (b) dated in Saka 1112, Cyclic year Saumya, which corresponds to A D 1189, and E.C. IX Anekal 74, assigned by Mr Rice to about A D 1200, fall in the reign of Kulōttunga-Chōla III and not Kulōttunga-Chōla II, as mentioned by him. See E C IX Introd. 18 and E C X Introd. XXX) Probably assignable to his period are the inscriptions registered as E C. X, Kolar 218, dated in the Cyclic year Īsvara, corresponding to 1140 A D, which mentions the Mahāmandalēsvara Timmaya-Dēva-Chōla-Mahārāja, who makes a grant of land to a temple, without acknowledging the Chōla suzerainty. He has been identified by Mr Rice with the Nala-Tnūmalarasa, whose son Tnūmalarasa-Dēva has engraved his crest, the Gajasīmha, on the Nandi hill (Under the inscription is drawn a lion with the proboscis confusion caused by the war of the Pandyan succession in which Rājādhirāja took an active part

The story told in these inscriptions may be pieced together for comparing it with the narrative of Mahādrāma. The Arjākkam inscription sets forth that the army of Ceylon having taken possession of the Pandyan country drove away king Kulasekhara, who was in Madura and then began (?) to fight in battle with the feudatories of the great king Rājādhirājadeva. The danger consequent upon the war spreading in the districts of Tondi and Paṣi combined with the (?) easy way in which the army of Ceylon gained victories struck terror into (the hearts of) the people both in the Chōla country and in other districts. Having been informed of this I Ediriṭṭi Sola Saṁhuvarayan (the donor of the grant mentioned in the inscriptions) felt anxious as to how this moy end went near the sacred feet of Śivaidevar (a great Saiva devotee of the time) and said This army of Ceylon which has thus entered (the country) (consists) of men (who are given to) very vicious deeds. If they enter the boundaries of the Chōla country it will be a misfortune to the temples of the gods including those of Śrī Mohādeva to the Brāhmanas and to the whole country. I (further) requested that in order to avoid this (calamity) he should by prayers oblations and worship and in all (possible) ways be pleased to make their faces unseen (?hy us). Whereupon His Holiness was pleased to declare This the army of Ceylon which consists of very vicious and wicked men removed the sacred door of the temple of the god of the holy Rāmēśvaram obstructed the worship and carried away all the treasures of the temple. We also learn that they are all sinners against Śiva. We shall make the necessary attempts for the flight and disappearance after being completely defeated in battle and after being account goes that Karikāla-Chōla was an uncompromising Saiva and that on the return home of Rāmānuja from his signal successes abroad, he was asked in common with other Brāhmans, to subscribe to a declaration of faith in Siva. To escape persecution, he fled, it is said, to the Hoysala kingdom in Mysore. Here, he converted the ruling king from the Jaina faith, an event which has been assigned to 1117 A.D. Having put down the Jains by the severest measures, he settled, it would appear, under the royal favour and protection at Mēlkōte, and there established his seat. After twelve years, on the death of Karikāla-Chōla, he is said to have returned to Sīrangam, where he ended his days. There are at least three insuperable objections to the acceptance of this story. First, there is nothing on record in any inscription of the whole period ranging from Kulōttunga Chōla I to Kulōttunga-Chōla II, a period of seventy-five years, to substantiate this story. Secondly, there is no hint in any of the thousands of inscriptions known of the Imperial Chōla kings that they were ever intolerant of religious faith. On the other hand, they uniformly patronised Buddhism, Jainism, Saivism and Vaishnavism. They were too ardent believers to be intolerant towards any religion. Moreover, the kings of this time appear to have professed now this faith and now the other, and even when they preferred the one to the other, they were—as shown in the detailed accounts given above—equally interested in the other and did much for those professing it. Thirdly and finally, apart from the inherent improbability of the story, there is nothing to show that persecution was called for at the time to which it has been assigned.

The story of the war as told in inscriptions.

Rāmānuja, a contemporary of Kulōttunga Chōla II

It is probable that Rāmānuja actually lived during the life-time of Kulōttunga-Chōla II. A disciple of Rāmānuja, Tiruvarangattamudanāi, is mentioned in an epigraph

Lankapuri Dandanāyaka and his generals being put to death and their heads nailed on to the gateway of Madura. Arrangements were then made against the future annexation of the Pandyan country to Ilam (Ceylon). All this was we are told done by Pallavarayar the minister of Rājādhirāja who it is added died later of some disease (M E R 1924 Para 21). The Tirumayanam inscription which is six years later than the Pallavarayanpēttai record confirms the fact of the Chōla part in the Pandyan war during the reign of Rājādhirāja. It mentions Kulasekhara a rival Vira Pandya and suggests that there was a Chōla invasion of Ceylon. It records a gift in favour of a person who distinguished himself in the campaign. Owing to the fragmentary character of the record the details cannot be made out (M E R 1925 Para 21). The Sāmbonarkoyil record which refers to incidents in the 11th year of Rājādhirāja adds the notable fact that there was so much confusion in the Chōla country as the result of this Ceylonese invasion that the images of the Nāyanmārs (i.e. the sixty three Saiva devotees referred to in the Periya Purānam) had to be removed to a place of safety apparently to avoid their being outraged by the invaders, who apparently were expected to press northwards inland into the Chōla country (M E R 1925 Para 21). The Tiruvalangadu record which is dated in the same year as the Tirumayanam inscription describes the part played in the war by a traitor named Srivallabha (M E R 1906, Para 23). He was evidently one of those who had been won over by a bribe—in the guise of a present—by the Singhalese general Lankāpuri Dandanāyaka.

That the war mentioned in the inscriptions above quoted and in the narrative as given in the Makāvamsa refer to one and the same event there can be no

The Makāvamsa
and the inscriptions
refer to the same war

Vikrama-Chōla Vikrama-Chōla is styled Periyadēvar in an inscription of the 11th year of Rājārāja II (M E R. 1913, Appendix B No 418). This term might be taken to indicate, as suggested by Mr H Krishna Sāstri, that Vikrama-Chōla was Rājārāja's father. The fact that Rājārāja II was styled Rājakēśari-varman, while Vikrama-Chōla was entitled Parakēśarivarman, lends some support to this view, though it must be admitted that both the surnames are given to Vikrama-Chōla in his inscriptions. Rājārāja II had probably the title of Rājagambhīra (M E R. 1913, Para 36). The latest inscription discovered so far is in his 27th year, which corresponds to A D 1172 (Ibid Appendix B. No. 123). He must, therefore, have ruled at least 26 years. (Ibid Para 36). This is confirmed from another source. Dr Hultzsch quotes a record of his successor Rājādhirāja, from which it might be gathered that Rājārāja ruled from at least this period (S I I III 207). His queen's name appears under the name or rather surname of Mukkokilānadigal, apparently named after the more famous queen of Vikrama-Chōla. She is said to have belonged to the Malada family (M.E R 1925, Para 20). The Royal Secretary during his time was Rājāsraya Pallavaraiyar (Ibid Appendix B No 530.) This Pallavaraiyar was the same as the Pallavarayar of Konigakullattur, where he built the temple of Rājārājēsvaram-udaiyāi. He was, both from his position and otherwise, an important personage of the time. He played a great part in the affairs of the State, especially during the war of the Pāndyan succession. (See below) He was the general who commanded the Chōla forces against the Ceylonese general Lankāpuri Dandanāyaka. The village where the temple named after Rājārāja II stands is called after him Pallavarāyanpēttai near Rāyavaram. The large number of inscriptions of Rājārāja II found at this temple shows the high patronage it enjoyed in his time (M E R 1925, Para 20)

given to very vicious deeds apparently referring to the terror striking methods of pillage and plunder and burning to ashes and razing to the ground towns and villages they adopted in the course of their march inland

(6) that Kulasekhara was assisted by the Chôla and Kongu chiefs the former from the Tinnivelly area where the Chôla Pândyas appear to have held sway as viceroys and local rulers. (See Chôla Pândyas below)

(7) that Kulasekhara was not so badly beaten as the Maharamba would have us believe for though worsted again and again he admittedly made good on every occasion his escape and re-appeared with fresh forces to give battle to the enemy

(8) that ultimately his resistance was nearly broken by the Singhalese generals and had to flee to the Chôla king Rajadhiraja and seek his aid for driving out the foreign foes

(9) that the Chôla king treated him as becoming his royal position and sent adequate forces under Pallavarayar to reinstate him on the Pândyan throne

(10) that the Chôla king was induced to do this as much in his own interests as in those of Kulasekhara as the enemy had advanced far into the inland and apart of the terroristic methods adopted by them had reached as far as Kānchi, one of the provincial capitals of the Chôla kingdom and there was a general unsettlement of the peaceful conditions prevailing in it

(11) that the Chôla king was desirous of not only driving out the Ceylonese from the mainland but also of preventing them from annexing the Pândyan kingdom to Ceylon

(12) that Pallavarayar the Chôla minister who was responsible for putting Rajadhiraja on the Chôla throne was the general in charge of the Chôla forces

(13) that the final scene in the campaign was enacted in Madura City the Pândyan capital where the Ceylonese generals were put to death and their heads nailed on to the gates of the City and

(14) that Kulasekhara entered the City with due pomp and ceremony effective precautions having been taken by Pallavarayar against the annexation of the Pândyan country to Ceylon.

Several teachers of this school are mentioned in the inscriptions of this reign and the figure of one of these, Paranjotī Pandita, engraved on the north wall of the Tiruvānakoil temple, still attests to the influence they wielded among the masses during the period (M E.R. 1912, Para 28) The temple at Tiruvōiriyūr continued to be one of their chief centres. Its fame, indeed, at the time was so great, that it still continued to attract attention from distant Kāshmīr. An inscription, dated in the 9th year of Rājaiāja II, mentions a gift of 96 sheep for maintaining a perpetual lamp in it by Ariyan Padamāran Kattimān of Kāshmīrapuram (M E.R. 1922, Para 22, Appendix C No 146). In the 17th regnal year, he made a gift of 12 buffaloes to the same temple. (M E R 1911, No. 369 of 1911) He was evidently devotedly attached to this temple

Rājādhirāja
II, A D
1168 1191.

Rājādhirāja II succeeded Rājaiāja II. Hitherto the exact relationship he bore to Rājaiāja II and the circumstances under which he came to succeed him were not definitely known. It was so far thought that both Rājādhirāja and his successor Kulōttunga-Chōla III were probably sons of Rājaiāja II, more especially as the historical introductions of the two kings are identical with some of Rājaiāja II. As regards Kulōttunga-Chōla III, it was suggested that he was probably the person referred to as Komāran-Kulōttungadēva, who is referred to in an inscription dated in the 2nd year of Tribhuvanachakravartin Rāja-Rājadēva, who has been identified with Rājaiāja II (M E R 1909, Para 48, Appendix B No 419 of 1908) This identification seems impossible of acceptance, for if he was Komāran already in the 2nd year of Rājaiāja II, he should have been at the time of the death of Rājaiāja II, 28 years and cannot have been put by on the score of infancy by Pallavaiāyai in favour of Rājādhirāja II, as the sequel have been identified by Mr Venkayya (See V.E.R 1899 Para 32) while a few others have also been identified by Mr S Krishnaswāmi Aiyangar (South India and Her Muhammadan Invaders 2—11)

With the materials now available it is possible to fix the date of the Ceylonese expedition to India with greater approximation than it was possible for Mr Venkayya when he first wrote on this subject in 1899. As we have seen inscriptions dated in the 5th 6th and 12th regnal years of Rājādhirāja II refer directly to this war. Besides these an inscription of the 6th year of Kulottunga III refers to the disturbances which occurred in the 11th year of the reign of his predecessor Rājādhirāja II. In other words we have definite references to the war in inscriptions bearing dates, A.D. 1173 1174 and 1180 and a reference to what took place in A.D. 1179 as well as the result of the war which was then on. As the Arpākham record of A.D. 1173 states that the Ceylonese generals had been defeated and compelled to retreat after the time it was composed the war should have been going on for some time say from about 1171 1172 or so. It is more probable that it was already in progress in A.D. 1172 the year of the coronation of Rājādhirāja II, who the Pallavarayanpēttai inscription states was chosen king because of the troublous times. This date is confirmed from a consideration of Ceylonese history. The king who helped Parākrama Pandya against Kulasēkhara Pāndya was Parākrama Bāhu the Great, who ruled from A.D. 1158-1186. He ordered an expedition against the king of Rāmanna (Pegu) in his 12th regnal year. After this expedition was despatched in A.D. 1165 and before A.D. 1167 1168 Parākrama Pandya, being besieged by Kulasēkhara sent for help to Ceylon. The Singhalese king despatched an army under his general Lankāpura but

Date of the War A.D.
1169 1173

was, it would appear, at the head of affairs. He was in charge of the Palace staff and had been markedly honoured by high office, honours and preferments. He thus seems to have enjoyed the confidence of Rājarāja II. When he was in the height of his power, Rājarāja II passed away leaving behind him two children, aged one and two years, respectively. Since the times were troublous, the minister was obliged to save and guard from danger the ladies of the palace and the children, whom he lodged in a place of safety. Seeing that there was no grown up heir, Pallavarāyar raised to the throne Ednīpperumāl, the late king's cousin and a grandson of king Vikrama-Chōla. This Ednīpperumāl was crowned under the royal name of Rājādhirāja in his 4th regnal year with the unanimous consent of Pallavarāyar's party and of the whole nādu (i.e., country). There seems to have been great opposition, both open and secret, to the coronation from many quarters, against which Pallavarāyar carefully guarded the newly raised king and firmly established him on the throne, imprisoning all the suspected enemies. It would seem as though Rājādhirāja had already been marked out as the successor of Rājarāja II, for he was, we are told, already four years co-regent. The fourth year of Rājādhirāja, in that case, would be 1168 A D, when Rājarāja II was still ruling (Rājarāja II ruled for 26 years and died in 1172 A D, and not in 1162 A D, as mentioned by a slip in M E R 1924, Para 20). Pallavarāyar had evidently to place a member of a different family on the throne because the children of Rājarāja II were mere infants at the time of his death. This is, perhaps, the reason why Kulōttunga III, the son of Rājarāja, did not immediately succeed his father on his death. At the time of Rājarāja's death, he was about one or two years old and when he actually came to the throne in 1178 A D, (this date has been definitely fixed for his accession), he should have been only 6 or 7

to the Cholas for help and Vira Pandya to his own allies. During this campaign some of the details of which are recorded in an inscription of Kulottunga Chōlo III the son or sons of Vira Pandya were defeated by the Chōlo army. The Singhalese soldiers had their noses cut off and rushed into the sea to escape from the Chola troops. Vira Pandya himself was attacked by the Chōlas and compelled to retreat. The city of Madura was captured and a pillar of victory was planted in it. The Chōla army took possession of the Pandyan throne and made it over with the kingdom and the city to Vikrama Pandya (M E R 1899 Para 38 No 1 of 1899). According to the Vahārcamsa the Singhalese hold on Rāmesvaram continued for some time as Nissanko Mallo claims to have built the Nissankesvara temple there. He was of the Kalinga dynasty and was a nephew of Parākrama Bāhu I. He claims to have invaded the Pāndyan country thrice.

The disturbances referred to in an inscription of the 6th year of Kulottunga Chola III as having occurred in the 11th year of Rājādhirāja (i.e. in 1170 A.D.) should accordingly be referred to the second part of the war which was fought after the capture of Madura City by Pallavarāja the Chola general. It has been suggested by Mr V Venkoyya that Kulottunga III distinguished himself in this part of the war and in consequence assumed a surname similar to that of Rājādhirāja. (M E R 1899 Para 38 quoting S.I.I III, i No 36). But since he wrote the Pallovarayanpēttai inscription has been found. According to this record as we have seen, Kulottunga III was only a year or two at the time of the crowning of Rājādhirāja i.e. in 1172 A.D. He could accordingly have been only about 9 or 10 years about the time the second part of the Pāndyan war was fought. In these circumstances, we have to infer that Kulottunga III when he styles himself conqueror of

Did Kulottunga-
Chōla III
take part in the war?

to the elder son, the co-regency with Rājādhirāja and eventually the throne itself. The very inscription which furnishes all the particulars of the revolution mentions the fact that Rājādhirāja—of course, at the instance of Pallavarāyar—made provision in the 8th year of his reign (=1176 A D) for the queen and children of Rājārāja II and his mother, sister and the latter's children (M E R. 1924, Para 21). This shows that Pallavarāyar, if tyrant he was, was a tyrant of the kindly and judicious type

Period of Rājādhirāja's
rule

In view of the confusion prevailing about Rājādhirāja's reign, it may be useful to set down the length of his rule. As above stated, he became co-regent in 1168 A D, actual ruler in 1172 A D., (in his 4th regnal year), and ruled in all, so far as at present made out, for 19 years. There are records referring to his 6th, 9th, 12th, 13th, 14th and 19th years. (See M.E.R 1923, Para 39 Appendix B. No. 490 of 1922 where there is a reference to the land survey carried out in his 9th year, M.E.R 1910, Para 28, No 731 of 1909, M E R 1925, Appendix B No 261 of 1925, M E R 1911, No 231 of 1910, and M E R 1925, Para 21, Appendix B No 188 of 1925). There is thus no doubt that he should have reigned for 19 years from the date of his accession, i e., from 1168 up to 1187 A D. It is equally certain that he was crowned in 1172 A D. An inscription at Conjeeveram states that the 8th year of Rājādhirāja was about 15 years later than the 19th year of Rājārāja. As it is definitely known that Rājārāja II ascended the throne in 1146 A D, 15 years after the 19th year would be 1180 A D., as he was already, according to the inscription, 8 years past in that year, the date of his crowning should have been about 1172 A D (See S I I. III 207, M E R. 1904, Para 21)

Chief events
of his reign

Rājādhirāja's rule was disturbed by a devastating war, which concerned the succession to the Pāndyan throne

grant which is dated in the 6th regnal year his son Lalavaravar had died then (i.e. at or about A.D. 1170) Sambavaravar was apparently resident in the Chola province of which Kanchi was the capital whereas his son Pallavaravar was the chief minister of Rajaraja II and then the king-maker of Rajadhiraja II. According to the Lalavaravarmuttu grant the original name of Rajadhiraja was Pundarikottam and his father's name Venkatasaya Perumal. The name of Lalavaravar was Lakshmi Sakti Nilavarayan. Looking at the name of the king and of the minister and remembering the opposition encountered with installing Pundarikottam to the throne it is not altogether impossible that Rajadhiraja and his minister Pallavaravar were related to each other in some manner which in the present state of our knowledge is not quite clear. That Saint Vyandikar to whom Sambavaravar went in this hour of distress was not only known near Kanchi but also nearer the chief royal capital is also probable. An inscription dated in Salva 1101 (= 1181-1182 A.D.) found at Achyutamangalam in the Vonnilaru Taluk Tanjore District refers to his consecrating the god Sumanatha in the temple newly built at that place probably by himself. He was the royal preceptor of the time and is described as the brother of a certain Govind Misra and as belonging to the Rādha country (i.e. Bengal). His real name appears in this inscription as Srikonta hāmbhu. He was undoubtedly a Brahmin, as he is described as having belonged to the Sāndilya gotra and a great devotee of Siva. (M.E.R. 1925 Para 23 Appendix B No. 402 of 1925). His sons are mentioned in another inscription in the same temple (Ibid No. 103).

The Thirteen Years' War of Pāndyan succession which ended about 1181 A.D. seems to have brought considerable misery to the people. One result of it was the great confusion and unsettlement it created throughout

Effects of the Pāndyan succession
war Weakening and decay of Chōla power

dispute as regards the succession to the Pāndyan throne, Parākrama-Pāndya, one of the claimants, was besieged in Madura by his rival Kulasēkhara. Parākrama-Pāndya appealed for help to Parākramabāhu, the king of Ceylon, for help. The latter ordered—according to the Mahāvamsa—his general Lankāpura Dandanātha to proceed to Southern India, and re-establish Parākrama on the throne. Before Lankāpura could reach the nearest Ceylonese port of embarkation, Kulasēkhara had succeeded in putting his rival to death with his queen and children and in capturing the city of Madura. The Ceylon king, however, ordered his general to proceed and conquer the Pāndyan kingdom and bestow it on one of the sons of the murdered claimant.

Progress of the war

Lankāpura accordingly sailed with his army and began his campaign, with the conquest of Rāmēsvaram. His advance was disputed at every successive stage by the Malavar and Kallar chiefs, who were the adherents of Kulasēkhara. The march on Madura proved apparently a tedious and hotly disputed progress to Lankāpura, though he did considerable damage by laying waste the villages by fire and sword. The details of these encounters need not be gone into here, more especially as they may be read in Mr Venkayya's narrative of the war (M.E.R. 1899, Paras 23 to 31). Lankāpura was aided by the forces of Pāndya and by contingents sent by his maternal uncles who were chiefs of the Kongu country and by certain of his followers in Tinnevely. With these forces, several battles were fought by Lankāpura, who, as he advanced, sent word to Virā-Pāndya, the son of Parākrama, who had meanwhile escaped into the Malaya (i.e., Kērala) country, to return. Virā Pāndya, thus encouraged, returned and was welcomed by Lankāpura, who duly made over to him the presents sent by Parākramabāhu, the Ceylon king. The march the time we are writing of The spirit of defiance of authority it betrays is indicative of the loosening of the bonds of even social and religious ties. The political fabric however still held fast for the time being but the greatness of the Cholas as a dynasty was fast running away despite what Rājādhirāja could do to postpone the evil day The war should have absorbed so much of the man power of the kingdom that there appears to have been a paucity of cultivators Land accordingly went out of cultivation Labour being scarce, classes hitherto unused to cultivating land apparently had to take to it. There is also reason to believe that the cultivators had been subjected to harassment by officials and had had to bear the burden of heavy customary obligations imposed by landlords These had to be relaxed Social regulations which had slowly grown up had also been felt to be more or less deleterious in their effects and they had to be relaxed a little to make them less irksome

Society was as it were, breaking up Rājādhirāja II, though he lost his right-hand man in Pallavarāyan in or about the 6th year of his reign, was wise enough to discern the signs of the times In the 14th year of his reign (=A.D 1182), according to two inscriptions (M E R 1919 Para 19 Appendix B Nos 429 and 488) he appears to have taken action to give some relief to his subjects The reforms he appears to have introduced in at least a part of his kingdom included reform of Land Law, recognition of the rights of women to hold property and relaxation of certain unfavourable Caste regulations.

Break-up of society
Rājādhirāja II
Reforms

First among the measures taken was reform of the Land Law A general reduction of rents was ordered under which those holding lands on leases, under the local assemblies were shown some concessions. The

Land Law Reform

the Singhalese side The slaughter was, it would appear, so great that a space of three leagues was all one heap of corpses! The three-storeyed palace of Pon-Amarāvati was also burnt down to ashes and the country round about suffered waste Agreeably to the commands of his sovereign, Lankāpura next returned to Madura and there celebrated the festival of the coronation of Vīra-Pāndya. Meanwhile, Kulasēkhara contrived to secure further help and with these reinforcements attacked and took Mangala, which had submitted to the enemy Lankāpura met the advance of Kulasēkhara and wrested Vellinaba from the hands of Kulasēkhara's allies and then took Sīviliputtūr Not to be outwitted, Kulasēkhara, gathering a large army from his Tinnevely and Kongu allies, waited for the enemy at Santaveri Lankāpura joining forces with Jagad Vijaya advanced against him but Kulasēkhara breached the bund of a tank en route This, however, did not avail him Lankāpura, intrepid as he was, made good his way and took the fortress Two other places next fell, one of them Kattala, being burnt to ashes, as it was there that Parākrama Pāndya had been slain. Kulasēkhara next encamped at Chōla-kulāntaka Kulasēkhara, meanwhile, marched to Pālāyam-kōttai and there gathered together fresh forces Certain Chōla chiefs joined him here with their troops, among them being Pallavarāyar A battle ensued at Pālāyam-kōttai but Kulasēkhara lost the day He had to flee for life and the town was captured by the combined forces of Lankāpura and Jagad Vijaya. The two Singhalese generals next advanced towards Madura, whither Kulasēkhara was reported to have repaired. On the way up, however, Lankāpura changed his plans, and advanced to Thukkanapper while Jagad Vijaya encamped at Pattannallur, a place apparently on the road to Madura. Meanwhile, Kulasēkhara had repaired to the court of the Chōla king and had sought apparently to distinguish them from the agricultural classes— from keeping locks of hair. They were also prohibited from keeping any slaves.

Among minor Rural Regulations were the following — Minor Rural Regulations.

Bullocks grazing in village channels were ordered to be impounded in pens erected for the purpose. The conversion of cattle-stalls and village house sites into paddy fields was prohibited.

The pre-occupation of the war should have left little or no time for building activities. We have accordingly no record during this reign of construction of new temples in the Chola kingdom. Almost the sole exception was the renewal apparently in stone in the 12th regnal year of a shrine at Ilabayangettur (Chingleput District) by a private devotee who delighted in the name divapādashekharaṇa Muvandavilan alias Sivacharanālayaṇa the former name being highly reminiscent of one of the titles of Rājaraṣa the Great. Rājādhirāja, as a devout worshipper of Śiva visited the famous temple at Tiruvorriyūr which was still a place of great religious attraction in his 9th regnal year (=A D 1177). This visit should have come off shortly after the success over the Ceylonese generals and the restoration of Kulasekhara Pāndya to his throne. An inscription of that year at Tiruvorriyūr (V & R 1012 Para 29 Appdx. B No 371 of 1911) which records this visit gives some details of it which shows that despite the suppression by Śaṅkarācharya of the evil practices indulged in by the Kāpāhikas at this temple in the 8th century they still flourished at it in the 12th century. In the temple Chaturānana Pandita, apparently the disciple of the day of the original Chaturānana, had a matha of his own. There was, besides, another Śaiva teacher named Vagīśvara Pandita, who, it is said expounded the

Moral and religious life

probably made an impression on Lankāpura, who was obliged to beat a retreat, leaving Vīra-Pāndya to his fate

Epigraphical references to this war

The epigraphical references to this war so far traced confirm the above suspicion more completely than might be imagined. These are at least five in number, of which four directly refer to it, while one refers to it indirectly. The first of these is the Arpākkam inscription dated in the 5th year of Rājādhirāja and found at the village of Arpākkam, near Conjeeveram in the Chingleput District (M E R 1899, Para 31, Table B No 20 of 1899). This gives a fairly full contemporary account of the war which supplies a much needed corrective to the one furnished by the Mahāvamsa. The second is the Tiruvālangādu inscription dated in the 12th year of Rājādhirāja, which refers to this war of succession and mentions the part played in it by a traitor named Sīvalabha (M E R 1906, Para 23, Table B No. 465 of 1905). The third is the Pallavarayanpēttai inscription dated in the 6th year of Rājādhirāja, which materially adds to the information supplied by the Arpākkam record (M E R 1924, Para 20-21, Appendix C No 403 of 1924). The fourth is the Tirumayanam (Tanjore District) inscription dated in the 12th year of Rājādhirāja which refers to certain incidents in this war and records a tax-free gift of land to a person who distinguished himself in the campaign (M E R 1925, Para 21, Appendix B No 261). The 5th and last is a record from Sāmbanārkōyil (Tanjore District) dated in the 51st year of Kulōttunga-Chōla III (the successor of Rājādhirāja II) which refers to a perturbation caused in the 11th year of his predecessor's (Rājādhirāja's) reign which necessitated the removal of certain images to a place of safety (M E R 1925, Para 21, Appendix B No 171 of 1925). The reference in this inscription is, perhaps, to the debased and materialistic form of religion shows perhaps, the retrocession of society from the ideals placed before it a few centuries back by Sankarācharya (See V. J. R. 1912, Para 29)

There are no records to show when Rājādhirāja died. But as no inscriptions have been so far found beyond his 19th regnal year, he probably died about that year (A.D. 1187). Taking a fair view of all the circumstances of his reign it has to be remarked that his life was cast in difficult times. Though an usurper he should be held to have made good his choice. He not only fought out and won through an exhausting war which lasted over thirteen years and involved practically the whole country from Rameswaram to Conjeevaram but also tried to repair to some extent its after-effects. His reforms especially those in favour of agriculturists and the rural people generally, should have endeared him to the masses. He was apparently a firm bold and withal a tactful ruler, who despite the odds against him endeavoured to make the lives of his people happy after an unprecedented war the like of which the country had probably never known.

Death of Rājādhirāja.

Rājādhirāja II was succeeded by Kulottunga Chōla III son of Rājārāja II. The succession thus reverted to the regular male line from Kulottunga-Chōla I. What became of the sons if he had any of Rājādhirāja II it is not known. Nor are any queens of his mentioned in his inscriptions. That he was succeeded directly by Kulottunga Chōla III there is no doubt whatever and that his direct successor was Rājārājodēva III is fully confirmed from his inscriptions. It is thus clear that the descendants if any of Rājādhirāja II got no chance to succeed him or his successor. An inscription of Kulottunga III at Nellore settles his probable date, as it

Kulottunga-
Chōla III
Tribhuvana-
vira, Vikrādjendra,
II. A.D.
1178-1918
(1923)

chased'' Accordingly, he was pleased to worship (Śiva) for twenty-eight days continually Subsequently messengers arrived from my son Pallavarāyar bringing a letter to me reporting that Jayadratha Dandanāyaka and Lankāpuri-Dandanāyaka and the other generals and troops fled, having been defeated'' The inscription then records that Edirili-Sōla-Sāmbuvarayan went to the priest, communicated the glad tidings of the flight of the Singhalese army and offered to make a gift to him The priest, Umāpatidēva alias Jnānasivadēva, a native of Dakṣiṇa Lāta (or Dakṣiṇa Rādha, or Lower Bengal), apparently an immigrant, who had been patronized by Sāmbuvarayan, at first declined any remuneration for his service, remarking that he had received many gifts in the past from the donor. But the importunity of Sāmbuvarayan was irresistible and he ultimately chose Alapākkam (the ancient name of Aipākkam) as a suitable gift, and he distributed the income derived from it among his various relations, (M E R 1899, Para 34)

The Pallavarayanpēttai inscription, which is one year later than the Arpākkam record, furnishes direct inscriptional evidence about the help given by the Chōla king to the Pāndyan king Kulasēkhara When the king of Ceylon sent his army and generals to conquer and annex the Pāndyan country, the Pāndyan king Kulasēkhara, we are told, fled from his kingdom and sought refuge with the Chōla king and entreated him to recover his kingdom for him Thereupon the latter was pleased to direct that Kulasēkhara be installed on his throne after killing the Ceylonese commander and his lieutenants who had entered the Pāndya country and nailing up their heads over the gates of Madura In accordance with this direction of the Chōla king, Kulasēkharadēva, during his stay in the Chōla country, was entertained with deserving liberality With enough forces, funds and zeal, the Pāndyan country was re-conquered by the Chōlas,

The records relating to the reign of Kulōttunga Chōla III are many and they include besides numerous lithic inscriptions, a copper plate grant of his dated in his 20th year which comes from Tirukkālūr (M.E.R. 1903 Para 17)

Record of his Reign

Inscriptions dated from his 3rd to his 10th year have been traced (See S.I.I. III ii. 201-5 for inscriptions from 3rd to 31st years M.E.R. 1923 No 99 of 1923 for one of his 22nd year M.E.R. 1903 No 516 of 1902 for one of his 27th year M.E.R. 1924, No 396 of 1923 for one of his 37th year M.E.R. 1910 No 274 of 1909 for another in the same (37th) year M.E.R. 1908 Para 63 No 386 of 1907 for one of his 39th year M.E.R. 1913 Para 39 for one of his 38th year M.E.R. 1911 Para 29 for one of his 23rd year M.E.R. 1923 Appdx C No 172 of 1924 for an inscription dated in his 38th year M.E.R. 1920, Para 28 for records dated in his 15th and 21st years and M.E.R. 1913 Appdx B No 489 of 1912 for one of his 40th year) There is some evidence from the inscriptions of the Pāndyan king Māravarman Sundara Pāndya that Kulōttunga III lived to at least the 7th year of that king as he is mentioned in his inscriptions dated in his regnal years 6 and 7 his date of accession being 1216 A.D. (See below) This is not reflected in Chōla inscriptions of the period so far found

End of
his Rule.

In the majority of his inscriptions Kulōttunga III is called Parakṣasri-varman alias Tribhuvana Chakravartin Kulōttunga Chōladēva. Some substitute Virarājendradēva (II) and others have instead Konērunaikondān and Tribhuvanaviradēva. (S.I.I. III ii. 205 M.E.R. 1911 No 82 of 1911) In one inscription he is called Tribhuvanachakravartin Rājendradēva or Vira Rājendradēva (M.E.R. 1925 Appdx B Nos 393 399 and 403)

His other names and surnames.

question whatever. In both, the following facts are mentioned —

- (1) The defeat of Kulasēkhara and his flight to the Chōla court,
- (2) the capture of Rāmēsvaram and later of Tondī and Pasa by the Singhalese,
- (3) the Singhalese generals Jayadratha-Dandanāyaka and Lankāpuri Dandanāyaka, the former of whom appears in the Mahāvamsa as Jagad Vijaya and the latter as Lankāpura Dandanātha,
- (4) the Chōla general Pallavarāyaṇ as leading the Chōla forces,
- (5) Vīra-Pāndya as the opponent of Kulasēkhara and as the ally of the Ceylonese generals,
- (6) the commission of atrocities by the Ceylonese generals, which led to the sacred images in the temples being secreted in places of safety, and
- (7) the methods of warfare adopted by the Singhalese generals in winning over to their side the local chiefs by means of presents, which led to treachery of the kind that Srivallabha was guilty of as mentioned in one of the inscriptions referred to above.

The combined version

The inscriptions read with the Mahāvamsa narrative render plain certain facts, which may be thus summarized —

- (1) That the war was about a disputed succession to the Pāndyan throne, in which the Ceylon and Chōla kings took opposite sides,
- (2) that Parākrama Pāndya and his son Vīra-Pāndya had the active aid and support of the Ceylon king,
- (3) that Kulasēkhara, the rival claimant, had the support of the Chōla king,
- (4) that the Ceylonese generals commenced the war by committing atrocities at the sacred temple of Rāmēsvaram, which they appear to have plundered and even desecrated by breaking open the doors of the inner sanctuary and preventing worship in it,
- (5) that the foreign forces consisted of men who were the titles of Virārājendra dēva Vijayarājendra Tribhuvanaviradeva and Rājādhirāja karikula Chōladeva. (Ibid Para 17 and inscriptions quoted therein) Since he is said to have been ruling even in his 38th year though his successor is definitely known to have ascended the throne in 1216 A.D. we should set down his rule so far as it is at present known to 1216 A.D. His successor Rājārāja III began his rule as we have seen in the same year. A couple of inscriptions of the Pāndyan king Māravarman Sundara Pāndya (one dated in his 15th—1st year and another in his 15th year (1232 and 1231 A.D.) however suggest that Kulōttunga III was living even in 1231 A.D. probably as nominal co-regent, the government being in the hands of Rājārāja III. These two inscriptions specifically mention his name and state that Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya was pleased to restore the Chōla country to him. (U.E.R. 1920 Para 32 Appdx. C No 9 of 1920 and M.E.R. 1924, No 72 of 1924 where the inscription is wrongly attributed to Kulōttunga III which statement is corrected in M.E.R. 1920, Para 33) The conquest of the Chōla country is referred to in Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya's inscriptions dated from his 5th to 6th years and its restoration in his inscriptions dated from 7th to 11th years. The restoration thus should have taken place in or about his 7th regnal year (=A.D. 1222-23) of which time we have no inscriptions in the name of Kulōttunga III himself. But as Kulōttunga III is specifically mentioned in inscriptions dated in Māravarman Sundara Pāndya's 15th and 16th years as the king to whom the Chōla country was actually restored, it has to be presumed that he was living at about the time of the alleged restoration (i.e. 1222-23 A.D.) As above suggested Rājārāja III was probably co-regent with Kulōttunga-Chōla III from 1216 A.D. onwards to the death of Kulōttunga III whenever that event occurred. (See below)

The Inscriptional narrative entitled to greater weight

The narrative contained in the inscriptions is entitled to greater weight than that incorporated in the Mahāvamsa because it is of contemporaneous origin and is, where it departs from the Mahāvamsa, more natural. While the Mahāvamsa attributes to the Singhalese general all the victories and none at all to Kulasēkhara, the inscriptions (the Alapākkam one in particular) while speaking in terms expressive of contempt and abhorrence of their terroristic acts and modes of behaviour, gives the Ceylonese generals credit for the "victories" gained by them. "It is, therefore, very probable," as Mr Venkayya has remarked, "that the Singhalese army did not, as stated in the Mahāvamsa, go back to Ceylon of its own accord, but as recorded in the (Alapākkam) inscription, actually defeated and compelled to leave India." If the Pallavarayanpēttai inscription is to be believed, the Ceylonese generals did not live to go back to their native island, for they were beheaded by Pallavarāyaṇ and their heads put up on the gates of the Pāndyan capital, apparently as an example to like foreign intruders. Only the remnants of their forces could have sailed back to Ceylon.

Country
affected by the war

The part of Southern India affected by this war extended from Rāmēsvaram to Madura in the north-west, to Pon-Amarāvati, not far away from modern Pudukōttai, near Trichinopoly, westwards as far as Srīvilhputtū, in the present Tinnevely District, while its echoes were heard as far north as Kānchi in the Chingleput District, where Pallavarāyaṇ's father, Eḍuḷi-Sōla-Sāmbuvarāyaṇ, asked Svāmīdēvar to offer prayers to effectuate the defeat of the invaders. In actuality, the campaigns of the two Ceylonese generals and Kulasēkhara's attacks and counter-attacks were mainly confined to parts of the present Ramnād and Madura Districts, and to small parts of the Tinnevely and Trichinopoly Districts as well. The more important places mentioned in the Mahāvamsa

Madurai (i.e. Madura) from Vira Pandya and placed it on (Vikrama) Pandya. Another inscription of his 11th year (S II III n No 57) mentions the defeat of the son of Vira Pandya and Kudal (i.e. Madura) on Vikrama-Pandya and that Vira Pandya again revolted, but that he took his crowned head i.e., the crown and on the throne he placed his feet on the crown. An inscription of the 12th year (S II III n No 58) confirms these facts in detail and gives information that after once again Vira Pandya apparently the village of the name of Ilaiyangudi in the present Madurai district. This place figures in the Maṭṭa as one of the places taken by the Chera king in the part of the war (Chapters 289, 298, 300, 307 and 310). (S II III n No 88) further mentions that he pardoned the Pandyan king and the Chera king. As suggested by Dr. Hultzsch, the king mentioned subsequently in the inscription (No. 206). Finally, we are told of a king who bore the surname of Vara and who was honoured as Vara, probably an ally of Emperor Vikrama-Pandya. In the inscription according to certain authorities (Nos. 167 and 168) Vara is identified as yappan alias Rajapala mentioned in these records. He is described as Vara in the 4th year of Vikrama-Pandya (No. 168) and must have lived through the reign of the latter as well and taken part in the campaign that ended before it could sail, Parākrama Pāndya had been slain and his capital taken. The expedition was, however, ordered to proceed, and duly landed on the Indian coast. This was in the 16th year of Parākrama Bāhu the Great, i.e., in A D 1169. The war in aid of Vīra-Pāndya, son of Parākrama Pāndya, thus began in or about A D 1169 and ended about A D 1173, so far as Lankāpura and his co-adjutor Jagad Vijaya are concerned.

11
12

Continuation of the War,
A D 1179-1181

The war, as might be expected, did not end with the departure of the Ceylonese forces from Madura. According to inscriptions, it seems to have continued much longer than the Mahāvamsa would admit. According to an inscription at Alangudi, Tanjore District, dated in his 11th regnal year (A D. 1179), Rājādhirāja II is described as he "who conquered Madura and Ceylon" (M.E.R. 1899, Para 38 No 3 of 1899). In another inscription found at Alambākkam and dated in his 13th regnal year (=1181 A.D.), he is given the same title. In this inscription, it is mentioned that some of the Brāhmanas deserted their homes and the lands were neglected and the rents accumulated. The desertion was probably due to the terror caused by the war (M.E.R. 1910, Para 28, No 731 of 1909). The title, "he who conquered Madura and Ceylon" found in inscriptions of the 11th and 13th years, should be based on the victories achieved by the Chōlas during Rājādhirāja's rule in a later campaign against Vīra-Pāndya and his Singhalese allies. Kulasēkhara, who fought against Lankāpura, appears to have died some time after his restoration mentioned in the Pallavarayanpēttai inscription and to have been succeeded by Vikrama-Pāndya. The war thus continued between Vikrama-Pāndya and Vīra-Pāndya. The former, as the successor of Kulasēkhara, naturally became allied to the Chōlas, while the latter depended upon the Singhalese to whom he owed his throne. Vikrama-Pāndya appealed beyond doubt that Kulottunga had actually overrun the Pāndyan country and was in Madura for the ceremony of consecration of horses. In one of his historical introductions appearing in an inscription dated in his 4th year he is stated to have attacked his opponent Vira Pandya and compelled him to retreat (M.E.R. 1899, Para 38 No. 1 of 1899). Whether this statement is to be taken literally and whether this does not refer to the campaign that occurred in the reign of Rajādhirāja II are moot points. As one inscription distinctly states that Kulottunga III cut off the head of Vira Pāndya (M.E.R. 1915, Appdx. B No 370) it might be presumed that he was actually killed in war by Kulottunga III in person.

The suggestion contained in his inscriptions dated the 12th to 20th years (S.I.I. III. ii. 205 f.n. 10) that he took Ceylon as well is one to be understood as meaning that he drove out the Ceylon troops from Madura. An inscription of his 31st year adds that Kulottunga III placed his foot on the crown of the king of Ilam, i.e. Ceylon (M.E.R. 1902, No 170 of 1902 S.I.I. III. ii. 218 f.n. 8). This seems an exaggeration as, taking that the war continued between the 9th and 12th regnal years (1187 to 1190 A.D.), Nissanka Malla the ruling Singhalese king, though he is said to have invaded the Pāndyan country thrice never was in India.

Conquest of Ceylon A.D.
Circa 1190

Several inscriptions of Kulottunga III, dated in his regnal years ranging from the 20th to the 31st, mention that he was pleased to take Karuvur as well (S.I.I. III. ii. 205 M.E.R. 1926 Para 28 Appendix C No 91 dated in the 20th regnal year). As we find him appearing in his inscriptions as Tribhuvana vira-dēva from his 27th year he must have assumed it after the capture of Karuvur which probably occurred in or about his 20th regnal year (=A.D. 1198). By the conquest of Karuvur the Kongu kingdom passed under his yoke. With this Madura and Ceylon" in his inscriptions of the 5th and 6th regnal years, simply assumed Rājādhirāja's title of "who conquered Madura and Ceylon," more as an inherited than as an acquired one. He had some reason to do so, as the war had been fought during the time he was co-regent (his formal accession having taken place in 1178 A D) with Rājādhirāja. There is no evidence, however, that either Rājādhirāja or Kulōttunga III ever invaded Ceylon during their reigns or conquered it. The title of "Conqueror of Ceylon" is based solely on the conquest of the Ceylonese forces.

Pallavarāyar probably a near relation of Rājādhirāja
II

The Chōla general Pallavarāyar, who led the Chōla forces to success in the first part of the war, was the minister of Rājādhirāja. As mentioned above, he had been the chief minister of Rājārāja II as well and was the person who effected the silent revolution which ended in the crowning of Rājādhirāja as king in 1172 A D. According to the Pallavarayanpēttai record, his full name was Kulattulan Tiruchittambalam-udaiyan-Peumanambiyār. This inscription, which is dated in the 6th regnal year of Rājādhirāja (A D 1174), states that after the entry of Kulasēkhara Pāndyan into Madura City and the expulsion of the Ceylonese forces from it, minister Pallavarāyan died of some disease and that, apparently in recognition of his services to the State, king Rājādhirāja made a grant of tax-free lands to his relations and set up an inscribed slab recounting his exploits. The minister's name, as has been mentioned, appears in the Mahāvamsa and in the Arpākkām and Pallavarayanpēttai grants. In the Arpākkām grant he is described as the son of Eḍirili-sōla-Sāmbuvaiayan, who prayed for his safety at the sacred feet of Svāmīdēvar. Apparently, Sāmbuvaiayar was alive in the 5th regnal year of Rājādhirāja, though we do not know what became of him after that year. From the Pallavarayanpēttai imprison his own sovereign Rājārāja III Hoysala Ballala II who ruled about this period is described as having shaken kāñchi which shows from which side the trouble should have originated (VE R 1912 Para 30 Appendix B 160) That the re-conquest of the north including kāñchi, is not a mere boast is proved by the fact that three inscriptions of his reign have been found at Conjeevaram and five others as far north as Vellore and Nandalur in Cuddapah District (E I IV, 281, No. 16 which furnishes the date for one of these records see also VE R 1908 Para 63 No. 2 of 1908)

The vassal chiefs were apparently growing impatient of control Fired by the prevailing war spirit they seem to have tried to break off from the supreme power There are indications that these chiefs made compacts among themselves to support one another by sending their subordinates, army and horses in case of need Thus in a record from Aragal in the Salem District, dated in the 15th regnal year (=1191 A D) we have the chief of that place and another of Tirukkoilar (South Arcot District) entering into an agreement by which they divided the adjoining country between themselves and engaged to behave in a friendly spirit towards each other to the end of their lives and that in time of trouble the one should help the other with troops and heroes A similar political compact was entered into between Edirli Sāmbavarayan and three others of whom one was a certain Hudavarayan the king's brother in law in the 35th regnal year (=1213 A D) The parties agreed to be friends with each other and not to give shelter to offenders against each other or set up new offenders (ME R 1914, Para 17 Appendix B No. 440 and No. 485) Other compacts of this nature are referred to in the inscriptions of the next reign This shows a tangible fight against rebellious vassals,

C. C. I. D.
120.

the country between Cape Comorin and Kānchi. It so weakened the Chōla power that its decay as a ruling dynasty may be said to date from about its close. The rise of feudatories, like the Sāmbavarayas, some of whom are mentioned in Rājādhirāja's inscriptions of the 10th and 11th years, marks the beginning of the weakening of the Chōlas as a central power (M E R 1919, Para 21, Appendix C. Nos. 52, 71, 252). One of these (No. 252, dated in the 11th regnal year) refers to a political compact between different members of this (Sāmbavaraya) family and to an engagement made by them that they would keep to its terms. Compacts of this nature, intended or made to secure the personal ends of the parties to it rather than protect the State, are repeated in the next reign (see below). Another indication of the spirit of lawlessness that had come to prevail is to be seen in a record of the 14th regnal year. This comes from Punjai, in the Tanjore District, and details how four persons in a village had misappropriated temple land, how the trustees of the temple and the Mahēsvaras had claimed it as a dēvadāna and planted four boundary stones, to indicate their possession of it, and how the āndārs (devotees) of the temple in the village rose in a body and charged the four unuly people with having removed the boundary stones. The inscription then states that the Āndār Tiruchchula-Vēlaikkārar, (i.e., the Vēlaikkārar of the Holy Trident Order) who were apparently the guardians of the temple, entered fire and lost their lives. On this, the Mūlaparimishayār decreed the land in dispute to the temple and the village assembly ordered the four delinquents to make a gift of 200 Kāsu to set up metallic images in the temple in honour of the Tiruchchūlavēlaikkārai, who had sacrificed their lives to prove the ownership of the land (M E R 1925, Para 21, Appendix B No. 186 of 1925). Stay straws of this kind show which way the wind was blowing at about part of the Tondaimandalam province will be evident when it is remembered that the rebels should have caused serious disturbances impossible of quelling otherwise than by drastic measures. (See M E R 1913 Para 10 Appendix B No 120) There are other inscriptions to show that the spirit of insubordination should have been more general than is inferable from the inscriptions which have come down to us. Though Kulottunga III the last powerful king of the Chola dynasty did his best to stem the torrent against him he was it is to be feared only partially successful in his attempt at regaining for his royal house the restoration of power and prestige which he seems to have so ardently desired.

The times accordingly seem to have been propitious for a coup de main on the part of the ruling Pāndyan king Māravarman Sundara Pāndya the king in question was probably the son or younger brother of Vikrama-Pāndya whom Kulottunga III had at such cost of men and money restored to his throne against the combined forces of Vira-Pāndya his rival and Visaanka Malla, the king of Ceylon. (See above also M E R 1926 Appendix C No 47 of 1927) He was apparently an ambitious and perhaps even an unscrupulous prince who at an opportune moment turned without any moral rectitude against his own protector. He overtly seized the Chola kingdom in or about 1222 A D when Kulottunga III was nominally still king, though the actual sovereignty had passed to Rājārāja III. According to an inscription of his dated in his 6th regnal year (=1222 A D) he calls himself who took the Chola country (M E R 1926, Nos. 17 and 18) The actual circumstances which led up to this event still remain to be cleared up. But Māravarman Sundara Pāndya was not so wholly devoid of gratitude as to keep the conquered kingdom to himself. He returned the

Pāndyan
= restoration of Chola kingdom
A D 1222

rents payable on Varu-Sai-pattu and Varapattu lands were reduced on a graduated scale. Though the reduction appears small, it should have meant much to the tenants, considering the purchasing power of money in those days. Tenants who did not come under either of these two classes, but fell under Vellanpattu, Dēvadāna and Purattu, were allowed to take $\frac{2}{5}$ th of the yield. For lands cultivated with water baled from a source, the cultivator was allowed half the produce, the other moiety being reserved to the owner. For lands cultivated with dry crops and for lands which had hitherto to pay a Kadamar of 20 Kāsu, only 17 Kāsu was henceforth to be collected. Those that had been paying from 18 to 10 Kāsu got a reduction of 2 Kāsu and from the Kadamar of lands ranging from 10 to 5 Kāsu, two Kāsu was remitted. It was further decreed that at the time of realising the Kadamar thus settled, the State officials were prohibited from entering dwelling houses and from levying fines. At the same time, tenants who refused to agree to the above rates were ordered to be removed, their places being taken by others who agreed to them.

Rights of married women to property

It was also decreed that from the 14th regnal year, it should be lawful for a married woman to become, on the death of her husband, the owner of his lands, slaves, jewels and other valuables, and cattle. If, before his death, he had made default and his lands had been sold, the purchaser was to possess the right over the lands and slaves that belonged to him.

Social
reform

It was further declared unlawful for Brāhmans to till lands with bulls yoked to the plough. Those classes that were engaged as labourers were debarred from becoming vel and arasu. Kavadis (carriers), potters, drummers, weavers and barbers were disallowed—

benefactor of his family by returning to him his crown and kingdom

The form of Government continued the same during the time of Kulottunga III. The system of Government had been so firmly established that the wars left no mark on it. The Pāndyan conquest of the Chōla kingdom coming as it did at the very end of Kulottunga's reign—in fact after the heyday of his rule was over—did not affect the established order of things. Judging from the active character of his rule—building temples carrying on war and introducing a revenue survey in his 38th regnal year (M.E.R. 1909 Appendix B No 216 of 1908)—his administration cannot be pronounced a failure. The traditional number of eight ministers seem to have formed his cabinet, of these, a few are known from his inscriptions. Though they are usually spoken of as Royal Secretaries, they should have been his ministers. One Royal Secretary, Minavan Muvēndavēlar is mentioned in two of his records (M.E.R. 1923, Para 39 Appendix C No 198 of 1923 M.E.R. 1918 Para 40, Appendix B No. 209). Two other officers of his were Rājēndrasinga Muvēndavēlan (M.E.R. 1913 Para 40, Appendix B No 476 and Appendix C No 70) and Nariyundaichchōla Muvēndavēlan (M.E.R. 1918 Appendix B No 201). Like his predecessors, he had a palace at Vikramasōlapuram from where he issued his grants, seated in his coronation hall, on his golden throne, under a canopy of pearls. (M.E.R. 1923, Appendix C No 198 of 1923 see also S.I.I. III ii No 85). His queen Bhuvanamuṇḍaiyāl is represented as being seated with him on the 'throne of heroes' when he made grants. (S.I.I. III ii Nos. 85 and 88). Among the cities mentioned in his inscriptions is Pundamallī (modern Poonamallī near Madras) which is described as a city (M.E.R. 1902, Para 5, No. 192 of 1894 and No 811 of

Political and Civil Administration

Sōmasiddhānta i.e., the doctrine of the Kūpālika Saivas in the temple. In the company of these great teachers, the king was also pleased to hear the story (Srīpurāna) of Aludaiya-Nambi. We have a good portrayal of the Sōma-Siddhānta in the well-known philosophic drama Prabhōdachandrōdaya written by Kūshna-misra, about the middle of the 11th century, approximately when the Chōla kings Rājādhirāja I and Rājēndira-Dēva bore rule in the South. In this work, a character is introduced in the form of Sōma-Siddhānta, which is depicted as a horrible figure wearing garlands of human bones, living in burial grounds, eating from skulls and practising the use of sorceric collyriums to realise the true relation existing between the seen and the unseen. The followers of this cult are further represented to have offered human sacrifices to please their special deity Bhairava (one of the more terrible manifestations of Siva) and his consort and to have practically revelled in drinking and other vices. They believed, it is stated, in attaining Sivahood even while enjoying the sensual pleasures of life but condemned as hindrances to progress the practice of forbidden powers (Siddhis) such as —

(1) bringing one under psychic control, (2) attracting a body from a distance, (3) mesmerizing, (4) causing death without bodily injury, (5) creating craziness, and (6) transporting a body away to distant countries—by power of spells.

These were evidently forms of religion which the Brāhmans condemned as left-handed (Vāmāchāra). That the great Siva temple at Thuvoniyur, so popular at the time as to attract Royal visits (besides Rājādhirāja II, his successor Kulōttunga III is recorded to have visited it in an inscription dated in his 19th year, M E R. 1912, Appdx B No 368 of 1911), had an institution to propagate and a teacher to expound such a highly regnal years that prince (pillaiyār) Yadavaraṣa adopted coercive process to collect the rents on land (M.E.R. 1913 Para 33 Appendix C No. 201 and 202) Yadavaraṣa, we are told in a record dated in the 31th year imposed rather arbitrarily the tax called ponṇam (gold levy) uniformly on all lands in the country without exempting as usual the uncultivated waste in villages. In certain villages they could not impose such an illegal demand with impunity. But the tax-collectors whose names are given collected the utmost they could exact and for the balance the members of the village assembly were arrested and imprisoned. On this some Brahmans who were members of the village assembly sold by public auction some land for 200 ḥḍam and paid up the arrears. The purchaser—one Durgiyandi Nayan—was apparently a man of catholic sympathies. After assigning portions of the land to the Viṣṇu temple the Jain paṭṭi, (i.e. shrine) a Piḍāri shrine the Bhattas etc., dedicated the rest ($\frac{1}{2}$ of the extent bought) for the maintenance of Vyākāraṇadhara Vyākhyānamandapa in the Tiruvortimiyur temple for the upkeep of the teachers and pupils who studied grammar there (See V.E.R. 1913, Para 33 Appendix B No. 201 of 1912). This rigorous collection of revenue is confirmed by another record dated in the 37th regnal year according to which no remission of taxes was allowed to the cultivators though there was a failure of crops. (M.E.R. 1910 Nos. 271 and 279 of 1909) There could thus be no staying power in the people and a famine reduced them to desperate straits. Thus, we are told in a record of the 23rd regnal year a Vellālan of a village (in the Tanjore District) sold himself and his two daughters as slaves (aḍimai) to the local temple (V.E.R. 1911 Para 23 Appendix C No 84 of 1911) It is stated in this inscription that the time was very bad that paddy was sold at $\frac{1}{3}$ naḷi for one ḥḍam, that his children were couples Saka-samvat 1119, Cyclic year Pingala, expired, with the 19th year of his reign (M E R 1894, No 197 of 1894) Thus, his initial year should have fallen in 1178 A D, which is confirmed by Dr Kielhorn's calculations of the dates of twenty inscriptions of his reign It has been ascertained that Kulōttunga-Chōla III should have actually ascended the throne between the 8th June and 8th July 1178 That this date is correct beyond all doubt is proved by a number of Tamil inscriptions found in Nandalur in the Cuddapah District, which couple his regnal year with the corresponding cyclic year (M E R 1908, Para 63, Nos 574, 576, 578, 581, 582, 601 and 602 of 1907) We have seen from the Pallavarayanpēttai record that at the time of his father's death, in 1172 A D, he was only a year or two old, so when he ascended the throne, he should have been but 6 or 7 years of age As Rājādhirāja II ruled for 19 years till 1187 A D, he should have been co-regent with Rājādhirāja till that year, and began to rule actually in or about his 16th year Equally certain is the fact that his direct successor was Rājārāja III An inscription at Tiruvidadaimarudur, dated in the 2nd year of Rājārāja III, who is known to have ascended the throne in Saka 1138, or A D 1215, (S I I I 86), refers to the 37th year of the great king Tribhuvanavīra-Dēva, i e, Kulōttunga III (See below) As Kulōttunga III ascended the throne about Saka 1100 (=A D 1178), his 37th year would be Saka 1137 (=A D 1215-1216), which would be very near to the date of the accession of Rājārāja III. It thus becomes probable that Rājārāja was the direct successor of Kulōttunga III and as the many inscriptions of the latter do not mention any other co-regent ruling in association with him, it may be taken as settled that none of his own children ever succeeded him on the throne (See M E R 1895, Para 14, also Appdx No 143 of 1895) not amounting to murder. Two individuals in a village it is said went out on a hunting excursion and the arrow which one of them aimed at the game hit it would appear the other and killed him. How the case ended it is not possible to say as the record is mutilated. But it might be gathered from certain records (see above) that the punishment for accidental killing of this kind was a fine which was utilized for burning a perpetual lamp in the local temple for the merit of the man who was killed. Thus in a record dated in the 4th year of Rājādhirāja we are told that the Brāhmanas of the local village assembly the residents of the main division in which the village was situated and the people of the sub-districts met together and settled that the offender should gift to the local temple 32 cows and 1 bull for maintaining the lamp he was ordered to present to the local temple. The idea underlying the order seems to have been as much to secure the peaceful repose of the spirit of the dead man as to obtain religious expiation for the guilty man for we are told that this punishment was decided upon 'in order that the (the culprit) may escape the possible mischief of the revengeful soul of the victim. As we have seen above, the same kind of punishment was meted out in two similar cases which occurred in the reign of Kulōttunga I, over a century ago. (See ante M.E.R. 1900 Paras 26 27) Two other cases of the same kind definitely referring themselves to the reign of Kulōttunga-Chola III confirm the view that this was the traditional mode of dealing with cases of killing where the intention to kill was wholly absent on the part of the culprit. Thus a record of his 11th year mentions a case where a man shot his own uncle thinking it was an animal he was shooting. The people of several districts assembled together in the mandapa of the local temple and decided that a lamp should be maintained by him in it. (M.E.R. 1919, Para. 22) Appendix C No 106

of 1925). In another record he is styled Parakēśarivarman alias Tribhuvana-chakravartin Ulaguyyānda-Perumāḷ, "who captured all countries that he saw (but) gave back none that he (once) conquered" (M E R 1913, Para 39). Among his other titles were Neriyudaichchōla and Ulaguyya-Nāyanār (Ibid). In inscriptions which bear no historical introductions, he is called either Kulōttunga-Chōladēva or Tribhuvanavīradēva. The latter occurs in inscriptions dating from his 27th year. In many inscriptions he bears the name Vīraājēndra. (M.E R 1912, Appdx. B No 265, 313, 323, 413 of 1911. See also S I I III 11, 205, M E R 1911, Nos 2 and 25). The reason for his assuming the name of Tribhuvana-vīradēva in the latter part of his reign is not known. Probably it was a triumphant declaration of his success over his chief enemies, the Pāndyas and Kēralas (See below). He should probably be identified with the Tribhuvanachakravartin-sōla-kērala-dēva of certain inscriptions and the mere Sōla-kērala-dēva of certain others (M.E R. 1925, Appdx. B No 75 of 1925, dated in A D 1200, also Nos. 126 and 127 of 1900 and 133 of 1906, see also S. I I III 1 62, and M E R 1900, Para 21, where he has been identified with prince Sōla-kērala-dēva of the Manimangalam inscription of Parakēśarivarman alias Rājēndradēva as his son). As Kulōttunga-Chōla III is said to have taken Kongu (conqueror of Karuvar appears as a title of his) and as it was called Sōla-kērala-mandalam (S I I III 1 44), this identification seems justifiable (See M E R 1925, Para 22). A still another name of his was Tribhuvanachakravartin Rājādhirāja alias Karikala-Chōladēva (M E R 1914, Para 17, Appd B No. 363 of 1913). If the inscription in which this name occurs is one of Kulōttunga III—as seems likely—then we have in this record, an order of his dated in his 2nd year, which is the date of another record (Ibid, No 262 of 1913). Thus, we have for him

Brāhman were both fined 1 000 kāsu. As they could not pay the fines imposed or rather nobody would come forward to help them to pay them and since the fine had perforce to be paid, agreeably to the royal order their lands were sold to the temple by the village assembly for 1 000 kāsu including the 60 kāsu for default made in the payment of fines imposed (M. & R. 1925 Para 22 Appendix B No 80 of 1925)

Some of the feudatories of Kulōttunga III are known from the epigraphical records of the period. Among these were the following —

(1) Madhprāntaka Pottappi Chōla alias Tammusiddi araiśan whose inscriptions have been found at Kānchi Tiruvālangādū and Nellore. He made a grant to the Vishnu temple at the last of these places in the 26th year of Kulōttunga III (A D 1203 1204). Another inscription of his at the same place is dated in the 31st regnal year of his suzerain. His other inscriptions are dated in Saka 1127 and 1129 or A.D. 1205 1206 and 1207 1208. According to an inscription at Kānchi (M. E. R. 1893 No. 35 of 1893) he was crowned at Nellore. He claims descent from the Chōlas.

(2) Siyaganga Amarābharana alias Tiruvegambam Udayān was another. An inscription of his dated in the 34th year of Kulōttunga, (A D 1212) is in the Tiruvallam temple. Another inscription of his dated in A D 1205 is in the Ekamraśātha temple at Kānchi. He was a Ganga chief.

(3) Edirili Chōla Sāmbavarāyan was a third one. He was also known as Chōla Pillai and Alagiya-Chōla. He was a feudatory of Rājārāja III as well. He is mentioned in two inscriptions dated in the 27th and 33rd years of Kulōttunga III (= A D 1205 and 1211). He was probably the son of Sengenī Ammaiyyappan alias Vikrama-Chōla-Sāmbavarāyan. Another member of this family was Sengenī Mindan Attimallan Sāmbavarāyan. (M. E. R. 1893 No 36 of 1893 S. I. I. 1 87 Ibid No 132 III No. 61 III No 120 S. I. I. III ii 208)

Re-conquest
of Madura, continuation of the Pāndyan
War of Succession,
Circa 1187
A D

In Kulōttunga's reign, the Pāndyan War of Succession took another form. The new phase it entered on was the enthronement by Kulōttunga III of Kulasēkhara's son Vikrama on the Pāndyan throne, his dethronement with the aid of fresh Ceylonese forces by the Pāndyans, the dethronement and death of Vīra-Pāndya in turn at the hands of Kulōttunga III, and finally the conquest of the Chōla country, by Mānavaiṃman Sundara-Pāndya and its restoration by him to Kulōttunga-Chōla III. As we have seen, when Kulōttunga III styles himself "conqueror of Madura and Ceylon" in his inscriptions of the 5th and 6th years, he was only assuming the title as co-regent with Rājādhirāja II, in whose reign the Chōla forces invaded Madura and defeated the combined Pāndyan and Ceylonese forces and restored Kulasēkhara Pāndya to his ancestral throne. It is even conceivably possible that Kulōttunga III, though a boy of only 14 or so at the time, actually served in Pallavarāyar's campaign which ended in the death of Lankāpura, the Ceylonese general, and so was entitled to the title of "Conqueror of Madura and Ceylon". It would seem as though that after Pallavarāyar's conquest of Madura, on behalf of Kulasēkhara Pāndya, Kulasēkhara himself died and that Vīra-Pāndya, the son of Parākrama-Pāndya, revolted against his son Vikrama-Pāndya, and created disturbances in the kingdom which ended in his displacing Vikrama-Pāndya on the throne. He appears to have been assisted by certain of the Maṇava chieftains of Madura and by the Ceylonese forces under the orders of Nissanka Malla, the successor of Parākrama-Bāhu the Great, who is said to have invaded the Pāndyan country thrice. An inscription dated in the 9th year (SLI III, 11 No 86) confirms this inference when it relates that Kulōttunga III assisted Vikrama-Pāndya against the son of Vīra-Pāndya, defeated the Maṇava (i e, the Maṇava) army, drove the Siṃhala (i e, Ceylonese) forces into the sea, took temples in the home province appears to have continued unabated throughout his reign. An inscription in the harajaharavata temple at Tiruhuvanam near Tiruvilai-marudur in the Tanjore District registers the building operations of Kul-tunga III about which we have no information in his other records. (M. A. II 1908 Para 61 Nos. 100 of 1907 and Nos. 101 and 102 of 1907 which are duplicates of 100 of 1907)

He built the mukhamandapa of Sabhāpati and the gopura of the shrine of the goddess Girindirāja and the enclosing verandah (prākāra harmaja). These two refer evidently to the Natarāja temple at Chidambaram, where the king must have built the mukhamandapa the gopura of the shrine of the goddess Sivakāmi Amman and the verandah enclosing the central shrine. Kul-tunga is described as an unequalled devotee (ślabhaktā) of the god at Chidambaram. The king built the beautiful temple of Ekāntarāvara (at Conjeevaram) the temple of Hālāhalāya at Madura the temple of Madhyārjuna (i.e. Tiruvilai-marudur) the temple of brīhādjāyēśvara the temple of Vālmikēśvara at Tiruvarur (in the Tanjore District) the sabha (mandapa) and the big gopura of Vālmikādhīpati (i.e. the temple of Tiruvarur). Finally the king built the Trishivanavīśvara temple at Trishivanam whose brilliant tall and excellent vimāna interrupts the Sun (in his course). Further the king had the consecration ceremony of Siva and Pārvatī in this temple performed by his guru Sivameśvara who was the son of Srikantha Sāmbhu and bore the surname Iavarasiva. The king's guru was well versed in the Saiva Darśana and the 18 Vidyas and had expounded the greatness of Siva taught in the Upanishads. He was also the author of a work called Siddhāntaratnākara. Iavarasiva is probably synonymous with Leśnasiva, the name of a Saiva teacher who wrote the Siddhāntasāra. In the

Kul-tunga
III
gr. 41
M. A. II
1908

restoration of Kulasēkharā-Pāndya The title Rājarāja which he assumed shows that he should have lived and distinguished himself in the reign of Rājarāja II, the father of Kulōttunga III. As he is alluded to in a record dated in the 5th year of Rājarāja III (M E R 1917, Para 39, Appdx B No 342 of 1917), he should be presumed to have lived till then at least. From all these references, it might be inferred that he rendered signal service in the expedition against the Pāndyas sent by Kulōttunga III. A record of the 14th year of Kulōttunga III (M E R 1918, Para 39, Appdx B. No 94 of 1918), whose historical introduction is similar to that of the record of his 9th year quoted above (S.I.I III n. No. 86) confirms what has been stated above about Kulōttunga's campaign against Madura in favour of Vikrama-Pāndya and states that after inflicting defeat on the combined Pāndyan and Ceylonese forces, the latter of whom were compelled to show their backs (i.e., retreat) and enter the sea (i.e., sail back to Ceylon), he planted a pillar of victory in Madura and conferred the Pāndyan kingdom on his protegē Vikrama-Pāndya. This part of the War should have occurred prior to the 9th year, but as no details of it are furnished in his inscriptions dated from the 3rd to the 8th regnal year (beyond some of the 5th year claiming the title of "Conqueror of Madura"), this campaign must have been undertaken between the 8th and 9th regnal years (A D 1186-1187). That Kulōttunga III was present in person at Madura in connection with this campaign might be inferred from two of his records (M E R. 1915, Appdx. B Nos 273 and 339 of 1914, see also M E R 1924, Para 22, Appdx B No 396 of 1923). These inscriptions state that having taken Madura, Ceylon, Karuvur and the crowned head of the Pāndya, he performed the anointment of heroes and victors at Madura. This latter statement is interesting as it proves hulottunga III. But as the location of Sri Rājarājesvara is not given and as the Tanjore temple built by the Chola king Rājarāja I does not bear any traces of having been repaired in later times it is not impossible as Mr Venkaya has suggested that the Airāvatesvara temple at Dārśuram near Kumbhakonam is meant. The latter is called Sri Rājarājesvara in its inscriptions. In fact it is the name Rājarājesvara that appears to have been corrupted into Dārśuram. The former name was in later times written with two abbreviations for rāja side by side and the syllables suram affixed. Accordingly the name became Dārśuram which occurs in some of the inscriptions of the place. This form is evidently responsible for the modern Dārśuram. The Airāvatesvara temple at Dārśuram is built in the style of the Hampaharāvara temple at Tribhuvanam and both of them seem to have been copied from the Tanjore temple. It is thus not impossible that the Airāvatesvara temple at Dārśuram near Kumbhakonam which is called Sri Rājarājesvara in its inscriptions was either renovated or built by the Chōla king Kulōttunga III.

Apart from the date of its construction the Airāvātēsvara temple possesses a unique interest to the student of Tamil literature. The north, west and south walls of the central shrine contain a belt of sculptures representing scenes from the lives of the devotees of Siva as related in the Periya-purāṇam. A large number of these sculptures bear labels in characters belonging roughly to the 13th century A D. The following are the labels —

- | | |
|--|---------------------------------|
| (1) Avināyāṇḍār mu(da)lavāyap-pāl(lab) | (7) Uḍaiyanambī eṇḍaruvuḷḍār |
| (2) Tirumuraṅgaṇpūṇḍiyil porapāḍi. | (8) Iṇḍāṇḍiyār |
| (3) (U)ḍaiyanambiyāl vēḍar vaḷḷ
paritav-ēṭam. | (9) Saḍaiyanār |
| (4) Uḍaiyanambikku oḷḷuravulinapāḍi | (10) Tiruṇḷiḡaṇḍapperumbāṇanār |
| (5) Uḍaiyana(mb)iyāl āṇḍakonda-rulinapāḍi | (11) Kō-Siṅgaṇḍerumāl. |
| (6) Āvāṇa-ḷāl kāṭṭinapāḍi. | (12) Nēṇḍār |
| | (13) Pāṇḍimāḍe(vi) |
| | (14) Appāḷum aḷiḷchāṇḍa aḍiyār |
| | (15) Mulaṇḍru pūḷiya manivar |
| | (16) Mukkāḷam tiruṇḍāl tinduvar |

conquest, further, Kulōttunga III became the suzerain of the three kingdoms of Madura, Ceylon and Kongu, and thus was entitled to assume the grand title of Tribhuvana-vīra-dēva, the hero who had taken the three worlds (i.e., kingdoms) of Madura, Ceylon and Kongu. The conquest of Kongu thus apparently led to the assumption of this title. We have a few particulars of this conquest of Karuvur in an inscription of his dated in his 26th year, found at Korakkur, Trichinopoly District. It is referred to in this record as the conquest of "Kongu alias Vīra-chōlamandalam." Karuvur was obviously the chief capital of the Konga country (M E R. 1918, Para 40, Appendix B No 227 of 1917). Its conquest must have been held to be an important one as the boast relating to it is mentioned repeatedly in all his later inscriptions.

Expedition
against the North, Circa
1198 A D

An inscription dated in his 19th year states that Kulōttunga sent an expedition into the North and entered Conjeeveeram. He claims therein that he "despatched matchless elephants, performed heroic deeds, prostrated to the ground the kings of the North, entered Kanchi (Kānchi) when (his) anger abated, and levied tribute from the whole (Northern region)." What necessitated this expedition is not clear, though the reference to his "anger" and its "abating" would indicate that the chiefs in this area had rebelled against his authority. This is the more probable because they were quite friendly and owed allegiance to the Chōla king Rājādhiraja during the first period of the Pāndyan War. Apparently there were some forces at work in the ancient, Pallava land which, taking advantage of the growing weakening of the central authority at the Chōla capital, were trying to attain to some sort of independence. This, for the time, did not succeed, though it eventually culminated in the famous attempt of Kōpperunjinga to Sketches of these scenic representations have been reproduced by the Madras Epigraphical Office in M.E.R. 1920 Plates facing page 98 et seq. to which reference is invited. Though somewhat crude the sculptural representation is not by any means inexpressive. In places it is strikingly original in its portraiture and is fully deserving of closer attention. As affording valuable specimens of 13th century figure sculpture in the Chola country it merits study.

The temple of Manikanthēsvara at Kālabasti North Arcot District was built during this reign. Its original name according to an epigraph found in it was Tirumānikkengaiyudaiya-Nāyanār (M.E.R. 1901 Para 21 Appendix A. No. 197). It appears to have been completed—the temple, the mandapa and the flight of steps—about the 11th year of Kulōttunga III (= A.D. 1189).

Following the king's example, his subordinate chiefs also undertook the construction of temples. One of them, named Iranaṇ Ponparappinān alias Rājārājakōṇa-larāyan built the temple of Srikaṇṭhāsam at Kogaiyur in the South Arcot District, with its pavilions, mandapas, enclosure walls and towers. He also constructed a tank called Virabhayankaram and gave extensive lands for its upkeep. The endowments to the temple were largely augmented by the gifts of another chief of the family to which he belonged (M.E.R. 1918, Para 40 No. 93 of 1918 and 94 of 1919). Viru Narasimhadēva Yādavarāya, another feudatory of this king, re-built the Venkatēśa Perumāl temple on the Thirupoti Hill, in the 40th year of his chieftainship. He is mentioned in inscriptions dated in the 37th and 38th regnal years of this king. (See above, Siya-Ganga, son of Chōḷēndrasimha, who is described as the lord of Kuvalālapura (Kolar) another feudatory of this king built the temple of Anantālvār at feudatories as builders.

His

weakening in the authority of the ruling king. In these circumstances, Kulōttunga III, either out of policy or otherwise, thought it best to support himself by patching up a marital alliance with a powerful neighbour. Hoysala Ballāla II, a contemporary of Kulōttunga III, was such a powerful neighbour. An inscription dated in the 12th year of Kulōttunga III (=A.D. 1190) mentions the influence he wielded at the time. He was married to a Chōla princess called Chōlamahādēvi (M.E.R. 1912, Para 30, Appendix B. 460), who was either a daughter of Rājādhirāja or a sister of Kulōttunga III, whom the genealogists do not mention. This converted a potential enemy, who had made no secret of his designs on Kānchi, into a friendly, though independent, neighbour. That some such step was necessary on Kulōttunga's part to support his failing power among his own subordinates, is indicated from different sources. Thus the rebellious proclivities of some of his dependent chiefs is well brought out by a record from Tiruvannāmalai, South Arcot District, dated in his 27th regnal year (A.D. 1205). These eventually submitted and promised not to act against the interests of the king and to obey the orders of Chēdiyarāyadēva, who was apparently Kulōttunga's prime minister (M.E.R. 1903, Para 9, Appendix A No 516 of 1902). A similar tendency was evidently exhibited by another set of traitors (rājadrōhin) in Tondaimandalam (i.e., in the same old Pallava country). King Kulōttunga III was then (in his 26th regnal year =1204-1205 A.D.) in the Pāndya country. He despatched from there a chief named Kuruvilū Pugalvanāyan and ordered him to accept the chiefship of Ponmaru in that Province. He accepted the offer and going over to the place, traced out the seditionaries and doubtless meted out just punishment to them. The record is unfinished and so we do not know the details. The significance of sending a native of the Pāndya country to rule over a on apparently for a long time. In the reign of a certain Kulottunga, so popular tradition goes, the image of this god was thrown into the sea and the temple fell into disrepair. The Vijayanagar king Rāmarāja is said to have restored the temple and the worship in it. According to an inscription found in it (M.E.R. 1914, Appendix B No. 272 dated in Saka 1461 = A.D. 1539), the restoration seems to have been actually effected by Achyuta rāja and not by Rāmarāja. This apart there is no evidence whatever to connect the desecration of the temple with the name of Kulottunga III. A pious temple renovator and builder like him should have been the last to think of an irreligious act of this kind. In the suppression of the monasteries we see more a desire to purge Saivism of what was considered at the time an undesirable accretion. The suppression seems to have been popularly justified at the time, whereas in the case of the Gōvindarāja shrine the act would have been set down as that of a vandal which Kulottunga III was certainly not. The popular tradition attributing it to a Kulottunga seems as erroneous as the attribution of the restoration of the image and worship in its honour to Rāmarāja instead of Achyuta. The Vaishnavas at about this time were a quiet and peaceful folk and both kings and people had uniformly patronised their temples with those of the followers of Śiva. Even in the reign of Kulottunga III we have instances of such patronage, even from distant Ceylon in favour of Vaiṣṇava shrines. Thus we learn from an inscription dated in his 11th year that the Valanjiyar of Southern Ceylon (they call themselves Karunākara Virar Tennilanga Valanjiyar) who formed the mercantile classes spread all over the country as the leaders of the Vēlaikkārars and other classes of people making a grant to a Viṣṇu temple in the Tanjore District (M.E.R. 1913 Page 102 1915 Page 102). Some of these were, as we know, professing the Buddhist compliment of Kulōttunga III and his predecessor Rājādhirāja II by making it over to the reigning Chōla king. Accordingly, in his later inscriptions, dating from his 7th to 14th regnal year (A D 1223 to 1230), Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya styles himself "who presented the Chōla country." In still later inscriptions, ranging from the 15th to 17th regnal years, he boasts of having "performed the anointment of heroes and the anointment of victory at Mudikondasōlapuram, after taking the Chōla country" (Ibid., Appendix C. Nos 26 and 50). To these achievements he added in the historical introductions prefixed to some of his records the conquests over the Kongus, Īlam (i.e., Ceylon) and Karuvur.

Restoration of the Chōla
kingdom,
A D 1223

If the restoration of the Chōla country to its king was an event of his 7th year, it will have to be placed, as already stated, in A D. 1222-23, since the date of Māravarman's accession has been fixed at 1216 A D. The Chōla king at the time was, according to Māravarman's inscriptions, Kulōttunga-Chōla III, (M.E.R. 1926, Para 32, Appendix C. No 9, dated in his 15th year, M.E.R. 1924, No 72 of 1924 dated in his 16th year), though there are no inscriptions mentioning him beyond his 40th year, corresponding to 1218 A D. The inference to be drawn from these inscriptions is that Kulōttunga III was still living and was nominal king, though the actual ruler was his successor Rājārāja III. (See ante). What contributed to Māravarman's restoring the Chōla kingdom to Kulōttunga III, from whom his own father (or elder brother, who is called Periyadēvanār in his inscription) had his throne is not clear. A powerful and ambitious ruler, Māravarman took advantage of the weakness of the Chōlas of the time and extended his own territories at their expense, and in the height of his glory, he showed his gratitude towards the old

thus referred to as the original place where Panini received the first fourteen aphorisms (called Mahāśvara sūtras) directly from Śiva is not at present remembered in the Tiruvorriyur temple (M.E.R. 1913 Para 39 Appendix B Nos. 201 and 202 of 1912)

The date of the death of Kuloṭṭunga III is not known. That he survived his practical retirement from his kingly office and lived for at least six or seven years after the assumption of sovereignty by Rājārāja III is clear from certain inscriptions which have been referred to above. The Pāndya invasion apparently occurred during this period but its effects were not felt. A review of his long reign brings out the fact that in him the Chōla kingdom found at a critical moment, a strong ruler who was able to ward off the most cruel blow aimed at its very existence as an independent State. Much of his reign was as usual with Chōla kings, occupied with war. By the conquests he effected he extended his influence if not his rule as far as Nandalur in the modern Cuddapah District. By his friendly attitude towards the Hoysalas, he made friends of possible enemies. He shone equally well as a builder of temples, a pious devotee and a literary patron. Brave and determined as warrior diplomatist and administrator he might in better times have earned for himself even a greater name. The rot, however, had already set in the framework of his royal house and he could not stop its ravaging effects any more than his predecessor or successor.

A review of the reign of Kuloṭṭunga
III

Kuloṭṭunga-Chōla III was succeeded by Rājārāja III surnamed indifferently Rājakēśorivarmān and Parakēśorivarmān (M.E.R. 1915 Para 25). He also styled himself Tribhuvanaśaṅkharavartin. His inscriptions lack the usual historical introductions and also the usual name epithets except the ones of Tribhuvanaśaṅkharavartin.

Rājārāja III,
Tribhuvana
śaṅkharavartin
A.D. 1216-
1257

1901, dated in A D 1208 and 1214). But the effects of the war were seen in other directions. If they did not affect the routine of administration, they unsettled the life of the people and affected their prosperity and well-being. There appears to have been a general breakdown of credit and mutual trust. This is well brought out by a curious provision made in a record of his 17th year (M E R, 1914 Appendix B No 264 of 1913). It is mentioned in this inscription that the persons with whom capital was invested for interest were to produce the capital at the end of every five years before the managers and trustees of the temple for obtaining its renewal. A landlord class had apparently come into being and had ever encroached on the privileges of the cultivators. A record of the 40th year of Kulōttunga III, which sets out the mythological origin of the 98 Idangai castes, incidentally throws light on the disabilities they suffered by the disunion that prevailed amongst themselves. In that year, they took an oath that they would behave like brothers—or as the record puts it, “as the sons of the same parents”—and jointly assert their rights till they established them. “What good or evil may befall any one of us,” they say, “will be shared by all.” A later record—whose exact date is not certain—suggests that the Brāhmans and Vellālans who held proprietary rights in the land, backed by Government servants, created trouble to the 98 castes forming the Valangai and 98 castes forming the Idangai. (M E R 1913, Para 39, Appendix C No 35 of 1913). Apparently land was passing out rapidly into the hands of non-cultivators and there was grumbling at the changed situation. Oppression from one side was, as usual, met by combination on the other. No wonder the collection of taxes became difficult. But the Government of the day was not averse to forcible collection of the dues. Thus, we are told in a couple of inscriptions, dated in the 35th and 38th

South Arcot District and in certain places belonging to the present Trichinopoly and Tanjore Districts. Several others also have been traced in Nandalur Cuddapah District. The fact that he ruled up to at least 1257 A D, shows that the statement that he might have died in A D 1243 before Kopperunja, who led a rebellion against him (see below) declared himself sovereign cannot be admitted as correct (South Arcot District Gazetteer 35)

The period of forty-one years he actually ruled was one marked by sedition and rebellion on the part of his dependants and chiefs, ending in the invasion of his kingdom by the Pāndyas from the south west and the Hoysalas from the north west. The Chōlas under him have no exploits to boast of. His capacity too for military organization appears to have been exceedingly limited if he did indeed possess any. What we know of his reign makes us feel that he was not the sovereign for the critical times he lived in. During his reign, the weakness of the Chōlas as a ruling power reached its climax. Not long after he began to reign the Pāndyas under Māravarman Sundarā Pandya I became very powerful and continued their sovereignty over southern India, perhaps, with occasional interruptions until it was overthrown by the Muhammadans about the beginning of the 14th century. It was evidently the weakness of the Chōlas that led to the occupation of the Chōla country by the Hoysalas under Vira Sūmēśvara and to the conquest of Kāंची by the Kakatiya king Ganapati. If further evidence were needed for the decline of the Chōlas about this period it is afforded by the fact of the Telugu Chōla chief Tikka hurrying up to help the Chōla king against the Pāndyas and claiming for himself as the result of such intervention the title of Chōla akhāpāndachārya. The Hoysala interference in the affairs of the Chōla kingdom apparently began during the reign decline of the Chōlas.

Political

dying for want of food and that consequently himself and his two daughters borrowed" 100 Kāsu from the temple treasury and sold themselves. The famine must have been a severe one, when a man could bargain away his personal liberty for want of food. It must, however, be remarked that slavery of the predial type was common in those days and the idea of selling one's liberty during times of calamity was nothing extraordinary. Thus, in this very reign, we have a couple of records (M.E.R. 1926, Para 28; Appendix C Nos. 90 and 91) dated in the 30th and 20th regnal years, in which we have references to gifts by way of purchase of men and women as servants (mada adimai) for cultivating the lands of a matha. That the slaves passed with the lands on which they worked seems inferable from the expressions used in the grants (such as Kudimngadēvadānam, Kudimngavai, etc.) But there is nothing to show that agricultural serfs were subjected to ill-treatment of any kind.

Re-engraving of public records

Despite the misery created by the war and the famine, there appears to have been no dislocation of routine work. The administrative machine apparently ran smooth. Even the re-engraving of temple records on its walls, on the occasion of renovation or rebuilding, was attended to as a matter of course (M.E.R. 1913, Para 41, Appendix C No. 47 of 1913 dated in the 19th regnal year). This would seem to indicate that about the middle of the reign there was peace in the land and the Government and people had time enough to attend to the daily routine of their work.

Criminal justice

The administration of criminal justice ran on the traditional lines. A record of the 6th regnal year (M.E.R. 1910, Para 30, Appendix B. No. 257 of 1909) suggests the punishment that was generally meted out in the case of accidental killing, ie, culpable homicide which he joined the rebellion against Rajaraja III have yet to be made out. Whether he is identical with the Solakon who appears as the agent of Kopperunjinga in certain of his inscriptions in the Chidambaram temple (M.E.R. 1903 Appdx. A Nos. 459-460 and Nos. 463-468) is not clear. In an inscription of the 16th year of Kopperunjinga, Solakon's name appears as Solakennar he being described as the son (pillai) of Perunjinga (M.E.R. 1921 Para 7 No. 432 of 1921). They may be different persons as the prefix Kolli appears to distinguish them. If he was of the Chola royal house—as he might well have been judging from his name—it might indicate that the decline of the Cholas was about this time and partly at least to internal dissensions. Rai Bahadur V. Venkayya has suggested that Rajendra Chola III two of whose inscriptions of the 7th year have been found in the Srirangam temple may have been a contemporary of Vira Somesvara and that if he was reigning during the time of Rajaraja III independently of him it would lead us to the same inference. (M.E.R. 1900 Para 30 M.E.R. August 1892 Appdx. B Nos. 64 and 65 of 1892). Recent research has however enabled us to draw the inference that Rajendra Chola III was probably a brother of Rajaraja III and that he was associated with him from the 30th year of his (Rajaraja's) reign and that there are no indications from the extant inscriptions of both these kings that there was any dispute between them as to the succession or any other matter. On the other hand the mention of Solakon as an important ally of Kopperunjinga in the Tiruvēndipuram inscription suggests that he might have been a likely Chola claimant or pretender who possibly sought Kopperunjinga's aid as against Rajaraja III. Kopperunjinga was an ambitious chief and that he had allied with him a scion of the Chola family might have been sufficient in raising the standard of revolt against the ruling king.

of 1919). Another record, dated in the 16th regnal year, refers to a case in which a man, out hunting, killed a man by an arrow, mistaking him for an animal. The man was laid up for some days and then died. The Brāhmans and the nāttar (residents of the nād) assembled together and decided that as the two were not on inimical terms before the death of the man, the death was only accidental, and that on behalf of the deceased, the accused should provide for a lamp in the temple (M E R. 1919, Para 22, Appendix C No. 33 of 1919). It will be seen that the punishment provided for—many cows and a bull usually, it seems to have been—was not worse than the minimum punishment prescribed by the I P C. under Section 304 to cover analogous cases in modern days. A point to note is that there was an open adjudication by all the people of the locality, literate and illiterate, who may be presumed to have had a voice in the well-being of the community as a whole in and about the place where the offence was committed. They apparently were both judges and jury in the case. The milder punishment was of course restricted to cases in which “intention” on the part of the accused was proved to be wholly absent. The Criminal Code of the 12th and 13th centuries in South India seems to have been on the whole a fairly civilized one. In its working, however, no relaxation appears to have been shown to delinquents who deserved severe punishment. Thus, in a record of probably the 20th regnal year of Kulōttunga III, the royal order is proclaimed that mischievous people who were a source of trouble to the Brāhmans, Vellālas and the local temple (of Viṣṇu) would be levied heavy fines which might extend up to 20,000 Kāsu and in case of default would be liable for forfeiture of their lands to realize the fines imposed. In pursuance of this decree, two persons who were charged with having caused a riot (Kalaham) and set fire to the house of a instance of Vikrama Chōla Sambavarāyan one of the parties to it (Ibid No 113 of 1900) He declares that —

(1) as long as he and the other party to the compact live they shall be faithful to each other (2) in case alliance or hostility by either with Pirandaperumāl who was the son of Rājā rāja Adigan (i.e., Vidukad alagiya perumāl of the first compact above mentioned) it shall be done with the approval of the other (3) he (Sambavarāyan) will not join the enemies of the other party neither will he enter into transactions hostile to the interests of the other

As the second compact is between the two parties who probably formed the other compact with Vidukad alagiya perumāl and one of the conditions of their own compact had reference to the declaration of alliance or hostility with him by them it has to be presumed that it was concluded before the first one mentioned above Vidukad alagiya perumāl's compact with the other two jointly was apparently a clever counter blast to their own compact between themselves. If this is a reasonable inference the Vidukad alagiya perumāl's compact cannot have been so removed in point of time with the other one between themselves. Accordingly we have to infer that both the compacts came into existence in the reign of Kulōttunga Chōla III from when the Chōla power began to decline. As we have seen compacts of this nature first appear to have begun between the different members of the Sambavarāja family in the reign of Rājādhirāja II (See above.) It apparently thence spread to other chiefs as well to secure personal ends and ambitions. The compact of the 21st year referred to as having been concluded by Vidukad alagiya perumāl in the reign of some unnamed king was apparently one of this nature and may probably refer to a compact entered into in the 21st (or last) year of Rājādhirāja II Siyagangan mentioned in the compact of Vidukad

(4) Two other chiefs, Viḍaḡaḡalaḡiḡa-Perumāl of Dharmapurī in the Salem District and Maḡaiḡan-Vinaḡiḡaivenrān, are mentioned in two inscriptions of Kulōttunga III dated in his 20th and 21st years (S I I III 11 208)

(5) Finally, we have a certain Yādavarāḡa, referred to in an inscription of Kulōttunga's 21st year,

There were two chiefs of this last mentioned name ; one was Tīrukkaḡattidēva, and another his son Vīra-Narasimhaḡēva. The former is mentioned in Kulōttunga's records dated in his 16th and 17th years and the latter in his inscriptions dated in 36th and 37th years. Vīra-Narasimha is also referred to in an inscription of Rāḡarāḡa III, dated in his 8th year. In an inscription dated in the 15th year of Rāḡarāḡa III, he calls himself " prince Simha alias Vīrarākshāsa-Yādavarāḡa, the son of Yādavarāḡa alias Tīrukkaḡattidēva." Both father and son claim descent from the Eastern Chālukḡa family, for they both bore the birudas Vēḡḡivallabha and Sasīkula-Chalukki. An inscription of the 34th year of Vīra-Narasimha is in the Venkatēsa-Perumāl temple on the Tirupatī Hill. This temple was re-built in his 40th year (E I VII. 25). Another inscription dated in the 8th year of Tiruvēḡḡaḡanātha Yādavarāḡa is also to be seen on the Tirupatī temple. This Yādavarāḡa is styled Tribhuvana-chakravartin. Dr. Hultzsch thinks he may have belonged to the same family (M E R 1888-1889, No. 58, also S I. I, II, 11, 209). A still another member of the same family was Salukki-Nārāḡana-Yādavarāḡan, who was governor of Pularkōttam in the 9th year of Rāḡarāḡa III (M E R 1919, Para 30, Appendix B No. 218 of 1910).

Building activities of the period

There appears to have been a renewal of building activities during the period of Kulōttunga's long reign of nearly forty years. Indeed, it might be said with justice that Kulōttunga's interest in building or renovating dominated himself to the position of carrying the sandals of his enemies and of eating the chewed betel leaves thrown out from their mouths. This compact was apparently aimed against Alappirandan I dirikola Sambavarayan who to judge from his name was a relative of both the contracting parties. Its primary object appears to have been to isolate him and thus put him down. He should have proved himself obnoxious to both parties and the alliance accordingly took the form of a mutually protective alliance. Kulottungaśōla Sambavarayan was apparently a powerful chieftain for as was the condition imposed on him that he should not transgress his territorial limits.

Compacts of this nature would seem to indicate a falling off in the authority of the Chola king. These compacts fully demonstrate that the weakening of the central authority which showed itself first in the reign of Rajadhirāja II developed in that of Kulittōga Chola III and ended in open revolt in that of Rajarāja III. It might have been almost a necessity of the times for disorder and insecurity resulting from the Pandyan War of Succession had to be provided for and ambitious local chiefs found it both convenient and useful to form alliances of this nature. The Yūdavarayas, Kūdavarayas and the Sambavarayas referred to above were apparently chiefs of this type and they naturally endeavoured to make the most of the situation for themselves. The royal names they added to their own shows that they kept well or pretended to keep well with the ruling king of the time. They were all the same, prepared for eventualities and even at a suitable opportunity to throw off the yoke. Such indeed was what was done by Kopperunjioga who was in one sense a Kūdavarāya (or Pallava chief) who owed allegiance to Rājārāja III.

Political compacts between feudatories
and their significance

Kopperunjanga conquered the Chola king at Tollaru deprived him of all his royal insignia imprisoned him with his ministers and took possession of the Chola country. It has been suggested that this exploit was performed by Alagiya Sivan the father of Perunjanga (M E R 1923 Paras 7-8). While the fact of an earlier defeat may be accepted the fact that it was accomplished by the father of Perunjanga seems far fetched. Wherever Perunjanga is mentioned with the words Alagiya Sivan it is intended to particularise Perunjanga the son of Alagiya Sivan and no more. While the father Alagiya Sivan is mentioned as Perunjanga's father and the son of Perunjanga is also mentioned in Perunjanga's inscriptions, there are no independent inscriptions of the father and son (See below). Apart from this there can be hardly any doubt that Rājarāja was defeated at Tellāru in his 5th and 6th years prior to his second defeat at Sendamangalam and imprisonment there in his 10th year. After his defeat at Tellāru he was probably once before set at liberty by Hoyasala Narasimha II for his exclamation, on hearing of Rājarāja's second imprisonment at Sēdamangalam. This trumpet shall not be blown unless I shall have maintained my reputation of being the establisher of the Chōla kingdom would be meaningless. This is confirmed by an inscription of Narasimha II dated in A D 1231—before Sēdamangalam was fought and relieved—in which he has already assumed the title of the establisher of the Chōla kingdom (E C II. Sravasa Belgola No 186). In an inscription dated in A D 1222 Narasimha is besides, stated to have marched against Srirangam in the south (E C VI Chikmagalur 56) and in the Harihar inscription of A.D 1224 he is called the establisher of the Chōla kingdom and a Kadava (i.e. Pallava) king is said to have been his opponent in that connection. Hence the conquest of Srirangam (i.e. the country round the

- (17) Tiruvārūrpīrandār
- (18) Paramanaiye pāduvār
- (19) Pattarūyppanuvār
- (20) Kōlppuliyāndār
- (21) Pugalttunaiy (ar)
- (22) Scruttanaiyāndār (r)
- (23) Idangaliyāndār
- (24) Kalarchingānār
- (25) Munaiyaduvār
- (26) Vājilār
- (27) Nedumāranār
- (28) Kīriyār
- (29) Kōyil(?)
- (30) Kanambulāndār.

- (31) Viyyadigal Kīdavaikōnār
- (32) Sattiyin(d)ār
- (33) Kalicayanār
- (34) Kālikkambāndār kadai
- (35) Adibattar kadai
- (36) Narasingamunaiyaraiyar
- (37) (Pu)galchchōlanār
- (38) Poyyadimaiy illāda pulavar
- (39) Kūrruvānār
- (40) (Ka)nanīdānda(r)kadai
- (41) Sūmān purumāl kadai
- (42) Sirutto(nda)ndār kadai
- (43) Sakkiyanār

Besides these, there are a number of other labels which are only painted with red paint but not cut. The alphabet of these labels is nearly the same as that of the foregoing.

On the lower portion of the outer gōpura of the same temple are a number of niches—mostly empty at present—which must have contained images of gods. At the top of each of the niches is a label describing the image in it. The alphabet of these labels is almost the same as those on the central shrine. Subjoined is a list of the labels which shows the names of the deities commonly worshipped in the 13th century —

North Side

- (1) Ādi Chandēsvaradēvar
- (2) Gangūdēvi
- (3) Dumbū Nārādar
- (4) Vaisrava(nan)
- (5) Chandran
- (6) Mahāsūsta
- (7) Nūgarāja
- (8) Vāyu
- (9) Hrīlēkhādēvi
- (10) Rudra(ni)
- (11) Vaishnavi
- (12) B(r)a(h)m(ā)nī
- (13) Varunan
- (14) Sri-Nandikēsvara(dēvar)
- (15) Periyadēvar
- (16) Sāntyatita-sakti
- (17) Sānti-sakti
- (18) Vidyā-sakti.
- (19) Pārtishtha-sakti
- (20) Nivṛtti-sakti

South Side

- (21) Dakshaprajāpati
- (22) Yamunādēvi
- (23) Rati
- (24) Kūmdēvan

East Side

- (25) Agnīdēvar
- (26) Agastyadēvar
- (27) Sridēvi
- (28) Durgadēvi
- (29) Dēvēndran
- (30) Patma(dma)nidhi.
- (31) Sūryadēvar.
- (32) Subrahmanyadēvar
- (33) Kshētrapālār
- (34) Sarasvati
- (35) Visvakarma
- (36) Isānadēvar

king (Rajaraja III) and states that king Perunjinga had captured the Chōla Emperor (Rajaraja III) at Sēdamangalam (in the present Tirukoilur Taluk). Thereon the Hoysala king Vīra Nārasiṃhadēva (i.e. Nārasiṃha II) started from Dārasamudra (present Halebid in the Hassan District) seized Perunjinga with his wives and treasures and re-instated the Chōla emperor. The inscription attributes to the Hoysala king the title 'Establisher of the Chōla kingdom' and mentions the names of his officers who actually effected the liberation of Rājorāja III. It also states that Porikramabahu the king of Ceylon who seems to have been allied to Perunjinga lost his life in the course of this war. In an inscription dated in the 14th year of Rājorāja III (M.E.R. 1900 Appendix B No. 196 of 1900) i.e. only two years prior to the Tiruvēṇḍipuraṃ record Perunjinga is called a Pallava and represented as a vassal of Rājorāja III. Consequently his rebellion against the Chōla king and his defeat at the hands of the Hoysala king must have taken place between the years A.D. 1229 and 1232. This inference is confirmed by other records which refer specifically to the disturbances of the 16th regnal year (M.E.R. 1925 Forā 24 Appendix B No. 218 of 1925).

The Tiruvēṇḍipuraṃ inscription which gives a graphic account of the capture of Perunjinga and the liberation of Rājorāja III was apparently engraved by the two generals who effected the rescue. The following from it will be found interesting —

How Rājorāja III was imprisoned and how he was liberated.

In the sixteenth year of the Emperor of the three worlds, the glorious Rājorājadēva when Prātāpachakravartan the glorious Vīra-Nārasiṃhadēva, heard that Kopperunjinga had captured the Chōla emperor at Sēdamangalam that he destroyed the kingdom with his army and that the temples of Śiva and Viṣṇu were destroyed he exclaimed. This trumpet

Kānchi, in the 35th regnal year, corresponding to Saka 1134 or A D 1212-13. (M E R 1920 Para 21, Appdx. B. No 589 of 1919) Whether this Yādavaraya had anything to do with the Pillaiyār Yādavaraya mentioned above as resorting to methods of coercion for collecting the revenue due by cultivators, it is not possible to say

Suppression of unpopular monasteries,
1200 A D

As a devout worshipper of Siva, Kulōttunga III appears, in his 22nd year, to have taken steps to suppress some monasteries of an unpopular kind. Among those suppressed was one at Tirutturaipundi, whose chief died two years after its destruction. What actually led to such suppression is not clear. The suggestion that such suppression was indulged in by the king at the instance of Brāhmanas seems not well founded (M E R 1913, Para 42, Appendix B, No 471 of 1912). The crusade against these monasteries seems to have been a general one, as it is styled Kuhai-idi-kalaham (literally, the fight for the destruction of caves, i.e., monasteries). Their property, on their suppression, was confiscated to the State. It is possible that those connected with these monasteries preached or inculcated doctrines of a kind not favoured by the vast majority of the people. A deeply religious king like Kulōttunga III would not have gone the lengths he appears to have in this connection, if it was not found politically necessary to suppress the new religious orders that were cropping into existence apparently to public detriment.

Was Kulōttunga
III a religious bigot?

The question whether Kulōttunga III was a Saiva bigot is raised not only by the above mentioned suppression of a kind of Saiva monasteries but also by another incident which has been assigned to a Kulōttunga, who, it is suggested, may have been this king. The Nālāyīraprabandham refers to the Gōvindarāja temple within the famous Siva temple at Chidambaram, where worship was going it occurs (i.e. Tiruvēndipparam) was perhaps the spot where the Chōla emperor after his release separated from the two generals and entered his own kingdom. Appanna and Samundra Gōpayya were probably ardent followers of Viṣṇu and visited Tiruvēndipparam which is mentioned in the Viṣṇuvasa sacred work Nalāyīrāprabhaṅgam. The temple at which the inscription above referred to is still to be seen is on the very edge of the Gadilam river. In the 14th century, Tiruvēndipparam became the residence of Vēdānta Deśika, the famous commentator on Śrī Rāmanuja. His residence is still pointed out at the place. The two generals of the Hoysala king are mentioned in an inscription of Vīra Nārasiṃha, found at Arakere Gubbī Taluk Tanjur District (E.C. VII Gubbī 45) dated in 1233 A.D. Their exploit of destroying Kū-Perunjaṅga (he is called the Kadava king) and relieving the Chōla king is mentioned in it in these words. Kāḍava rāyaṇam kiḍiṣi chōḷaṇaṁ biḍiṣi taṇḍallige Appayya is spoken of as Vīra Nārasiṃha's Mahāśāmantā Balleya-Nayaka and is also described as the 'plunderer of the Tigulamandala'. He was granted the village of Arakere where the inscription is found as a Koḍaḷe as his reward. We are further told that Appayya was the son of Gandachayya Nāyaka and Ammaladēvi, who were devotees of the Idagur Goddess from whom he was a boon to them. He was it is said minister general and guardian of the army. He is said to have pursued Vīra Pāndya's army apparently after defeating it. He is said to have received the gift of the village of Arakere "as if a much-needed stick for thrashing the host of chieftains and hostile kings. He must have been quite a distinguished general for the writer of the epigraph to describe him and to moralise thus —

"What similarity is there between chiefs who possessing Koḍaḷe and Kulavṛtti invest in jewels and the conqueror of the armies of Chōla and Pāndya, the Ballāla (i.e. the able and some the Saiva faith (see above) The present reference shows that some others followed the Śrīvaiṣṇava faith, for the inscription testifies to the renewal of an agreement made by them to subscribe among themselves two Kāsu per head for providing for the maintenance of a matha at Tirukannapuram, founded probably by their own community, for feeding Śrīvaiṣṇavas in it on all festive occasions (M E R 1923, Appdx. B No 505 of 1922)

Kulōttunga
III as a literary patron

There is some reason to believe that Kulōttunga III patronised poets In a record dated in his 23rd regnal year we have one of these mentioned to us Vīrantapallavaraiyar is described in it as his favourite court poet His works are not known A person who probably belonged to the family from which he came, was, we are told, musician and dancing master in the Tirukkadayur temple (M E R 1925, Para 22, Appendix B No 255 of 1925). During Kulōttunga's reign, there seems to have flourished one Vatsarājan of Arumbākkam, who is said to have rendered the Bhārata into elegant Tamil. (M E R 1906, Para 23, Appendix B. No 482 of 1905) This translation is not otherwise known The version of Perundēvanār (Bhāratavenbā) and Villiputturālvār belong to the 9th and 15th centuries A D The author of the well-known Tamil Grammar Nannūl seems to have flourished at the court of Vīra-Narasimha Yādaiāya, a feudatory of Kulōttunga III. (S I. I III ii 208) At Tiruvorriyūr, there was maintained, during this period, a school for the teaching of grammar It was located in a mandapa, called the Vyākaranadāna-Vyākhyānamandapa, where it would appear, the god Vyākaranadāna-Perumāl (i.e., Śiva) "was pleased to appear before Pāṇini-Bhagavan for fourteen continuous days and to teach him the first fourteen aphorisms," with which Pāṇini begins his famous Grammar The Grammar-Hall it (ca. 1220-1221) managed to become powerful and drove out the foreigners from the Maya country. He the two sons Pandita Parakrama Babu II (1231-1269 A.D.) and Bhuvanika Babu (1271-1283 A.D.). Of these the latter drove out the Tamils from Polonnaruwa about 1271 A.D. He should have sent some chief of his to the Kopperunjinga against the Cholas for attacking them in their homeland. As there is no record of his personally visiting India, this inference seems fairly sustainable.

Now we come to Kopperunjinga. According to the writings of certain authorities it would seem to follow that there were three chiefs of this name —

The story of Kopperun-jinga.

(1) Alagiya Siyan Vaniyalappiranda Kopperunjinga I he has also been called Kadava I. (2) Kopperunjinga II entitled Sakalabhuvanachakravartin and "protector of Mallin" and "Nissankamalla" he has been identified with the Mahārājāsīmha of the Drākahārma and the Tripurāntakam inscriptions. The latter has been spoken of as the conqueror of Tondaimanulalam i.e. the old Pallava country. He has also been styled Kadava II. This is said to have been the rebel leader who took Rajaraja III prisoner. (3) Kopperunjinga III son of No. (2) above, who according to the Tiruvannūmalai record (No. 460 of 1909) claims to have "driven the Telungur to the north so that they might perish there." Whether this son is identical with Solakon who is described as piḷai (son) of Perunjinga in an inscription of his 16th year is not certain. (See on this subject M.F.R. 1902 Para. 9 M.F.R. 1903 Para. 2 M.E.R. 1906 Paras 5-6 M.E.R. 1913 Para. 66 M.E.R. 1911 Para. 3 M.F.R. 1923, Para. 21 M.E.R. 1923 Paras 5-8 and M.E.R. 1926 Para. 21). As all the inscriptions so far discovered are attributable to only one king Kopperunjingadeva, who appears to have ruled for at least 36 years, as inscriptions have been found from his 2nd to his 36th year there appears no valid ground for attributing some of these to Alagiya Siyan the father and some others to Kopperunjinga, entitled Sakalabhuvanachakravartin, etc.

above mentioned, and Ulagudarya-Perumāl in a record of his 6th regnal year (M E R 1918, Appdx B. No 246 of 1917). How he was exactly related to Kulōttunga III, his predecessor, and to Rājēndra-Chōla III, his successor, is not known. Both Rājarāja III and Rājēndra III refer to Kulōttunga III as "Peiyadēvar," but as this term is found used practically as a synonym for "respected predecessor" in several cases, it might not indicate any special relationship to him. (M E R 1913, Para 41). But his association of Rājarāja III with him from 1216 A D, during his life time, in his rule, indicates that he might have been his son "Peiyadēvar" in that case, might be taken to suggest "father" If this be so, Rājēndra-Chōla III may, until the contrary is definitely proved, be taken to have been the brother of Rājarāja III The initial date of Rājarāja III has been fixed by Dr Kielhorn in 1216 A D, which has been confirmed by an epigraph at Adhamankōttai, in the Salem District, which couples Saka 1163 (=A D 1241) with his 26th regnal year (M E R 1911, Para 30, Appdx B No 208 of 1910, see also M E R 1912, Appdx. B Nos 407, 415 and 418). An inscription of his dated in his 20th year, from the details furnished in it, falls according to Mr L D Svāmikannu Pillai, in 1235-36 A D, which, he states, is the only possible year for the astronomical peculiarities exhibited by it This, again, confirms that his initial year began in 1215-16 A D. (M E R 1912, Para 31, Appdx. B No. 258 of 1911) Besides many lithic inscriptions, there is a copper-plate grant of his dated in his 18th year, which comes from Tirukkalar in the Tanjore District (M E R 1903, Para 17) Inscriptions of his 36th (M E R 1909, Para 51), 38th (M E R 1921, Appdx C No 188) and 41st year (M E R 1922, Para 24, Appdx B No. 199) are known Many other inscriptions of his dated in his 32nd and 33rd years have been found at Thuvannāmalai, 1913 Para 66 Appendix B No 206) The following genealogical table gives the relationship of the various members of this family —

Alagijastyan alias Kadava I
Kopperunjinga or M hārīśambha alias Kadava II
Sōla-kon or Sōla kōnār (of Chidam baram Inscriptions and Inscription No. 152 of 1924)	Unnamed son men tioned in the Tiru- vannāmalai inscrip- tion (150 of 1902)— Pallavarjyar alias Kadavarjyar Kadava III (M L R. 1913, Appendix B No 206 of 1912).	Alaganarayan (men- tioned in inscriptions dated in the 14th regul y ar of K p- perunjing II alias Ninganga of Anur (S I VII 116, M E R 1902, Para 19)

As might be expected many of his inscriptions have been found at Chidambaram and Tiruvannamalai in the South Arcot District while a few have been traced at Tiruvadi (South Arcot District) Attur (Chingleput District) Thrunialisai, Siddhalingamadam Tāyanur Vayalur (North Arcot District) Tripurāntakam (Kurnool District) and Drāksharama (Godavari District) Judging from his inscriptions he was apparently deeply attached to the temples at Chidambaram Tiruvannamalai and Tiruvadi. His inscriptions at Tripurāntakam do not indicate any conquests in the region where they are found nor any gifts to the god of that temple. The Drākshārāma inscription quotes two verses—unfortunately mutilated—which were composed by Kopperunjinga himself and which refer to his victories over the Kārṇāṭa, Chōla and Pandya kings. Not much is known of his early career but it may be presumed that an ambitious man like him would not have kept quiet when circumstances were helpful to his attaining the rank of king ship. Apparently he made inroads on his master's dominions as far as Srirangam and annexed the country round it thus driving out the Pandyas who had occupied Tanjore and Uraiyur. This is proved by inscriptions actually found in the Shiyālī Taluk of the Tanjore of Nārasimha II, the father of Vīra-Sōmēsvara, who ruled from A D. 1220 to 1235. From the surname "the establisher of the Chōla kingdom" borne both by Nārasimha II and Vīra-Sōmēsvara, and from the statement of the Harihar inscription of the former that he "cleft the rock that was Pāndya" (Bombay Gazetteer, I ii 507) and that he gave the Chōla king his crown (E C. XII, Gubbī 45), it may be concluded that Nārasimha II marched into the Chōla country to help the Chōla king against the Pāndyas who, under Mātavarman Sundara-Pāndya, had advanced northwards and burnt Tanjore and Uraiyur. Nārasimha probably drove the Pāndyas out of the Chōla country, reinstated the Chōla king on his throne and returned to his own dominions. But his son and successor Vīra-Sōmēsvara established himself in the Chōla country soon after his accession in 1233 A D, with Kannanūr, near Trichinopoly, as his capital, either from motives of self-aggrandisement or from a desire to keep the Pāndyas more effectively in check. Even if self-aggrandisement had been Vīra-Sōmēsvara's motive in occupying the Chōla country, the Chōla king was apparently powerless to prevent it. As Rājarāja III ruled from 1216 to 1257 A D, he should undoubtedly have been the Chōla king, during whose reign the Pāndya invasion, the expedition of the Hoysala king Nārasimha II against the Pāndyas and the eventual occupation of the Chōla country by Vīra-Sōmēsvara took place, though the name of the Chōla king is not mentioned either in the Pāndya or in the Hoysala records (V Venkayya, M E R 1900, Paras 29-30). The Tīruvēndipuram inscription refers to one Kolli-Sōlakon, apparently a Chōla prince, who was an ally of Kopperunjīga and who raised the revolt against Rājarāja III. The context shows that he should have been an important personage. Who he was and how he was related to Rājarāja III and the circumstances under had annexed to his own Kopperunjinga did not, how ever throw off the yoke for we find him until two years before his second revolt acknowledging Rājarāja's suzerainty over him (See above.) But he was astute enough to decide upon a fresh adventure before long. His next move seems to have been to mature a plan by which a more successful step could be taken to end Rājarāja's sovereignty. The idea of the confederacy accordingly took shape despite the strong measures taken by Rājarāja III against seditionaries, and he got together even troops and leaders from distant Coylon. Then the affair of Sendamangalam in about 1231 A.D. followed and his discomfiture should have been great when the intervention once again of Nārasimha II, the Hoysala king wholly foiled his second attempt. He appears to have taken his defeat for the time being as became an adventurer like him with becoming grace but his ambitious spirit would not allow him to wait for the disappearance from the scene of his hated rival Rājarāja III before proclaiming himself king of the part of the Chōla country he actually controlled. We have no records of Rājarāja III beyond his 41st year or 1257 A.D., but at least four years before that date he appears to have defeated certain Dandanāyakas of the Hoysala king (apparently Vira Sōmēśvara who ruled up to 1263 A.D.) in a battle at Perumbalur (in the Tiruchinopoly District) and seized their ladies and treasuries, and levied tribute from the Pāndyas (M.E.R. 1918 Para 2 Appendix C No 73 of 1918 and M.E.R. 1925 Para 26 No 229 of 1925) and at least four years prior to that date i.e. between February and July 1243 A.D., Kopperunjinga ascended the throne and invested himself with regal titles like Sakalabhūvanachakravartin Kūḍal Avaniyālappirandān Kopperunjiṅga, of which Avaniyālappirandān takes the form of Avanyavanōḍ bhava in the Drākahūrama inscription dated in Saka 1184 (=A.D. 1362) or his 19th year. In the

Weakening
of central authority and the rise of the feudatories

That the times were out of joint and that there was considerable confusion in the land which enabled political adventurers to try their fortunes there can be no doubt whatever. The political position of the Chōlas had, indeed, so far degenerated, that, about this time, we find a Chēra king at Tirumalai in the North Arcot District, which till then at least, should have belonged to the Chōlas. This prince, Vidakad-alagiya-perumāl by name, belonged to the family of Elini or Yavanika. (S.I.I. 1. 105) He was the son of king Rājarāja-Adhika (or Adigaimān) and the lord of Takata, identified with Tagadur in the Mysore District (M.E.R. 1900, Para 31). Vidakad-alagiya-perumāl's influence appears to have expanded beyond Tagadur to Tirumalai and that he took an active part in the politics of the day is suggested by a couple of inscriptions at Chengama, in the South Arcot District. One of these, which unfortunately is undated, registers a political compact which Vidakad-alagiya-perumāl entered into with Karikāla-Sōla-Adaiyur-Nādālvān and Sengēri Ammayappan Attimallan alias Vikrama-Sōla-Sāmbavarāyan. It was apparently Vidakad-alagiya-perumāl that got the compact engraved on stone. (M.E.R. Para 32 Appdx B No 107 of 1900) He publicly declares in this epigraph that —

(1) as long as the two chiefs of the other side continue to be faithful to him, he will be true to them, (2) their enemies shall be his enemies, (3) his enemies shall be their enemies, (4) he will form no alliance with certain chiefs among whom Siyagangan is apparently one, and (5) on other points he will observe—the provisions of the compact—entered into in the 21st year of some unnamed king

In the 20th year of Kulōttunga-Chōla III (=1198 A.D.) the two chiefs who entered into the above compact with Vidukad-alagiya-perumāl, themselves entered into another compact. This record is also engraved on stone at Chengama, apparently at the

were registered on temple walls the methodical manner in which the original documents were secured in the temple treasury and the routine spirit which Solakon his representative at Chidambaram cultivated doubtless in the interests as much of the governed as the governor. Kopperunjinga was a devotee of the Siva temples at Chidambaram and Tiruvannāmalai. At the former place he built the eastern gopura (resembling we are told in the Tripurāntakam inscription, mount Meru) out of the riches obtained by the conquest of the country on the banks of the Cnavery and called the gopura after his own name. The decorations on the four sides of the gōpura are said to have been made with the booty acquired by subduing the four quarters. According to an inscription dated in his 5th year at Attur in the Chingleput District he presented that village for building the southern entrance of the Chidambaram temple (M.E.R. 1922 Appendix B No 286 of 1921). He made gifts at Drākshārama, where an inscription of his is actually found the Ēkambranātha temple at Coujeeveram Svetajaynta (i.e. Jambukēśvaram) Virattanam Modura, Kālahasti and other places. One of these at Tiruvannāmalai refers to him as the protector of Mīlilai (Māmallaparam) i.e. the Seven Pagodas with which the early Pallavas were, as we have seen closely connected and repeats the title Nissankamalla which appears in one of his Tripurāntakam inscriptions (M.E.R. 1906 Paras 5-6). Evidently the old Pallava capital lay in his usurped area. Among his officers were Sōlakon already mentioned, who was his agent at Chidambaram and his brother Vēnaudaiyār Tennavan Brahmsdirājan Jayntunga Pallavaraiyan and Tika Ambala-Pallavarayan all of whom are referred to in his Chidambaram inscriptions. Sōlakon was apparently deeply attached to his master and probably his benefactor. On a pillar in the second western gōpura of the Chidambaram temple and on another gōpura alagiyaperumāl has been identified with the chief of that name mentioned in the Tnuvalam record, as a feudatory of a Kulōttunga-Chōla, who must have been Kulōttunga-Chōla III (S I I III 122) Apparently, Vidukad-alagiyaperumāl had to agree with the other parties to the contract that he would not ally himself with this Sīyagangan among others, probably because he had proved hostile to them and because he like Sīyaganga belonged to the ancient Ganga kingdom, within whose limits both Vidukad-alagiyaperumāl and Sīyagangan seem to have had their principal dominions. An earlier compact entered into in the 11th year of Kulōttunga-Chōla III between Sengenī Virasōlan Attimallan alias Kulōttungasōla-Sāmbavarāyan, a member of the Sāmbavarāyan family, with one Kudal Arasanārāyana Ālappirāndān alias Kādavarāyan is also known (M E R 1919, Para 21, Appdx. C No 254 of 1919) According to this compact, both the parties to it swore they should not do anything that would be detrimental to the interests of either, that Kulōttunga-Sāmbavarāyan should not form any alliance with Ālappirāndān Edirisōla-Sāmbavarāyan, that he should confine himself to certain specified tracts of country which, if he transgressed, the mudals would send up arms and horses and cause him injury, and that if Ālappirāndān Edirisōla-Sāmbavarāyan inflicted any trouble on Kulōttungasōla-Sāmbavarāyan, Kādavarāyan would support him, that in case Ālappirāndān Edirisōla-Sāmbavarāyan ran away from his hill (residence) leaving behind him all arms, Kulōttungasōla-Sāmbavarāyan should have possession of them subject to the condition that he would not shelter or form any alliance with the other and that if Kādavarāyan allied himself with the relatives of Kulōttungasōla-Sāmbavarāyan and with Ālappirāndān Edirisōla-Sāmbavarāyan against the interests of Kulōttungasōla-Sāmbavarāyan, he (Kādavarāyan) would alias kūḍavarāyan, who has been identified with one of the Kopperunjingas of the later records. (M F R 1922, Para 21 Appendix B Nos 180, 181 and 423)

Though a man who in desperate situations took desperate means to achieve his ends, Kopperunjinga seems to have been a person with a prick of conscience. That is the redeeming feature in the man's character. Thus, in one of his inscriptions, we see him making expiation for having killed kāṣaṇ Harihara and other Hoysala generals in the battle at Perantalur (before his 10th regnal year) and for having seized by force their ladies and treasure. The expiatory act consisted in offering a gift to the Śiva temple at Vṛddhāchalaiu in the South Arcot District. The gift consisted of a golden forehead plate set up with jewels, which was called Araṇḍalappirandāu. It was to be placed according to the record on the image of the god with the chanting of a Sanskrit verse given in it. (M E R 1918 Appendix C No 73 of 1918) The devastation that should have taken place owing to the wars of this period should have been great quite apart from the low standards of political morality and warfare that prevailed—a sorry lapse from the standards of Manu followed during the days of the early Pallavas. Thus we are told in an undated record of the times of Sakalabhuvana-chakravartin Kopperunjingadēva found at Ākkur in the Muyavaram Taluk of the Tanjore District that one Alagiya Pallavar alias Virapratapar (apparently a connection of the reigning king who had fought against the Hoysalas and kept them in confinement and levied tribute from the Pāndyas) performed a pilgrimage of the sacred places along the Chōḷa country to which he returned after the warfare he had engaged in. He is said to have carried out necessary repairs to all the temples visited by him (they should have gone into decay) and made tax free all the

The better side of his nature.

Anarchy at its height. Revolt of Koppernūjunga, 5th to 16th regnal years

The successive stages by which this position was actually reached in the reign of Rājārāja III are not yet fully clear. But various inscriptions belonging to it thus broadly indicate the position —

Regnal year	Equivalent A D	Contents of Record indicating the position
5th year	1221 A D	Disturbances in the country Battle of Tellāru
6th „	1222 „	Gift for the welfare of the king
11th „	1227 „	Disturbances in the country
14th „	1230 „	Property of ārōhins (or rebels) confiscated
16th „	1232 „	Trouble in the country King kidnapped by Koppernūjunga and confined by him in the Sēndamaṅgalaṁ Fortress Released under the orders of Hoysala king Vīra Nūrasimha II by his two generals
23rd „	1239 „	Prostrations to god for the welfare of the king

The course of the revolt

According to an inscription dated in the 19th year of Rājārāja III, there were disturbances (duritamgal in Tamil) in the country during the 5th, 11th and 16th regnal years as the result of which the title deeds of the inhabitants of certain villages were lost and had to be renewed in their favour. The “disturbances” of the 5th year can only refer to the first signs of the coming revolt. (M E R 1925, Para 24, Appendix B No 213 of 1925). In the 16th regnal year, gifts of land were made for the welfare of the king. (M E R 1918, Para 41, Appendix B No 245 of 1917). In view of the political conditions of the time, this cannot be interpreted as a mere expression wishing prosperity to the king in the conventional manner, but something more. As a matter of fact, an inscription found at Vayalūr (North Arcot District), which though undated, must be held to refer to the incidents that should have occurred in the 5th and 6th regnal years of Rājārāja, confirms this view. It is stated in the inscriptions that must have been the Kākatiyas who had occupied the Tondai (Pallava) country during the time of Ganapati after taking Kānchi. They should have been actually driven out by Perunjunga's son and pursued as far as Draksharūpa, in the Godavari District, where he set up inscriptions enlogising his father's exploits. This inference is confirmed by an epigraph at Atti (in the Arcot District). This record states that Pallavandār killed a very large number of his enemies at Sevur and created mountains of dead bodies and swelling rivers of blood. Sevur has been identified with Mol Sevur in the Tindivanam Taluk of South Arcot District. (M.E.R. 1913 Para 66)

The episode of Kopperunjunga typifies the character of Rājarāja's rule. One portion of his kingdom was broken up apparently into petty principalities which had got into the hands of chiefs who set up independent rule some going to the extent of giving themselves the royal titles of Sakalabhuvana-chakravartin (as Perunjunga did) Sakaladīśchakravartin (as Rājanārāyana Sāmbuvarāya did) and even Tribhuvanashchakravartin (as Vijaya-gandagōpādēva did) and began to use their own regnal years ignoring the reigning Chōla sovereign and his royal era. There is reason to suspect that these three different families claimed descent from the Pallavas, were inter-related to one another and ruled contemporaneously over parts of the northern Chōla territories, forming parts of the present Chingleput and North Arcot Districts. The title Alappirandān is, indeed, assumed by Rājarāja Sāmbuvarāya which in its enlarged form of Avanī Alappirandān we know to be the title of Kopperunjunga's family (M.E.E. 1913 Para 65 Appdx B No 308). Perunjunga's family appears to have lasted for at least three generations he himself ruling so far as at present known during a period of 36 years. Sāmbuvarāya's

The significant episode of the Kopperun-
junga episode.

Cauvery referred to frequently in Perunjinga's inscriptions) must have taken place between A D 1222-1224. The first defeat of Rājaiāja III by Kopperunjinga should have occurred accordingly about the 5th and 6th regnal years. The gift for the welfare of the king in the 6th regnal year was probably in recognition of his liberation after the fight at Tellānu. In the 11th regnal year there were again disturbances in the country, set up again by his feudatories (M E R 1925, Para 24, Appendix B No 213 of 1925). In the 14th regnal year, the disturbances of the previous years having been successfully suppressed, at least to some extent, severe measures were taken against the seditionaries. According to an inscription of that year, the lands belonging to certain persons, who were the declared enemies of the State (dīōhins, they are called) were sold by public auction to the highest bidders in the name of the king. These lands were purchased by some private persons on payment of 33,000 Kāsu to the Royal treasury (M E R 1911, Para 30, Appendix C No 112 of 1911). This, however, appears to have had little or no effect on the would-be insurrectionaries.

The revolt and its probable object

In the 16th regnal year, an outbreak occurred which ended in the king being taken prisoner by Kopperunjinga, who secured him in his own fortress at Sēdamangalam in the present South Arcot District. What the object of this coup de main was is not definitely stated in the inscriptions of the period, but there can be little doubt that he wanted to do away with the king and make himself sovereign in his place. An inscription in the Vishnu temple at Tiruvēndipuram, near Cuddalore, in the South Arcot District, where the incident took place, contains an interesting account of how Rājaiāja's release was effected (M E R 1902, Appendix B. No 142 of 1902). It is dated in the 16th year of the Para 93 No 106 of 1922) Sīyan Pallavan alias Rājānarāyana-chaimbuvarāyan and Kulasekhara chaimbuvarayan figuring in a record of the 25th year of the Pāndya king Vira Iādya. Ibid No 190 of 1923) This Rājānarāyana should be distinguished from the later chief of the same name who ascended the throne in Saṭa 1260 and is mentioned below (See for particulars of other chiefs of this family U E R 1922 para 60) Rājānarāyana Sāmbuvarāya one of these seems to have succeeded (see M E R 1800 No 30) to the throne in Saṭa 1260-61 (A D 1338) and several inscriptions of his dated in 5th 6th 7th 12th 14th and 19th regnal years have been so far traced (M E R 1913 Appdx B Nos. 203 207 212 276 and 410 also U E R 1911 Appdx B Nos 285 286 287 and 298.) His 19th regnal would fall into 1357 A D which would take us into the beginnings of the first Vijayanagar dynasty. There was another Sakalalukochakravartin Rājānarāyana who was ruling in or about 1350 A D. He was different from the one mentioned above as having come to the throne in 1338 A D (See U E R 1926 para 41) Vijayagondagōpaladeva was another chief who affected independence. There is no doubt that his family also ruled over tracts of the country included in North Arcot and Chingleput from the times anterior to Rājārāja III Sāmbuvarāyan Pallavāndor mentioned in a record of Rājārāja III (M E R 1913 Appendix B No 106) is probably identical with prince Rājārāja Sāmbuvarāyar who takes the title of Ālappirandān (U E R 1913 Appendix B No 303) This Rājārāja Sāmbuvarāyar is described as the son (pillaiyār) of Tribhuvanachakravartin Vijaya Gandagōpālādēva who began to rule over Kānchi and the surrounding country in 1250 A D and continued at least to his 26th year i.e. 1276 A D (M.E.R 1910-11 Para 15 U E R 1913 Para 65 Appdx B No 39 M E R 1906 para 7) Another Mādhusudana Vijaya gandagōpāla is known (M.E R 1923 Para 91 Appdx C, shall not be blown unless I shall have maintained my reputation of being the establisher of the Chōla kingdom' He started from Dvāīasamudra, uprooted the Magara kingdom, (opposite to Srīangam) seized him (the ruler of that kingdom), his women and treasures, and halted at Pachchur There the king was pleased to order 'Destroy the country of Kopperunjinga and liberate the Chōla emperor'

The Story as told in the inscriptions.

This order was issued to two of his officers named Appanna-Dannāyaka and Samudra-Gōpayya-Dannāyaka, who thus describe how they carried out their master's command, incidentally giving the route by which they marched —

"We destroyed the villages of Ellēri and Kalliyūrmūlai (in the Chidambaram Taluk), where Kopperunjinga was staying, and Toludagaiyū where Sōlakon was staying, killed among the king's officers Vīra-Gang-nād-ālvān and Chinattarāyan, with four others, including Parākiamabāhu, the king of Ceylon, seized their horses and seized the horses of Kolli-Sōlakon. Having worshipped the god of Ponnambalam (Chidambaram), we started again, destroyed rich villages including Tondaimānallūr (Tondaimānattam in Cuddalore Taluk) and other places, caused forest to be cut down and halted at Tnuppādaripuliyū (Tnupapuliyū included now in Cuddalore town) We destroyed Tiruvadigai (Tiruvadi), Tiruvakkari (Tiruvakkarai in Villapuram Taluk) and other villages, burnt and destroyed the sea-port towns on the coast and the drinking channels to the south of the Varanavasi river and to the east of Sēdamangalam, and seized and plundered the women When we advanced against Sēdamangalam, and were going to encamp there, Kopperunjinga became full of fear and submitted to the king (Vīra-Nārasimha) that he would release the Chōla emperor As the king agreed and despatched a messenger to us, we liberated the Chōla emperor, went with him and let him enter his kingdom" (E I VII 160-9)

As suggested above, this inscription must have been engraved at the instance of the two generals who thus describe their successful mission, and the place at which the tracts of country in which the central authority had broken down and had been replaced by the rule of petty chiefs who proved themselves incapable against the organized and disciplined troops of the north (See below)

The rule of Rājārāja III accordingly extended only to parts of the old empire he inherited. Even in Tanjore and Trichinopoly, his records are few. Apparently the Sāmbavarayas had displaced him over the greater part of these two districts. The administrative routine however was still in vogue. The village assembly was in working order. An inscription of his reign dated in his 16th year found at Sembiyanmahadevi (Negapatam Taluk Tanjore District) gives us the interesting information that the village assembly ambaluni was meeting both in the day time and at nights for deliberating on affairs connected with the village administration and matters relating to taxes, etc., and that as this involved expenditure of oil for lamps and torches in excess of the quantity sanctioned by the Sabha, it was ordered that the assembly should meet only during day time. Such a commendable step in the retrenchment of avoidable charges shows the good sense with which the rural assemblies appear to have worked during the thirteenth century (M.E.R. 1926 Para 20 Appdx B No. 500). The disturbed nature of the times is indicated by an inscription at Nidur Tanjore District which discloses the steps taken by the village assembly of the place to put down the illegal exactions indulged in at the time. The village assembly convened a big meeting of the nāttār kutumbur and karaiyār in one of its temples and passed resolutions fixing the rates at which certain taxes should be levied. This indicates the extensive powers they enjoyed. It was also stipulated that none but those ruling should demand taxes from them, that they should

Administration in Rājārāja's time.

servant Appanna),—can such chiefs compare with reputa-Thus having received the Kodagi-mānyas, obtained the He his valour and secured it as if with the fist of a kingdom.
 Ballēya-Nayaka (i.e., Appanna), made grants to the of that god Machēsvara " hchur try of Kopperunjin-ga's confederates

Kopperunjinga's confederates appear to have been many. There were with him in the rebellion Sōlaku Viṇaganganādālvān, and Chinattarāyan, besides several other officers including Parākrama Bāhu described as "the king of Ceylon." Sōlakon alias Perumāl Pillai of Aragui was apparently Perunjinga's representative at Chidambaram, where in the Natarāja shrine he is mentioned in several inscriptions dated in the 3rd, 5th, 8th, 11th, 16th and 34th regnal years of Sakalabhuvanachakravartin Kopperunjingadēva as issuing orders.
 (M E R 1903, Para 4, Appendix A Nos 459 to 490 and Nos 463 to 468 of 1902). He appears to have been succeeded in his post by his younger brother Vēnadudaiyān, two of whose orders are referred to in two inscriptions in the same place dated in the 34th and 36th regnal years of Kopperunjingan (Ibid Nos 456 and 461). Who Parākrama Bāhu, the Ceylon king, was and how he came to be mixed in this confederacy of Chōla chiefs against their sovereign is not quite clear. But it was probably part of the policy of Kopperunjinga, who calls himself
 "the architect in establishing the Pāndya king," to bring in every one who had a grievance against the Chōla king. The Ceylon kings fought in favour of one of the Pāndyan claimants for the Pāndyan throne and the Chōlas had taken the part of the rival claimant in the Pāndyan war of succession. The presence of Parākrama Bāhu on the side of Kopperunjinga against the Chōla king should therefore be deemed natural. During the first portion of the reign of Rājārāja III, Ceylon was ruled by king Magha from 1215-1236 A D. While Magha was still king, the Singhalese prince Vijaya Bāhu III result that the income of the temple went up to 2 000 Aekems of paddy (M.E.R. 1918 Para 11 Appdx C No. 1 of 1918) The cause of the distress in this particular case is not known In a record of the 6th regnal year coming from Kul Tirumulam (Nannilam Taluk Tenjore District) we have it specifically stated that the persons holding the lands belonging to the local temple expressed their inability to pay the taxes and the prevailing rates and requested their revision This apparently was agreed to the lands being resumed and given over to the same temple on a favourable tenure or by excusing the payment of the dues altogether (Ibid Appdx B No. 215 of 1917)

The administration of criminal justice seems to have gone on the established lines We have a few more instances in this reign of how accused in case of death involving rashness or negligence on their part were dealt with In the case of a death caused by an indiscreet act of the accused the uncle of the latter was ordered to expiate the sin by a gift of lands made to the local temple for burning a perpetual lamp in it (M.E.R. 1918 Para 22, Appdx C No 33) In another case where a man was wrongly punished in a quarrel that ensued in connection with an alleged right to use water for irrigation purposes by a village, his son was given land as udirappatti in the 39th year of Kulōttunga Chōla III In the 20th year of Rājārāja III, the land having been found to be of an unproductive character the man was granted certain concessions This shows incidentally the care that was bestowed at the time on irrigation facilities and the zealous manner in which rights relating to water were conserved and protected (M.E.R. 1925 Para 24 Appdx B No 406 of 1925)

Administration of criminal justice.

As might be expected the troublous nature of the times could not have permitted an active policy in regard to

Erection of public buildings.

while, it is common ground that, so far, no inscriptions that are attributable to No (3) who is mentioned as the son of No (2), have been found. As a matter of fact, all the inscriptions so far discovered of Kopperunjinga refer to him as Sakalabhuvana-chakravartin, except the Tripurāntakam inscription which gives him the name of Mahārājasimha (Sānskrit for Kopperunjinga) and furnishes further two new titles Sarvajnakhadgamalla and Nissankamalla. It has, however, been generally admitted that this inscription refers to Kopperunjinga (No 2 above), while the Drākshārāma inscription prefixes the title Sakalabhuvanachakravartin to Mahārājasimha and gives the other name of Avanyavanōdbhara as well. This confirms the identification first suggested by Dr Hultzsch, of the Kopperunjinga (No 2 above) of the Tiruvannāmalai inscription with the Mahārājasimha of the Tripurāntakam inscription. A careful scrutiny of all the inscriptions relating to Kopperunjinga will show that the suggestion that Alagiya-Siyan should be treated as Kopperunjinga I and that certain of the inscriptions should be treated as pertaining to him is not proven. The plain fact seems to be that all the inscriptions refer only to one Kopperunjinga, and that to No 2 above who had different titles to his credit (like many a Chōla king), that his father Alagiya-Siyan was probably a petty chief before his more famous son won his spurs, that the title of Kūdal Avanyālappiranda, distinctively suggesting that one not born a king had, as it were, become king, because he was destined to rule the earth, had been assumed by him and that he had a son, (No 3 above) who also won some fame as a general and helped to drive the northern invaders out and make better known his father's adventurous career by the Tripurāntaka and the Drākshārāma inscriptions.

His rule over the usurped territory,
A D , 1213-
1279

Kopperunjinga thus was the son of a certain Alagiya-Siyan, apparently a petty subordinate of the Chōlas, and his wife Silāvati. Alagiya-Siyan is called in the Tripurāntakam inscription Jiyamahīpati, which may be taken as the Sānskritised form of his name (M.E.R. 1906, Para 5). It is possible he might have carved out for himself a small principality by the conquest of the Kūdal (or Cuddalore) country. (See M.E.R.

concerned. An inscription dated in the 7th regnal year accordingly records an order of Vira Narasimhadēva Yādavarāya one of the chief administrative officers of the king that Tiruvorriyur and other villages of the temple which had originally been tax free were to be taxed the collections however being made payable into the coffers of the temple. (M.E.R. 1913 Para 4 Appdx. B No 199 of 1912) A list of the taxes levied is also given from which it would seem that there was an extensive system of profession taxes—such as taxes on drummers, weavers on the looms, oil mongers dyers manufacturers of salt, etc. etc. Vira Narasimhadēva the officer above named, appears to have built a shrine in the temple at Tiruvorriyur and to have dedicated it to Vira Narasimhēsvara after himself in the 9th regnal year or two years after the Royal visit to it. (Ibid Appdx. B No 227 of 1912) He also carried out repairs to the famous temple on the Tirumalai hill at Tirupati. (See above)

It was probably during this reign that Kamban the Tamil poet, flourished at Tiruvannainallur in the South Arcot District. His name is coupled with that of Sadaiyappavallāl a local chief, who appears to have been his patron. As the ruling Chola king whose subordinate he was is not known he may be set down to the decadent period of Chōla rule—probably Rājārāja III when a good portion of South Arcot passed on into the hands of Kopperunjina and other chiefs. (See above) At Tiruvannainallur and about the same time (say 1250 A.D.) there lived Mykundadēvar the well known translator of the Siragnānabōtham. He is stated to have been the grandson of Sadaiyappa, the patron of Kamban (M.E.R. 1922 Para 11) The spread of Vaishnavism about the same time is marked by the popularity won by the hymns of the Vaishnava Ālvāra. Those of Nammalvār seem to have been regularly sung on the 5th day of the activities of the Reign.

Literary

District, on the south bank of the Coleroon These establish the fact that his dominion encroached southward beyond that river even into the Tanjore District Perunjinga also built fortifications on the northern bank of the Cauvery during his encounters with Kannadiyas (i.e., Hoysalas) It is not impossible that his march to the south of the river and his eventual occupation of the country there, as suggested by the discovery of his inscriptions at Shiyāli, was the result of his encounter with the Hoysalas. (M E R 1919, Para 46, Appendix B Nos 367, 391, 394 and 395 of 1918). His conquest of Cuddalore and the adjoining country of Chidambaram secured for him a title connecting his name with the Kūdal (at Cuddalore) These conquests were evidently the cause of Nārasimha's advance on Sīrangam between 1222-24 A D, for he was averse to an interloper like Kopperunjinga aggrandizing himself while he himself could easily annex them to his own dominions at the expense of the Chōla king Rājaraṇja III A pretext was ready at hand, in that Rājaraṇja was a relation, by marriage, of his, and he had been set at naught by a feudatory of his own About the year 1221 A D, or so, Kopperunjinga was practically undisputed ruler of a good part of the Chōla kingdom Besides Chingleput and South Arcot Districts, he was endeavouring to absorb parts of Tanjore and Trichinopoly Districts As Tiruvadi was the scene of a battle between the forces of Kopperunjinga and Hoysala Nārasimha II, it may be taken for granted that Kopperunjinga had extended his conquests up to that place (E I II, 260-9, M E R 1921-22, Para 9) His next adventure was doubtless to usurp the Chōla kingdom itself, if possible by kidnapping and imprisoning the king and his ministers His first attempt in this direction ended at Tellāru, as we have seen above. Rājaraṇja III was liberated by the Hoysala king, who also re-conquered the country round the Cauvery, which Kopperunjinga

a lamp. This must have been evidently issued by Gandag-pāla Madhurāntakan Pottappuchchilan, an administrative officer of Rājārāja III. As the coins are mentioned in an inscription of Kulottunga III as well he must have been an officer of that king also (M E R 1913 Para 42 p 112 Appendix B No 561 and 562, dated in the 23rd and 19th years of Rājārāja III also No. 560 dated in the 3rd year of Kulottunga III). The coin Gandagopillanmūḍai is mentioned in another inscription (M E R 1923, Para 91 Appendix B No 433 dated in the 20th year of Vijayagandagopāladēva). It has been suggested that this was struck by one Madhusudanadēva Vijayagandagopāla whose inscriptions range from his 6th to 26th year (Ibid M E R 1923, Para 91). Probably it was a different coin—for it is called Mūḍai and not pūḍu mūḍai.

It is not definitely known when Rājārāja III died though an inscription of his dated in his 41st year proves he should have lived at least down to 1257 A.D. It is just possible that he was assassinated in or about that year by his brother Rājendra-Chōla III who in his Lopika inscription boastfully describes himself as 'the cunning hero who killed Rājārāja after making him wear the double crown for three years. As suggested by Mr H. Krishna Sastri this record shows Rājendra-Chōla III as a crafty and ambitious prince 'who treacherously murdered his predecessor Rājārāja III three years after securing for him the two crowns—perhaps those of the Pāndya and the Kōrala' (M E R 1912, Para 32 Appendix B No 420 of 1911).

Possible end of Rājārāja

During his period of rule, the Chōla power was practically broken up. The descendants of the old Pallava power who had held subordinate posts under the Chōlas saw their opportunity and virtually superseded the Chōla

Character of
his rule

Tripurāntakam inscription he has besides the titles of Sarvajña Khadgamalla and Nissankamalla. With his title Sakalabhuvanachakravartin, we may compare the Sakalōkachakravartin by Rājanāiāyana Sāmbavarāya (M E R 1913, Appendix B Nos 194, 203, 207, 273, 410, etc.), Sarvabhaumachakravartin of the Hoysala king Vīra-Rāmanātha (M E R 1914, No 46 of 1913) and Tribhuvanachakravartin of the Chōla kings. Seeing that his inscriptions run from his 2nd year to his 36th year, he must have ruled from 1243 to 1279 A.D. This overlaps the reigns of Rājaiāja III (1216-1257 A.D.) and Rājēndra-Chōla III (1246-1268 A.D.), and ends fully half a century (to be exact, 53 years) before we hear of the next Chōla princeling Tribuvanachōladēva, of whom we get a first glimpse in 1332 A.D., when the earliest kings of the new Vijayanagar dynasty were about to open their rule. Kopperunjinga's declaration of independence was thus one of the contributory causes of the eclipse that the Chōla power sustained in the last quarter of the 13th century A.D.

Character of
his rule.

Though a political adventurer, rebel and usurper, Kopperunjingadēva, as he calls himself throughout his inscriptions, seems to have been an able soldier and a good administrator. He claims in his Tripurāntakam record to have destroyed the pride of the Karnāta (i.e., the Hoysala) king (i.e., after his own defeat at Tellāru and Sēdamangalam), to have been "the sun to the lotus-tank of the Chōla family" (i.e., before he rebelled) and "the architect in establishing the Pāndyan king" (referring perhaps to Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya, who was his contemporary as mentioned in an inscription at Chidambaram, No 332 of 1913—See M E R 1914, Para 2). The country under him should have been well governed, for his records show a precision and orderliness in administration which speak well of him and his subordinates. They testify to the regularity with which grants chiefs appears to have been Jayangonda Chola Ilavanji rayan who is termed a Muditar which signifies that he should have been a man of some importance at the Chola court. (P. C. & Kular 221 Mulbagal 215) His inscriptions have been assigned by Mr. Rice to Circa 1220 A.D. He may be the same as Maralvār, as palaeographically his inscriptions are not far removed from those of Kuttandan Devar described as the son of Maralvār. Next we have Kuttandan-devar just mentioned whose dated inscriptions belong to 1225 A.D. (Ibid Mulbagal 53 and 56a) His wife was Bengandai (Ibid Mulbagal 70) who is probably identical with Sangālvār daughter of Vasudeva the Nalambadaraya of Vamanād (Ibid Mulbagal 73) Like other chiefs of this reign he lays claim to independent rule in some of his inscriptions dated in 1228 A.D. (Ibid Bowringpet 30b) He describes himself as "ruling the earth" an euphemism for pretended independence. In A.D. 1231 we have mention of Tekkal rayan or Sembondayug. In an inscription dated in 1231 A.D. (whose original is not available) we have mention made of Rājadhīrāja maharaya ruler of the Kanchivamsa Maharaya Viraraya's son, Yalavanjiraya, restoring and liberally endowing the Sūmesvara temple at Mulbagal (Ibid Mulbagal 18) Then we have in 1254 A.D. a reference to Vāsudevan or Jayangonda Chola Ilavanji rayan (Ibid Mulbagal 61) He was apparently the son of Kuttandum (Ibid Mulbagal 178) His wife was Sottulvar daughter of Selvandai (Ibid Bowringpet 32) He is described as ruling over the earth (Ibid Bowringpet 37b) Apparently he was wholly independent of the reigning Chōla king. Anticipating a little it might be added that in 1268 A.D. we have another Kuttandan son of Nayan Venjandai and in 1269 A.D. we have Ilaiya (or junior) Vāsudevar his son ruling the earth. These inscriptions fall into the last year of the reign of Rājendra Chola III when the Chōla power was wholly of the goddess Sivakāmi-Amman, is recorded the fact that these pillars were placed there by Sōlakon for the merit of his master Avaniyālappirandān Kopperunjingadēva. The Tripurāntakam inscriptions state that Mahārājasimha (i.e., Kopperunjinga) built the eastern gōpura of the Chidambaram temple and decorated the four sides of it with "the booty acquired by subduing the four quarters" (see above). The east and west gōpuras are very richly carved and bear on their inner walls five specimens of images of which a large number illustrate the various dancing postures connected with the name and fame of Natarāja, the presiding deity of the Chidambaram temple. They are particularly interesting, in the opinion of Mr. H. Krishna Sāstri, on account of the descriptive verses engraved in Grantha characters above them. A more remarkable fact about them is that they illustrate all the 108 postures of dancing mentioned in the Bhāratīya Nāṭya-Sāstra (Chapter IV, vv. 33 to 53). An illustrated account of the postures will be found by the interested reader in M.E.R. 1914, 4 Plates facing page 82. Kopperunjinga's son, whose gifts of ornaments are found recorded at Tiruvannāmalai (M.E.R. 1903, Appendix A. No. 480 of 1902), together with a reference to the buildings he erected at that place, claims in the same inscription to have "driven the Telungar to the north, so that they might perish in the north." It may be, as Mr. Venkayya has suggested, that he fought against the Kākatīyas, who, during the time of Ganapati, had apparently taken possession of Kānchi, (I.A. XXI, 197) and that he drove them back to the north. In this case, he must be one of those who took advantage of the weakness of the Kākatīyas subsequent to the death of Ganapati (See M.E.R. 1906, Para 6, also Paras 43-44). Two other members of his family were Kūdal Ālappirandān Mōgan alias Kādavarāyan and his elder brother Kūdal Ālappuandān Arasanāiāyan.

inscription dated in his 5th year describes him as ' who was pleased to wear the hereditary crown and revive the family of Manu (M & R 1909 Para 52 Appendix B No 278 of 1923) He appears to have been co-regent of his brother from A D 1246 He was a cotemporary of the Hoysala king Vira Sōmēśvara, who was his uncle (Kielhorn Southern Inst No 865) During his reign the Pāṇḍyan aggression continued, with the result that the Pāṇḍyan sway became general throughout the Chōla empire. The Chōla empire may therefore be said to have practically come to an end during this reign

His Srirangam (7th regnal year) Lepāka (10th regnal year) and Tripurāntakam (15th regnal year) inscriptions furnish a list of his virudas (or titles) which throw some light on certain features of his reign (M & R 1912 Appendix B No 420 M & R 1892 No 64 of 1892 M & R 1906 Para 24 No 201 of 1905) The first two describe him as a great hero a very Rāma (in destroying) the northern Lanka, which was renowned to be the abode of Virarākshasas (great heroes) the elevator of the race of Manu the terror of his enemies on the battle-field the chastiser of those who despised the Chōla family the cunning hero who killed Rājarāja after making him wear the double crown for three years the subduer of the Pāṇḍyas and the Kōṛalas, the plunderer of the Pāṇḍya country (the hero) whose sword was clever in cutting off the crowned head of the Pāṇḍya king he who placed his feet on the jewelled crown of the Pāṇḍya who was death itself to the Kārṇāṭa kings, who drowned the vigour of the Kālī age in the ocean and on whose leg Vira Sōmēśvara the wrestler on hill forts (giriḍurga malla) placed (with his own hands) the anklet of heroes. His full name and titles are thus given Mahārājādhirāja Tribhuvana-chakravartin Rājēndrachōlādēva who took the crowned heads of two Pāṇḍya kings and was

An eulogy of
his reign

lands belonging to them. It would appear he camped at a village (name lost) on his way, and observed that the tenants had migrated from the villages leaving their lands waste, probably, owing to the unbearable taxation imposed on them. As we know, wai taxes were not unknown in those days. Their incidence should have proved far too intolerable to induce cultivators to leave their homes and migrate even, we are told, as far as the Ganges. Alagiya Pallavar, it is added, remitted all the arrears of taxes due from them and invited them to return home and take possession of their belongings. He also appears to have got the lands demarcated anew by cutting the (old) boundaries. The events mentioned above should have occurred after the defeat of the Hoysalas at Perambalūr already adverted to. The repairs of the temples and re-migration of people to their lands should accordingly have taken place in or about the year 1260 A D, when the ruling Hoysala king was Vīra-Sōmēsvara, whose capital was at Kannanūr, near Srīrangam, and when Kopperunjinga was still alive. (See M E R 1925, Paa 26, Appendix B No. 229 of 1925). This Perunjinga ruled the Pallava country and hence called himself Pallavāndār. He may be taken to have attempted the resuscitation of the Pallava power on the decadence of the Chōla Empire. He appears to have had three sons. One of them drove out the Telugu invaders to the north "so that they may perish there" (Tiruvannāmalai record, No 480 of 1902 quoted above). Whether this son can be identified with Sōla-kon or Sōla-konar, of the Chidambaram and other inscriptions is not yet definitely ascertained. He is called Pallavāndār alias Kadavaiāyai in another inscription. Then, we have another son of his, Nīlagangaraiyan, mentioned in an inscription of the 14th year of Kopperunjinga, the usurper. He calls himself also as Nīla-Ganga of Amui. (E I VII 166, M A R. 1909 Para 19). The Telugars said to have been defeated

to have obtained for his brother and predecessor two crowns—those of the Pāndya and Kerala kings—and to have assassinated him three years after his securing them to him. It has to be presumed that the fight which ended in the deaths of the Pāndya and Kerala kings should have occurred while Rājārāja III was still king. If it had occurred just before his 7th year—the year of the Srirangam prasasti—it would fall in the year 1253-4 A.D. as Rājendra's initial year was 1246 A.D. As Rājārāja III lived down to the year 1257 A.D. the third year prior to his assassination would be 1253-54 A.D. It would thus seem that the Pandyan campaign should have ended in about 1251 A.D.

It was apparently in connection with the Pandyan war that Rājendra Chola III had the active help of Vira Sōmēśvara II the Hoysala king though the latter clausus in A.D. 1237 (E C V Arsikere 123) that he uprooted Rājendra-Chōla in battle but gave him protection when he claimed refuge. In this year we hear of Vira Sōmēśvara being engaged in a victorious expedition against the Kadava Raya, i.e. one of the Kopperunjinga's family. Vira Nārasimha was encamped in 1234 A.D. at Ravatidāna-kuppa, while on an advance against the Pāndya king apparently in aid of the Chōja king Rājendra III. The sea roared out it would appear with the sounds of great fish, sharks and alligators saying to the Pandya king—give up all and live in peace as his (i.e. Vira Nārasimha's) friends. It will thus be seen that there was an earlier conflict with the Pāndyas in 1237 A.D. when Rājendra apparently being attacked by the Pāndyas, sought the aid of Vira-Sōmēśvara and put them down. A record of 1240 A.D., from Kadur states that he was marching against Gandagōpāla. This is evidently a reference to the conflict with the Pāndyas that occurred in 1237 A.D. (E C VI. Kadur 100). The later conflict

Relations
with the Hoysalas.

family seems to have lasted even longer, counting from the days of Kulōttunga-Chōla III. Scions of this family appear to have emigrated to the Kalinga country as early as the times of Kulōttunga-Chōla I and Vikrama-Chōla, for we hear of Periya and Cheriya Sāmbuvarāya in about the 12th century A D in the Guntur District (M.E R. 1918, Para 79). At the same time, in their homelands, according to an inscription dated in the 11th year of Vikrama-Chōla, they appear to have wielded considerable influence. An early member of the family was Sengeni Sumbugarājan Nālāyiravan Ammaiappan alias Rājēndra sōla-chambugarājan, who had his residence at Mannuruppal (Mannur) in Oyma-nādu (M.E R. 1923, Para 92, Appdx No 422 of 1922). He is said to have constructed many tanks with sluices, reclaimed waste lands and brought them under cultivation, and built numerous temples and carried out many other acts of charity. The title Nālāyiravan suggests that he should have been the Commander of 4,000 troops, who appear to have been known by the names of Vikrama-sōlan-Taya-Vēlakkārāi and Minanvanai-Venkadai, the latter of which suggests some conflict with the Pāndyas in which they should have been victorious (M.E R. 1923, Appdx. B No 389 of 1922, M.E R. 1919, No 234 of 1919). A lieutenant of Sengeni was one Akalanka-Chambavarāya who made some gifts at Madhurāntakan in the 15th year of Vikrama-Chōla. He had the title of Akalanka Sengeni's grandson Mindan Siyan Ammaiappan alias Edūlisōlachatrbuvarāya, and made over certain taxes to the temple at Tiruvedumalai built by his grandfather (M.E R. 1923, No. 421 of 1922). The gifts are recorded in an inscription of the 15th year of Rājārāja II. Mindan Siyan's son is probably referred to as Alagiyaśiyan (alias Alagiyaśīla-Chambuvadiar) in another inscription of Rājārāja II, also dated in his 15th year. Other members of the family were Tirubhuvanachamburāyan (M.E R. 1926,

In keeping with this is his boast in his Tiruchchattangudi inscription that he was the solo hero among the Vadugas i.e. the Northerners or people of the Telugu country. Further discoveries of his inscriptions in the Cuddapah and Kurnool Districts is likely to add to our knowledge of the extent of his conquests in the Northern Districts which may have extended as far as Rajahmundry near where must be located the place called Uttara Lanka referred to in the Tiruchchattangudi inscription (M.E.R. 1913 Para 43 Appendix C No 77 and No 49)

It has been suggested, on the basis of the above evidence, that the object of Rājendra Chōla's northern campaign was to crush the descendants or allies of Perunjingadeva, whose conquests as we have seen had extended as far as Draksharāma in the Godāvāri District. It was the success of Perunjinga both in his own territories and outside of it that proved the discomfiture of Rājārāja III. Rājendra Chōla seems to have made a supreme effort to retrieve the reputation of the Chōlas. The attribute Cholakula paribhava nirdharana vikrama confirms this view of Rājendra's endeavours. His cutting off the crowned heads of two Pāndya kings suggests the re-establishment of his sway over the south. That he was a bitter foe of the Harāhita (Hayasala) king Sōmēsvara, is equally clear. In certain records Sōmēsvara accordingly receives the title of Māma Sōmēsvara hāladanda, i.e. the hostile rod of death to uncle Sōmēsvara. In one record we are told that Vira-Sōmēsvara was so thoroughly humbled that he was compelled to put on Rājendra Chōla's leg, with his own hands, the anklet of heroes. In another record we see mentioned certain of the ministers and officers of Sōmēsvara engaged in a temple enquiry in the dominions of Rājendra-Chōla III (M.E.R. 1913, Para 43 Appendix C No 49). This indicates that the power of Rājendra was recognised by the Object of the Northern

conquests.

No. 196 of 1923). He renamed Uttiramerur as Ganda-gōpāla-chaturvēḍimangalam. He claims Pallava descent and styles himself a Mahāmandalēsvara. He is probably identical with the son of Tṛipūāntaka who makes a gift of land in the 18th year of his reign (M E R. 1896, No 15 of 1896). This Tṛipurāntaka should be the same as the minister of Chōla Tikka (No 34 of 1893) identified by M_r V Venkayya with Madhurāntaka Pottappichōlan Manumasittarasan Tṛukkallattidēvai (See M E R 1922, Para 59). Another son of Vijaya-gandagōpāla is mentioned in another inscription (M E R 1913, Para 65, Appdx B No 117). This prince's name appears to have been Panchanadivana Nilagangarayyar. His senior queer was Perumāl Nachchi. In this connection, it deserves to be pointed out that Madhurāntaka Pottappi-Chōla was the surname both of Vijaya-Gandagōpāla and Vira-gandagōpāla, who were the contemporaries of the Pāndya king Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya I, the Hoysala Vira-Sōmēsvara, and the Kākatiya king Gangapati. (M.E.R 1910-11, Para 16, M E R 1913, para 65). Madhurāntaka Pottappichōlan's records appear at Tiruvorriyur. In a record of his 2nd regnal year, at this place, he calls himself Mānava Vijaya. As an inscription of Rājārāja III, dated in his 22nd year, records an order of Mādhurāntaka Pottappi-Chola, it seems as though he partially recognised the suzerainty of the Imperial Chōla sovereign (M E R 1913, para 65, Appdx B No 198 of 1912). This, however, is about the only one inscription of his so far found in which he recognises the imperial authority. The central authority having been thus set at naught, the way was open for the Muhammadan invasion under Mālīk Kāfūr in 1310 A D, whose route lay through Harihar, Halebid, Bangalore and through parts of North Arcot, South Arcot, Chingleput and Madras Districts and thence southwards as far as Madurai and probably a few places beyond (M E R 1913, Para 68). This exactly covered irregular collection of revenue is indicated in one of his epigraphs dated in his 10th year. This epigraph comes from the Tanjore District and registers an undertaking by a man who held land on padai parru (or military tenure) that he would not raise new taxes on it besides what he was normally entitled to (V E R 1926 Para 30 Appendix C No 191 of 1926). Apparently such undertakings had become necessary because of the illegal exactions that holders of land were indulging in during the last period of Chola rule. From another record of his reign (V E R 1926 Para 25 Appendix B No 339 of 1926) dated in his 12th year we learn that owing to the imposition of various taxes (as many as three are mentioned) on the devadāna (temple) lands no tenants came forward to cultivate them and as a consequence the temple fell into disrepair and worship in the temple ceased. The local chief is said to have accordingly remitted the taxes and enabled the resumption of worship in it. That collection of revenue was at the same time brisk and that the village assemblies had a high sense of duty in regard to it are suggested by another epigraph dated in his 28th year. From this epigraph we learn that on the death without leaving any heirs, of a tenant, who had been in arrears for over ten years the local assembly afraid we are told, of the stigma that would be attached to them by the non collection of the dues sold the defaulter's land and met the demand (Ibid No 336 of 1926).

Rājendra Chōla III appears to have ruled up to 1268 A.D. An inscription of his dated in Saka 1268 (A.D. 1346) styles him Mahāmandalēśvara which shows how far his power had gone down (M E R 1918 Para 41 Appendix B No 330 of 1917). The assumed date of this record (Saka 1268) would however give to Rājendra III a reign of 100 years as he ascended the throne in 1246 A.D. (= Saka 1168). This seems doubtful, if not supply transport at the rate of one man for every kāni of land cultivated for carrying the paddy to its destination, and that some other agricultural contingencies should be met in the manner mentioned in the record. The disturbances caused by the wars had not only increased the imposts on the rural taxpayers but also the number of those claiming the right to collect them. No better proof of the weakening of the central authority can be required than this record. A rather informative record from Tukkachchi, dated in 23rd year of Rājarāja III, shows the automatic nature of the arrangements that were in force during the period for the collection of dues by the temples even during times of distress. There were apparently Kāval-Kāniyālais appointed to the places, whose duty it was to lease out the lands and realize the assessment. They appear to have prevented the defaulting tenants from absconding by giving them what was required for their maintenance and personally inquired into the daily requirements of the temple, supplemented its funds so that the fixed scale of expenditure might be met, set up the images required in the temple in order that the usual processions may be conducted, appointed a person to offer prayers for the welfare of the king, appointed priests to offer the fire-sacrifice hōma and ministered to the wants of Brāhmans and Vellālas, who were immigrant settlers in the village. In return for all these good services, the Kāniyālan was given the privilege of entering the temple armed with a bow, of getting one of the privileges (niṁandas) for himself, of receiving half of the emoluments of the person who had to carry the images of the gods in procession and of getting a house within the temple premises and letting it out to any person he chooses. The Kāniyālar of the Tirukkachchi was so successful in his management that he reappointed the servants and brought under cultivation all the lands that had gone out of cultivation in the previous years with the 13 No 51 of 1691 F I III 70) At the place where this inscription is engraved is another of Sundara Pandya and Tikka which are probably of about the same time. There is another inscription of Vira Champa dated in the same year (Saka 1230 = A D 1314) at Tiruvallam (M E R March 1890 Table B No. 3 E I III 70). Here his father is called Chola bhupa whereas in the Kanchi inscription he is named as Vira Chola. The difference is immaterial. Vira Chola may have been his name while Chola bhupa simply describes him as Chola king. Of this Vira Champa we have another inscription at Tiruvottur where he is described as Vira-champarayan (? Vira-champarāyan) alias Sambavarāyan. It is a gift of lamps by him dated in the 12th year of Māravarman Sundara Pāndya identified with the parricide of the same name referred to below (M E R 1900 Para 11 Appx B No. 97 of 1900). A record of Sadagūpavarman (? Jātavarman) Tribhuvanochochravartin Vikrama Pāndya at Tirupukuli near Conjeeveram dated in his 8th year, refers to a gift of land for maintaining a service called Vira-champansandi founded by Sambavarāyan Vira champān the chief of Sambukulo in the temple of Viraraghava Perumal on the Asiksha in the month of Avani in which he was born (M E R 1910 Para 35 Appendix C No 183). In an inscription found at Tiruvadi (South Arcot) dated in 1310 A D, in the 43rd year of the Pāndyan king Māravarman Srivallabha reference is made to the coin Vira-champāpanam, which must have been a copper coin issued by Vira-Champa. (M E R 1922 Para 20 Appendix C No 414 of 1921). These inscriptions show that Vira Champa belonged to the Sambavarāya family and affected semi independence in his own territories. He and Vira Chōla, his father were Chōlas probably by connection but had nothing to do with the reigning family of Chōlas. He must have been the Vira Champa who was captured public works, especially in regard to the construction of temples. A few minor works, however, appear to have been carried out during this reign. Thus, according to an inscription dated in the 7th year of Rājārāja III, found at Tirumalavādi, one Ednisōla Muvendivēlan, built the nritta-mandapa (or dancing hall) in the local Siva temple. The same person appears to have built other mandapas in the local Vishnu temple, and replanned the village and opened a new street filling in a pit in the centre of the village. He is also stated to have protected the village against the inundations of the Kollidam by removing further south the southern embankment. The grateful inhabitants invited the benefactor to live amidst them in a house they presented him with (M.E.R. 1920 Para 23, Appdx C No. 91 of 1920). Certain records of this reign indicate that valuable additions or gifts were made to temples by dancing women and then charities and gifts were recognised by the grant of certain privileges in the temples where they served, e.g., the waving of the chamara or fly whisks before the images during the car festivals, etc (See M.E.R. 1923, Para 43, Appdx C No 183 of 1923 and No. 190 of 1923). Royal favour continued to be bestowed on the great temple at Tiruvorriyur. Following precedent, Rājārāja III appears to have paid a visit to it in his 19th regnal year and attended one of its more famous festivals. He is said to have stayed on the occasion in the Rājārāja-mandapa (M.E.R. 1923, Appdx. B. No 211). The teaching of Pāṇini at this temple was, as we have seen, a special object of solicitude of one of the priests, called the Vyākaranadānabhatta, evidently after god Siva "who gave grammar" to Pāṇini (See above). On a representation made to the king, the local taxes collected at the place were ordered to be paid into the temple instead of into the Royal treasury, as they were considered ningal (deducted or prohibited), so far as the Royal Exchequer was of his was Kodai Ravivarmān evidently a Tiruvad (Travancore) king of Jeytunga nadu who was a subordinate of the Pāndyas. (M.E.R. 1917 Para 8 Appendix B Nos 661 665 and 666) His maternal uncle was Valluvanādālvān apparently the chief of modern Valluvanad in the Malabar District. Whether he was the same as the chief Vira Singan Vikraman alias Vira Rājendra Valluvanādālvān mentioned in other inscriptions of Māravarman Sundara Pāndya I is not clear (M.E.R. 1907, Para 9 Appendix B Nos. 559 to 561) What drove the Pāndyas into the arms of the Cheras was the encroachment of the Chōlas. (See above and also under Chōla Pāndyas) Under Māravarman Sundara Pāndya I (1216 1235 A.D.), the Pāndyas who had been disgraced by the Chōlas invaded the Chōla country and burnt Tanjore and Uraiyur. Māravarman Sundara Pāndya I even conducted the ceremony of anointing the victors and heroes at Mṇḍikondasōlāpuram and bears in his many inscriptions the characteristic attributes who distributed or conquered the Chōla country and who distributed the Chōla country and performed the anointment of victors at Mṇḍikondasōlāpuram (M.E.R. 1916 Para 26 M.E.R. 1917, Paras 8 9 M.E.R. 1919, Para 43 and M.E.R. 1920 Para 32) In his inscriptions up to the 6th year he takes credit for having conquered the Chōla country from the 7th year he takes credit also for its restoration and from the 14th and later years he boasts of the anointment of heroes and victors. This probably indicates the order in which these different events followed one another. To these are added in some inscriptions, the conquest of Kōnga, Ilam (Ceylon) and Karuvur. He was accordingly the first of the mediæval Pāndyas who made a successful incursion into the Chōla country. That he was established in the Chōla country is proved by the fact that he had another capital at Pon Amarāvati the Pāndyan celebration of the marriage festival of Viṣṇu in the temples (See, for example, at Tīrukannapuram, Tanjore District, M E R 1923, Appendix B No 503 of 1922) When hearing these hymns divine, orders were, it is said, issued exempting on certain conditions certain classes of people from the payment of taxes due on their houses (Ibid Para 42) These included the stipulation that they should not sell, mortgage or convey by way of gift their houses without the consent of the sthanikas, (i.e., the temple trustees) They were to have dealings in gold, bell-metal, cloths, etc., on which they were to pay taxes to the temple at the rates fixed by themselves and the temple authorities. (Ibid)

Rājendra Chōla III becomes a Mahāman d īśvara under the Pāndya, A.D. 1268.

Domestic
life

Certain inscriptions of Rājārāja III appear to refer to his sons, though the word pillayār (literally, son) is not free from doubt Thus an inscription of his, dated in his 18th regnal year, refers to his pillayār Gandagōpāla and his wife Jyabhamaladēviyār, and a gift made in the name of the latter to a temple at Kaverippakkam in the Conjeeveram taluk (M E R 1924 Para 23, Appendix B No 410 of 1923) Another inscription of Rājārāja III dated in his 25th year mentions the coin Gandagōpālan-pudumādar whose ascription is doubtful, in view of other Gandagopālas already referred to (See, however, M E R 1924 Para 23, where it is ascribed to this prince) Another son of Rājārāja III is mentioned in an inscription of his whose regnal year has been lost Pillayār Sōlagangadēva mentioned in it is apparently the prince Sōlagangan who often figures in inscriptions issuing orders (ōlar) independently of the ruling sovereign (M E R 1913 Para 42, Appendix B. No 519 of 1912)

Coinage

Several inscriptions of the period mention the gift of one Gandagōpālan-pudumādar, in each case for maintaining the Chola country could not have made much difference to the people as the differences in the system of administration pursued or the life led by the people was not appreciably great. Indeed the predominant features of social and religious culture in the two kingdoms indeed in the greater part of Southern India was the same. Thus we note in an inscription dated in the 5th year of Maravarman Sundara Pāndya I provision being made for the reading of the great epics the Mahābhārata and the Itimāyana and the Purāṇas as well in the presence of the god at Tiruttangal a well known Vaishnavite temple in the present Ramanād District. A provision like that would be as befitting a Vishnu shrine in any part of the Chola kingdom of the time and as inscriptions showing similar provision for the reading of the Vaishnava Prabhandam and the Saiva Nārāyaṇ are too numerous to need particularization. Associated with Maravarman Sundara Pāndya I was Jatavarman Kulaśekhara II who began his reign in 1237 A D. His minister was the above named Noman Uyyaniraduran alias Garakulattariyan. (IA ALI 165 M F R 1923 Para 61 Appendix B No 518 of 1922)

In the reign of Maravarman Sundara Pāndya II (A D 1238 1251) the Pāndyan advance on the Cholas appears to have received a check. Maravarman Sundara Pāndya II was the nephew of Vira Sōmāvara the Hoysala king who thus stood as stated in his own inscriptions as the Mamidi or maternal uncle to him. His mother was probably Paminiyakkan who is referred to in an inscription of his dated in his 9th regnal year (M.E.R. 1912 Para 34, Appendix B Nos. 520 and 527 of 1911). Then we hear of two Pāndyan kings, known as Maravarman Vira Pāndya who came to the throne in 1253 A D and Jatavarman Vira Pāndya who ascended the throne in 1254 A D. Apparently these were influence checked temporarily

Pāndyan

kings from their territories. Much of Chingleput, North Arcot and South Arcot and parts even of Trichinopoly and Tanjore were thus lost to the Chōlas. The Pāndyan encroachment continued. How he was twice beaten on the field by Kopperununga and imprisoned, we have seen above. He had on both the occasions to be restored to liberty by the Hoysala king. That is typical of the low state to which the Chōla power had sunk. In 1258-59 A.D., a year following the close of Rājarāja's reign, one of his chiefs transferred his allegiance to the Pāndyans. This, again, shows the weakness of the Chōlas as a ruling power in the South (M E R. 1925, Para 25, see No. 297 of 1913). Though he reigned long, he proved himself an ineffective and slothful ruler, apparently spending his time in the attending of temple festivals and the hearing of religious songs (M E R 1913, Para 42). He was not more active in administration. The manner in which subordinate chiefs subverted his power and took full advantage of his weakness shows this in unmistakable fashion. The times required a stronger and wiser ruler, more alive to the dangers that surrounded him. No wonder that Rājarāja III succumbed to the powerful forces working against him and thus paved the way for the first Muhammadan inroads into the South. During his reign, the Chōla power practically ceased to exist.

Chōlas in Mysore in the reign of Rājarāja III

During the reign of Rājarāja III, there appear to have ruled over parts of the present Kolar District, a family of chiefs who probably were of mixed Chōla and Pallava descent. Judging from their inscriptions, their influence appears to have been confined to Āvanī, Tekkal and Kurudumalai, though popular tradition attributes to them a general restoration of the temples in the Kolar country. The first of the family, according to one inscription, (C X. Mulbagal 73), was Marālvār, whose identity is yet established. But the most prominent of these i.e., Jains. If so, he must have successfully carried on a crusade against them. But the phrase as it stands means one who cut off the crown and crowned head of the Savaka (king). Probably the land of Savaka (i.e. Jain) or a king of that name is intended to be referred to (M.E.R. 1917 Para 11 Appendix B No 588 of 1916). Vira Pāndya's younger brother was Kulasekhara Kadiyadevar otherwise known as Tiruvēlvali Bhāgavati Alagappermai (M.E.R. 1917, Para 12). A record of Jatāvarma Vira Pāndya dated in his 15th year (=1260 A.D.) attributes to him not only the taking of Ilam Kongu and Sōlamandalam but also mentions a defeat inflicted by him on Vallan (i.e. Vallāla or Ballāla) who must be Hoysala Narasimha III. The fall in the Pāndyan influence in the Chola territories during the period immediately preceding that of Māruvarman Vira Pāndya and Jatāvarman Vira Pāndya must have been due to the influence of Vira Sōmesvara in the same regions. Pāndyan supremacy however seems to have revived some time prior to 1260 A.D. under Jatāvarman Vira Pāndya who from the inscription last cited seems to have succeeded in defeating Vira Sōmesvara's successor Nārasiṃha III, who succeeded to the Hoysala throne in the same year (1254 A.D.) in which Jatāvarman Vira Pāndya died the Pāndyan throne. As we know 1260 A.D. marks the close of the reign of Rājendra Chōla III.

We next pass on to the reign of Jatāvarman Sundara Pāndya I (A.D. 1251-1261) who appears to have been known also as Konṭrinmaikondan Sundara-Pāndya under which title several inscriptions have been found in the present Salem and Coimbatore Districts. If the boast of Jatāvarman Sundara Pāndya I that he 'conquered all countries' is true, it may be that he annexed the two districts named above to his dominions. His extensive conquests and the terror he struck into the

Renewed conquests of Jatāvarman
Sundara-Pāndya I

broken by the inroads of the Pāndyas, Hoysalas and Kākatīyas. In keeping with Hoysala policy, this part of the ancient Chōla empire was overrun by Rāmanātha, if not earlier by Sōmēsvara, (Ibid Kolar 92, 99 and 239), and Ilavanji-Rāya is himself described as one of the ministers of the Hoysala king (Ibid Kolar 239). His descendants appear to have exercised their sway down to 1336 A.D., when we have mention made of a Chōlappa-Perumāl and a Sembodiyagan. (Ibid Malur 7 and 15). The Vijayanagai kingdom came into being in that year and soon absorbed all the country south of the Krishna (E C. X. Introd. XXXI)

Rājēndra-
Chōla III
alias Manukula
medutta
Perumāl,
A D 1246-1268,

Rājarāja III was succeeded by his brother Rājēndra-Chōla III. What became of Gandagōpāla and Chōlaganga, his sons—if sons they were—is not known. It may be that they both died before Rājarāja III ceased to rule. There is, however, no epigraphic evidence to support this suggestion. It may be even that with the assassination of their father, their fates were also settled by the usurping fratricide. What directly led to the murder of Rājarāja at the hands of his brother is not known. But the Lepāka inscription of the latter by the use of the word dhūṛta in application to him suggests he might have been crafty and mischievous by disposition and that to satisfy his personal ambitions, he should have treacherously murdered his brother. Rājēndra-Chōla, in an inscription of his dated in his 22nd year, calls himself "Parakēsarivarmaṇ," his predecessor having styled himself Rājakēsarivarmaṇ. (M.E.R. 1913, Para 43). He is also known to have had the surname of Tribhuvanachakravartī, apparently inherited from Rājarāja III. A more famous title of his was Manukulamedutta Perumāl, i.e., the king who took the name of Manu (M.E.R. 1908, No 185 of 1908, M.E.R. 1911, No 46 of 1911, dated in his 4th year). An 122) As he ascended the throne in 1250-1251 A.D. (E.I. III 8) if this identification is correct he would have been still ruling in 1292 A.D. and have died in 1293 A.D. As this would give an unusually long reign to him Mr V Venkayya has suggested that he cannot be identified with Marco Polo's Sender Bendi. Sender Bendi he would identify with probably his successor, of the name of Maravarman Sundara Pāndya. This alleged Maravarman Sundara Pāndya must according to him have died about 1293 A.D. He would also have been a contemporary of Vira Sōmesvara the Haysala king. This postulation of another Maravarman Sundara Pāndya has however not been confirmed by epigraphical finds so far. The probabilities are that Marco Polo's Sender Bendi is identical with Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya IV who began his reign in A.D. 1302 (See below).

That Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya I was in effective possession of the greater part of the Chola country from near Trichinapoly in the South to Nellura in the north is proved not only by records of his found at Nallara but also otherwise. According to an inscription dated in the 2nd year of Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya I a new flood embankment was built on the Canvery the old one having breached and covered with sand the adjoining cultivated lands. Judging from where the records come this must refer to an embankment on the Coleroon which branches off from the Canvery near Trichinapoly (M.E.R. 1919 Para 20). A small cess appears to have been levied on this account (Ibid Appendix B No 510). Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya I had the special title of Ellārku Nāyaṇḍr which means the lord of all and corresponds to Ellāntalaiyāṇān a recognised title of his. There is just a doubt whether this title was not that of an unnamed elder brother of his in whose name an image of Vishnu called Ellāntalaiyāṇaperumāl was

His effective rule over Chola
country

entitled Konērimarkondān. The inscription at Tripurāntakam also attributes to him the feat of having cut off the heads of two Pāndya kings. A fragmentary inscription at Tirukannapuram also gives the latter title and calls him further Narapati Rājendra-Chōla. It adds that he was the establisher of various religious creeds and a worshipper at the divine lotus-feet of Kanakasabhāpati at Vyāghrapura, (i.e., Chidambaram) (M E R 1923, Para 45, No. 515 of 1922). In the Tripurāntakam inscription, Rājendra-Chōla III is described as Mahārājādhirājanarapati and the exploit of his having taken the heads of two Pāndya kings is mentioned in it also. It is dated in the 15th year, corresponding to the Cyclic year Raudra (=1260-61 A.D.).

Conflict with the Pāndyas

It is possible he came into conflict with the encroaching Pāndyas, against whom he might have secured some temporary advantages. The "two Pāndyas" whom he boasts to have killed are not identified, that they were kings of the Pāndyan kingdom there can be no doubt, for they are described as "crowned". It might be that he attempted to save the Chōla line from extinction but his efforts proved futile. The Pāndyas under Mānavarman Sundara-Pāndya, who ascended the throne in 1216 A.D., and his successors gradually regained their lost power and their aggressions proved too much for the declining Chōlas under the successors of Rājendra-Chōla III. The result was the latter were ultimately reduced to the position of mere inferior vassals (mandalēsvaras) under the Pāndyan rulers. Indeed, the Tirukannapuram inscription itself mentions Sēmappillai, the son of Rājendra-Chōla III, who appears in some inscriptions as a feudatory of the Pāndya king Vīra-Pāndya. (M E R 1915, Page 101). The conflict with the Kēralas should have occurred at the same time as that with the Pāndyas, i.e., long before the 7th and 15th regnal years. As he is said were well versed in the Vēdas and Sāstras and were able to write commentaries on them for building a Śiva and a Vishnu temple. (Ibid) Associated with Maravarman Kulasekhara I later in his reign should have been Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya III (1207 A D) Vira Pāndya who ascended the throne in 1276 A D Jatavarman Srivallabha (1291 A D) Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya IV (1302 A D) and Maravarman Srivallabha (1307 A D) Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya III began his rule in 1276 A D (M E R 1913 Para 45 E I VI 314 M E R 1914 Para 23) He appears to have been entitled Kaṇṇiyuga Rāma at least coins bearing this legend have been attributed to him (M E R 1693 Para 13 quoting Tracy in M J L S, 1887 1888 and M E R 1914 Para 23 see also V. J. R 1921 Para 41) He is called Rājardjan in one record (V. J. R 1918 Para 50 Appendix No 218 of 1917 J. A. S. L. I 223) Almost simultaneously with him ruled Vira Pāndya who came to the throne in A D 1276 During his time the country round the present North Arcot District was governed by one Kulasekhara Sambavarāya one of whose records dated in his 25th year is known (M E R No 77 of 1908 No 92 of 1900 both of which come from North Arcot District) He was apparently a feudatory of Vira Pāndya Another feudatory of his was Semappillaiyār who figures in an inscription of Vira Pāndya dated in his 14th year (M E R 1923 Para 52 No 358 of 1922) He was the son of Rājendra Chōla III With Jatavarman Sundara-Pāndya III there appears to have been some other co-regents. One was Maravarman Vikrama Pāndya II for whom several records yield the initial date A D 1260-1270 (M E R 1917 Para 10 Appendix B Nos. 648 and 703 M E R 1918 Para 44) Then there was Maravarman Vikrama Pāndya III who ascended the throne in 1283 A D He was a contemporary of the Kākatīya queen Rindrāmba.

above referred to occurred about the year 1254 A.D. Vīra-Sōmēśvara appears to have pushed on his earlier victory against the Pāndyas as far as Rāmēśvaram where he erected a pillar of victory. (E C XI Davangere 25 and E C V, Channarayapatna 203, dated in 1223 A D). Colonies of Hoysala Brāhmans appear to have followed in the wake of his conquests and settled down as far as Tinnevely, where their descendants are still to be found resident among local Tamil inhabitants. He evidently took possession of part of the Chōla country and was ruling from there, from about 1239 A D, his residence being at Kannanur, or Vikramapura, to the north of Srīrangam, in Trichinopoly (E C III, Tirumakudal-Naṣipuri 103 and Nanjangud 36) He is said to have created Kannanur for his pleasure in the Chōla country by the might of his own arm and there, with an interval in 1252, he was till 1254 A D One inscription describes him as the talisman (rakshāman or protector) of the Chōla King (Rājēndra III) This is dated in 1257 A D (E C IV Kūshnarajpet 9) A record of 1272 A D refers to his speedy conquests of the Chōla king and of the foremost leaders of the Pāndyan king (E.C VI, Kadu 125)

Re conquest
of the Northern
country

The reference in the Srīrangam, the Lepāka and the Tripurāntakam inscriptions (the last two of which are in the present Cuddapah and Kurnool Districts, respectively) to Rājēndra III having been a Rāma in conquering the Virarākshasas of Northern Lanka, is a reference to some defeat he appears to have inflicted on the Kākatīyas. The Tripurāntakam inscription is dated in his 15th year (=A D 1260-61), which corresponds to the last year of the Kākatīya king Ganapati. (M.E.R 1906, No 196 of 1905) Rājēndra-Chōla III probably took advantage of Ganapati's death either to extend his own dominions or at least to make his influence felt in the Telugu country.

An inscription at Vriddhāchalam (U F R 1018 Para 50 Appendix C 72) dated in the 14th year of 'Tribhuvanachakravartin' Konṛimāikondan Sundara Pāndya records that the king's elder brother made provision at the temple there for a service established by the king himself after Muppidi Nāyaka. From this it would seem to follow that the Pāndya king in whose behalf Muppidi Nāyaka fought was the above mentioned Sundara Pāndya who from the astronomical details furnished in another inscription of his at the same temple (Ibid Appendix C No 81) has been assigned to 1315. If this date is accepted the inscription would be referable to Jatavarman Sundara Pāndya IV who began his reign in 1302 A.D. The inscription above quoted (No 84 of 1018) furnishes for him the title of Kōdanda-rāja (U F R 1018 Para 50). As the grant in the name of Muppidi was made in the 14th year, i.e. in 1315 A.D. the conquest of Kānchi should have taken place just prior to 1315 A.D. Māravarman Kulasekhara I ruled from 1208 to 1308 A.D. He had the title who was pleased to take every country—a title first acquired by Māravarman Sundara Pāndya I. He has been identified with Kales Dovar of the Muhammadan historians, and the Asiar or Ashar of Marco Polo (S. Krishnaswāmi Iyengar South India and her Muhammadan Invaders 55). His reign is said to have been a prosperous one and his treasury, it is said contained treasure worth 1200 crores in gold. Kāyal was his chief sea port and its foreign trade was extensive. Ships from Aden, Kīz (in the Persian Gulf) and Ormuz touched at it. Describing king Kulasekhara Marco Polo says that he was the eldest of the five Pāndya brothers and that he possessed vast treasures and wore upon his person great store of rich jewel. He maintains, he adds, great state and administers his kingdom with great equity and extends great favour to reigning Hoysala sovereign. Of course, such a state of affairs cannot have been reached without preliminary contests which apparently enabled Sōmēsvaia to call himself the “uprooter of Rājēndra-Chōla III” in his own inscriptions (M E R 1913, Para 43)

Rājēndra-
Chōla III as a resuscitator of Manu

The title of Manukulamedutta as applied to Rājēndra-Chōla III is of some interest, though its exact significance is not clear. The Chōlas, however, traced their descent from Manu, and so a reviver of the dynasty was possibly justified in calling himself Manukulamedutta. In that sense, the term Manukulam may be intended to mean the Chōla race, in which case Manukulamedutta would mean the resuscitator of the Chōla race. In one inscription Rājēndra-Chōla III is said to have “revived the family of Manu,” and his mother is spoken of as “she, who brought forth a son who made glorious the Manu race,” and in another he is described to have “raised Manukula, the family of Manu (from its low position) and to have worn the hereditary crown” (M E R 1909, Para 52, No 185 of 1908, M.E.R 1923, Para 42, Appendix B No 273 of 1923). It has been suggested that he assumed this title because he endeavoured to regain for his royal house a part of its lost glory. He probably also stopped illegal levies of land revenue and restored the ancient rule of the one-sixth fixed by Manu and generally took steps to restore the political and social order on the lines laid down by Manu. One epigraph, indeed, states that he established the six systems of religion (Samaya). (M.E R 1913, Para 43, Appendix B. No 425, dated in his 2nd regnal year). The disturbed state of the country should have required reformation and it is possible Rājēndra-Chōla III tried to win over the allegiance of his people by proclaiming his open avowal of faith in the ancient law-giver. That Rājēndra-Chōla was a considerable prince and that he took active steps to prevent Assuming that Vira Pāndya was already on the throne before 1310 A.D., when Sundara Pāndya fled to Delhi his 16th year would be 1356 A.D. which is about the time that the Muhammadans at Madura began to depart. In the 44th year of Vira Pāndya we hear of the right of Pudikkādal (i.e. protection of a village against outsiders) of Surakkadi being sold to a certain person. This might be taken to indicate that the foreigners were still in the land in the 44th year and as we know that the re-consecration of the temple took place in the 46th year the departure may be set down to the 45th regnal year of Vira Pāndya or about 1365 A.D. (See M.E.R. 1909 Para 27 110 of Nos. 1908 and 120 of 1908). An inscription of his 31st year has been found. It gives him his full name Māravarman Vira Pāndya. It supplies the interesting fact that Kampana ndaiyar (i.e., the Vijayanagar king Kampana II who reigned from 1361 to 1374 A.D.) drove the Tufakkars i.e. Muhammadans and established orderly government throughout the country and restored worship in all the temples. (M.E.R. 1916 Para 33 No 64 of 1916). An inscription at Tiruppankuli (No 18 of 1899 dated in Saka 1287 (1368 A.D. E.I. VI 321) is the earliest record that mentions the conquest of the Muhammadans of Madura by Kampana. In 1368 A.D. the driving out was already an accomplished fact. As the Muhammadans ruled 48 years from 1310 to 1358 A.D. in Madura the driving out should have occurred in 1358 A.D. Hence the inscription dated in the 31st year of Māravarman Vira Pāndya should be referring to an event that occurred in 1358 A.D. Hence the initial date of Māravarman Vira-Pāndya should be fixed at A.D. 1326 27 31 1358 (M.E.R. 1916 Para 33). Under the parricide Sundara-Pāndya ruled Vira-champa (See under Rājendra-Chola III) over Kānchi and the country round about. (See Kampā II under Vijayanagar Dynasty). Vira-Champa's inscriptions show that he reigned about impossible. It is probable that the Saka date of this record should be read as 1168 and not 1268, as the former would fall in A.D. 1246, which is within 1268 A.D., up to which year we know Rājēndra-Chōla III actually ruled. Apparently during the last years of his rule, despite the efforts he put forth to retrieve the fortunes of his family, it sank so low indeed that it became divided into a number of small principalities over one of which Rājēndra's son ruled as a mandalēsvara. It is probable, however, Rājēndra's power was subverted by the Pāndyas under Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya II, who ruled over the Pāndyan kingdom between 1251-1261 A.D. After this conquest, the position of Rājēndra-Chōla was apparently reduced to that of a mahāmandalēsvara as mentioned in the inscription quoted above. How this subversion took place will be found narrated below.

His two sons
Sēliyar Kōnār and Sēma
Pillai

We know that Rājēndra-Chōla III had at least two sons. One was Sēliyar Kōnār, called Pillai, in one of his records, dated in his 5th year (M.E.R. 1924, Para 24). Another was Sēma Pillai, called nammagan (our son) (M.E.R. 1923, Para 45, Appendix B No. 515 of 1922). We do not hear of them as independent rulers in the period immediately following his own. Sēma Pillai appears as a vassal of the reigning Pāndyan king. From A.D. 1268 to A.D. 1314, the Chōla country was divided into a number of small States each under a local chief and what was under Rājēndra's son was but a province of the Pāndyan kingdom. The Sāmbavaiāyas ruled at Kānchi under the ægis of the Pāndyan king Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya I and his successors. The hold of the Pāndyans did not slacken until their own country was invaded by Muhammadans under Malik Kafur in 1310 A.D. In 1314 we hear of a Vira-Chōla and his son Champa, at Kānchi, the latter donating a car to the Vishnu temple at that place (M.E.R. August 1893, Para far north as Kanchi. Malik Kafur's invasion of South India in A.D. 1312 brought the Muhammadans to Madura and it is not easy to understand how Ravi Varman Kulasekhara was in the face of their existence able to advance as far as Conjeeveram and to subdue the Pāndvas and Chōlas. There is however no doubt whatever of these conquests as we have an inscription of his in the Ranganātha temple at Srirangam and another in the Arulāla Perumāl temple at Kānchi (V & R August 1900 Para 15 M & R July 1903 Para 11).

This Ravi Varman Kulasekhara has been identified with Māravarman Vira Kerala an inscription of whose date in his 4th year is to be seen on the southern gopura of the Natarāja temple at Chidambaram (M & R 1914 Para 21). The Poonainallī inscription (31 of 1911) suggests that he called himself—though a Chōla—also a Pāndya. His father Jayasimha bore the title Vira Kerala (E I 293 see also E I VIII 8). In the Arulāla Perumāl temple inscription it is stated that Ravi Varman Kulasekhara was at Kanchi in his 4th year. The name of Poonainallī near Madras where a grant of his is recorded appears in it as Chōra Pāndya-chator vēdimangalam (M & R 1912 No 31 of 1911). A Ravi Varman Vira Pāndya is referred to in an inscription coming from the Conjeeveram Taluk Chingleput District. (V & R 1924 Para 34). He may be the Chōra king Ravi Varman Kulasekhara above named (E I IV 146) or a successor of his who took the title of Vira Pāndya to commemorate the victory over the Pāndyan king.

Jatavarman Parākrama Pāndya, whose inscriptions ranging from his 5th to 11th years are known began to rule over the Pāndyan territories in the period immediately following the conquest. He and Māravarman Kulasekhara II began their reign about 1314-1315 A.D. (M. & R. 1911 Para 32). The latter had the title of by Kampa II, the Vizayanagar Prince, in the reign of Bukka I (See below under Vijayanagar Dynasty) Both the reigning Chōla family and its old feudatory chiefs passed under the suzerainty of the encroaching Pāndyas who became all-powerful in the South in the period between 1268-1310 A D, when they were subverted by the Northern Muhammadans under Malik Kafur. An inscription at the Arulāla Perumāl temple at Kānchi (M E R 1893, Para 13, Appendix B. No. 43) dated in Saka 1238 (expired), cyclic year Nala, corresponding to A D 1316, is of king Pratāpa-Rudra of Warangal. It contains the interesting statement that Muppidi, one of his officers, conquered Kānchi in that year (M E R August 1893, Para 13, Appendix B No. 43 of 1893). This was apparently another attempt made by the "northern Telugas" to regain their last hold on the South. In any case, it indicates the confused state of affairs at the period we are writing of (See below).

The Pāndyan
Invasions.

To understand the causes of the downfall of the Chōla empire, it is necessary to hark back a little and trace the history of the growth of the Pāndyas, their neighbours and age-long enemies. Since the time of Kulōttunga-Chōla I, whose conquest of the Pāndya kingdom has been already referred to, the relationship between the two kingdoms had naturally become strained. Kulōttunga-Chōla II was a contemporary of Māavarman Srivallabha (1132-1169 A D.) During the reigns of Rājādhirāja II and Kulōttunga-Chōla III occurred the Pāndyan war of succession, in which the Chōlas took an active part in favour of one of the two pretenders claiming the Pāndyan throne. Māavarman Srivallabha's son Jatāvarman Kulasēkhara I (1190-1217 A D) proved an active prince. His inscriptions have been found in the Madura and Tinnevely districts, most of them issued from his several royal camps. A brother-in-law

the South Arcot District states that the Muhammadans (Tulukkur) had invaded and brought about "the ruin of the country" (V.F.R. 1903 I para 27). The Muhammadan occupation of the temple at Tirupattur (in the Rāmanād District) has been referred to above (V.F.R. 1913 para 46). All these records go to confirm the invasion of Malik Kafur in A. D. 1310 which was made possible by the break up of the Chōla Empire. Kafur's forces must have marched right through the Madras Chingleput and South Arcot Districts before reaching Madura and appear to have caused considerable damage to Hindu temples apart from looting their secreted treasure and spreading ruin everywhere. Their objective was Madura because the Pāndyas were at the time the chief ruling dynasty of the South claiming supremacy through out its length and breadth. The ruin of Chōlas and the country meant also the ruin of the Pāndyas and their Empire. The forty years of Pandyan occupation of the Chōla country (A. D. 1268 to 1310) was followed by nearly half a century of Muhammadan usurpation of Madura (A. D. 1310 to 1358) which ended only with the vigorous campaign by Kampana Udayar II the Vijayanagar prince who drove out the Muhammadans and re-established order by Hindu rule once again in the South.

This however is only a digression though a necessary one. We may now revert to the Chōlas who fell under the sway of the Imperial Pāndyas. Soma Pillai son of Rājendra-Chōla became as we have seen a mere mahāmānda lēvara or governor under Pandyan overlordship. The invasion of the Pāndyan kingdom which ended in the fall of Madura in 1310 A. D. into Muhammadan hands apparently affected the position in the old Chōla dominion. Exactly twenty years after the capture of the Pandyan capital we hear of one Tribhuvanavirachaladeva, entitled Parakēśavarīman and Tribhuvanachakravartī setting up

Tribhuvana
Vira-Chōla-
dēva, Parakēśa-varīman
Tribhuvana
chakravartī
1331 A. D.

capital being at Madakulam, now included in Madura City His titles Atisaya Pāndyadēva and Kalyuga Rāma (he was, as stated above, a conqueror of Ceylon as well) show that he was a conqueror of some repute. (M E R 1917, Para 9) One of his ministers, Mālavaiāyar, is frequently mentioned in his inscriptions. A younger brother of his was Vijayagandagōpālādēva, surnamed Adaiyavalaindān, whose inscriptions are quite numerous in the South Arcot District Vijayagandagōpāla seems to have been himself a minister of a Pāndyan king who is styled "Tribhuvanachakravartin Kōnērīnmaikondān," probably identical with Mālavarman Sundara-Pāndya I himself (M E R 1919, Para 25, Appendix B, No 480) The conquest of Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya I apparently ended with the partial break-up of the Chōla kingdom, a part of which—that forming the old Pallava kingdom or Tondaimandalam country and southwards of it as far as Pudukkōttai—passed under the sway of the Pāndyas, who set up their rule in it through their own ministers. One of these was Vijayagandagōpāla above named and another was Soran Uyvaniraduvan alias Gurukulattaraiyan The latter seems to have been an important personage An inscription dated in 1227 A D, in the 12th year of Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya I, states that Gurukulattaraiyan built in stone the temple at Tiruttangal. He is eulogized as the lord of Tadanganni and as having set apart a village for performing special service in that temple in honour of his sovereign in the 7th regnal year In the same temple, Gurukulattaraiyan enjoyed the honour of a Kalam being sounded proclaiming his arrival (M E R 1922, Para 49, Appendix B No 554 of 1922). Gurukulattāraiyan is also known to have built the temple of Siva at Tangal and provided for its maintenance (Ibid No 575, dated in the 17th year) The change of sovereignty from the Chōlas to the Pāndyas of part of the South and other lands beyond the seas (Benoy Kumar Tulkal, The Folk element in Hindu Culture). A dynasty the court earned such fame and renown went down practically ruined under the stress of its own weight (Sic Rāmaṇaḥ forin mundi). We have seen above the proximate 191-2 that tended to the break up of the Chōla power. In those were other causes at work which went deeper than to its roots and contributed to its decay. Kings of this dynasty revelled in war and war then as now unsettled affairs in the country and eventually demoralized those engaged in it. The Pandyan war of succession involving a series of reverses to the Chōlas though they succeeded to some extent in one phase of it appears to have not only affected the internal peace of the whole kingdom, but also ended in the humiliation of the Pandyas who were not slow to take their revenge on the Chōlas. The demoralized condition of the army, the growing incompetence of the central Government and the discontent of the peasantry—these were taken advantage of by strong and ambitious chiefs and they soon brought about a revolution which ended in the disruption of the mighty empire which at one time commanded obedience from the greater part of Southern India. But soon these ambitious chiefs saw that the destruction they had wrought of the central Government opened the flood gates to invaders from the North. The first Muhammadan invasion of Mūlik Kafur occurred in 1310 A.D. when these very revolutionary chiefs found themselves unable to fight them out. A new power soon rose into being and drove the intruders out. The new revolution was exclusively political in character but it soon affected the economic, social and moral spheres.

It is to this decadent period of the Chōlas, when they had become the vassals of the Pandyas, whose ascendancy over Southern India was practically undisputed contemporaries (M.E.R. 1924, Para 33, and M.E.R. 1912, Para 37, M.E.R. 1916, Para 29 and M.E.R. 1920, Para 37). The former Mānavarman Vīra-Pāndya, was the suzerain of a chief Kulasēkhara Sāmbuvaiāya, whose inscriptions ranging from his 11th to 22nd regnal years, come from Pallikonda in the present North Arcot District. This chief appears to have dated his grants in his own regnal years, affecting more or less independence. (M.E.R. 1926, Para 34; No. 77 of 1908). He probably became quasi-independent during the close of the reign of his suzerain, which ended in 1278 A.D. The 25th year of this chief—Kulasēkhara Sāmbuvaiāya—corresponds to 1302 A.D., and it is therefore probable that he might have remained independent of Pāndyan control at least till then. However this may have been, there is scarcely any doubt that the Pāndyas remained in control of the old Pallava country and the adjoining parts of the Chōla kingdom till 1302 A.D., though the local chiefs may have in certain cases pretended independence. Of the other Pāndyan king above named, Jatāvarman Vīra-Pāndya, who ascended the throne in 1254 A.D., inscriptions dated from his 7th to the 15th year have been traced. He is known as the conqueror of Ceylon, Kongu and the Chōla country (Sōla-mandalam) and to have been pleased to perform the anointment of heroes and victors at Chidambaram (M.E.R. 1912, Para 37). An inscription dated in the 10th regnal year describes some king as “who was pleased to take the Chōla country, Ceylon, and the crown and crowned head of the Savaka” may belong to him, at least paleographically it may be assigned to him, though the conquest of Kongu, which happened before his 7th year, is not mentioned in it. The epithet “who took the crown and crowned head of the Savaka” is mentioned for the first time in this inscription. It is doubtful, as Mr. H. Krishna Sāstri remarks, whether the word Savaka refers to the Sravakas, Dhananjaya Erige as ruling the Alavadi 600 as subordinate of the Gangas. (E C XII Maddegiri 92 91 97 101) Ruling with him was a Cholika Muttarasa who has been assigned to the time of Sripurnaha (Ibid Maddegiri 01 96 99) The later line starts about the beginning of the 12th century Its exact relationship to the earlier one is not known They passed successively under the yokes of the Western Chalukyas and the Hoysalas One of the first of their line known is Mahanandalasvara Irungola Chola Mahārāja who was ruling in 1106 A D (E C XI Chalakere 16) This Irungola is probably the same chief mentioned in an inscription dated in 1128 A D He begins a line of chiefs who ruled down to 1292 A D (E C XII Sira 7) Their genealogy is let out in several inscriptions found in the Tanjur District (Ibid 7 Pavagada 43 50 52 and 54) They claim to be of the Solar race and of the Isa vamsa and trace their descent from Karikela Chōla. The order of descent (father to son) is thus stated —Jeta Brahma Bhōgēndra Mangi destroyer of the Matangas Rabbe Dēva or Bichi, who slew Hosagoramesra, his great enemy Gōvinda Irunguna or Irungola Melli Deva entitled Bhōgi Brahma Irungola Boimma and Ganesvara There were thus 11 generations of chiefs. Irungola of 1106 may be taken to be Irugola I of this genealogy Chiefs of this line are thus described —Lord of Oreyurpura (or Urayur near Trichinopoly), crest-jewel of Kalikālachela kula (after the famous karikāla-chōla) Gōva (or guardian) of Rodda (in the present Anantapur District) Nigalenkamella and the champion who had taken the heads of 64 chieftains (Ibid Hiriyur 40) Irungola I who was ruling in A D 1106 was the son of Gōvinda and Mahādevi (E C XII Pavagada 43) His full name was probably Vira Pāndya Irungōla-Dēva who in 1128 A.D. is referred as the ruler of Rodda 300 Sira 300 Herave 300 and Sindevadi 1 000 all of which may most be the Irungola who raided the Anobiddasarinād in the Tumkur country (See below). In an inscription assigned by Mr. Ruce to 1278 A.D. Gōvinda II is described as the foremost of the Salar line (i.e. the Cholas). His son was Irungola III of whom we know nothing. Irungola's son was Rhiṅga whose son Rāmna obtained fame by building an impregnable line of fortifications connecting the fort of Harriya and the fort of Nidugal. Such was, we are told, the security created by him that trouble about military exercises and schemes for repelling an enemy became unnecessary (EC VI Molkalmuru 20). Rāmna deva had four sons, one of them being Irungola but we know nothing of them (Ibid Molkalmuru 21). This period of darkness is coeval with the capture of Nidugal in 1285 A.D. by Hoysala Narasimha II (see below). In 1092 we have Ganesvara Deva (FC VII Sira 60 and Pavagada 53).

Chōla coinage during the Pandyan supremacy

The Hoysalas as the enemies of the Imperial Cholas did not prove friendly to the Nidugal Chōlas. Vishnu vardhana who drove the Imperial Cholas out of Mysore about 1116 A.D. did not leave the local Chola chief of Nidugal unattended to. He is said in one inscription to have captured the powerful Irungola's fort (EC IV Nagamangala 70) and Narasimha I is described as the breaker of the pride of Irungola. In 1218 A.D., Ballāta II was encamped at Nidugal (EC V Hassan 10). In 1267 A.D. Irungōla made a raid into the Anobiddasarinād in the Tumkur country, (EC XII Tumkur 49) and in 1276 A.D. joined the Sevuna army in its invasion of Dūrasamandra (EC V Belur 164 165). In 1285 A.D. Nārasimha II marched against Nidugal and reduced it.

Relations
with the Hoysalas.

About two centuries later we hear of a family of Chola-Chōlas in an inscription dated in 1481 A.D. (EC XII Chola-mahārāsa)

set up by Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya I (M.E R 1922, Para 37, Appendix B No 328 of 1921) He appears to have been a popular king for we have a record from Chidambaram (M.E R 1919, Para 26, Appendix B. No 546) which registers the establishment of a grove and a street of cocoanut trees (planted on either side of it) for the recreation and habitation of the people. His charities included the covering of the Srīrangam temple with gold and the presentation of Srīpūṣhamangalam, to the Brāhmins of Sundara-Pāndya-Chaluvēḍimangalam, founded by him to the South of the Arulāla Perumāḷ temple at Kānchi. (M.E R 1921, Para 39, Appendix C No. 116 of 1921) Kōḍandarāma was one of his titles. He issued coins bearing the legend Kōḍandarāma in Tamil on the reverse side under a State umbrella flanked by chāmaras (M.E R 1921, Para 41, but see (M.E R 1914, Para 23) He was also known by the surname of Ranasingarākshasa, (M.E R 1922, Para 37, Appendix No 329 of 1921) which is allusive of his prowess in war. His namesake Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya II, who ascended the throne about 1270-1271 A.D. (M.E R. 1913, Para 45) was probably co-regent with Māravarman Kulasēkhara I, who reigned from 1268 to 1312 A.D. The latter had a long reign of 44 years. In one of his inscriptions, he appears with the title "who was pleased to take Malanādu, Sōnādu (the Chōla country), the two Kongus, Īlam (Ceylon) and the Tondaimandalam (M.E R 1917, Para 12, Appendix B. No. 698) This explains his usual title "who took all countries" In some inscriptions he is termed Bhuvanēkavīra (M.E R 1918, Para 52, M.E R 1924, Para 35, No 218 of 1924) He had a son named Kandiyadēvar and Kālingarāyar, an officer who had served under Māravarman Kulasēkhara I (M.E R 1916, Para 31). Kālingarāyar was a patron of Brāhmins. One of his grants was made to twenty Brāhmins who

Each village was independent in its economy and Government from every other. Women appear to have held the land exactly like men. The governance of each village was vested in itself. The village assembly which consisted of all the people of the village and which was called together by the blowing of a trumpet (M.E.R. 1919 Para 15) was the ultimate authority in all matters pertaining to its well being. In actual practice however the assembly appears to have consisted of—or been divided into—a number of committees. In the days of Parantaka I (907-917 A.D.) some abuses seem to have crept into the work of these committees and he issued orders for regulating their conduct. The royal order apparently could take effect only when it was adopted or at least approved by the assembly as a whole.

From this it
(1) The village and its assembly

Among the more important committees spoken of in Parantaka's time were Annual Supervision, Tank Supervision, Garden Supervision and Supervision of Justice. Their names indicate their spheres of work. It was the duty of the Annual Supervision Committee to see that the lands in the village were properly cultivated and the produce was properly collected (M.E.R. 1913 Para 23 Appdx. B No 269). Each was chosen annually when the Assembly was in session. The Annual Supervision Committee probably looked after all affairs which did not fall within the scope of the other committees. It seems to have been known as 'Samratsaragrāmakāryam'. It apparently could declare certain kinds of land free—for example land connected with the sacred tank of the temple and a mandapa adjoining it. The document exempting these lands had apparently to be signed by the members of the village assembly of the place in which they were situated (M.E.R. 1913 Para 42). Two other committees are also known from the Uttaramallur inscriptions viz. Gold its Committees.

(M E R 1914, Para 20) He was probably a brother of Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya I (M E R 1914, Para 20) He bore the title of Rājakkannayan It has been suggested that Mālavarman Vikrama-Pāndya III is the same as Mālavarman Vikrama III, and that all the inscriptions referred to these two should be ascribed to only one king and that he ascended the throne in 1269 A.D. (M E R 1922, Para 31, M E R 1924, Para 3). There was another Vira Pāndya who ascended the throne in 1296 An epigraph of his 22nd year (1318 A.D.) is known (M E R 1924, Para 24). A grant for his merit dated in the 15th year of Mālavarman Kulasēkhara I (1283 A.D.) shows he may have been his successor (M E R 1924, Para 35) Jatāvarman Sīvallabha ascended the throne in A.D. 1291 (I A. XLII, 225, M E R 1918, Para 49) An inscription of his 13th year from Thukōshtiyūr is known (M E R 1924, Para 37) Jatāvarman Sundara-Pāndya IV began his rule in 1302 A.D. An inscription of his dated in his 12th year is known (M E R 1916, Appendix B No 608 of 1915). During his reign, Muppidi Nayaka, the general of Pratāparudra, the Kākatya king of Warangal, invaded Kānchi, and installed Manavira as Governor in that city. (E I VII, 128) His return from Kānchi is recorded in an undated fragmentary inscription at Mallam He is said to have conquered the Pāndya king, to have received elephants from him as tribute and to have entered Nellore on his way. This conquest of the Pāndya signifies that the general Muppidi ousted the enemies of his protegee Manavira, who may have been a Pāndya himself and received from him the tribute of elephants. Dr Hultzsch has suggested that Manavira might have been a Telugu-Chōda chief and his enemy whom Muppidi defeated, might, in his opinion, have been Ravavirna of Kōrala who was crowned at Kānchi in A.D. 1312-1313. (E I. VII 130, M E R 1909, Para 31).

certain inscriptions included in the village assembly according to others they were subordinate to the village assembly and had to carry out its orders. These apparently contradictory statements have been reconciled on the basis that though each of these committees as a body was subordinate to the village assembly yet the members of the former were not debarred from taking part in the deliberations of the latter. Certain inscriptions indicate that young men were also chosen as members of these committees and they were expected to take an active part in discussing questions brought before them (VE R 1899 Para 58). Inscriptions of the time of Rājaraṇa I suggest that these assemblies had sometimes prolonged sittings occasionally extending into the nights though they ordinarily finished their work before sunset (VE R 1919 Para 15). These assemblies met in the local temple in special Halls called Rājendrasolan Seubiyannmahadevi pperuvuondapam built by Rājaraṇa I, and other kings (VE R 1913 Para 23 M. E. R 1916 Para 10). The whole assembly in session including all the committees was called the mahā sabha. (M. E. R 1913 Para 23)

In the time of Parāntaka I as stated above two royal orders were issued directing various amendments in the rules regulating the election of members to the Committees of the Assembly. The first of these was issued in his 12th year (= 919 A D) and the second in his 14th year (921 A D). The earlier is less elaborate in certain points than the later one and the changes introduced by the second were laid down in order that wicked men might perish while good men might prosper. Apparently things had gone wrong with the village assembly of Uttaramellur—to which the orders specially relate—and the king had to intervene and compel it to make strict rules to regulate the selection of members to its committees.

Reforms introduced by Parāntaka I
921 A D

merchants and foreigners, so that they were glad to visit his city." His contemporaries were Rāmachandīa, the Yādava king of Dēvagrī who ruled from A D 1271 to 1310. Queen Rudramba, who ruled over Telugana, with her capital at Warangal, but subsequently, about 1221 A D, raised her son Pratāparudīa to the throne, reigning till 1328 A D, over a territory which extended as far as Nellore, the Hoysalas under Vīra-Ballāla III who ruled from 1291 to 1312 A D. The last of these ruled up to somewhere near Chidambaram, from where Kulasēkhara's territories began. According to the authorities above named, Kulasēkhara ruled for some forty and odd years, which has been nearly confirmed by lithic inscriptions, and was murdered by his elder and legitimate son Sundara-Pāndya, identified above with Jātavarman Sundara Pāndya IV, who was perhaps his co-regent. The parricide Sundara-Pāndya was, in his attempts at sovereignty opposed, according to Muhammadan historians, by his step brother Tīra Pandi, identified with Vīra-Pāndya. Sundara-Pāndya failed against Vīra-Pāndya and eventually took refuge with Alauddīn of Delhi. Vīra-Pāndya appears to have been the natural son of Mājavarma Kulasēhara. In his records he styles himself Ranamukharāma (M E R 1918, Appendix C No 104). Two inscriptions from Tirupattur, dated in the 44th and 46th years of Vīra-Pāndya, show that he ruled up to at least the 46th year. These inscriptions refer to the grant of certain privileges on one Viśulaya-dēvar, who helped in the reconsecration of a temple, which had been occupied and ruined by Muhammadans (Tulukkar). The Muhammadan occupation of Madura must, from these inscriptions, have taken place before the 46th year when the reconsecration took place. As Madura had not been occupied by Muhammadans before Mālik Kāfur's invasion of 1310 A D, the *Tulukkar*s referred must be assumed to have been Mālik Kāfur's followers.

assembly resolved that only those capable of reciting the Maṇṭrabrahmaṇa (hymns and Brahmaṇas) could be elected as members of the Village Supervision Committee and could take part in the deliberations of the Village Assembly (V & R 1922 Para 16 Appendix C No 210 of 1922). The members were termed Vriyān scydr. Another record of the same year says that those who had been found guilty of misappropriating property belonging to Brāhmanas and of other heinous crimes (not specified) were not eligible for such privileges in the village and that one chosen in contravention to these rules would be accorded the same punishment as was usually meted out to transgressors of royal orders (Ibid No 211). Among the disqualifications prescribed were the following — those who had been on any of the Committees of the previous years and had not submitted their accounts and their relations. Of the latter a long list is given which excludes every one related in any way on the agnatic, cognatic or any other side whatever. Those guilty of the five great sins, of the crimes of theft and adultery, of social and religious offences of different kinds of foolhardiness etc. were also excluded from being selected.

Excluding all those thus specified, names were to be written for pot-tickets in the thirty words and each of the wards was to prepare a separate packet with a covering ticket specifying its contents tied to it. These packets were then to be put into a pot. The pot-tickets were to be opened in the midst of a full meeting of the village assembly including the young and old members convened for the purpose. All the temple priests then present in the village were without any exception whatever to be seated in the village hall where the assembly was to meet. The most elderly of the assembled priests was to stand up and lift an empty pot so as to be seen by all the people present. A young boy who

Mode of selection—cast-blind election and drawing of lots.

1314 A D As Vīra-Champa is recorded to have gifted Vīra-champanallur in the 8th year of Sadagōpavaiṁan alias Tribhuvanachakravartin Vikrama-Pāṇdyadēva, the latter should have been a contemporary of Sundara-Pāṇdyā, the parricide (M.E.R. August 1900, Para 14; Appendix B No 52 of 1900.)

Vīra-Pāṇdyā, who defeated the parricide, was succeeded by Māiavarman alias Tribhuvanachakravartin Parākrama-Pāṇdyā, whose 6th regnal year is coupled with Saka 1262 This gives Saka 1256 (= A D 1334) as his initial year.

A Kērala invasion under Ravivarman
Kulasēkhara

About the time that Sundara Pāṇdyā and Vīra-Pāṇdyā were fighting for the Pāṇdyan throne, there was one Ravivarman alias Kulasēkhara, son of Jayasimha, ruling the country round Quilon. (E.I. IV 145) In 1299-1300 A D, he took possession of the Kērala country. He defeated a certain Vīra-Pāṇdyā, and made the Pāṇdyas and Chōlas subject to the Kēralas and in A D 1312-1313 was crowned on the Vegavati at Kānchi. The war with Vīra-Pāṇdyā was then renewed and resulted in his flight to the Konkana country. Ravivarman Kulasēkhara was in Kānchi about A D. 1315-1316. Vīra-Pāṇdyā with whom he fought may have been either the Vīra-Pāṇdyā mentioned above as the son of the Pāṇdyā "Kales Dewar" and opponent of Sundara-Pāṇdyā, or as pointed out by Professor Kielhorn. (E.I. IV. 116, n. 1) he may be identified with Prince Mārtāṇḍavarman alias Virapāṇdyā Dēva of Venād, the 1th year of whose reign corresponded to A D 1315-1316. Mr. H. Krishna Sastri has suggested that this Vīra-Pāṇdyā should be identified with the Māiavarman Vīra-Pāṇdyā mentioned in a epigraphs (M.E.R. 1911, Para 21). Whoever the Vīra-Pāṇdyā was against whom Ravivarman Kulasēkhara fought, there is no doubt that the latter was a powerful ruler as he was able to advance from Quilon as described already. From these thirty tickets twelve men were to be selected. Six out of these twelve were to form the Gold Supervision Committee and the remaining six were to constitute the pancharara vāriyam. In making subsequent annual selections to these two Committees, the wards already represented during the previous years were to be excluded and the appointments made from the remaining wards by an oral expression of opinion. This was evidently intended to secure rotation. Two special disqualifications are mentioned in connection with these two Committees. Men who had ridden on asses (i.e. those who had been publicly disgraced for evil acts, etc.) and those who had been guilty of forgery were to be excluded from them.

There is reason to believe that village assemblies of this kind were common all over Southern India including the Mysore State. (Malur in the present Chintāmoni Taluk according to inscriptions found at the temple there, had an assembly. E.C. and M.A.R. 1908-9 Paras 69-70 see ante.) Many inscriptions found in this State refer to them. Inscriptions found in the East Coast also refer to them. As Mr. Venkayya has observed it may be assumed until the contrary is proved that the Committee system of village administration prevailed over a considerable portion of Southern India. (M.E.R. 1899 Paras 58-79)

Universality of Committee system in Southern India.

It will be seen that the Assembly selections were annual that the same members could not year after year serve on the same Committees that the qualifications property and intellectual were high that the disqualifying causes were many and tended to keep out almost every imaginable relation of a Committee member who had not submitted his account and those guilty of offences against property religion or society that accounting was insisted on with a severity which suggests a lapse on the part of some members before the second rescript of Parāntaka I

Its principal merits.

Abhanqārahuttarāya, the invincible horseman An inscription of his dated in his 19th year is known, (M E R 1913, Para 45, Appendix C, No. 29) The following is a list of later kings of the Pāndyan line, the last of whom take us down to the beginning of the 16th century when Vijayanagar rule was all supreme in Southern India —

Mānavaiṃan Parākrama-Pāndya
(Initial date)	A D 1334-1335
Jatāvaiṃan Parākrama-Pāndya	A D 1357-8-1372
Jatāvaiṃan Kulasēkhara	A D 1396-1402
Konēṃmaikondān Vikrama-Pāndya (Joint ruler with Arikēsaiṃ)	. A D 1401-1418
Mānavaiṃan-Vikrama-Pāndya	.. A.D 1443-1457
Alagai-Porūmāl Sīvallabha	.. A D. 1471
Jatāvaiṃan-Parākrama-Pāndya alias Kulasēkhara (M E R 1912, Para 41)	. A D 1480-1499

Effect of the Pāndyan Invasions

The above rapid summary of Pāndyan relations with the Chōlas discloses the plain fact that the break up of the latter was due almost wholly to the Pāndyan incursions, though it is true that such incursions could have formed only the proximate cause for that result. The collapse of the Chōlas ended in the way being paved for the descent of the Muhammadans from the North to the South. That the route of the invading Muhammadans lay through the Chōla country is proved by inscriptions. Thus an inscription dated in the 7th year of Sakalalōka-chakravartin Rājandīyānan Sāmbuvaiyār, at Tiruvaiyur refers to the plunder carried out by the Muhammadans (Tulukkar) who had occupied the country (M E R 1913, para 68, Appendix B No 203 of 1912) It would appear that the Muhammadans ransacked the great temple at that place and removed all the buried treasure they could get at. Similarly another record from Tiruvāmāttur in products should have been either exchanged or sold for cash. Overseas trade at the end of the 13th century is testified to by Marco Polo. It was chiefly carried on through the agency of the Muhammadans who had established themselves from the early years of the Christian era at several of the sea ports of the South eastern Coast such as Negapatam Koyol etc. Though weaving was practised industries on an organized scale there were none. There is mention however in the inscriptions of the period of the goldsmith blacksmith, the stonemason the carpenter etc. The artistic excellence of the work of these different sorts of artisans had reached a high degree long before the Imperial Chōlas began to rule. But there is reason to believe that in the reign of Rājārāja I and his successors down to Kulot tūngo Chōla III these classes received increasing patronage both from kings and private parties. The prosperity which the country enjoyed from about the 11th to the 13th centuries is still evident in the beautiful temples which have come down to us from that period. These show the high water mark that the sculptural and architectural arts had reached in Southern India during the period. The jewellers art flourished during the same period. Apart from what is mentioned in the inscriptions of Rājārāja I we have details of the gifts of copper vessels ornaments and images made of gold and silver set with precious stones such as pearls rājāvandan mānikkam pavalam kuppi vuyiram maratakam etc. presented by queen Sembiyāmahādēvi to the temple at Tiruvenkādu (M.E.R. 1910 Para 13). Trade guilds were not unknown. An inscription of Rājārāja I which comes from Varalar (N. Arcot District) refers to a gift by a guild of nānādesi merchants. Another of Rājēndra Chōla's time eulogizes a guild of merchants of the Banajiga caste who had been praised in 500 Vīra sāsanas (or edicts) (M.E.R. 1913 Para 25). A record from Baligāmi also praises merchants rule in it. The titles assumed by him show that he made to the ancient Chōla throne. His exact ship to Rājēndra-Chōla's sons is not known. Nor any material to fix the real extent of his authority seems to have begun his rule in A D 1331-1332. The record of his at Tiruvannāmaḥai and another dated in 3rd year at Modur (M E R 1911, No 210 of 1910) issued his orders from a town in Kalingaipaṭṭu in Nigariḥ-Chōla-mandalam. Kalingaṭṭu, in the Vijayanagar period of South Indian history, was a district included in the Muluvāi-rājya. The recipient of the gift was the temple of Singaperumāl in Duṭṭiyāi-agaiam, identified with Chāmundi, in Padinādu, i.e., Hadanāru of Mahisha-mandala. Tribhuvanachōladeva's sphere of rule should, therefore, have extended over parts of Salem, South Arcot and South Mysore (M E R 1911 Para 34). Whether he is the same as Tribhuvanavīradēva, who is referred to in an inscription found at Periyakōttai and which is dated in his 3rd regnal year, is not known (M E R 1908, Para 70, Appendix B No 467 of 1907, See also E I IX, 22).

end of Chōla
pire

Thus ended the Chōla empire, which in one form or another had been in existence since the 4th century if not from an earlier period. During sixteen centuries it had stood guard against invasions from the North, kings, especially those of the Imperial (or Vijaya) line, wrought memorable deeds both in warfare and the arts of peace. They carried the name of India wide. To the trans-Himālayan nations, the Chōlas appears to have been better known than any other South Indian dynasty. One writer has gone to the length of suggesting that India, influence of the Chōlas and Pālās, who ruled aneously over Northern and Southern India, became a school of Asia by supplying faith, literature, material necessities to Nepal, Tibet, China, Japan.

1063 1066) mentions the following — Crkkalanju humarakkuchchdnam Vaundrappdrai Tattarpdttam Ailraipdttam Velikkdsu Tingalmērūmu Muttdcanam Turippuluvai Valangai Idungai maganmai Dusa randam Madaikkūli Virasēlai etc There were a multiplicity of revenue officers to collect these taxes (V E R 1916 Para 16) Occasionally the taxes from a particular village were granted by royal order to a temple as Virarajendradeva did in the 5th year of his reign the taxes of a village to the temple of Mahāvishnu at Tirumukkudal (Ibid) Periodical redistribution of lands seems to have prevailed down to a late date An inscription of Kulottunga Chola III dated in his 12th year refers to one such redistribution of the punjai and nattam lands of a village. The object of such redistribution is not specified This was probably to equalize the incidence of taxation on the individual cultivators. (M E R 1913 Para 38) This however did not exclude absolute ownership in land On its conveyance by way of sale or gift from one to another there passed the following rights of ownership mentioned in Tamil Inscriptions — Wet land dry land village site tank swamps common land, podāri manru land on which the cattle are gathered kalur kalli trees on surface water at the bottom of wells and such others. (cf asatābhogātējssvāmya of the Sanskrit inscriptions, which included the eight rights of ownership viz water, minerals, hidden treasure store akshani future income past income and probable income) (M E R 1913, Para 42) In connection with tanks is mentioned a tax called the Eriyam Collections known as Eripatti which were private donations, went to meet the cost of repairs of tanks Eri ayam seems to have been levied for the same purpose. The latter was collected by the men composing the Tank Supervision Committee of the year and they were to keep the tanks in order from the collections made (M E R from about 1260 A.D., that the coins on which the fish and other symbols, particularly the Chōla standing figure, should be attributed. The inscriptions on these coins such as Sōnādu Kondān ("He who conquered the Chōla country") and Ellān-tālayānān ("Lord of all") are in Tamil and they unmistakably show the Pāndyan ascendancy under Mālavaiṃman Sundarā-Pāndya I (1216-1239 A.D.) Jatāvarman Sundarā Pāndya I (1251-1261 A.D.), and Māravaiṃman Kulasēkhara I (1268-1312 A.D.) over the Chōlas. "Ellāntalayānān" was a recognized surname of Jatāvaiṃman Sundarā-Pāndya I and appears in his many inscriptions. This title appears in the variant form of Ellārku-Nāyanār, which means the same thing (M R R 1919, Para 26; Appendix B No 481). Maravaiṃman Sundarā-Pāndya I is also described in his inscriptions as he "who distributed or conquered the Chōla country," which explains the coin legend Sōnādu-Kondān M E R 1916, Para 26, Nos 582, 591, 602 of 1915 etc. See ante). It should, however, be added that the term "who was pleased to take Malai-nādu, Sōnādu, the two Kongus, Īlam and the Tondaimandalam" is also a title of Mālavaiṃman Kulasēkhara I and it is possible that coins with the legend "Sōnādu Kondān" may refer to him as well. (See ante).

Chōlas of Nidugal, a local
Dynasty

Between the 8th and the 13th centuries there ruled in the Mysore State a local dynasty of Chōlas, whose territory consisted of the country around Hēmāvati and Nidugal. Their capital was Penjeru or Henjeru, in Tamil called Peruncheru, now Hēmāvati, on the northern border of Srīa Taluk. Their inscriptions are found in the Tumkur, Chitaldrug and Bellary Districts. They call themselves Chōla-Mahārājas. The earlier chiefs of this line were probably subordinates of the Gangas. Certain inscriptions found in the Tumkur District mention a Chōla

1063 1066) mentions the following — Crkkalanju humarakkuchchānam Paundrappārai Pattārpāttam Kiliraipāttam Velikkāsu Tingalmērimu, Muttāvanam Tarippulacai, Valanjai Idangai maganmai Dusa vandam Vidaiykkuli Vīrasēlai etc There were a multiplicity of revenue officers to collect these taxes (V E R 1916 Para 16) Occasionally the taxes from a particular village were granted by royal order to a temple as Virarajendradeva did in the 5th year of his reign the taxes of a village to the temple of Mahāviṣṇu at Tirunukkudal (Ibid) Periodical redistribution of lands seems to have prevailed down to a late date An inscription of Kuloṭṭunga Chola III dated in his 12th year refers to one such re-distribution of the puṇjai and nattam lands of a village The object of such redistribution is not specified This was probably to equalize the incidence of taxation on the individual cultivators. (M E R 1919 Para 38) This, however did not exclude absolute ownership in land On its conveyance by way of sale or gift from one to another there passed the following rights of ownership mentioned in Tamil inscriptions — Wet land dry land, village site tank swamps common land podāri, munru, land on which the cattle are gathered, kalar kallu trees on surface, water at the bottom of wells and such others. (cf aṣṭābhogātējavāmya of the Sānskrit inscriptions, which included the eight rights of ownership viz water minerals hidden treasure store akṣini future income past income and probable income) (M. E R 1913 Para 42) In connection with tanks is mentioned a tax called the Ēriyam Collections known as Ēripatti which were private donations went to meet the cost of repairs of tanks Ēri ayam seems to have been levied for the same purpose The latter was collected by the men composing the Tank Supervision Committee of the year and they were to keep the tanks in order from the collections made (M E R

be taken as implying the countries surrounding the peak of Nidugal as the centric. He appears to have come into conflict with Hoysalas (See below). His son Malli-Dēva was a feudatory, in A D 1108, of the Chālukya king Vikramāditya (E C XI, Challakere 21) and in A D. 1147 of Jagadēkamalla II. He appears to have been co-ruled with his father. An inscription dated in the latter year describes his kingdom as comprising the very territory, mentioned above in connection with his father (E C XI, Challakere 21). There are high praises of his minister Tantrapāla Nāman, whose grants to the god at Nidugal are detailed (E C XII, Pavagada 43). Malli-Dēva had two wives, Lakma-Dēvi and Sīta-Dēvi, the latter of whom made a grant to the temple of Nonambēsvara, which is described as the Ghatika-sthana of Henjerapatna (E C XII, Pavagada 35 and Sūa 23). The latest date known for Malli-Dēva is 1179 A D (Ibid Pavagada 79). Then we have a Gōvinda-Rāya, mentioned in an inscription dated in 1207 A D (E C XI, Molkalmuru 23). After him, apparently a part of the kingdom was called Gōvindavādi (E C XII Sūa 37). He was succeeded by Iṅgōla II stated in one inscription dated in A D 1332 to be the son of Baṁma and Richale-Dēvi (E C XII, Pavagada 50) and in another as the son of Perumāle Dēva (E C XII, Pavagada 47 and 14). He was apparently highly skilled in archery and the use of weapons. (Ibid Pavagada 50). In an inscription dated in A D 1232, he made a grant for a Jain Basadi on the Nidugal hill, otherwise called Kalanjana (Ibid Pavagada 52). In another inscription dated in 1247 A D, he is given the title Danva Munāri (E C XI, Hūiyur 37). His son Tripurāntaka Dēva was ruling at Hanayaduiga, the Brahmagiri where the Asōka Edicts have been found (E C XII, Sūa 34). That he was co-regent with his father is clear from the fact that he is spoken of as still ruling at Nidugal in 1277 A.D (E C XII, Sūa 32). He of prince Arikulakēṣari to the temple of Siva at Tiruvannāgar Tūṇaḷavarai. The gold Aṭṭaṇṇu presented is stated in the record to have been called ṭaṭṭu and subsequent to the gold being burnt cut melted and fused current neither wanting in purity nor in weight. (M.F.R. 1112 Para 21 Appendix B No 216). As the Chola Aṭṭaṇṇu was much better than the Ceylonese it was found necessary to keep out the latter and retain the good. Hence the periodical testing above referred to and certifying so exactly. Doubtless this duty fell on the Gold Supervision Committee.

The social and religious life of the people centred round the local temple. Most of the temples built during the Chola period were royal foundations and as such built by kings or queens or by great generals and commanders. Some were named after living kings or queens and dedicated in their names to gods or goddesses whether Saivite or Vaiṣṇavite. Some were named after living kings or queens and others after those that were dead. Thus the Rājaraṣṭhara temple at Tanjore was built by Rājārāja I and dedicated after himself while yet he was alive. The Arinjāṅkavara temple at Melpadi was also built by him in the name of Arinjāṅga who had died at Arrur. (See M.F.R. 1921 Para 26). A temple in memory of Kulottunga I was dedicated apparently in the 7th year of Vikrama Chōla his son. It was called Kulottunga Chōlesvara. (M.F.R. 1695 Appendix B No 139 of 1695). The temple wherever it existed drew its income from three different sources —

u Religion
Lade
(a) The Temple—the centre of religious life

- (1) from the king and the ladies of the royal household
- (2) from private gifts and offerings and
- (3) from fines levied on delinquents made payable by the local assembly to the temple

Royal patronage took many forms—vide Rājārāja and Rājendra Chola's gifts and the donations of Sembiya mahādevi ante—but the most common form was the

(b) Temple income.

Maddagani I) They are described as Chōlaramakkalu or sons of the Chōlas. Instead of Chōla-mahārājas they call themselves Chōla-mahārasus. Only two of them are known—Bayirāja-Dēva and his son Rāmapa-Dēva. The former is styled Mahāmandalēsvāra. The connection of this family with the Nidugal Chōla chiefs is not mentioned in the inscription quoted above. (For other Chōla-mahārasus known from inscriptions found in the State, see M A R 1907, Para 45 and the references mentioned therein.) They belong to the 16th century and fall in the reign of the Vijayanagar king Sadāsiva Rāja and belonged to one and the same family. They were minor feudatories under the Mahāmandalēsvāra Rāma-Rājaya-Vithala-Dēva-Mahārāja's son Tirumala Rāja, who was ruling in Penukonda during the reign of Sadāsiva-Raja. For an earlier set of claimants to Chōla ancestry, see M E R 1907, Para 71.

Review of the Economic,
Religious and Social life of the People
Circa 850 to
1250 A D

Before closing the section relating to the Imperial Chōlas, it might be useful to briefly review the economic, social and religious life of the people of the period covered by their rule. The Imperial Chōlas ruled from about the middle of the 9th century A D, to about the middle of the 13th century A D (i.e., from Vijayālaya, 846 A D, to Rājēndira-Chōla III 1268 A D). During the major part of the four centuries, they ruled Southern India as a whole and had a centralized Government. Though war was a normal feature of almost every reign, there was, without doubt, material advance in the prosperity of the people. The Empire was divided into a number of provinces and each province was sub-divided into a number of districts, each of which again was made up of a number of villages, which largely lived on agriculture. The land was well cultivated, and was officially divided into different classes, for purposes of deriving the king's revenue from it.

temple as a whole was under the control of a committee or the local assembly its central shrine whose affairs required special attention was in the charge of a committee which would borrow at times money in advance and discharge certain obligations to the temple and make gifts to it on its own behalf and take up other similar responsibilities. Again in certain cases the temple treasury appears to have been in the charge of a committee. This committee was not merely a receiving and disbursing body but also possessed administrative powers, like the selling of the temple land on suitable conditions. The surplus in the temple treasury was in some cases, utilised for special purposes either with the consent or at the instance of the local assembly (See below). The temple bought and sold lands as it thought fit like any private party and kept strict accounts of its assets and liabilities. There were cases of embezzlement and enquiries by royal officers—as for example in the reigns of Uttama Chola Rajaraja I Ganderāditya etc. as already mentioned (M.E.R. 1911 Page 69 M.E.R. 1913 Para 33 M.E.R. 1910 Para 167 M.E.R. 1918 Page 142 M.E.R. 1922 Para 14 Appendix B No 208 also ante). But there is reason to believe that most of the temples were honestly managed and their accounts maintained on an efficient basis. An inscription from Tirukoilur mentions that the temple committee recovered from a person ten cows on the evidence of an entry in its accounts that his grandfather had received ten cows from a chief for the purpose of supplying curds for feeding Brahmans in a Matha.

The temple had absolute control over its property for a charity once made in favour of a temple could not be recalled even by kings. Hence we see that the temple wherever necessary farmed out or commuted its revenue and leased out its lands perpetually to private individuals, receiving reasonable advance payment and agreeing to

(d) Its property

Supervision" and "pancha-vāṇa-vāṇiyam" The former probably regulated the currency, while the latter is said to have supervised the work of the five other committees of the village. This latter suggestion originally made by Mr Venkayya (M E R. 1899, Para 53) has been recently given up. Panchavāravāṇiyam was a tax or due levied on land-holders (of mēlvaram) and this committee was charged with its collection (M E R. 1913, Para 33). According to inscriptions of the time of Rājaraṇa I, there were certain other committees as well, for example at Brahmadēsam, one for managing the affairs of the village called grāmakārya or ālumu ganavāṇiyam, and another for managing the affairs of the (local) temple called Srīkārya or Kōvil vāṇiyam. In an inscription assigned for palæographical reasons to the 12th century A D, there is reference to an Irrigation Committee as a branch of the village assembly (M E R. 1925, Para 17, No 110 of 1925). Another Committee was the Sabha-vāṇiyam. (M E R. 1923, Para 25, Appdx. C No 74). There were accountants attached to each of these committees (M E R. 1916, Para 8) and they acted as arbitrators as well. There were apparently as many committees as circumstances required it. In Brāhman villages—such as Uttaramallur, Brahmadēsam, etc. the assembly (called Sabha) was composed entirely of Brāhmins. In other villages the assembly was composed of all the residents, in which case it was called ūṇm. Where it was composed exclusively of merchants, it was known as nagarattōm. While the rules relating to the first of these classes of assemblies are known, no special mention of those regulating the ūṇm and nagarattōm varieties have come down to us. It is not unlikely that most, if not all, of the conditions pertaining to membership in the Brāhman Sabhas applied to these also except the high literary qualifications (knowledge of a whole Vēda) prescribed for it. These committees were, according to the modern sense. The Ennaviram Tribhuvani and Tirumukkudal temples are good examples of this type of charity. (See ante. M F R 1918 Paras 27-28. M F R 1919 Para 15 and 1916 Para 16. See ante.) Specialisation in grammatical studies was encouraged at the Tiruvorivur temple. The grammar hall maintained at that temple has been already referred to. The study of Aspitaśra theories Upana Paikhinasa Sister and the Ledra are mentioned in grants referred to above. There are a number of records referring to grants of land made for expounding the Prabbakaram or the Siddhānta (or system) of Prabhākara who lived about the 8th century A.D. Thus we are told in one inscription that some lands were presented to certain Brahmans for expounding it in the temple of Nagesvara at Kumbakonam (M F R 1912 Para 19). In the Innayan record a similar provision is made (M F R 1918 Para 28). In a Vatteluttu inscription at Tirukk. shittiyur dated in the 11th year of Rajakesarivarman (probably Rajaraja I) a grant for the same purpose is mentioned (M F R 1921 Para 13 Appendix B No. 133 of 1923). Hospitals were located in temples maintained by private endowments and gifts often of lands. This is clear from the grant recorded in favour of an ātulasāla in the 5th year of Virarajendra (=1069 A.D.). This hospital was located in the Jananātha shrine of the Mahāviṣṇu temple at Tirumukkudal. The hospital was called Virasōlan and was provided with fifteen beds for sick people. There were attached to it besides a physician and a surgeon, two nurses as well. Medicines required for a year were apparently stocked in it. (M F R 1916 Para 16 Appendix B No. 182). It is of interest to note that Virarajendra not only restored the grant as a temple gift 75 kalanju of gold that the inhabitants of the village in which the hospital was situated had subscribed for to the ātulasāla but also the taxes of that village

Qualifications for Committee
Membership

According to the later rescript, adopted by the Assembly of Uttaramallur, this village of 12 hamlets—which may be taken to represent its class—was divided into thirty wards and the people of each ward were to assemble and choose men for what was called “pot-tickets” (Kūdarōlai). The following were the qualifications which one was to possess if he wanted his name to be entered on the pot-ticket and put into the pot —

(a) He must be the owner of more than a quarter (vēli) of tax-paying land, (b) he must have a house built on his own site, (c) he must be below 70 and above 35 years of age, (d) he must know the Mantra-brāhmaṇa, i.e., he must know it himself and be able to teach it to others.

Thus not only a high property qualification was required of an would-be member, but he was also to fulfil a high intellectual (or literary) test, and the restrictions relating to over-age and non-age had to be satisfied. These qualifications, however, did not suffice. Among those possessing them, only those who were well conversant with business and conducted themselves according to sacred rules were to be chosen. These, further, should have acquired their wealth by honest means, should possess pure minds (i.e., uncorrupted by evil influences), and should not have been on any of these Committees during the three years preceding their selection. A lowering of the property qualification was, however, allowed in one case. It was ruled that even if one owned only one-eighth (Vēli) of land—the prescribed extent was one-quarter—he was entitled to have his name written on a pot-ticket, and put into the pot in case he had learnt one Vēda and one of the four Bhāshyas and could explain it to others. In the 11th year of the reign of Rājārāja I, we hear of the Village assembly of Uttamachola-chaturvēdimangalam meeting in the temple and laying down an amendment to this rule. The

to co-operate with the temple Mohasvaras in making the collection of this tax a success (See ante, V E R 1923 Para 43 Appendix B No 537 of 1922)

Women were closely connected with temples especially for serving them in different capacities. First as servants proper for example for husking paddy. A grant in the 19th year of Rājārāja III refers to the gift of five women with their descendants to the Tiruvorriyur temple for this purpose (V E R 1913 Para 42 Appendix B No 211). This is a private gift slavery of a kind being common during the period of which we are writing. An actual sale of four women to a temple is recorded in another inscription. The sale price paid for them was 700 Adru. It was evidently a common way of providing the requisite labour for temple purposes as the record does not suggest the enslavement as due to famine or the poverty of the parties concerned (V E R 1913 Para 37 Appendix C No 80). Women were next required for service as padiyilārs as dancers trained to do service on occasions. With the growth of the Saiva cult a high value was set on dancing as a fine art. Rājārāja III is said to have visited the Tiruvorriyur temple where sitting in the Rājārājen mandapa he is said to have listened to singing in the style called agamārgam by one of the padiyilārs attached to the temple. Next, we have mention of women who entered service under the temples as dēvar-adiyāl literally servants of god (M E R 1922 Appendix B No. 230 and Appendix C No 141). Then there were others who had learnt dancing and followed it as a profession. From the days of Rājārāja I, they were attached to temples in certain numbers. In the time of Rajēndra-Chōla I we hear of gifts of land for performing dances before the gods. (M E R 1915 No 65 of 1914). An inscription in the temple of Kurumbandal (Chingleput District) records the grant of

(f) Women and the temple

knew nothing of the matter, was to hand over to the standing priest one of the packets from the thirty wards. The contents of the packet were then to be transferred to the empty pot and well shaken. From this pot one ticket was to be taken out by the young boy and made over to the arbitrator. While taking charge of the ticket, the arbitrator was to receive it on the palm of his hand with five fingers open. He was then to read out the name on the ticket thus received. The ticket read by him was also to be read by all the priests then present in the Hall. The name thus read out was put down and accepted. Similarly one man was to be chosen for each of the thirty wards. Of the thirty persons, thus chosen, those who had previously been on the "Garden Supervision" and "Tank Supervision" Committees and those who were advanced in learning and those who were advanced in age were to be chosen for the Committee for "Annual Supervision." Of the rest, twelve were to be taken for the "Garden Supervision" Committee and the remaining six were to form the "Tank Supervision" Committee. The last two Committees were to be chosen after, it is stated, an oral expression of opinion, of their willingness, probably, to serve. The members of these three Committees—they are called "great men" in the inscription—were to hold office for full 365 days and then retire. If any one on any of the Committees was found guilty of any offence, he was to be removed from office at once. For appointing the Committees after one set of them retired, the Committee for "Supervision of Justice" was to convene a meeting with the help of the arbitrator. Their selection was to be by drawing pot-tickets as set out above. For the panchanara-vāriyam and the Committee for "Supervision of Gold," names were to be written for pot-tickets in the thirty wards, thirty packets with covering tickets being deposited in a pot and thirty pot-tickets being drawn as appear to have kept up a high standard of life—they were not infrequently married women—but later when the local assemblies lost the control of the temples they degenerated into 'Slaves' of men and not of gods. The disappearance of monasteries and a system of dedicated service in the temples did not prove an unmixed good. Monasteries gave opportunities for women for some centuries to fit themselves by education. Such education was in their own hands and the role they filled as nurses, servants and proficient in music and dancing showed that it was not altogether ill used. The disappearance of the monasteries in or about the 10th century, and the decay of temples after the power of the village assemblies over them broke down, about the 13th century virtually meant the denial of an independent life to unmarried women as a class.

Both Buddhism and Jainism inculcated the worship of the teacher (or guru). With the gradual subsidence of these faiths and the rise of the cults of Śiva and Viṣṇu the worship of the 'guru' received an additional impetus. The propagators and popularizers of these faiths took the place of the older gurus. The Vaiṣṇava Ālvāra and the Śaiva teachers thus came to be closely associated with the temples, about which they sang in their hymns. Shrines were attached to existing temples and sometimes independent temples were erected for their worship. Rājārāja I is said to have provided for the recital of the Śaiva hymns included in the Dēvāraṃ (S I I II 252 No 65). Rājendra Chōla was the first to set up the images of some of the more famous Śaiva saints in the Rājārājesvara temple at Tanjore. (Ibid 166, Nos 40 and 41). Numerous inscriptions attest to the great fame they enjoyed with the masses. Their hymns became highly popular and were set to music and special provision was made for singing them

(g) Temples and Teachers

was issued. The mode of selection of members prevalent in the 10th century combined the advantage of the modern elective principle with that of drawing lots, thus eliminating the human, and substituting for it the divine.

In regard to village accounts, it was ordered by Parāntaka that "arbitrators and those who have earned their wealth by honest means shall write the accounts. One who was writing the accounts shall not be appointed to that office again until he submits his accounts (for the period during which he was in office) to the great men of the big Committee (in charge) of the accounts, and is declared to have been honest. The accounts which one has been writing he shall submit himself, and other accountants shall not be brought to close his accounts." (M.E.R. 1899, Para 67). Those who acted against the interests of the village—eg, acting against the village as such or against its institutions, such as the temple, etc,—were held to be grāma-kantakas or grāma-dīḥins and were subjected to certain well-known penalties—being disallowed the privilege of "touching Siva, etc." (M.E.R. 1911, Para 30).

Towns and Trade

Though the Chōla empire was mainly an agricultural country, there is reason to believe there were a few towns in it. Tanjore, Gangaikondasōlapuram, Kānchi, Kolai and many other places would in those days have been not only fairly large-sized and populous but also attractive as the capitals of the empire. Highways connecting the capitals are indicated by the terms Vaduga-vazhi, etc., found in the inscriptions of the period. Roads should have been maintained and beautifying of cities was not unknown. Lands required for making roads were, on acquisition, removed from the account of taxable lands (M.E.R. 1913, Para 38). Trade went on at markets and fairs. At the fairs, imported articles appear to have had a ready sale, while at the weekly markets, the local famous saint. In many ancient temples of the Tanjore District this ceremony of making the image of Vanikyaachakar hear his own favourite hymn is said to be observed to this day (M.E.R. 1913 Para 37 Appendix B No 121) Such a recital appears to have been not only quite common but was also extended to other well known Vēdic pieces. Thus we read of a deposit of 20 Karunkāṣu being made with a temple by a private individual for the purpose and its authorities lending it on interest. The three Kāṣu they thus obtained as interest annually they awarded to the best reciter of the Jaimini Sāmavēda on the asterism Tiruvadirai in the month of Mārgaḷi. It is found stated in the inscription that no prize-winner should compete a second time (M.E.R. 1924 Para II Appendix B No 266 of 1923)

The Saiva saints had not only shrines dedicated to them in the temples but had also mathas set up in their names. These were also attached to the temples. These are first heard of from about the 10th century A.D. A matha or rest-house under the name of Tiruvāḡisan Rājendra Solan was built by Rājendra Chōla I in the 12th year of his reign (=1024 A.D.) at Uyyakkondān Tirumalai (M.E.R. 1909 Para 53 Appendix B No 467 of 1908). In the 13th century there were quite a number of these mathas in existence. These were presided over by Saiva sanyāsins called Mahesvaras or Sivayōgins (M.E.R. 1909, Appendix B No 177 of 1908 and 164 of 1908) and they were scattered throughout the Chōla dominions. These became centres of the Saiva faith whose catholicity attracted many adherents from all classes of people. A number of these mathas named after Tirugnānasambandhar and Appar, also called Tirunāvakkarasar are found all over the Tamil districts of Madras Presidency some of them being presided over by Mudaliyārs (M.E.R. 1909 Para 53 and M.E.R. 1911,

(h) Mathas attached to temples.

of the same caste, and states that they penetrated the regions of the six continents by land and water routes and dealt in various articles such as horses, elephants, precious stones, perfumes and drugs, either wholesale or retail (E C VII, Shikarpur 118) This boast of the mercantile community is confirmed by the existence of stone records even in Ceylon and Burma which refer to their several gifts in those countries The Vaishnava temple at Pagan in Upper Burma was built by the merchants (nānādēsi) of that town (E I VII 197) A Basinikonda record states that the community consisted of nādu, nagara and nānādēsi (M E R 1913, Para 25) They were apparently in a flourishing condition during the Chōla period of rule, for they not only built temples and endowed them from their earnings, but also declared towns as Nānādēsiya-Dasamaḍi Eriṇṇapattanas and bestowed some privileges on their residents (Ibid). There is ample evidence to believe that corporate life was in full vigour among the professional classes apart from that of the Village Assembly (M E R 1916, Para 9)

The King's Revenue

The king was expected to govern and meet his own charges As he was probably the largest land-owner, he should have done this with ease The successful wars should have secured him considerable booty from which to build temples and beautify his capitals, imperial and provincial The land revenue should have brought in an increasing revenue as the result of the surveys again and again referred to in the inscriptions from the time of Rājaiāja I All land was taxed, the taxes being collected under the two heads of Ūṇar and Uzhuvirar (M E.R. 1916, Para 10) Even lands gifted to temples were not free from taxation, such lands could be made tax-free by the payment of an extra amount (Ibid) The other taxes levied were many but their incidence is still hardly made out An inscription of Vīraiājēndiadēva (A D

with the temple. If war was a perpetual distraction the temple was an eternal attraction. Successive kings of the time made the temples not only a source of spiritual inspiration but also a meeting centre for man and woman for young and old. If the booty taken in war by kings was spent on the erection and beautification of temples the poorest villagers were ready to lay out their hard earned cash in founding charities small and great in connection with them especially with those with which they were locally connected. Even the fines collected for wrongs done were spent on charity in close co-operation with those in charge of sacred shrines. Life in the village accordingly evolved round the rural or city temple and it was for that reason none the worse. The popularity that it enjoyed with the masses may therefore be more readily imagined than described. People believed in their temples in more senses than one and their expectations were not belied. A daily visit to the local temple—so common even to this day to the Indian—should in those days have been not only a source of spiritual consolation to the visitor but also the satisfying of a social craving for him. The causes for this are not far to seek. The temple was in a word the centre of social and religious life of the local community and a man king and peasant alike could not any more avoid it than isolate himself in his own home. Thus we read in one record of Rajarāja I dated in the 9th year of his reign (=A.D. 994) of a theatre and dances as adjuncts of the temple. This inscription refers to a gift of land to a professional actor by a rural assembly for staging the seven acts (anākas) of the Ārya kuttu (themes from the Sanskrit Purāṇas) on the festival day in the month of Purattas (September-October). Provision is also made in the record for the supply in connection with the staging of this kūttu, of rice flour betel leaves and areca-nuts and ghee for mixing collyrium and turmeric. (V E R 1925 Para 13 Appendix B No 120 of 1925). An inscription of the 46th year of

of the same caste, and states that they penetrated the regions of the six continents by land and water routes and dealt in various articles such as horses, elephants, precious stones, perfumes and drugs, either wholesale or retail (E C VII, Shikarpur 118). This boast of the mercantile community is confirmed by the existence of stone records even in Ceylon and Burma which refer to their several gifts in those countries. The Vaishnava temple at Pagan in Upper Burma was built by the merchants (nānādēsi) of that town (E I. VII 197). A Basinikonda record states that the community consisted of nādu, nagara and nānādēsi (M E R 1913, Para 25). They were apparently in a flourishing condition during the Chōla period of rule, for they not only built temples and endowed them from their earnings, but also declared towns as Nānādēsiya-Dasamadi Eriwīnapattanas and bestowed some privileges on their residents (Ibid). There is ample evidence to believe that corporate life was in full vigour among the professional classes apart from that of the Village Assembly (M E R 1916, Para 9).

The King's Revenue

The king was expected to govern and meet his own charges. As he was probably the largest land-owner, he should have done this with ease. The successful wars should have secured him considerable booty from which to build temples and beautify his capitals, imperial and provincial. The land revenue should have brought in an increasing revenue as the result of the surveys again and again referred to in the inscriptions from the time of Rājaiāja I. All land was taxed, the taxes being collected under the two heads of Ūṇṇar and Uzhuvīrar (M E R 1916, Para 10). Even lands gifted to temples were not free from taxation, such lands could be made tax-free by the payment of an extra amount (Ibid). The other taxes levied were many but their incidence is still hardly made out. An inscription of Vīraiājēndiādēva (A D.

fellow beings and for his native village—was highly developed in the people. People freely gave up their lives not only for those to whom they were personally attached—as servant and master or sovereign and subject—but also for seeing to the safety of the communities and villages to which they belonged. Many records are available in the Mysore State to testify to this trait. (Rice Mysore and Coorg 166 188) We have on record the instance of a priest giving up his head for the benefit of a hero who was then engaged in fighting a battle (V & R 1908-9 Para 73). An inscription of the 8th year of Rājārāja I (=A D 993) records that a man lost his life in protecting his native village. The good folk of the district provided a perpetual lamp to burn in his name in that village to secure eternal merit for him (M. E. R. 1913 Para 22). In another record mention is made of four persons entering fire and giving up their lives as a protest against the usurpation of temple property (V & R 1925, Para 21).

Casto though recognized was not the rigid social system it became afterwards. It never seems to have interfered with the occupation chosen by a man. Thus we find Brāhmins not only as ministers students of the Veda and priests, but also as soldiers and generals. (M. E. R. 1913, Para 33). Similarly we find Vaisyas and Kshatriyas more interested in Vedic education if inscriptions can be any guides to us. In this matter Society was protected against crimes and personal wrongs by the administration of equal justice which was tempered by mercy. Besides the examples quoted already in the foregoing pages it might be mentioned that considerations of social status or birth do not appear to have stood in the way of the infliction of suitable punishments on delinquents (Ibid Para 34). Heavy fines were imposed for rioting and for disturbing the public peace (M. E. R. 1925, Para 22 No 80 of 1925). The punishment

Protection of society
against malefactors.

Money

In the sub-sections on Coin and Currency, included under the reigns of the more important kings, the coins in circulation during their periods are given. Judging from inscriptions, the Kalanju appears to have been the most popular gold coin of Chōla times. An inscription of the 14th year of Rājarāja records a grant of this gold coin, by the Bāna queen Arinjingapuñāṭṭiyār, daughter country and that such service was readily recognized and amply rewarded by the people at large. Equally striking are the records which mention gifts to temples and the feeding of Sṛayāgins well versed in the Vedas for the welfare of the ruling king. The spirit of loyalty and reverence for the sovereign was apparently an ingrained virtue in the people of Southern India (V.E.R. 1918 Para 41 also ante).

A number of Chōla inscriptions found in the Pāndya kingdom (mainly in the Tinnevely District) establish beyond doubt the conquest of the Pāndyan country by the Chōlas and the exercise of their sovereignty over it. That the Chōla domination over it dates from the time of Rājārāja I seems also fairly certain. The earliest inscriptions found are of his time dated between his 23rd and 27th regnal years. He is called in them Nīgarīl Chōla and Chōlendra Simha two of his well known titles. Inscriptions of Rājendra Chōla I dated in his 3rd and 4th years of Rājendradūva dated in his 3rd year and of Kulōttanga I dated in his 80th year have also been found. Though many Chōla kings earlier than Rājārāja claim to have invaded the Pāndya country and even had successful contests with its rulers—for example Parantaka I, Sundara Chōla Parāntaka II and Uttama-Chōla—it is Rājārāja who finally succeeded in subverting the Pāndyan kingdom and establishing Chōla rule in it. This is also made evident from the surname Rājārāja mandalaṁ applied to the Pāndya country in the inscriptions of the Chōla rulers found in it. In the reign of Rājendra Chōla I, the Pāndyas appear to have rebelled but he soon put them down. As mentioned above the Pāndyan king took to flight and Rājendra Chōla I superseded him and appointed instead his own son to rule over the Pāndyan kingdom as his viceroy. This political step effectually put an end to further trouble from that quarter until we granting of villages or lands for the benefit of the temple. Another was the making over to the temple of taxes due to the State. Still another form was remitting taxes on lands gifted away to the temple. Among the taxes exempted from were the following — siddhāyam, pancharāram, silluṇai, echchōru, kūrr-arisi, ārrukkāl-amanṇi, ērkkādi, pādaganellu, ulavarai, nirvilai, etc. (M E R. 1923, Para 31). Where the villages granted were declared tax-free, all the taxes collected in it were to be made over to the temple treasury and not to the king's treasury. Such exemption of payment into the king's treasury was called nīngal. Among the taxes which were thus made payable to the temple instead of into the Royal Exchequer were the following — Vetti, pudavar-mudal, tirakkāsu, āsuvi-galkāsu, kudai-kāsu, fee levied on uvachchais and on looms, navari-kāsu, vēlichchinnam, vetti-kāsu, siropādikāval on lands growing gingelly and cotton, grain for supervision (kankām), kurra-dandam, patti-dandam, kārtigai-kāsu on oil-mongers, fee on dyers, and arisi-kāsu on salt-pans. All these probably represented petty taxes, payable in cash or in kind. The Tiruvorriyur temple enjoyed these taxes and a dispute about their levy was decided in its favour. The villages whose taxes were thus made payable to the temple were called dēvamandalam, i.e., god's domain. (See M E R 1913, Para 42).

Chōla
Pāndyas

(c) Its management

As regards management, every temple was in the management of a Committee. Where no separate committee existed for the purpose, the village assembly acted as the trustee for the charities connected with it. Apart from what was in the hands of trustees, money meant for special services was left in the hands of the priests (Varikkhānasa) who conducted them. When they failed to carry out the objects of a trust, they were compelled to compensate in land or money according to the kind of the office held by them. In large foundations, while the

and Rājādhirāja I. If this be so then Māravarman Vikrama Chōla Pāndya was another son of Rājendra Chōla I. The next prince that ruled the Pāndya country must have been a Sundara Chōla Pāndya without any distinguishing name. Four records of his reign have been registered. He appears to have been ruling at Rājendra Solapuram (M E R 1917 Appendix B No 327). The apigraph which records this fact refers to a gift of land by him after purchasing it from the Sabha (or assembly) from Rājārāja Chaturvedimangalam (i.e., Ambāsamudram). Another grant of this king is dated in his 17th regnal year and records the fact that it was made with the sanction of the uncle (Anuman) which doubtless signifies the ruling Chōla Emperor whose identity cannot be made out in the absence of the exact year which corresponded to the 17th year of Sundara Chōla Pāndya. That the latter cannot be the prince Jatavarman Sundara-Chōla Pāndya son of Rājendra Chōla I above-named because he is termed his nephew and not his son seems clear. Perhaps he was as suggested by Mr H. Krishna Sastri the successor of Māravarman Vikrama Chōla Pāndya and a nephew of Rājādhirāja I. Another inscription refers to Jatavarman Chōla Pāndya Deva and describes him as the son of Virarājendra Chōla I. He also ruled from Rājendra Solapuram (M E R 1917 Appendix B No 643). He has been identified with prince Gangakandasōlan on whom Virarājendra I is stated to have conferred the title Sōla Pāndyan (E I VI 293 S I I III 36 M E R 1917 Para 3). Two more inscriptions of his occur at Suchindram (E I VI 293). Other inscriptions of his ranging from his 4th to 21st year are referred to in M E R 1908 Para 41. Another Chōla-Pāndya prince known is Māravarman Parākrama Chōla Pāndya for whom we have inscriptions dated in his 3rd and 4th years. In the latter of these inscriptions a gift by one Yōgadēva and his wife Sōmldevī of Kashmir receive a certain amount annually thereafter. It transferred at will, if necessary, the obligations previously set upon one class of people to another, while in a few other cases the communal maintenance of a charity was agreed upon in spite of odds. If necessary, again, the communal responsibility for the conduct of the charity was discharged and the same entrusted to an individual. The temple also served the purposes of a registration office—as already remarked—its records being engraved on its stone walls and re-engraved with care when the structure was rebuilt, under official supervision. (See M E R 1922, Paras 66-69 and the authorities quoted therein).

(e) Its duties and responsibilities as to, hospitality, education, medical aid, etc

The temple was, however, not merely the receiver of gifts and the executor of trusts through the agency of its Committees. It had also to discharge many other duties cast on it. Among these were the following —

(a) hospitality and charity, (b) imparting education, (c) affording medical relief, and (d) acting as a Bank to the village assembly in case of need.

As regards the first of these functions, numerous inscriptions can be quoted to show that the temple provided facilities for feeding Brāhmins, local and foreign, and the poor. Grants were received specially for this purpose. Also for providing various amenities to the temple. An inscription dated in the 30th year of Rājendra-Chōla I, registers a sale of land made tax-free, to a temple for making a flower-garden and for feeding Srivaishnavas in a matha called after the king's aunt Sri-Kundavaiyālvār (M E R 1913, Appendix C No 184 of 1923). As to imparting education, some of the larger temples appear to have maintained colleges for promoting higher studies in Sanskrit literature, logic, grammar and philosophy. Free boarding was provided for students studying in them. These colleges might be termed universities in 1332.

11. 2. 10
 12. 2. 10
 13. 2. 10

(which are named) and other fees as well (also specifically named) The mantapa in which the hospital was located was built by a local donor, a Vaisya, Mādhava by name, who it is said revived the charities and built the surrounding halls (Ibid) The grants made by Kundavai, sister of Rājēndra-Chōla I, for an ātulasālai have also been referred to already. (M E R 1924, Para 14, see ante) The temple, besides, served the purpose of a bank for various purposes Thus, we are told in one record that the village assembly of the place borrowed money from the temple treasury and purchased house sites, etc., and paid interest on the amount thus borrowed Instead of interest, however, it agreed to pay all the taxes levied on the lands, thus relieving the temple of all liability from taxation From a record of the 31d year of Rājēndra-Dēva, we learn that the famine-stricken inhabitants of a village, who could not obtain any help from the royal treasury, turned to the local temple treasury and secured sufficient funds from it by the sale, apparently of temple jewellery, gold and silver The village assembly alienated land in return in favour of the god The lands were in different areas and were accordingly consolidated They were later made tax-free by a royal decree (M E R. 1899, Para 53) How a small temple in distress or difficulty was helped with funds by a larger one from its treasury is also referred to in inscriptions The members of the village assembly of the large temple resolved in session to impose on themselves a tax of 20 Kāsu per head, Brāhmans and Mahēsvaras, "distinguished barely by the sacred thread," paying 10 Kāsu each This shows, nobody—even the poorest Brāhman wearing but the sacred thread and the Mahēsvara subsisting on temple charity—was exempted from this taxation. The amount was paid in cash or kind into the temple treasury and then converted into a capital fund for being expended on worship, offerings, etc. The temple servants were ordered

On the conquest of the Gangas by the Cholas in 1004 A D the Hoysalas or Hoysalus rose to power in the west of Mysore and eventually, in 1116 A D expelled the Cholas and became rulers of the whole country which they held till the middle of the 11th century. They were of indigenous origin claiming Sosevur or Sosavur—Sasakapura of Sanskrit writers—as their birth place. This place has been identified with Angadi in the south of the Mudgere Taluk (E C VI Mudgere 9 15 16 and 18) of the Kadur District formerly included in the Manjarabad country. This was the scene of the incident between Sala and the tiger related in so many inscriptions which led to his becoming the founder of the Hoysala dynasty (Ibid Chikmagalur 20 and 137). The temple of Vasantikadūvi at which it occurred is still represented by the present Vasantamma temple which enjoys a great local reputation. There are other temples there in ruins containing some fine carving which indicate its former importance. The name Ingadi means a market or shop a rather rare thing in that mountainous region covered with forests (cf Uppinangadi Belladangadi Hosangadi etc in South Kanara District). The change from Sosavur to Angadi appears to have taken place during the Vijayanagar period and was as suggested by Mr Rice, perhaps due to political motives. (E C VI Introd 14). Thus in 1359 A D under Bukkarāya the place is called Sosavūr (Ibid Mudgere 25) but in 1530 A D, under Achyuta Rāya it is, according to an inscription in the Belur Taluk called Angadi. The Hoysalas were accordingly, to start with a family of hill chiefs in the Western Ghats of Mysore,—the Malepas over whom they rose to become predominant thence assuming the title of Maleparōl-ganda or Malaparōl-ganda which is used as their signature in some of their grants, and also appears on their coins (E C VI Introd 14). They claim to be an allowance of paddy and gold to twenty-four dancing girls attached to it (M E R 1893, Para 14) In the reign of Kulōttunga-Chōla III, we hear of dance masters being appointed to temples, apparently to train the women attached to them. (M.E R. 1925, No 255 of 1925) In the reign of Rājarāja III, we have evidence of the prosperity enjoyed by dancing women and the gifts made by them to temples Such gifts were recognized by the grant of certain privileges to them in the temples—e.g., waving of fly whisks before the images during the car processions, etc (M E R. 1923, Para 41)

Position of Women

The position of women in the Buddhist period was largely influenced by the monastic system Down to the 12th century A D, a devoted religious life afforded not only a career but also a position in society Some of the nuns were of royal rank and to the majority of them even secular learning was not forbidden. Tending the sick, managing the lands attached to the monastery, and the care of the establishment gave them ample opportunities to exercise their talents. To women of ability—as Nāgiyakka of the Prabauddhavihāra—the system should have been of considerable attraction, though the recruiting of Sāvāsīs or lay sisters should have enabled many married women to remain outside the monastic fold. During the 10th and 11th centuries, the recruiting wars led to a complete break up of the system The decay of Buddhism which occurred about the 8th century had already contributed not a little to this dissolution In the religious revival that followed, both Saivism and Vaishnavism endeavoured to fill the void thus created but the conditions were far different In the altered state of affairs, women could only be absorbed into the temples for purposes of “divine service” (dēvaradyāḷ), or as mere servants who, having been entered up for service, tended to remain hereditarily so, Dēvar-adyāḷs at first

Taluk (V I R 1916 Para 69) It also occurs in an inscription dated in 1006 A D found at Kalihar on the opposite side of the river to Talkād (E C III Tiruvankudlu Narsipar 41) The name also appears as Poyana Hoyana and Hoyala in Kannada inscriptions and as Poyichala Pochala, Hoyichala and Huyichala in Tamil inscriptions. In view of the earlier occurrence of the name Poyala it is a question whether the story narrated of Sala should not be shifted back to at least half a century anterior to 1006 A D the date so far reckoned as the initial year of the Hoyala dynasty The Kalayur inscription refers to a battle that was fought between certain Poyala leaders and Aprameya the Chola general who probably was killed in it This would seem to indicate that about the beginning of the 11th century A.D. the Hoyalas had already made themselves felt as far south-eastwards as Talkād Whether the Hoyala king referred to in this inscription is Sala is discussed below

Hoyala inscriptions are most numerous in this State though they are also found in the Bombay and Madras Presidencies and to a small extent in Coorg as well. They range from South Arcot in the East to Coorg in the West and from Sholapur in the North to Panjora if not Rāmāvatam in the South.

Hoyala
inscriptions
and where they are found

At first the Hoyalas acknowledged the suzerainty of the Western Chūlakyas but became independent in the reign of Viśhanvardhana As stated above, their most famous capital was Dūrasamudra, now represented by Halebid in the Hassan District. Prior to that place becoming the royal seat Sasavur and Belur had had the honour of being the capital In the time of Ballāla II, Kannanur near Srīrangam in the Trichinopoly District, became an alternative capital After the destruction of capitals.

Hoyala

at the temples. The encouragement thus given to them furthered the cause of music as a fine art. Devotional songs were thus familiarized among the people and even kings are reported to have attended musical displays and festivals of this kind at the more famous temples (M E R. 1912, Para 12, M E R. 1913, Para 14). In an inscription of the time of Rājādhirāja I, mention is made of the images of the Bhaktas or 63 Saiva saints and to Nambi Āndānambi's Tiruttondantōqai, where the history of these saints is detailed (M E R. 1913, Para 24, Appendix B No 137). An inscription of Rājaiāja III records a gift to the shrine of Sīruttonda-Dēva at Tiruchettangudi; while another mentions a gift for providing offerings on the day he obtained salvation at the hands of Siva. (Ibid., Para 42, Appendix C. Nos 63 and 69). Among the more famous of these Saiva saints, whose hymns have obtained a reputation as great as the Vēda itself, are Mānikyavāchakai, Appai, Tirugnānasambandhai and Sundaiar. Their hymns were collected together by Nambi Āndān Nambi abovenamed, but the collection is not by any means complete. Recently a number of hymns of Tirugnānasambandhai were found engraved on the walls of a temple at Tiruvadavayal, Tanjore District, which are not to be found in the Dēvāram as it has come down to us (M E R. 1918, Part I, Para 19; and Part II, Para 34, Appendix C No 8 of 1918). As they are part of an inscription dated in the 18th year of Rājārājadēva, they have to be assigned to the time of Rājārāja II, or about the middle of 12th century A.D. Provision was also made in certain temples for the reading of the Dēvāram, the collective name given to the hymns. Thus a gift is recorded in an inscription of Rājādhirāja II, dated in his 5th year, for reciting Tiruvembāvai of Mānikyavāchakai before his image on the day of Tiruvādirai in the month of Mārgaḷi, December-January; Tiruvembāvai was the most favourite hymn of this and killing it has been told above. Nothing historical is known about him. An inscription which has been assigned to about 1220 A D assigns to him the founding of Sasākapura. (E C V Belur 112). In view of the fact that the name Hoysala occurs as early as about 950 A D the eponymous hero Sala has to be antedated to some time anterior to that date. References in later inscriptions—of the time of Vinayāditya I his son Nripakāma and his son Vinayāditya II—suggest that the Hoysalas were connected on the one hand with the Gangas and on the other with the Western Chālukyas. They had apparently as much by their own exertions as by marital alliances with the royal houses slowly risen to power from the position of petty hill chiefs to that of a ruling dynasty.

Inscriptions relating to Vinayāditya range over a long series of years. If all these belong to only one king of that name, then he should have reigned for 88 years from 1012 to 1100 A D. As the cognomens assumed by him indicate that he was a Chālukya subordinate he should have been the contemporary of the three successive Chālukya kings Vikramāditya V, Somesvara I and Vikramāditya VI. Mr R. Narasimhachār who has discussed this question at some length has suggested that as there is evidence of the rule of a king named Kāma Hoysala during this period the existence of two kings of the name of Vinayāditya should be postulated—one the father of Kāma Hoysala and the other his son. As this suggestion explains the available facts it may be tentatively accepted. On the basis of this assumption the periods of rule of the three kings would be thus apportioned—Vinayāditya 1006 A.D. his son Kāma Hoysala 1022-1047 A.D. and Vinayāditya II 1047-1100 A.D. (M A R 1916 Para 83).

Vinayāditya I 1006-1022
A.D.

All the inscriptions so far met with put Vinayāditya after Sala. Some state that there were kings between Para 31). Branches of the Gōlakimatha, founded by the disciples of the Gōlaki-vamsa of Āryāvarta, are spoken of in two inscriptions of the Pāndyan king Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya. The Gōlakimatha is referred to frequently in the inscriptions of the 13th century found in the Kurnool District (M E R 1924, Para 30). Similar mathas are spoken of in connection with Vaiṣṇava temples as well. A Vaiṣṇava matha appears to have been established at Tiruvadandai by the residents of that place and provision made in it for free feeding. (M E R. 1914, Para 26) A gift of land to provide for the reading of the Mahābhārata, the Rāmāyana and the Purāṇas in a matha built by two brothers and in the immediate presence of the god of Tiruttangal, Madura District, in the 5th year of Māravarman-Sundara-Pāndya is known. (M E R. 1923, Para 50, Appendix B No 546 of 1922). In later days these mathas are known to have enjoyed great popularity and to have exercised considerable influence over the temples. Pilgrims from abroad found hospitality and residence in them. Special provision in cash is provided, for instance, in one inscription, for feeding itinerant ascetics in the Virapanditan Tirumadam at Tiruvālisvaram in the Tinnevely District. These mathas appear to have served a useful purpose as teaching and disciplinary institutions. They maintained teachers for the different sāstras. (M E R. 1923, Para 50) Apparently in the reign of Kulōttunga-Chōla III, some of these had fallen into evil ways and were accordingly raided and suppressed under the king's orders in his 22nd year. It is evident that the suppression was attended with rioting of some kind as the term kukai-idi-kalaham shows; it distinctly involved destruction of monastic caves and rioting of more than ordinary dimensions. (M E R. 1913, Para 42, see ante)

iii Social Life the temple as a social centre.

As in the religious sphere so in the social, the life of the community was, during this period, largely connected

Apramēya is not only said to have defeated Nāganna the Poysala minister but also killed in battle the Poysala leaders Manjaga Kaliga (/ Kaliganga) Nāgavarma and others and himself apparently lost his life in the battle that was fought on the plains of Kalavur (EO III Tirumakudin Varsipur 44 Text and Translation)

The significance of the Kalavur (or Kaliyur) battle deserves to be noted. It probably refers to the beginning of a series of struggles which closed only with the complete evacuation of the Mysore country of the Chōlas and its occupation by the Hoysalas. The events recorded in the Honnaru Rājēndrapura, and Gundatteranya inscriptions perhaps indicate the fights of the border land between the Hoysalas on the one side and the Chola feudatories (the Kongūlas and the Changālas) on the other apparently during the reigns of Rājarāja's successors Rājēndra Chōla and Krlōttunga Chōla I. Tamil inscriptions of Rājēndra Chōla I and other Chola kings down to Krlōttunga Chōla I refer frequently to battles fought at Kampili, Kollapnram, Koppam, Kndal, Sangama and Nagali against their Western Chālukya foes. It is not improbable that in some if not all of these the Hoysalas took an active part on behalf of their overlords, the Western Chalukya kings. (Krishna Sāstri The Hoysalas in MSJ II 114)

Nripa Kāma or Kāma Hoysala son of Vinayāditya I, probably began his rule about 1022 A.D. There is now no doubt whatever of his having actually ruled over the Hoysalas. He was, as stated above, the father of Vinayāditya II (See EO V Arsikere 141 and 157 M.A.R. 1016, Para 83). He is in a few records described as a Mahāmandalēsvara (EO VI introd 14). An inscription of his 7th year gives his alternative name as Rāchamalla-Pērmadi (Rājamalla-Permadī-yenipalāma-Voysala). Rāchamalla Pērmadi is as remarked by

Nripa Kāma or Kāma Hoysala, 1022-
1047 A.D.

Kulottunga-Chōla III (=1122 A.D.) registers a gift of land and cash by a village assembly, which met for the purpose, in the local Vishnu temple for the maintenance in the temple of a theatre called Nānāvīdu-nātasālai, apparently a theatre whose repertoire was so great as to be able to provide variety entertainments of many different kinds (Ibid, No. 152 of 1925). There are other instances of gifts of a similar nature on record. Thus we have a gift of land for the performance of the dance called Sakkar-kūttu, while another provides for the dance Sandikkūttu (M E R No. 65 of 1914 and No. 253 of 1914). Dancing was a favourite pastime of the period. The cults (of Krishna and Siva as Natarāja or king of Dances) gave an impetus to dancing. The encouragement given to dancing should have familiarised people with the Bharata Sāstra, of which we have full sculptural representations on temple walls (See ante). Rājārāja I, in providing for the great temple he built at his capital, brought and settled in it as many as 400 dancers collected from the several temples in his dominions (S I I II 259). His son Rājēndia-Chōla I, as we have seen, made endowments for enacting a drama called Rājārājēsvarā-nātaka by an expert in Sandikkūttu (Ibid, 306-307). Rājādhirāja I is known to have made a similar provision in favour of an actor and his troupe for their services in one of the temples (M E R 1908, No. 264 of 1907). A record of Kulottunga-Chōla III mentions the appointment of an additional dancing master in a temple. He had to dance, according to the inscription, with gestures—apparently in accordance with the Bharata Sāstra. (M E R. 1908, No. 306 of 1907). Rājārāja III, as noticed above, attended the performance at a temple of agamāṅgam by an expert Paḍiyilāi (M E R 1913, No. 211 of 1912).

Social instinct highly developed in the people

There is considerable evidence to believe that the social instinct—the instinct which impels a man to feel for his

Vikramāditya VI (1076-1126 A D) He appears to have extended his rule to Gangavadi 96 000 (E C V Belur 200 dated in 1073 A D) Another record describes him as having ruled as far as Talkad (E C V Arkalgud 102a) This is further confirmed by another inscription which states that he was ruling over hill and dale. (Ibid Arkalgud 67) How exactly he came to claim the Ganga dominions over which he extended his jurisdiction is not clear It would seem as if Gangavadi which was in the possession of the Cholas from the time of Rājārāja I was regained by the Chālukyas already in the time of Somēśvara I The statements made in the Tamil records of the Chola kings do not militate against this inference for it is stated that Vikkilan (i.e. the Yavaraṇa Vikramāditya VI) had actually been driven from Gangavadi over the Tungabhadra by Virāṇaṇdra I and that subsequently to this event the daughter of the Chola sovereign was given in marriage to Vikramāditya perhaps on political considerations. (H Krishna Sastri The Hoysalas in V S J II 115) But according to one record he had we are told the six letters Ru kka m Po-ysa lu inscribed on his flag which is a possible reference to connection with the Ganga king Rakkasa In one record whose date is not certain but which describes Vinayāditya II as still ruling over his kingdom we have its boundaries thus mentioned — Honkana (North Kanara) Ulvakhada (South Kanara) Bayalnad (Wainād) and Talkad (S E of Mysore District) and Sāvinale a hill somewhere to the north not yet identified (E C VI Chikmagalur 160) In another record dated in Saka 954 coupled with Sureajitu (a mistake for Prajāpati Saka 970 or A D 1047) he is called Tribhuvanamalla Poysala Deva. It records a grant by the 1 000 of Talkad tho. 1 000 of Kirunagara and the dēsis of the 18 countries. (M A R 1914 15 Para 76) A minister of his was Mahāsandhivigrahadandanāyaka Pūchinmayya, the son for misappropriation of temple funds was compulsory sale of the hereditary rights in the temple of the delinquent. Audit of temple accounts by royal officers was usually followed by the recovery of the misappropriated property. (M E R. 1915, Para 23) On the other hand, men who did good to the village or its temple, or afforded relief in providing better facilities against floods and in times of scarcity received special honour. Thus a Kaniyālan who in the 22nd year of Rājārāja III rendered valuable services to the people of a village and the foreigners who had sought shelter in it during a season of distress and helped to maintain the usual services in the local temple, was given the privilege of entering the temple armed with a bow, of receiving half the emoluments of the persons who carried the images of the gods in procession, of getting a house in the temple premises and to have the order containing these details engraved on stone (M.E R 1918, Para 41; also ante) Not infrequently public benefactors of this kind expected no return for their public charitable work. Thus we hear of private individuals purchasing lands for the purpose of laying out roads through which the images of the gods in the local temple had to be carried in procession. Such lands were made tax-free but the benefactor himself was content to be left alone (M E R 1913, Para 39) In a record of Rājārāja II, it is stated that a large number of persons made a similar grant of land for laying out a road called Rājagambhīra-tīruvīdi for the local god to pass to the river Kollidam for the sacred bath festival. The inscription adds that 750 cocoanut trees were to be planted and cherished on both sides of the new road (M.E.R. 1915, Para 26; No. 45 of 1914). Another who filled up a pit in his village and took precautions against the encroachment of the river was honoured with the gift of a house in it (See ante) These instances ought to suffice to show that men were ready to yield to the higher instinct of service to the community and the the Īdinātha basti are of the triple and the Triparāntika of the double type. Descriptions of these temples will be found in the Chapter on Architecture and Sculpture above.

Ireyanga does not appear to have ascended the throne. He probably predeceased his father. An undated record describes him as Mahāmāndalesvara Vira Ereyanga Hoysala Deva and as 'ruling the kingdom in peace and wisdom' apparently by himself and as having dug two tanks (E C VI Kadur 33). Two other records represent him in the same fashion (Sravana Belgola 144 and E C V Channarayana 118 dated in 1093 A D). A recently found inscription at Devihalli in Halebid hobli dated in 1095 A D describes him similarly as Mahāmāndalesvara and as ruling the kingdom (by himself) at his capital Dvāravatī i.e. Dorasaṃodra. (M.A.R. 1921 No 19). But as another record dated in 1096 A D states that he was associated with his father as Yuvaraja (Ibid Kadur 142) the inference seems plain that he was ruling as co-regent of his father and no more. He was a general under the Western Chālukyas and is spoken of as a powerful right arm to the Chalokya king (Sravana Belgola 327-345). We are told that he trampled down the Malava army burnt Dhara and laid it in ruins (E C IV Nāgamangala 30) dragged down the Chōla king and plundered his camp and broke and ruined Kalinga (E C VII Shimega 61 also E C VI Arkalgud 102a Belur 58 Hassan 65 Arkalgud 117). The last of these records Arkalgud 117 states that the Malava king's hill fort which was too strong for the Chalukyas he without effort plundered while the Chalukya was looking on. His success against the Dhāra king is said to have established the standard of his (the Chālukya Emperor's) fame in the north (E C VI Nāgamangala 30). In performing these victorious feats Ereyanga

Ereyanga,
1032-1033
A D 1100
A D 1

come to the declining period of Chōla rule Rājēndia-Chōla appears to have taken possession of the Pāndyan country not later than the 3rd year of his reign and in the 5th and 6th years to have turned his attention to the conquest of the Kēralas In an inscription found at Mannārkōil, in the Tinnevely District, mention is made of the land survey of the village made in the 9th year of Rājēndia-Chōla under a royal decree issued by him (See M E R 1917, Appendix B 400, para 2)

Chōla Princes
as Viceroys in Pāndyan
Kingdom

Chōla princes serving as viceroys in the Pāndya country are known from their lithic inscriptions found in it One of these was Jatāvarman-Sundara-Chōla-Pāndyadēva, a son of Rājēndra-Chōla I, many of whose inscriptions have been traced (M E R 1905, Para 25, No 115 of 1905, M. E R. 17, Para 3, E I XI, No 30) Some of his inscriptions begin with the historical introduction of his father A probable surname of his is Manavīa-Paiāntaka (M E R 1917, Appendix B No. 630). Another prince was Mānavarman Vikrama-Chōla-Pāndya, many of whose inscriptions have also been found in the Pāndya country One of his inscriptions mentions the queen Ulagudaiyāl of Rājēndia-Chōla I, the conqueror of Gangai, Kidāram, and the Eastern Country She might have been the mother of the prince (M E R 917, Appendix B 623) Another inscription refers to the inner circuit of a temple named Rājādhinājan-surrālī The prince was either another son of Rājēndia-Chōla I or a son of Rājādhirāja Mr H Krishna Sāstri has drawn attention to the fact that in the historical introductions of Rājēndra-dēva, a younger brother of Rājādhināja I, the former is stated to have conferred on one of his royal younger brothers, the victorious Mummadi-Sōlan, the title Sōla-Pāndyan He thinks it is not unlikely that Mānavarman-Vikrama-Chōla-Pāndya is identical with this Mummadi-Sōlan, the younger brother of Rājēndia-dēva

Channarayana 169) He recognises the suzerainty of the Western Chulukya king Vikramāditya VI from whom he took the cognomen Trihuvanamalla. He is referred to in inscriptions as Trihuvanamalla Poysala Deva. He visited Sasavur in 1100 A.D. (E.C. V Belur 199) but made Belur his capital (E.C. IV Nagamangala 32 E.C. VI Chikmagalur 160). The boundaries of his kingdom are given as those that existed during the time of Vinayāditya II (E.C. IV Nagamangala 32 E.C. V Belur 199). In 1103 A.D. he married simultaneously the three daughters of Marivāno Dandanāyaka and Chāmavo (E.C. IV Nagamangala 32 E.C. VI Chikmagalur 160). This event is referred to in the inscriptions as of some interest. These three daughters of Marivāno were, it would appear so highly accomplished and skilled in science singing and dancing that they were (we are told) worthy to grace the capitals of three separate kings. These three girls—Padmala Devi, Chāmala Devi and Boppa Dēvi by name—Ballala I wedded on the same day in one pavilion confirming their father in the lordship of Hindagere as the wages for their wet-nursing. Marivāno dandanāyaka was apparently a devout Jain. With the merchants of Belegorepattana he set up the Jain image in the basti at Hatna in the Tiptur Taluk the image being consecrated according to an epigraph on it by the Jain teacher Śubhāchandra (M.A.J. 1918 Para. 93). Marivāno and his brother rose to high military rank in the reign of Bitti Deva. In the year 1104 A.D. Ballala I appears to have led an expedition against Changāla Dēva (E.C. V Hassan 161 162). With his brother Vishnu he is also said to have put down the pride of the Pāndya (the Pāndya king of Uchchangi) and seized the wealth of his kingdom. He also helped his brothers in beating off Jagaddēva's attack on Dōrasamandra and capturing his treasury and the central ornament of his is recorded in favour of a temple at Sermadēvi. How this prince was related to his predecessors or to the Chōla Emperor of his time is not known. (M.E.R 917, Appendix B 329 and 613) A still another Chōla-Pāndya prince is referred to in an inscription found at Perichchikōyil, Ramnād District (M.E.R. 1923-24, Appendix C 99). It mentions a certain Jatāvaṛman-Vīra-Sōla-Pāndya, in whose 21st year it is dated. He has been identified with Jatāvaṛman-Chōla-Pāndya-Dēva, the third of the princes abovenamed, who was the son of Vīraājēndradēva (M.E.R 1923-24, Para 25).

Thus, there are at least four Chōla-Pāndya princes known to have ruled over the Pāndya country as Chōla viceroys — Jatāvaṛman-Sundara-Chōla-Pāndya, Māra-vaṛman-Vikrama-Chōla-Pāndya, Jatāvaṛman-Chōla-Pāndya alias Jatāvarman-Vīra-Chōla Pāndya, and Māra-vaṛman Parākrama Chōla Pāndya.

Their rule
over Kērala

That the Chōla-Pāndya princes ruled over the Kērala country as well is established by certain inscriptions found at Mannārkōyil and Sermadēvi in the Tinnevely District. In one of these, dated in the 14th year of Sundara-Chōla-Pāndya, the third of the princes named above, mention is made of a gift by Adichchi, queen of the Chēra king Rāsingadēvar, to the temple of Rajēndra-Sōla Vinnagar, the present Gōpalaswāmī temple at Mannārkōyil, which, according to another record, was built by Rāsinga (i.e., Rājasimha) himself. (M.E.R 1905, No 112). Another inscription of the 22nd year of Māra-vaṛman-Vikrama-Chōla-Pāndya found at Sermadēvi mentions the quarter called Sēiamaṇār-Velam (M.E.R 1917, Appendix B 620).

Genealogical
Table of the Imperial
Chōla
Dynasty

The following is a table of kings of the Imperial Chōla dynasty. The pedigree has been revised with the aid of materials available up to the end of 1926.

Ballāla I was succeeded by his younger brother Bitti Deva better known as Vishnuvardhana. His other younger brother Udayāditya also survived him. Udayāditya took part in 1116 A D, in the war against the Chōlas, which ended in the recovery of Talkad Kolar and the whole of Gangavādi generally. He evidently joined in the pursuit of the remnants of the Chola forces from across the Kolar border for we are told that his daughter died at Vijayitamangala modern Botamangala in the S E of Kolar District (E C VI Chikmagalur 70). He appears to have lived till 1123 A D, when he died at Kellavatti in Nurgundanad. Apparently Vishnuvardhana was affectionately disposed towards him. For we are told he granted in his memory the village in which he lived as a rent-free agrahāra to the Brāhmins dependent on him (i.e. Udayāditya) forming it into 18 shares of which two were assigned for the god Janardhana which had been previously set up there (E C V Hassan 102). Udayāditya's son Ereyanga II appears to have made a grant in favour of the son of a person who devotedly gave up his life on the same occasion (M A R 1916 Para 85). Of this Ereyanga II we know no more. A Kodage grant of Udayāditya is recorded in Hassan 173 which is undated. Udayāditya however is best known as the builder in 1120 A D of Seringapatam (M A R 1907 Para 87).

Bitti Dēva
or Vishnuvar
dhana 1111
1141 A D His brother Udayāditya.

Bitti Dēva, younger brother of Ballāla I and older brother of Udayāditya was, perhaps the greatest of the Hoysala line. He is celebrated as the rescuer of his country from the Chōlas and the establisher of the independence of the Hoysalas. By his many conquests he greatly extended the boundaries of his kingdom. The year in which he began his reign is not yet definitely ascertained. The Hallukadi betta inscription is dated in his 12th year but no Saka or Chālukya-Vikrama year is

Date of accession of Bitti Dēva

reigns of the three Chōla kings Kulottunga-Chōla I (1070 to 1120 A D.) Vikrama-Chōla (1118 to 1135 A.D) and Kulōttunga Chōla II (1135 to 1145 A D) As already mentioned Rāmānuja's last period of life fell in the reigns of Vikrama Chōla and Kulōttunga Chōla II If the conversion took place actually in or about 1016 17 A. D. as suggested by Mr. Rice then Rāmānuja should have been about 100 years old and the alleged persecution would fall into the reign of Kulōttunga Chōla I There is no evidence whatsoever of persecution of Vaishnavas during the reigns of Kulottunga Chōla I Vikrama Chōla and Kulottunga Chōla II As they were themselves founders or supporters of Vaishnava temples the story of the persecution seems a later invention and may be given up as baseless Rāmānuja, however, does appear to have visited the Hoysala kingdom and converted king Bitti Dēva. His sojourn in Mysore is reflected in certain inscriptions which may be referred to here The actual reason for his visit to Mysore may have been the existence of a number of Sri Vaishnavas in the Hoysala kingdom during the period he lived These as we have seen are referred to in many inscriptions dated in the pre-Rāmānuja period According to tradition, Rāmānuja is said to have visited all the Vaishnavite shrines north and south, and if there is truth in this statement (we might well believe in it) then his visit to Mysore is capable of easy explanation without the embellishment of the story of his having been persecuted by the reigning Chōla king He is believed to have reached Mysore from Srīrangam by way of the Nilgiri hills. Among the places visited by him are said to be Vahnipushkarini a place on the Canvery about 40 miles west of Mysore Mirle and Saligrāma about 10 miles eastwards and then Tonnur or Tondanur where Bitti Dēva then had his capital and actually resided. At Tonnur it was that he converted Bitti Dēva and made him change his name to Yādavas and of the Lunar race, and bear the title Lord of Dvāravatīpura (which represents both Dvāraka in Kathiawār, the reputed capital of Śrī Krishna, the hero of the Yādavas, and their own capital Dōlasamudra). The first few kings of the line were Jains, and the progenitor of the family was Sala. It is of him the story above referred to is told. On a certain occasion, when he went to worship at the temple of his family goddess Vasantikādēvī at Sosavūr (above named) and was receiving instruction from the Yati there, a tiger bounded out of the forest, glazing with rage. The Yati hastily snatched up his rod—described as betta and in other ways (E C V, Introd 10)—and handed it to Sala, saying Poy Sala (i.e., Strike, Sala). Whereupon Sala hit it and killed the tiger, finishing it off perhaps with his dagger (E C V, Belur 171). Moreover, from the rescued Yati's exclamation, Sala assumed the name of Poysala, of which Hoysala is a variant. This story or a modified version of it is repeated in all the accounts of the origin of the dynasty (see E C V, Introd ix-x) and then crest on temples exhibits a free standing group of Sala stabbing a tiger (see E C V, Frontispiece), while the seal of copper-plate grants shows a dead tiger and the rod (E C IX, Bangalore 6). According to an inscription at Sorab, the Yati mentioned in this story was Sudatta (E C II, Sravana Belagola 28) and according to another, he was named Vardhamāna Munīndra (E C VIII, Nagai 46). Other inscriptions state that the Yati had been brought by Sala from some other place and had been established for some time at Angaḍi when the incident occurred (E C III, Nanjangud 38 and 39).

Derivation of the names
Poysala,
Hoysala, etc.

The name Poysala occurs in the name of the Rāshṭra-kūṭa feudatory Poysalamaruṇa mentioned in the early inscription of about 950 A D, of the time of Annigeri, the Nolamba king, at Hosahalli, near Marale, Chāmarājane Nagai.

Ramānuja was known before he became a sanyāsin. There is no doubt that Tonnur was then the capital of the Hoysala kingdom for it is described as such in Mysore 16 dated in 1128 A D. Its alternative name was Yadvapura or Yadvanurayana chaturvedi mangalam (E C III Seringapatam 64 dated in 1722). Another undated inscription of Vishnuvardhana found on a pillar of the mantapa in front of the Lakshmi-devi shrine in the Lakshminārāyanasvami temple at Tonnur states that the mantapa was built under the orders of Vishnuvardhana by his Vahāpradhānu (Prime Minister) Surigeya Nāgajya. The traditional date of Ramānuja's visit to Tonnur is 1099 A D which it will be seen does not fall in the reign of Vishnuvardhana but in that of Vinayāditya his grand father. It is possible that he actually reached there earlier and that he was in the Mysore State sometime before Vishnuvardhana's accession to the throne. If the date 1099 A D may be depended upon Rāmānuja must have reached Tonnur in his 82nd year and converted Bitti Dēva 26 years later taking it for granted that the conversion took place in or about 1116-1117 A D (See M.A.R. 1907 1908 Paras 37-40). Similarly an inscription in the navaranga of the Nārāyanasvami temple at Melkote records that Surigoyya Nāgādēvanna the builder of the mantapa at Tonnur made a grant for the god. This confirms to some extent the traditionary story that Rāmānuja built the Melkote temple with the aid of Vishnuvardhana. (V A R. 1912 Para 84). Then again a much worn inscription in characters of the 12th century has been found on the door lintel of the Srīpada tirtha pond in the Rāmānjāchārya temple at Baligrāma. It confirms in a way his visit to that place. After obeisance to him and a Sanskrit verse in his praise it records in Kannada that Embar Āndān and Achān of the matha (i.e. the Rāmānjāchārya matha) of Srīrangam granted some privileges to the Dōrasamudra by the Muhammadans, Tiruvannāmalai, in the present South-Arcot District, became the capital

Chief Hoysala titles

The Hoysala kings had many distinctive titles, but those most commonly appearing in their records are the following — Yādava-kulāmbara-dyumanī (sun in the sky of the Yādava family), Samyaktva-chūdāmanī (crest jewel of perfect devotion), Maleparōl ganda (champion over the Malepas or hill chiefs), Bhujabala-pratāpa-chakravartī (strong-armed illustrious emperor), and from the time of Ballāla II, Dakshina-chakravartī or Tenkana-chakravartī (emperor of the south)

List of Hoysala kings

The following is a list of Hoysala kings as made out from their extant inscriptions —

Sala, Poysala or Hoysala	Circa 10th century A D
Vinayāditya I	1026 A D — 1022 A D
Nripa Kāma or Kāma Poysala	1022 A D — 1017 A D
Vinayāditya II	1017 A D — 1100 A D
Ereyanga I (only Yuvarāja)	1063 A D — 1095 A D
	(? 1100)
Ballāla I	1100 A D — 1106 A D
Bitti-Dēva or Vishnuvardhana	1111 A D — 1141 A D
Udayāditya	Died 1123 A D
Ereyanga II (son of Udayāditya)
Nārasimha I or Pratāpa-Nārasimha	1143 A D — 1173 A D
Ballāla II or Vīra-Ballāla	1173 A D — 1220 A D
Nārasimha II or Vīra-Nārasimha	1217 A D — 1235 A D
Sōmēśvara or Vīra-Sōmēśvara or
Sor-Dēva	1234 A D — 1262 A D
	(According to the Badanalu inscription, his initial year was 1228 A D and according to Krish-narājapet inscription he died in 1256
	A D)
Nārasimha III or Vīra-Nārasimha	1254 A D — 1291 A D

Sala, Circa 10th century A D

Of the time of Sala, no records have been found. He may be taken to be the mythical founder of the Hoysala dynasty. As Romulus was to the Romans, so was Sala to the Hoysalas. The story of his striking the tiger take place to some date between 1100 A.D. and 1116 A.D. the year in which the Chōlas were expelled from Talkād and in which the new name occurs for the first instance. We may not be far wrong if we set down 1113 A.D. as the actual year in which the event took place.

Shortly after his conversion Vishnuvardhana appears to have entered on an extensive range of conquests.

First among these was the capture of Talkād the old Ganga capital in which the Cholas had established themselves. This exploit was accomplished by his General Ganga Raja, who was also one of his ministers in or about Saka 1039 or A.D. 1117. An epigraph dated in that year (E.C. III Malavalli 31) contains a lively version of the story. It is narrated that Ganga Raja appeared before Talkād and summoned Adiyama (also called Idiyama, probably a corruption for Adigaima), the Chōla representative in command of the army there to surrender. Adiyama haughtily refused to give up the country which his master the Chola king had put in his charge and defiantly said: "Fight and take it (if you can)." Thereupon the two armies met in battle and Ganga Rāja gained a great victory, defeating Adiyama and putting to flight the chief Dāman who barely escaped with his life as Ganga Rāja was just about to cut him through the belt on his back, showing that he had already turned to flee, running off with the utmost speed in the direction of Kānchi, one of the Chola capitals. Ganga Raja followed up this victory with so much vigour that he also put to flight Narasimhavarman identified by Mr. Rice as a Pallava subordinate of the Chōlas, but more probably the Milādī chief mentioned in the Tirukōilyur inscriptions who was a contemporary of Rājendra Dēva and all the other feudatories of the Capture of Talkād 1117

A.D.

these two (E C V, Kadur 51 and 16), others represent Vinayāditya as the son of Sala (Ibid, Chikmagalur 20), while some others seem to identify Vinayāditya with Sala (Ibid Kadur 143). If Mr. Narasimhachār's view proves acceptable, which seems to be supported by Kadur 51 and 16, then the Vinayāditya mentioned in Chikmagalur 38, dated in the Vikrama-gāla (i.e., the Vikrama Era) 1060, cyclic year Paridhāvi, should be set down to Vinayāditya I (See E C VI, Intro 15, where the date is given as 1070 Vikrama Era). The inscription has since been correctly read by Mr. Narasimhachār as 1060 of the same era (M A R 1916, Para 83). Though the use of the Vikrama Era in connection with the Hoysalas is rare, there is no doubt that is the era that is meant. Though 1060 Vikrama Era and Paridhāvi do not correspond, Mr. Narasimhachār does not doubt the genuineness of the inscription. The cyclic year actually corresponding to 1060 Vikrama Era is Subhakṛitu, and as the cyclic year should, in cases of this kind, be taken as correct, we arrive at 1070 of the Vikrama Era (=1012 A.D.) as the date intended for the grant recorded in the inscription. He was a subordinate of the Chālukya king Vikramāditya V, after whom he took the additional title of Tribhuvanamalla (E C VI, Chikmagalur 38). The Jain work Bāhubalīcharitasataka mentions Vinayāditya, but it is uncertain whether the reference is to Vinayāditya I or his grand-son Vinayāditya II. He was probably the Hoysala king, whose general Nāganna was defeated by Apramēya, the general of the Chōla king Rājarāja at Kalavūr. It is interesting to note that the inscription which gives details of this battle (E C III, Tnumakudlu-Naisipur 44) gives Apramēya, the Chōla commander, among other titles, the one "the king of Death to the race of Malepas" (Malepakula-Kālam). As mentioned above, the Hoysalas describe themselves as the "Lord of the Malepas" (Maleparōlganda).

The retreat of one sector of the Cholas must have been accordingly by way of Kalar (E C VI Chikmagalur 70) The retreat of the others appears by way of Talamala in the present Coimbatore District (E C IV Nagamangala 76) In this record one of the time of Narasimha I son of Vishnuvardhana we are told that Vishnuvardhana from Talamala onwards trod the mighty spreading ghāts to powder with the tramp of his armies, and crossing over them pulled the areca and cocoa nut groves and the teak plantations on the other side as if plucking out the moustaches of Kanga and Chengiri Before the attack on Talkād commenced Vishnuvardhana commanded Ganga Rāja, his general to ask for a boon which he said he would be pleased to grant on the confident assumption he would succeed He asked for a piece of land in Bindiganavale, which was granted to him Ganga Rāja duly made over this land to his guru Subhāchandra Siddhāntadeva (E C IV Nagamangala 91) Of Dāma, whom he pursued we have further particulars in another record (Saravana Delgola New Edn 240 = Old Edn 90) From this record we learn that his full name was Dāmodara that he was a Chōla Sāmanta and that he had astonished people by his valour which had put to flight many in any number of battles At last he met his equal in Ganga-Rāja who defeated him and put him to flight He took refuge in the forest and dared not show himself again in the battle field for fear of death The further information is given that after escaping the blows from Ganga-Rāja's sword Dāmodara lived like a Saiva ascetic eating from a skull (or potsherd) from which (oven) a dog will not eat It would appear that Ganga-Rāja, after the battle, marching alone rapidly taunting and making them (the Chōla forces) lose courage, put them to flight He also put to flight Narasingavarman and all the other sāmantas of (the) Chōla (king) above the ghāts and brought the

Mr Rice, a distinctive title of the Gangas, and it is not clear how he came by it, unless indeed he was the son by a Ganga princess. This would suggest intermarriage between the Gangas and the Hoysalas (E C VI Intro 15). That he ruled up to at least 1027 A.D., is clear, for his inscriptions dated up to that year are known. An inscription of his 7th year has been referred to above, another dated in 1022 A.D., and a fourth in 1027 A.D., are also known (E C VI, Mudgere 19, E C V Manjarābad 43, Arkalgud 76 and Manjarabad 44). In 1022 A.D., he appears repelling an attack by the Kongālva king. The enemy's general Kannana seems to have singled out Nriipa-Kāma as his opponent, but the latter's general Jōgayya came to his rescue by charging against Kannana's horse and killing him, but lost his own life in the attempt (E C V, Manjarābad 43). In 1026 A.D., we find him opposing the Kongālva king and claiming a victory at Manni (Ibid Arkalgud 76), and in the succeeding year helping apparently the Kadambas of Banavāsī. (Śravana Belgola 44=118 of New Edn), which describes him as the patron of Echam or Echiga, the father of Ganga-Rāja, the Hoysala general, who, in 1116 A.D., captured Talkād and drove the Chōlas out of Mysore.

Vinayāditya
II, 1047-1100
A.D.

Nriipa-Kāma was succeeded by Vinayāditya II, who is actually described in Arkalgud 157 and 141 as his son, Ātana tanaya (E C VI). His name appears also as Binayāyta and Vinayāta (Ibid Arkalgud 179 and 102a). He was born at Sosavur, which was doubtless his capital (Śravana Belgola 56). Hoysala-Dēvi, one of the queens of the Chālukya king Sōmēśvara I (1042-1068 A.D.) was possibly a sister of Vinayāditya II (E C VII, Honnali I). He was a feudatory of the Chālukyas, like his forbears and so took the cognomen of Tribhuvanamalla (E C VI, Kadur 161), after one of the titles of

we have a reference probably to the invasion of Madura

On Pandya flourishing his sword Hoysalesa cut him down with his own sword, and left only half a man to look on in the Tigala army

Ganga Raja also appears to have driven off in a night attack the Chālukya army encamped at Kannegāl near Hassan By these successes he caused Vishnuvardhana to stand erect i.e. enabled him to assume independence (Soronu Belgola New Edn. 73=Old Edn. and 9 and 210=Old Edn. 90) These two records thus graphically describe the manner in which Ganga Raja beat off the forces Vikramaditya sent against him — When the army of the Chālukya Emperor Tribhuvanamalla Peruvadi Deva including twelve admantas (or tributary chiefs) was encamped at Kannegāl this Ganga Raja saying 'Away with the dream to mount a horse this will be a night battle for me attacked and defeated with ease all the admantas so that people said that the sword in the arm of Ganga dandadhīpa caused the men of the army who were entering the camp to enter mine carried off the collection of their stores and vehicles and presented them to his own lord

The Chālukyas
def. led at Kannegala.

Another general Panisa Raja is said to have 'frightened the Todas (the well known aboriginal tribe on the Nilgiris, drove the Kongas (the Tamils) under ground (or perhaps to the low country) slaughtered the Polnvas put to death the Malayālas (the people of Malabar), terrified king Kalo and offered up the peak of Nilgiri (the loftiest point in the Western Ghāts overlooking Malabar) to the goddess of victory (E C IV Chāmrājnagar 83) The record which mentions this conquest of the Nilgiris also adds that on receiving the king's order, Panisa seized Nilādri and pursuing the Malayālas captured their forces and made himself master of

Conquest of Nilgiris.

of Dandanāyaka Echimayya. This Pōchimaya built a Siva temple somewhere near Arsikere. (E C V, Arsikere 194, as revised, M A R 1910-11, Para 97) His queen was Kaleyabbarasi, and had a son by her named Ereyanga. She took considerable interest in promoting a marriage between Marīyāne-Dandanāyaka and Dekavedandanāyakitti. On this Dandanāyaka, Vinayāditya II bestowed in honour of the marriage, in 1048 A D, the lordship of Sindagere (Ibid). In a record at Mattavara, dated in Saka 991, Cyclic year Ṗingala (which should be Kīlaka), he is described as having built a basti at the place for the convenience of the people and richly endowed it. Taking the Cyclic year as indicating the correct date of the grant, the record has been assigned to Saka 1000 or A D 1077 (M A R 1916, Para 84). He was apparently a devout Jain. A Sravana-Belgola record dated in 1129 A D states that he became a great king by the favour of the Jain teacher Sāntidēva (Sravana-Belgola 67-54 Old Edn). Another states that he built any number of tanks, temples and Jain shrines, besides many nādus (districts) and villages (Ibid 143). The erection of Jain temples is thus related — “The pits dug for bricks became tanks, the mountains quarried for stone became level with the ground, roads by which the mortar-carts passed became ravines—thus did king Poysala cause Jain temples to be built.”

Entirely in keeping with this statement is the progress that architecture and sculpture made in his reign. The first temples built in the Hoysala style have been attributed to it — the Basavēsvara temple at 'lonachi (Circa 1047 A D), the Jain basadi at Angadi (Circa 1050 A D), the Kēdarēsvara temple at Balagāmi (Circa 1060 A D), and the Tripurāntaka temple at the same place, (1070 A D), the Kaitabēsvara temple at Kuppattūr (Circa 1070 A D) and the Ādinātha-basti at Chikka Hanasoge (Circa 1090 A D). Of these, Kēdarēsvara and northern regions. Having succeeded in this expedition to the north he is said to have defeated the Pandvas and others. We are told, in highly hyperbolic language that he sought out and subdued every country, hill fort or king that was famous. He having gained the fame of Kripa and Arjuna why asks another record should there be a separate Bhadrata story? Is not the history of King Vishnu enough? (E C V Hassan 53) This record states that its description is as mere eulogy. That the northern expedition included an attack on Dhāra which had been brought to great fame by king Bhūjo, is also specifically stated in this record. His expedition against Mālwa and against Kānchi and the east generally is however discredited by Sir John Fleet (Bombay Gazetteer 197-198) who stigmatises them as "undoubtedly fictitious or hyperbolic. But his southern expedition has been confirmed as mentioned above by recent discoveries of inscriptions in the Trichinopoly District. There is, therefore some ground for believing his northern expedition as well especially in view of the definite language used in Hassan 53 which is one of the reign of Nārasimha I son of Vishnuvardhana. The capture of Chakragotta carries the scene of his activities into the present Bastar State in the Central Provinces. Chakragotta has been identified with the country mentioned in the Bastar records of a line of kings who claimed connection with the Sinda family. The Somēsvara of this line defeated by Vishnuvardhana may it has been suggested be the one who ruled and died before 1113 A.D. If this is so this victory against the Sindas should have been gained by him while he was still a Yuvorja ruling with his brother Ballāla I (Krishna Sāstri The Hoysalas M.S. 118). All the same his northern expeditions were not as uniformly successful as his own inscriptions would have us believe. The Sinda records maintain that at the request of must be taken to have acted as a feudatory of Vikramāditya VI. He was a devout Jain, his guru being Gōpanandī, to whom he made a grant in 1094 A D. (E C. V Channarāyapatna 148). He appears to have had two queens Echaladēvi and Mahādēvi. The latter is spoken of as a Chōla princess and is referred to at length in Arkalgud 102a (E C. V). She built a tank at Tereyūr, identified with the village of the same name in the N -E angle of the Tumkur District (E C V, Introd. XI-XII). Apparently, she belonged to a local Chōla family which ruled over a part of Tumkur District. It should, however, be added that her father Irukkavēl belonged to a family of chiefs who were military officers under the Chōlas and had frequently intermarried with them. Irukkavēl's father, Pāndya, rendered valuable service to Vikramāditya by driving out his treacherous brother Sōmēsvara II and bestowed the kingdom on him. This, he should have done as an officer under the Chōla king Vīrarājēndia I who claims in his Tamil records to have conquered the seven and a half lakshas of Rattapādi and bestowed it on Vikramāditya. This alliance should have for some time at least established peace between the Chōlas and the Chālukyas. (H. Krishna Sāstrī, The Hoysalas in M S J II, 115). Hemmadīarasu (or Hemma-māndhāta-bhūpa), who is described as a Ganga king and as the father-in-law of Ereyanga, must accordingly have been the father of Echala-Dēvi (See E C VII, Shimoga. 64). This Hemmadī-Dēva was in residence at Harige and ruled over Yedatōre-Mandala 1,000. By Echaladēvi, Ereyanga had three sons, Ballāla I, Bittī-Dēva and Udayāditya.

Ballāla I, 1100-
1106 A D

Of these, Ballāla I succeeded his grandfather on the throne in 1100 A D (E C V, Belur 199). His reign, however, proved a short one. Inscriptions dated in his reign have been found up to 1106 A D (E C V.

provincial capitals as well at which he resided at intervals of time. Thus in 1128 A D he was at Indavapura or Tonnur (EC III Mysore 16) In 1137 A D Bankāpura in the north and Talkād in the South are mentioned as his capitals (EC V Arsikere 144) Kolāla (modern Kolar) was another important city in the south

According to inscriptions, Vishnuvardhana had under him a number of able generals and ministers. Of the latter five are mentioned together as pancha pradhānar (cabinet of five ministers) and they apparently formed a sort of final court of appeal for the decision of important questions. (EC V Channarayana 260b) Foremost among his generals was Ganga Raja the conqueror of Talkād. A number of inscriptions collected in the Bravara Belgola and Hassau volumes refer to him — his pedigree his exploits and his pious deeds are given in them (see Bravara Belgola Introd. 51-57 EC V Introd. XIV) His father Ēcha also called Baudhamitra is said to have served under Nripa Kāma Hoysala. He had an elder brother called Banima Chamupa, apparently a general in the army. Among his many titles were Mahā-sāmānta-dhīputi and Mahāprachanda-dandanāyaka and Drōha-gharatta or Svāmīdrōha-gharatta (a mill stone to traitors to his lord). As he is described as a pūrṇa kumbha (vessel filled with water) for the coronation of king Vishnuvardhana, it may be inferred that he took a leading part in the king's coronation. He took part in the driving off of the Chālukyas at Kannegala in the capture of Talkād and in the conquest of Kongu Chengiri and other places. He was a great supporter of the Jaina religion perhaps the greatest after Chāmunda-Rāya. He is said to have taken great delight in gifts of food shelter medicine and learning. An eulogy of him states that he was the disciple of Suhhāchandra Siddhānta Deva and that he and ministers

His generals

necklace (E C V, Belur 58, E C IV, Nāgamangala 30). The reason for this attack of Jagaddēva on the Hoysala capital is not vouchsafed to us in any of the inscriptions which mention the event. The same Jagaddēva appears also to have 'stood encompassing the city of Anumakonda against the Kākatiya king Piōla, on behalf of his sovereign, the Chālukya emperor Tribhuvanamalla Vikramāditya VI. It looks as if in the latter part of his reign Vikramāditya did not exert the same influence on his subordinates as in his earlier years, and that, consequently some of them who were more adventurous than the others appear to have made an attempt to throw off the imperial yoke. Of such, Vishnuvardhana with his brother Ballāla and the Kākatiya king Piōla were, perhaps, prominent. In a record from Siavana-Belgola, Vishnuvardhana is stated 'to have drunk the rolling sea of the armies of the lord of Mālava Jagaddēva, and others sent by the emperor (chakrin).' Dr Fleet also concludes that, about the end of Vikramāditya's reign, there was an evident conspiracy of powerful chiefs to upset the Chālukya empire.

His death

Ballāla I probably died in 1106 A D. The circumstances of his early death are not known but certain inscriptions suggest that he probably fell a victim to some cruel ailment of which we have no particulars (Siavana-Belgola, New Edn Nos. 254 of 1398 and 258 of 1132 A D). According to these records, Ballāla I suffered from some terrible disease of which he was cured by the Jain guru Chārukīrti-pandita. According to tradition, as recorded in the Bhujabali-sataka of Doddaiya (Circa 1550 A D), Ballāla's life was threatened by some spirit, an enemy of his former birth, and Chārukīrti by saving his life got the title of Ballāla-jīvarakshaka (Siavana-Belgola Ins. Introd 31 and 63). He probably died from a recrudescence of the unnamed disease from which he is said to have suffered.

all these three by Ganga Rāja (Ibid 118 128 and 117) Ganga Rāja a elder brother a wife Jakkānabbe was also a pious and charitable lady. She built a tank and a Jaina temple. Her husband Dandanāyaka Ēcha son of Ganga Rāja's eldest brother Banma was even better known as a builder and donor. He is spoken of as having built Jaina temples at Kopana Sravana-Belgola and other holy places. He died by the rita of Sanyāsana. Ganga Rāja's son Boppa set up an epitaph for him (Sravana Belgola 381). This Boppa is said to have driven out the Kongas and other arrogant adversaries who were thorns to the country. He built the Jaina temple Trailōkyarājana, also called Boppānācātvalnya, after himself (Sravana Belgola 120). When Ganga Rāja died in 1133 A.D. Boppa erected in his honour the Parsvanatha basti, naming it Drōha gharatta Jindālaya after one of the titles of his father. He also built the Sāntisvara basti at Kambadahalli, Nagamangala Taluk also in memory of his father (M.A.R. 1915 Para 78 E.C. V Belur 124). Boppa in latter years, was in immediate attendance on the king. He it was, who in 1141 A.D. brought down the king's body from Banbāpura where he died to Mudgere. (E.C. VI Chikmagalur 96). He was probably the Boppānā who is described as Bitti Deva's general and is said to have made an attack in 1120 A.D. on Bhojabala Ganga Pemmādi Deva and gained a victory at Halasur (E.C. VII Shimoga 12). It will thus be seen that Ganga Rāja and his immediate relations were great devotees and supporters of Jainism. So liberal and charitable indeed was Ganga Rāja, that supernatural power came to be attributed to him. It is stated that just as the Gōdāvarī stopped flowing on account of the Jaina devotee Attimābharasi (identified with Attimābhe mentioned in connection with the Kannada poets Ranna and Ponna of the 10th century A.D.) the Cauvery though it swelled given in it (E C IX, Doddballapur 11) If the Doddaganni inscription dated in Saka 1028 (=A D 1103), in which he is styled simply Tribhuvanamalla-Poysala, can be attributed to him, it would be the earliest epigraph mentioning his rule. In that case, his reign may be taken to have begun in or about 1106 A.D., up to which we have inscriptions of Ballāla I (E C. V, Channarayapatna 169) There is, however, no doubt that he was already ruling in the 25th year of the Chālukya-Vikrama Era, Cyclic year Vikrama, corresponding to 1100 A D, for in an inscription of that year his full name Tribhuvana-Malla-Bittiga-Hoysaladēva is mentioned (E C VI, Kadur 164) In another inscription dated in the 35th year of the Chālukya-Vikrama Era (corresponding to 1111 A D), mention is made of him, (E C VII, Shimoga 89) though no regnal year is given As we have inscriptions of Ballāla I up to 1106 A D, Bitti-Dēva probably ruled as co-regent of his brother for some time, say, from 1101 A D, and from 1106 A D became sole ruler, though subject to the suzerainty of the Western Chālukya king conversion to Vaishnavism,

His
Circa 1113
A D

A notable event in his career was his exchanging the Jain faith for that of Vishnu, which, according to tradition, took place under the influence of Rāmānuja, the reformer, who is said to have fled from persecution by the Chōla king, a relentless Saiva, and had taken refuge in the Hoysala country On his conversion, Bitti-Dēva is said to have called himself Vishnuvardhana, by which he is best known. The story of his conversion has been narrated under the section on Chōlas above (See under Kulōttunga-Chōla II). The whole story still rests mainly on Vaishnava tradition and literature. The year in which the conversion was effected is, even accepting the tradition, not known. Rāmānuja's traditional date is 1017 to 1137 A D This period is covered by the stone basadi (EC IV Krishnūrūpeta 37 and MA R 1920 Para 72) His wife was Dandanayakitti Jakki ybbhe and she is praised in a poetical epigraph at Basti Hoskote This epigraph says that the only women that could compare with her were Sitā and Rukmini (M I R 1920 Para 72) Then there was the young general named Vishnu or Bittiyanna and surnamed Immadi dandanayaka His exploits are set out in one record (EC V Hassan 53) He seems to have been a special object of the king's favour He received his education under Śrīpāla, a celebrated Jaina teacher and logician of the time His father was an old minister of the time of Freyanga The king treated him like a son and perhaps had some idea of adopting him (having then no son of his own) as he himself had his upanayana performed and after seven or eight years of age, when he had become proficient in the use of arms obtained for him a virgin jewel as a bride and himself took part in the marriage ceremonies At the age of ten or eleven the boy having become as sharp as kusa grass, and perfect in the four tests of character, the king invested him with the title of Mahāprachandadandanīyaka and made him Sarvādhipātri He justified his patron's confidence by gaining important victories in the south with extraordinary rapidity—in half a month we are told—especially burning Rāyarāyapuram (or Talkād) and brought back troops of elephants together with much spoil The later history of this young man is not known Making some allowance for exaggeration, there seems no doubt that the story of this young man as detailed in the inscription is in the main a credible one

Pergade Vāsudēva, who is said to have spread the fame of this king is mentioned in an inscription in the Kēśava temple at Grāma Hassan Taluk (MA R 1917 Para 97) His son Udayaditya erected a Jina temple called Vāsudēva Jinabasti in his father's name. (Ibid) Other

Vishnuvardhana It was also here, according to the traditionary story, that he defeated the Jains in a great controversy and despoiled their land grants and destroyed their temples and with their materials built the Motīṭalāb or Lake of Pearls. There seems no truth in these highly coloured stories, for we see Vishnuvardhana, even after his conversion, as a tolerant ruler and as a friend as much of Jainism as of Vaishnavism or Saivism. His most able generals were Jains and they are recorded to have restored Jain temples on an unprecedented scale. From the glowing account given of his consecration of the Chennakēśava temple in 1117 A D, under the name of Vijayanāīyana, it might perhaps be inferred that his personal leanings were towards Vaishnavism. If Vishnuvardhana actually patronised Vaishnavism, he no less supported Jainism. There is reason to believe that Vishnuvardhana could not have behaved as an intolerant religious bigot. In fact, there is no evidence to show that he did. Though Rāmānuja is said to have stayed about twenty years in Mysore after the conversion of Bitti-Dēva, there is no evidence from the inscriptions that have so far been discovered that he either was the inspirer of religious persecution. There is the less reason for our drawing such an inference against him as he himself had been, according to the story, a victim of persecution and had to flee for his very life to the court of a foreign prince. That Rāmānuja stayed at Tondanur and at Melukōte (or Melkōte) and that he visited Saligrāma may be inferred from certain inscriptions. Thus an inscription found in the Lakshminārāyanasvāmī temple at Tonnur, which may be assigned to the reign of Vishnuvardhana, contains a grant to a matha of Rāmānuja. Another mentions one Tīruvaṅgaḍāsar, who in another inscription of the time of Nārasimha I found at the Kṛishna temple at the same place, calls himself a servant of Ilayālvān, a name by which Lakshmidēvi temple at Doddagaddavalli (Circa 1115 A D), a quadruple temple built by a great merchant and his wife (E C V Hassan 140) the famous Kesava temple at Belur one of the finest specimens of its class built by the king in 1117 A D and dedicated by him Happe Chennigaraya at Belur a double temple (Circa 1117 A D) Kirtinārūya at Talkād (1117 A D) Kēśava and Siddhasveta temples at Marale (1130 A D) and the Pārasvanatha basti at Halebid (1133 A D) which was built by the general Boppa son of Ganga Raja. Descriptions of the architectural and sculptural beauties of these temples will be found in sufficient detail in the chapter on Architecture and Sculpture above.

Like his contemporaries Vishnuvardhana appears to have had a number of queens. These were Sāntala Dēvi I Lakshmi Dēvi Bāminala Dēvi Sāntala Dēvi II Dēvaki Dēvi and Rājala Dēvi. Of these Sāntala Dēvi was at first a strenuous upholder of the Jain faith but later undoubtedly embraced with the king the Vaishnava religion. She is eulogised in Sravana Belgola 132 (=Old Edn. 56) as the builder of the Savatigandhavāra basti at that place. She was the eldest daughter of Marasīnga and Murchikabbe. She was we are told to king Vishnu the goddess of Victory in battle the goddess of wealth always resting on his breast and the goddess of fame spreading to the remote points of the compass the greatness of his valor. Among the epithets applied to her are a Brihaspati in discrimination a Vāchaspati in ready wit, the cause of the elevation of the four śamayas or creeds expert in singing instrumental music, and dancing a rampart to the Jain faith and a rutting elephant to ill-mannered co-wives (udoritta-savatigandhavārane). The temple of Savatigandhavārane at Sravana Belgola was founded by her in 1123 A D after this last mentioned title of hers. The circumstances

Domestic
life

Srīvaishnavas of Sāligāve (i e, Sāhgrāma). The persons named were among the immediate disciples of Rāmānuja, the first two being in addition his close relatives Embāl was his cousin and Āndān, generally known as Mudaliyāndān, was his nephew Achān, also known as Vidāmbiyāchchān, was a favourite disciple. (M A R 1912-1913, Para 76). That these disciples at Sūtiangam should have conferred certain privileges on the Srīvaishnavas at Sāhgrāma shows their personal interest in them, which is capable of satisfactory explanation on the basis of Rāmānuja's own interest in them. The earliest direct epigraphical mention we have of Rāmānuja's visit to Melkōte (Yādavagiri) is contained in the Tondanūi copper-plates dated in 1722 A D. It is stated in this inscription that Yādavagiri "had been the residence of that Yati-lāja," another name of Rāmānuja (E C Seringapatam 64). Thus the indirect evidence derived from inscriptions indicates that Rāmānuja did visit Mysore somewhere about the time of Vishnuvardhana, and that he did convert him is proved by the fact that he not only changed his name (as testified to by inscriptions) but also by his active propagation of the newly embraced faith by building temples in honour of it. In an inscription dated in 1100 A D, he is called Bittiga-Hoysala-Dēva (E C VI, Kadur 164), in another dated in 1112 A D, he is called Bhujabala-Vīra-ganga-pratāpa Hoysala-Dēva, (M A R 1907-1908, Para 37), while in a third dated in 1117 A D, he is called Bhujabala Vīra-ganga-pratāpa Vishnuvardhana-Poysala-Dēva (M A R 1911-12, Para 83). In 1117 A D, we now know that Vishnuvardhana set up the image of the god Karttikeyana at Talkād, after driving the Chōlas out of that place. (Ibid). In the self-same year, the image of Vijay-Narayana at Belur was consecrated in the famous temple at that place (E C V, Belur 58). The conversion of Bittu-Dēva may, accordingly, be set down, if it did etc.) in favour of Jaina shrines. Queen Sāntale died in 1131 A D at Sivaganga about 30 miles S W of Bangalore. (Sravana Belgola 113) The inscription which records her death says that she was 'dear to the heart and eyes of that famous king Vishnu' (Ibid). It also bears testimony to her unsanctified faith in the Jain religion. It records that her guru was the Jaina teacher Prabhāchandra and her ever favourite god Jinanatha. Her parents also died soon after. Her mother overcome with grief practised severe sanyāsana renounced the world and fasted for one month and gave up her life (Ibid). Apparently after Sāntale's death Vishnuvardhana married Lakshmi Mahadēvi. It was her son Vira Nārasimha (also called Vijaya Nārasimha and Pratāpa Nārasimha) who succeeded Vishnuvardhana on the throne. He was born in or about 1133 A D just at the moment when he had obtained a notable victory against one Masana, apparently a general of the Chālukyas who had invaded his territories in great force (EC V Belur 124). He blessed the moment of his birth and with affection gave him the name of Pratāpa Nārasimha and crowned him from the time he was born (EC V Belur 93). Not long after that is, in or about 1135 A D Vishnuvardhana married another Sāntale Dēvi, the beautiful daughter of a chief named Kūteya-Nāyaka and his wife Jakkīyabbe. The issue of this marriage was a lovely daughter named Chikka Sāntale. But both mother and daughter soon died and Jakkīyabbe erected Siva temples in their memory (EC V Hassan 89). There is at least one record which suggests that Lakshmi and Sāntale II were queens at the same time. (EC V Channarayana 186 dated in 1143 A D.) An inscription dated in 1136 A D, however shows that the senior crowned queen at the time was Bammala-Dēvi a Pallava princess. (EC V Arsikere 32 and EC IV Nagamangala 3). A riding school was apparently maintained in her name (EC

Chōlas and recovered the various districts that had been taken from the Gangas. These he loyally made over to his sovereign Vishnuvardhana. Numerous inscriptions of Vishnuvardhana refer to this conquest and they give further particulars of it. Thus, one epigraph states that Vishnuvardhana burnt the city of Talkād, polluted the water of the Cauvery by throwing the corpses of the enemy into it, so that Rājēndia-Chōla, the Chōla king, was driven to use the wells in the vicinity, and delayed the setting in of the south wind because it was stopped by filling the nostrils of the skulls of his enemies slain on the banks of the Cauvery. Apparently the slaughter was heavy. Such, indeed, was the terror he created that even Yama—adds the record—was afraid to straighten his moustaches (E C V, Belur 58 dated in 1117). Another inscription mentions one Hattagaia Kete-Nāyaka as having taken an important part in the capture of Talkād city. It says that terrified at hearing the sound of his glittering shield, taking it for a rumbling of the earth or the rolling of thunder, Adiyama, crossing the river from the south side, fled and at the same time Kete-Nāyaka entered the fort of Talkād behind king Vishnuvardhana (E C V, Channarāyapatna 209 dated in 1178 A.D.) This suggests that Vishnuvardhana was personally present at its capture and was the first to enter it at the head of his army. Another record states that Vishnuvardhana pursued the Chōla army after its defeat. (E C V, Belur 171) This pursuit of Adiyama (also called Adiga) is referred to in another inscription, where we have a few more details. Adiyama, this record adds, hesitated, thinking “He will not do what he says”—but found he was mistaken (E.C VI, Kadur 69). From another record the inference has been drawn that Vishnuvardhana was, in this pursuit, accompanied by his brother Udayāditya and that the latter’s daughter died at Vijayitamangala, identified with Betamangala of modern times.

front of the larger tiger is an elephant-goat or more probably a lamp stand. The title Malaparūḷ ganda means the lord among hill chiefs. The titles Srī Nonambarāḍi gonḷa (the conqueror of the glorious Nonambarāḍi) and Srī Paḷakāḍugonda (the conqueror of the glorious Paḷkad) seem to have been adopted in imitation of Gonguḥaṇḍa adopted by Rājendra Chōla I (See ante under Cholas).

Vishnuvardhana kept on a friendly intercourse with the Western Chālukyas. His title Mahāmandalēśvara the description of him as Chālukya maṇi maṇḍalika chāḍā maṇi or crest jewel among the feudatory chieftains of the jewel of the Chulukyas, and the application to him of the feudal expression talpādapadīnopajīvin which means subsisting like a bee on the water lilies which are the feet of the paramount sovereign show the feudatory position he occupied under Vikramāditya VI and his successor Somēśvara III. The formal preambles attached to his records not only confirm this inference but directly mention the suzerainty of the Western Chālukya sovereigns over him. At the same time as suggested by Sir John Fleet (Bombay Gazetteer 498) the terms used in regard to his rule plainly indicate not only that he belonged to the more powerful among the Mahāmandalēśvaras who enjoyed a certain amount of independence and exercised much freedom of action but also that Vishnuvardhana himself aimed at and probably even enjoyed still greater power than was enjoyed by his peers for while most of his records show simply the use of the technical expression of intermediate rank and authority belonging mostly to him and his equals a few of them disclose the fact that he not infrequently described his authority by the current expression of paramount sovereignty. (For instance in many of his inscriptions the words Vijaya rājyam uttarottarā-abhivṛddhi

Relations
with the Western Chālukyas.

whole nādu under the dominion of a single umbrella." Thus were the Chōlas driven out of Mysore and the old Ganga kingdom brought under the subjection of Vishnuvardhana. The event may be set down approximately to 1117 A.D. The conquest of Talkād was always looked on by Vishnuvardhana as a great triumph and as the first contributory to his later successes. Hassan 116, dated in 1123 A.D., compares it to making a clearing in the forest, fencing it round by piling up the bodies of hostile kings, burning it, ploughing it with the hoofs of his horsemen, forming seed-beds watered with the stream of his valour and sowing them with his lasting fame (E.C. V)

Conquest of Kongu and other kingdoms.

The conquest of Gangavādī seems to have been followed by that of Kongu, Nangali, Nolambavādī, and Kovatur, identified with Koyattūr in the Punganur Zamindārī, etc. Apparently, the fall of Talkād was followed up by a war of conquest of the Chōla country generally. A great many inscriptions of Vishnuvardhana refer to his conquest of the south as far as Rāmēsvaīam. In one inscription he assumes the title of Kānchigonda, the capture of Kānchi (E.C. VI, Chikmagalur 160). This record states that his victories were proclaimed at Kānchi by beat of drum, that Madura was squeezed in the palm of his hand and that Jananāthapura (Muhābalipura on the East Coast) was destroyed by one of his generals. That these claims are not altogether vain boasts is proved by an inscription found at Āduturaī in which reference is made to the attempt made by the Hoysalas, during the war of the Periyavadugan (apparently Vishnuvardhana) to remove certain images from that place to Dōrasamudra (M.E.R. 1913, Paras 46-47). It is evident that Vishnuvardhana's forces actually entered the Trichinopoly District and passed through it on their way to Madura and Rāmēsvaīam. In E.C. V, Belur 171, building a Jaina temple for Śrīpālśhaividyā Deva and presenting him a village as an endowment for it. From the references we have for this renowned teacher it would seem he was a great logician and dialectician. His descent is traced in one record from Mahavira himself and the title of Shat taraka śhaṇmukha shows his eminence among his contemporaries. He also inherited the titles of Uddiśhaṇmha, Uddi kothhula and Tāraka chakravartin. (I C V Channarayana 119). He is spoken of as a supporter of the Alanka-matha to which he apparently belonged. He was proficient in prose and poetry (Ibid Arakero 69). Special mention is made of his commentaries. (I C V Hassan 41). Many other Jaina teachers flourished in Vishnuvardhana's reign, among these being Mallishena Miladhara well known as the Ganadnara of the Kuti age of whose death we have a record in Varana Belgola 51 (I C II). Prabhachandra a disciple of Meghachandratraividyā the guru of queen Santalo I and Subhachandra, the guru of Ganga Rāja who is described as a Siddhanandi in philosophy (Varana Belgola 130, 118 and 181). Two of the greatest promoters of the Jaina religion Ganga Rāja and Punisa, flourished during his reign. The reign of Vishnuvardhana should accordingly be set down as one of the brightest in Jaina history as it certainly proved to be one of the greatest to the Śrī Vaiṣṇava religion as well. The religion of Śiva was equally patronised by the king and the people. The Kalamukhas were in the ascendant and their great centre was Balligūmi. About this time, which synchronised with the reigns of the Chālukya kings Vikramāditya VI and Somavara III Balligūmi was probably in the height of its glory, spiritual and temporal. (See ante under Chālukyas). The Kālāmukhas had extended their influence far and wide under continued royal patronage. A record dated in 1136 A D

Kērala (Malabār) before showing himself again in Pongal-nad (or Wainād) " (Ibid)

Conquest of the Pāndyas
of Uchchangī

While the expeditions mentioned above were being carried out in the south and west, Vishnuvardhana's attention was directed to the north. In the same year in which Talkād was taken, the Pāndyas of Uchchangī were attacked and defeated at Dumme, just on the border of Shimoga and Chitaldrug Districts (E.C VI, Chikmagalur 99). The conquest of Uchchangī was effected by prince Chāma-Dēva, a son of the Orissa king Chōla-Ganga, who was born in the Mysore country (E.C XII, Chiknayakanhalli 29 and 30).

Other
conquests
mentioned in his
inscriptions

Many other conquests of Vishnuvardhana are found mentioned in his inscriptions but details are lacking. For instance, he is, in Belur 58, said to have destroyed the army of Jagaddēva, apparently the Sāntara king of the time, devoured the fierce elephant Sōmēsvara, evidently the Chālukya king Sōmēsvara III, displayed his valour before Mānikya-Dēvi of the Chakrakunta throne, destroyed the serpent Chengirī, identified with Senji or modern Gingee in the South Arcot District, broke down the plantain stems the spears of Iungōla, doubtless the chief of Nidugal in the present Pāvugada Taluk, uprooted Kovatū (Koyatū in the Punganūr Zamindārī), shook Teriyūr, in the N-E of Tumkur, crossed over Vallūr, in the Pāvugada Taluk, etc. About Chengirī and its ruler, one record, dated in 1136 A.D., contains a few details worthy of note. Narasinga-Dēva was apparently its ruler and he is said to have deserted his queens, forsaken his kingdom and died, evidently after his defeat on the battle field. On this, Vishnuvardhana is said to have taken possession of his wives (E.C V, Belur 17). Also, he is said to have turned in the direction of the Gangas, and slew the kings of the

This cannot well have been otherwise when we remember that much of the time of the kings of the period was devoted to wars carried far and near so much so even Brāhmins could not have escaped the spirit of the times. Caste whatever may be said of it was not altogether unaccommodating in matters of this nature. It was both flexible and charitable enough wherever the good of the State as a whole was concerned.

Reading the numerous inscriptions of Vishnuvardhana recording his achievements one feels that he should have been an active prince blessed with indomitable energy. His conquests show that he was not only ambitious to make a name for himself but also to make the most of the weaknesses of his neighbours. His expulsion of the Cholas appears to have brought him great renown. Whatever doubt there may be about his military adventures in the north there appears no doubt now that he did lead expeditions to the south most of which could only have added to his fame as a conquering general and no more. He appears to have taken a personal part in his wars often leading his forces in the thick of the fight. He is indeed described in our record (E C V Channarayana 149) dated in 1125 A D as one of the four great Kshatriyas that the country had known—the three others being Dilipa Rāma (Dasaratha's son) and Krishna Rāja. His change of faith did not mean any want of patronage in favour of the Jains with whose teachers he seems to have kept close intercourse. He was not merely tolerant he was active in helping them to flourish. His personal encouragement of Vaishnavism by the construction of stately edifices which have been the marvel of ages produced an enormous effect on his successors who added to the architectural and sculptural grandeur of the country. His rule must have been, despite the wars he

An estimate
of his reign.

Vikramāditya VI, Achuṅgi II pursued and prevailed against the Hoysalas, also that Permadu went to the mountain passes of the "marauder" Bittiga, besieged Dōrasamudra, pursued him till he arrived at and took his city of Bēluṇṇa (i.e., Belur), drove him on further to the mountain pass of Vāhadu, and thus seized upon his royal power. (Bombay Gazetteer 497, fn 7)

Boundaries of his kingdom

The boundaries of his kingdom extended on the east to Nangali, i.e., the eastern part of Kolar District (EC VI, Mudgere 22, Kadur 102, etc), south to Kongu, Chēram and Ānemale (i.e., Salem, Coimbatore and Travancore), west to Barkalūr in South Kanara; and north to Sāvimala (somewhere towards the Krishna). The southern boundary is given as Rāmēsvāra, towards the east of Madura District. (EC V, Arsikere 30 dated in 1134 A.D.). One record states that on the east, south and west three oceans were boundaries of the land he ruled, and that on the north he made Perdore (i.e., the Krishna) his boundary (EC V, Hassan 119). The course of his conquests is thus vividly described in another record—The lion, the Hoysala king's valour, having sported in plunder at Talkād, attacked the lofty elephant Uchchangi, calmly marched by Banavāsī, daringly seized on Belvola, and sprang forward with joy to the Perddore, planting his feet on Hanungal, (EC VI Kadur 69) Belur 38 (EC V) describes his conquests in general, and Nagamangala 70 (EC IV) gives a list of all the important forts captured by him. The provinces over which he ruled were the following—Kongu, Nangali, Talkād, Gangavādi, Nolambavādi, Banavāsī, Hanungal, Kaligere, Halasige, and Belvola (EC VI, Chikmagalur 160, Kadur 80, etc)

His capital
cities.

Dōrasamudra was his recognized capital (EC V, Belur 147, EC III, Mandya 29 etc), but there were great reformer to support such an inference. In the light of what we actually know about Vishnuvardhana from the inscriptions and of Rāmānuja from his own writings, we have to give up such stories. It is certain that Vishnuvardhana could not have been the author of such desecration, much less would he have allowed it even if others had desired it.

Vishnuvardhana appears to have died in 1141 A D at Bankāpura (EC VI Chikmagalur 96). His body was brought down by Boppa-deva-dandanayaka doubtless Boppa the son of Ganga Rāja, to Madgere, where we are told a fight took place for the elephant and treasure (Ibid). The record which mentions this incident describes Vishnuvardhana as the Senior King the other being his son Narasimha I who, as we have seen was crowned from the date of his birth. The person who secured the elephant probably the State elephant and the treasure was one Binna Gauda of Miriyalpalli in Taligenad evidently one who was interested in Nārasimha's succession to the throne. Why there should have been a fight and why the body was brought to Madgere are not clear though it is possible that the body was being removed to Hosavur the ancient family seat of the Hoysalas and that there was some dispute as to the succession. Nārasimha was only an infant aged about 8 or 9 years at the time and it is probable that Boppa tried to secure the throne for him. There is no hint as to who his competitor might have been. Bnta-gauda, the son of Binna-gauda who secured the elephant and the treasure and fell in the fight was at the request of the chiefs and farmers of the Taligenad granted by Nārasimha with one hana of land (EC VI, Chikmagalur 96 dated in 1141 A D).

Date of his death 1141
A D

Though Vishnuvardhana died in 1141 A.D. there are a number of inscriptions dated in 1142, 1145 1148 and 1149 A D mentioning him as the ruling sovereign.

This however is nothing but an echo of the conquests of his famous father (E C III, Seriagapatam 74 E C VI hadur 11 F C V Hassan 137). A Chāṅgāḷva incursion is referred to in an inscription assigned to about 1150 A.D. (F C IV Honnur 143). In 1161 A.D. he is said to have defeated a Kadamba force that threatened Bankapura his capital (E C V Belur 193). The Chālukya king Jagadeka mallā attacked him in 1143 A.D. and appears to have asserted his supremacy in 1149 A.D. (E C VI, Davangere 8; E C VII Chik nayakanhalli 29 and 10). This supremacy as stated before, was more often than not in a dormant state and was put forth only when the power of the Hoysālas was on the wane. Nārasiṃha I was not only a boy but also a weak ruler. Accordingly we find him assuming the prefix Jagadekamallā in 1153 and 1155 A.D. (E C X Holar 100a and 169) but immediately after this the Chālukya throne was usurped by Bijjala the founder of the Kalachurva line. About this period a part of the kingdom appears to have been ruled by a Mahāmāṇḍa levara called Jagadeka Vira Hoysala Śāntara Māra Dēva (E C VI Koppa 101 dated in 1162 A.D. Mindgero 37 dated in 1154 A.D.). He was apparently connected with the Hoysālas.

Nārasiṃha I though a Vaiṣṇava was tolerant towards Jainism the religion of most of his generals. He visited Sravann Belgola in 1169 A.D. and made grants of villages to the temple built by Hulla (E C II Sravann Belgola 210 and 319). Vaiṣṇavism was also spreading slowly in his reign. Tonnur and Melkote were its chief centres. At Tonnur one Tiruvarangadāsar, described as a servant of Rāmaṅṇa kept himself busy during this and the next reign obtaining grants for the temples from generals and others. (M A R 1907 8 Para 11). Nārasiṃha however eventually lapsed into a voluptuary and surrounded him, did not touch him, thus testifying to the depth of his devotion to the Jaina faith (Sravana-Belgola, Introd 52, Trans 40 fn 2). It is not surprising that an inscription at Bastihalli describes him as the glorious abode of Jina-dharma and as the chief agent in increasing the wealth of Vishnuvardhana by the three constituents of legal power, sakti-traya (M A R 1907-1908, Para 39)

His Belu

Closely related to Ganga-Rāja were the generals Mariyāne and his brother Bharata, who were sons of Mariyāne, the senior. To the latter, Ganga-Rāja was related as his brother-in-law, while the younger Mariyāne and his brother Bharata were the brothers-in-law of his son Boppa Bharata—or Bharatēsvara—and his brother Mariyāne were both generals under Vishnuvardhana and his son Nālasimha I. Bharata erected the two images of Bharata and Bāhubali, the sons of Rishabhānātha, the first Tirthankara, at Sravana-Belgola. He also put up the happalige (railing) of the hall near those images as also the hall around the Gommatēsvara and the grand flight of steps. He is further credited with the building of eighty new bastis and renovating two hundred old ones in Gangavādi (Sravana-Belgola, 265 and 267, E C IV, Nagamangala 32, E C VI, Chikmagalur 160). An equally famous general was Punisa, who was the conqueror of the Nilgiris. (See above). He is said to have been generous to those he had conquered, and employed his wealth, we are told, without any fear, in restoring Jaina bastis throughout Gangavādi as they were in the days of the Gangas. The Pāṣvanātha-basti at Chāmiṛājnagar was founded by him. His guru was Ajitasēna-panditadēva, referred to in some of his inscriptions (M A R 1916, Para 53) (E C IV, Chāmiṛājnagar 83). He built the Mūlasthāna-basadi of Vishnuvardhana-Poysala-Jinūlaya at Basti Hoskote, in Krishnarājpeta Taluk, where his wife also had built a both dated in 1119 A.D.) Another was the Maha pradhāna Sarvadhikāri Senādhipati Dandanayaka Lakṣmavva who is eulogised in E.C. III Nanjangud 175. He founded in 1159 A.D. a temple at the royal city (raḍadhīni) Sottuvur on the Lanka of the Kapini the present Suttur. Hulla the treasurer was another minister of Nārasiṃha. He was a Jain and was the builder of the Chaturvimsati Basti at Sravana Belgola to which Nārasiṃha I granted in 1159 A.D. a village to provide for its repairs and worship. He was so pleased with it that he renamed it Bharya Chūḍamoni after Saṃyuktva Chūḍamuni one of the titles of Hulla (E.C. II Sravana Belgola 313). Hulla had served under Viṣṇuvardhana and is praised as one superior to Brihaspati in politics and to Y. gandharayana in administration (Ibid and Sravana Belgola 313). He was a minister during the reign of Ballala II as well (Ibid Sravana Belgola 210). He was a firm supporter of the Jain religion indeed claimed to be one of the three greatest of its supporters Chāmuḍa Rāya Ganga Rāja and Hulla. (Ibid Introd. 59). He restored several Jain temples at Bankāpura Kalivita Kopasa and Kallengeru all places held sacred by the Jains besides building five Jain temples at Kallengeru and the Chaturvimsati temple at Sravana Belgola above named (Ibid Introduction 59). Chokkimayya was another general of Nārasiṃha I. He had also seen service under Viṣṇuvardhana. (E.C. V Bowriogpete 9). He calls himself the senior general and Viṣṇuvardhana's garuda, i.e., a general faithful unto death. He caused a mantapa to be built at the Gangadhareśvara temple at Sivaganga for the spiritual welfare of his mother Malliyavva (M.I.R. 1915 Para 30). He obtained certain signal victories over the chiefs named Bankha and Panarjotta, at Nangali in the present Kolar District and over the rulers of Kāñchi and Kongu in which he captured superior elephants. He appears to generals of some note were Bheppayya who is mentioned in an inscription at Nāianapura as making a grant of land in favour of god Mahādēva of Betivani (M A R 1912-13, Para 75), Heggade Sūṅgeya Nāgayya, mentioned above as the builder of the mantapa in front of the Lakshmi-dēvi temple at Tonnū, who made a grant for the Nārāyaṇa temple at Melkōte (M A R 1907-1908 Para 38 M A R 1912, Para 84), and Heggade Mallimayya (Ibid Para 39)

A feudatory worthy of mention is mentioned in one record (E C IX, Nelamangala 84) He is described by the names Bitti-Dēva, Viṣṇu-sāmanta and Viṣṇuvardhana, apparently after the king, and is spoken of as belonging to the Adala-vamsa and Mitia-kula (or Solar race) He is said to have erected the Gangādhariśvara temple on the Sivaganga hill and endowed it He also built the Brahmēśvara temple and the Brahmasamudram village in the name of his father, besides Jinālayas and Adalēśvara temples, the Viṣṇusamudra tank, the Bōchasamudra tank in the name of his mother, and endowed a temple of Kēsava. This family of chiefs has been met with in connection with Kaidāla in the Tumkur Taluk (E C XII, Tumkur 9) There they are described as lords of Mānyakhēdapura (identified with Malkhēd, the Rāshtrakūta capital) and Gangaputras ruling over Maragare-nād They were unusually liberal minded and were patrons, it would appear, of the four creeds,—Jaina, Bouddha, Saiva and Vaiṣṇava (E C IX, Introd. 20-21). Apparently they were originally connected with the Rāshtrakūtas, but later, on the rise of the Hoysalas, passed under their yoke

Architecture
and sculpture

During the reign of Viṣṇuvardhana, a great impetus was given to the building of temples and bastis, not only by the king and his generals but also by rich merchants The following have been assigned to his reign —

Marasamndratank. Another sāmanta was Bitti Dēva the son of Sāmanta Chatta, the Hulyera chief. His mother Sāntale was a supporter of the four creeds (see above). His descent is traced through Chatta who had won fame as a great soldier. When Volamba a senior queen had the misfortune to be taken captive, he rescued her and received from the king the title of Vīra talaprahāri. He also slew Doddanka at the camp of Āhavanalla the Chalukya king and received from the latter the title of Doddanka badiso. His son was Bhīma who for attacking and killing Sitagara gandra, received from Vishnuvardhana his name as a further title. Bhīma and his wife Chattiyakka had four sons Vacha Chatta Valla and Govi deva. Of these Chatta (the second of that name) married Sāntale above named and their son was Sāmanta Bitti deva alias Vishnu-samanta. To him king Nārasiuha gave Heinagera for the expenses of the elephants. (E C XII Chiknayakanhalli 21) Bitti and his brothers were devout Jainas and the gifts made by his brother Govi-deva on the death of his wife are mentioned in the record quoted above. Govi Dēva distinguished himself in the war against the Chaugūlvas. A record dated in 1160 A.D. at Kampanhalli states that the wounds which he inflicted with his spear on the face of the elephant on which the Chaugūlva king was seated resembled the characters of an inscription recording his own valor. (U A R 1909 1910 Para 76) He was the builder of the beautiful Pārsva nātha basti at Heggare in 1160 A.D. as a memorial to his dead consort Mahādēvi Nāyakitā. His another wife Sriya-dēvi presented a Jaina image which was once in the Ranganātha temple at Hulyur. (M A R 1918 Para 94) Bitti had been general in the time of Vishnuvardhana and claims to have subdued Nilāchala cut off the head of Kāla and reduced to powder the Konga army. Apparently he was engaged in the wars under which this particular title of hers came to be given to the temple are not known. She endowed the temple with a village and certain lands which she presented to her guru Piabhāchandra (Sravana-Belgola 132). The god she set up in this temple was Sānti-Jina, after which saint she herself was apparently named (Ibid 131). She must have been a lady of great beauty if the verses occurring in this epigraph are not mere poetic hyperboles. Her father Mārasingayya was a Saiva and her mother, Māchikabbe, a devoted Jain. Māchikabbe belonged to a distinguished family, her father and grand-father having been generals (Ibid 132). Sāntale was the patta-mahādēvi, having assumed the crown (pattamam dhariyisidal) in or about 1117 A.D., the year of the great victory over the Chōlas at Talkād (E C V, Belur 16 and Channarayapatna 260b). In 1123 A.D., the king made a grant to her of the village of Sāntigāma (now called Gāma, east of Hassan), the villages dependent on it being gifted to 220 Brāhmans (E C V, Hassan 116). Sāntale appears, however, to have changed her religion with her lord, for, according to an inscription found on the pedestal of the image in the Kappe-Chennigarāya temple at Belur, the image was set up by her, who is there described as Pattamahādēvi. Likewise, an inscription on the pedestal of the principal image in the Kēsava temple at Belur states that that image was set up by the victorious Vishnuvaidhana (M A.R. 1911, Para 98). In the Kappe-Chennigarāya temple, statues of Vishnuvaidhana and Sāntale are to be seen, thus showing their special interest in it. To the Kēsava and Chennigarāya temples, grants are recorded in an inscription dated in 1117 A.D. (E C V, Belur 58). This, however, does not mean that either the king or queen Sāntale became inimical to Jainism, for we find grants dated in later years (e.g., Belur 9 dated in 1129 A.D., Belur 124 dated in 1133 A.D.,

course of Ballāla's insurrection some villages were destroyed and many people were killed. One Banoya Nāyaka of Huvinahalli took part in the fight and lost his life. He apparently fought on behalf of the king and from his title Billamotta (head of archers) must have occupied some important position locally. (M A R 1913 Para 77) Another contemporary record (also a virgal dated in 1173 A D at Kelagur Chikmagalur Taluk) states that Ballāla II during his insurrection entered the Taligenādu and Kodagunadu and in the resulting fight Govaganda of Mnrugur fell. A record dated in 1177 A D (E C V Belur 86) gives more interesting particulars. It would appear from it that when Ballāla II leaving his father passed over Malē (or the hill country) and Tantrapala Hammadiyanna making all the subjects and farmers of Malē together with the Kongālva Changālva and the other chiefs of Malē visit him caused the diadem of empire to be bound on him and obtained the rank of minister. It would thus seem that the rebellion was supported by the Malēnād chiefs particularly the Kongālva and Changālva kings and that Tantrapala Hammadiyanna, the descendant of an immigrant family of bangle sellers of Ayyavale saw his opportunity and helped Ballāla II to get himself crowned at his hands himself becoming minister. The risings indicated by the virgals in Hale-Narsipur and Chikmagalur taluks show that there were adherents of the king as well who fought for him and fell. In the very year of the rebellion (1173 A D) Nārasimha I seems to have died, being at the time only about 40 years of age.

Ballāla II or Vira Ballāla surnamed Yadava Nārāyana succeeded Nārasimha I on the throne. He had been co-regent of his father during his life time and later about 1177 A D had rebelled against him. Apparently on the death of his father he was crowned king in his

Ballāla II,
Vira-Ballāla
Yadava
Nārāyana
1178-1220
A.D

V, Arsikere 58, dated in 1140 A D) In another inscription dated in 1140 A D., she is described as patta-mahā-dēvi, and another queen named Rājāla-Dēvi, described as "sister" in the sense of co-wife, is spoken of as prīyā-rasī. (E.C. VI, Kadur 96, Chikmagalur 122) Bammala Dēvi is described (E C XII, Gubbī 13, dated in 1140 A D) as beautiful and "famed for her grace" She was the daughter of Chavudabbarasī and king Govinda By her amiable and skilful disposition, she is spoken of as having captured "the inmost heart" of Vishnuvardhana She was in residence with the king at Hanungal in 1140 A D , and from there made a grant for Bammalēsvara (apparently a god set up in her name) and the Brāhmans (Ibid) Rājāla-Dēvi is said to have belonged to the Chālukya vamsa She is said to have been raised in 1141 A D to the position of senior queen, though Bammala-Dēvi continued as the "crowned queen" An inscription dated in 1129 A.D. mentions one Kumāla-Ballāla-Dēva and describes him as the eldest son, as if there were other sons of Vishnuvardhana at the time. Whose son he was, is not known As he is not heard of again, probably he died soon after This prince had apparently sisters younger than himself, the eldest of whom was Hariyabbarasī or Hariyala-Dēvi, who had married the vibhu (or lord) Singa (E C VI, Mudgere 22 and Chikmagalur 160)

Coinage and Currency

Vishnuvardhana was the first of his dynasty to issue a currency of his own His coinage was in gold. Three different coins seem to have been introduced by him. One of these, probably the first of the series, bears on the reverse the legend Malaparōl gāṇḍa. The other two bear the legend, each in three lines, of Srī Nonambavādī gāṇḍa and Srī Talakāḍu gāṇḍa. On the obverse is a sārdūla or mythical tiger, facing the right, with a smaller one above, which is between the sun and the moon, in bearing this Ballāla it would appear attacked it and mounting on it that one cubit was able to bring it under his possession. From this event he acquired the title of gīradurga malla and as it was on a Saturday he won the success he took the title of Samādrasiddhi (Ibid Belur 137 175 Arsikere 178). This latter title however is one which Bijjala had taken before him. Uchchangī is said to have had a moat as deep as Patāla (the nether world) and as broad as the eight cardinal points and as high as the sky (Ibid Belur 72). Apparently it was a far famed fortress and its conquest brought fame and name to Ballāla II. When Kaina Deva the Pāṇḍya king craved for mercy he restored him to his kingdom (Ibid Belur 72). This event must have occurred shortly before 1117 A.D. as an epigraph of that year represents him not only as the conqueror of Uchchangī but as making it his royal capital and as ruling from it (E C VII Chiknayakanhalli 36).

A conflict with Sankama Dēva the kalachurya king is referred to in an inscription assigned to about 1170 A.D. (E C VI Mudgero 33). Sankama's elephant was pierced to death but he himself escaped.

War against the Kalachurya king Sankama, Circa 1170 A.D.

But his most decisive victory was gained against the formidable army of the Sevunās at Soratur near Gadag. There are numerous accounts of this victory in the inscriptions of Ballāla II. Bhīllama the Sevuna king came with as many as 200 000 infantry armed with thunderbolts and 12 000 cavalry conspicuous with high saddles and jewelled breast-plates. Ballāla II, seated on his one elephant, charged the Sevuna king's army put them to flight, and slaughtered them all the way from Soratur to the banks of the Krishna. (E C VIII Sorah 140). He is also said to have destroyed a city named Viravardhana which seems to be the city Srivardhana.

Victory over the Sevunas 1191 A.D.

pravaḍḍhamānam ā-chandīārīka-tāram-bāram sallutam re frequently occurs in his inscriptions.) As a matter of fact, in certain inscriptions belonging to his reign, all reference to Chālukya supremacy completely disappears (E C. V, Channaiāyapatna 149, dated in 1125 A.D.) All the same, a close examination of Hoysala inscriptions shows that the nominal suzerainty of the Chālukyas was recognised by the Hoysalas up to about 1200 A.D., which marks the end of the Chālukyas as a ruling dynasty. Thus, a number of Hoysala inscriptions in the Kadur District, dating from 1090 to 1137 A.D., ie, from Vikramāditya VI to Jagadēkamalla II, and from 1136 to 1203 A.D., ie, from Jagadēkamalla II to Sōmēsvāra IV, recognize the suzerainty of the Western Chālukya kings. Similarly, a number of Hoysala inscriptions, dating from 1099 to 1174 A.D., in the Hassan District and others ranging from 1040 to 1200 A.D. in the Tumkur District, recognize the supremacy of the Western Chālukyas. In the reign of Nārasimha II, there is observed a break in this respect, because not only had the Western Chālukyas disappeared as a ruling dynasty but also the Hoysalas themselves closed in on them and occupied a part of their territories, the Yādavas of Dēvagiri occupying the rest.

Religion and Society.

Buddhism, Jainism and Vaiṣṇavism flourished in the reign of Viṣṇuvardhana as friendly faiths. The inscriptions show that though he left Jainism for Vaiṣṇavism, his interest in the former did not abate. It is certain he was not hostile to it. If he was an unbeliever in its tenets or a sectarian, as some stories would have it, the fact would have leaked out in the many inscriptions we have of him. On the other hand, we have evidence enough to infer that his interest in Jainism was well sustained throughout his reign. Thus in 1125 A.D., long after his conversion to the rival faith, we find him to the Gadag record the country in that neighbourhood was in Bhallama's possession. In his Gadag and later records Ballāla accordingly assumed the paramount titles of Simastobhavanāśraya Śrīprithvirālabha Mahārājādhirāja Iṣṭamātora Paramabhaṭṭāraka and the style of Pratāpa Chakravartin Bhujabala Chokravartin, Bhujabala pratapachakravartin Hoyala chakravartin Bhujabala pratāpa Hoyala-chokravartin and Jādara chakravartin (F C VII Channagiri 61 E C VIII Sorab 110 etc. etc. Bombay Gazetteer 503). The assumption of these titles is, however, not inconsistent with the plain title of Mahāmāndolātora prefixed to his name in certain Mysore inscriptions even of this late date (F C III Nanjangud 71 dated in 1192 A.D. and not in 1312 A.D. as suggested by Mr Rice also Tirumakudlu Narsipur 31 dated in 1195 6). The boast that he reduced the whole of the Kuntala country seems clearly inadmissible. Probably the northern boundary of the Hoyala kingdom thus extended was evidently the Malprabha and the Krishna where the Malprabhā joins it. While Ballāla's inscriptions have not so far been found on the north of these rivers they have been abundantly traced to their south (Bombay Gazetteer 503-504 E C VII Shikarpar 103).

Among other achievements attributed to Ballāla are the conquests of Tolkāl, Kongu, Nangal and Nolarubavadi. But these were certainly the achievements of Vishnuvardhana and not his own. In or about 1215 A.D. Ballāla II took the Hanoya fort where he founded a city called Vijayagiri (E C XI Molakalmuru 12). The Hanoya fort is on the Brahmagiri where the edicts of Asoka have been found (E C XI, Ibid).

To mark his position as paramount sovereign Ballāla II established an era of his own running from the first year of his reign as paramount sovereign, which records

Founding of the Ballāla
Era, 1191 1192
A.D.

found at Halebid, mentions a matha of theirs at the Hoysala capital itself. It was an ancient and well established one presided over in succession by Īsana-sakti, whose ascetic virtues and learning are highly praised, Dēvēndra-pandita and Kalyāna-sakti-pandita. Attached to this matha was the shrine of Māṇikyēsvara, among whose devotees were the rich merchants of the three capitals of Dōrasamudra, Belur and Vishnusatnudra, identified with Keresante (see E C VI, Kadur 88 to 93), who dealt in precious stones. They were evidently members of the Banajiga caste as they are described as "attainers of Vira-Balantha perfection." They are spoken of as emigrants from Ahichchathia and upholders of the Nānā-dēsi, a term signifying merchants of foreign countries. As we have seen, Nānādesis are spoken of in certain inscriptions found in Burma and elsewhere as merchants upholding the Vaishnava religion. (See ante under Chōlas). Here apparently they followed the Saiva creed of the Lakulīsa school. They were, we are told the joy of the sahavāsīs, a term we have seen used of by adherents of the Buddhist Vihāras at Baligāmi. The sahavāsīs referred to here were adherents of the Saiva matha and interested in its prosperity. Brāhmanism was thus in the ascendant, the waning influence of the rival faiths giving an opportunity to it. The king himself was a great patron of the older faith. The tulā-purusha and other ceremonies (see E C V, Arsikere 144 dated in 1137 A.D.) should have rendered him even more popular with its adherents. But there is no trace whatever of sectarianism either in the king, whose respect for the faith of others was as great as for his own, or in the people, for we hear of no disputes between their followers as we do a couple of centuries later. Members of the Brāhman caste led armies, traded as merchants and followed secular occupations, while the profession of arms was naturally highly respected.

to the Gadag record the country in that neighbourhood was in Bhallāla's possession. In his Gadag and later records Ballāla accordingly assumed the paramount titles of Sivastabhurandīśvara Śrīprithivīcālabha Mahārājādhirāja Paramasara Paramabhattāraka and the style of Pratāpa Chakracartin Bhujabala Chakracartin, Bhujabala pratāpachakracartin Hoysala chakracartin Bhujabala pratāpa Hoysala chakracartin and Yādava chakracartin (E C VII Channagiri 61 E C VIII Sorab 110, etc. etc. Bombay Gazetteer 503). The assumption of these titles is, however, not inconsistent with the plain title of Mahāmāyādāraka prefixed to his name in certain Mysore inscriptions even of this late date. (E C III Nanjangud 71 dated in 1192 A.D. and not in 1312 A.D. as suggested by Mr. Rice also Tirumakudlu Narasimha 31 dated in 1193-6). The boast that he reduced the whole of the Kuntala country seems clearly inadmissible. Probably the northern boundary of the Hoysala kingdom thus extended was evidently the Malprabha and the Krishna where the Malprabhā joins it. While Ballāla's inscriptions have not so far been found on the north of these rivers they have been abundantly traced to their south. (Bombay Gazetteer 503-504 E C VII Shikarpur 105).

Among other achievements attributed to Ballāla are the conquests of Talkāl, Honga, Nangali and Nalambavadi. But these were certainly the achievements of Vishnuvardhana and not his own. In or about 1215 A.D. Ballāla II took the Hanaya fort where he founded a city called Vijayagiri (E C XI, Molakalmuru 12). The Hanaya fort is on the Brahmagiri, where the edicts of Asoka have been found (E C XI Ibid).

To mark his position as paramount sovereign Ballāla II established an era of his own running from the first year of his reign as paramount sovereign which records

Founding of the Ballāla
Era, 1191-1199
A.D.

indulged in, a peaceful and prosperous one Trade should have flourished for we find rich merchants vying with himself in the construction of beautiful structures. The king and his generals and ministers seem to have been unsparing in extending the kingdom, in adding to or adorning the temples and in securing the peace and prosperity of the country Judging from his records, Vishnuvardhana should have been active in the discharge of his royal duties, whether as general or as administrator. He toured the kingdom and apparently halted for periods of time in his provincial capitals But there is reason to believe that his eye was on the northern frontiers, where he established a new capital, Bankāpura, to keep in check as much the Sindas as the Chālukyas, who otherwise would have threatened with impunity the peace of his kingdom. He appears, despite the vigour with which he conducted his military campaigns, a thoroughly human personage His desire for a successor who could continue his policy of military adventure combined with peaceful prosperity is detected in the manner in which he adopted and brought up young Vishnu and made him a great general and warrior like himself The gladsome manner in which he received the news of the birth of a son by Lakshmi on the day he won a victory over the Chālukya forces shows him in the light of one blessed not only with the greatness of a king but also with the highest attributes of a mere man. His treatment of his trusted generals shows how he reciprocated their great services A person so human, so worldly and so wise cannot have been the sectarian he is represented to have been in certain traditionary stories These are undoubtedly later inventions worthy of no credence. Society too would not have tolerated such vandalism as the wild destruction of Jain temples which is attributed to him under the influence of Rāmānuja Nor is there anything in the whole personal history of this Mahapradhūna Sarvādhikāri Śrī Karanada Heggade is mentioned in some inscriptions. The person referred to by this name was better known as Ereyanna a general of Ballāla II (See V A R 1912 Para 58) Another minister was Kesara-dandanātha or Kesaraja who is mentioned in an epigraph dated in 1210 A.D. He belonged to a family of hereditary ministers (Ibid Channarayapatna 214) who held the position of minister to successive Hoysala kings. The general Vasudhanka bandhava Rēchamayya or Rēcharasa who had rendered eminent services to the Kalachuryas, joined Ballāla II and served under him. He caused to be built about 1220 A.D., at Arasikere (modern Arasikere) the Sahaṣa kutajinālaya and endowed it with the sanction of the king. The record which mentions this fact states that Arasikere at that time contained a thousand steadfast Jaina families and is styled the southern Ayazale (i.e. Ashole). Its Brahmins we are told were learned in the Vedas the guards brave the traders wealthy the fourth caste of unshaken speech the women beautiful the labourers submissive the temples ornaments to the world the banks deep and wide the woods full of fruit and the gardens full of flowers (E C V Arasikere 77) Rēcharasa set up also the god Sāntinātha at Jinanāthapura near Sravana Belgola (E C II Sravana Belgola 380).

A fondatory of Ballāla was Macha-Dēva, who had about 1205 A.D., the charge of the Holalkere nād and the Honkunda Thirty. His minister Somi dannāyaka the senior dannāyaka was about 1211 A.D., governing the Bemmathar pattana i.e. Chitaldrug (E C XI Holalkere 2). In 1184 A.D., we find Goparasa the minister and general ruling over the Banavasi province, with Balligrāma as his capital (E C VII Shikarpur 185). In 1198 Eraga or Ereyana another minister and general, was ruling over it (Ibid Shikarpur 105). The next year, Kumāra Padmi Dēva was appointed governor of (E C V, Aisikere 110 and Hassan 65 and M A R 1912, Para 85) These are probably so dated, because Vishnuvardhana's son was, as an infant, not firmly established on the throne at the time the grants mentioned in them were made and it was deemed safe to continue the dating of public documents in the name of Vishnuvardhana. Such a sort of reckoning has been observed to prevail among the Chōla kings of about the same time and it is possible that the system had greater vogue than is apparent from inscriptions (See ante under Chōlas)

Nārasimha I,, Nārasimha I succeeded his father when he was but a Pratāpa- boy of about 8 years. The succession appears to have Nārasimha, been disputed. A title of his mentioned in Sravana 1143 1173 Belgola 345 is significant in this connection. It calls
A D him "a fire to the forest (of) rival heirs". A possible claimant suggested by Mr. Nārasimhachār is some one connected with queen Sāntale I. But as we do not hear of any son to Vishnuvardhana by her, Kumāra-Ballāla-Dēva described as the eldest son in certain epigraphs (E C VI, Mudge 22) or one claiming through him may have tried to dispute the succession. Vishnu's generals should have made short work of this claim and put Nārasimha on the throne. His reign appears to have been a peaceful one except for minor attempts at incursions by neighbours. He is credited in 1145 A D with the slaying of the Changālvā king in battle and the capture of his elephants, horses, gold and new jewels (E C IV, Nagamangala 76). As he could have been only 12 years at the time the event took place, it should have been the exploit of one of his father's generals, most of whom sustained Nārasimha's power by loyal and devoted service.
Among these were Chokimayya, Hulla, Bittiga and others, who are represented in some detail below. Numerous records describe Nārasimha not only as a terror to most of the kings of the south, but also as their conqueror.

officer was Kesinayya a grant by whom is recorded in a record dated in 1173 A D. The great minister Kumara Panditayya-dannāyaka was the promoter of her interests. This Kumara Panditayya is described in another inscription of 1200 A D as the son of Ballala and Umā dēvi (Channarayapatna 172). She must be the queen referred to as Rāma dēvi by Sir Jahn Fleet (Bombay Gazetteer 501 fn 7). The latter's son Hodeya Bittayya built a tank and founded a town for which a grant (an umbali) was made. (Arsikere 85 and 40). Chūlamahādēvi is mentioned in an epigraph dated about 1200 A D in which she is described as the senior queen and the crowned consort. She is spoken as ruling Kembala. (Channarayapatna 205). Of her a touching story is told in the epigraph referred to. While at Kembala it was reported to her that some wicked persons at Bevur had used hard words about her. She in consequence ordered it to be attacked and Keta malla son of Machigauda apparently the local headman was killed in the assault. Feeling compunction for this she sent two of her chief men to the family saying —

We have caused harm to our children go and encourage them with our wards and in the presence of the sixty families of Kembala console Keta malla's son and make to him the grant of a rent-free estate. Ketala dēvi is spoken of as a jewel mirror to the face of the kingdom (Belur 186 dated in 1217 A D). Another inscription (Belur 115 dated in 1220 A.D. in the first year of Narasimha II) refers to queen Abhinava Kēśala Dēvi who with Ballāla II is said to have set up the god of Kedarēśvara. (Belur 136 see also EC IV Heggaddevankote 28). She is also referred to in a Davangere record dated in 1218 A D as the establisher of a Wednesday fair at Kandavada, reckoned to be the Southern Surashtra, for the benefit of the local god Sōmanatha, to whom the merchants and others granted

He was, we are told in one epigraph, "the sandal to the goblet breasts of a bevy of 384 well-born women" (E C V, Belur 193 dated in 1161 A D) This is confirmed by another epigraph dated in 1173 A D, in which he is described as 'sporting' in the company of women of many different countries—Āndhīa, Simhala, Kaināta, Lāta, Chōla, Gaula, Bangāla and Mālava (Ibid Belur 114) He had, besides, his legally married wives, at least four of whom are known. Of these, the senior queen was Changala-Dēvi (Ibid) Gujjala-Dēvi was another (Ibid Arsikere 142 dated in 1162 A D) Another queen, Mailala-Dēvi, is mentioned in another epigraph (E C. IV, Kīshinārājapete 32, dated about 1150 A D) Echala-Dēvi, who is found mentioned more generally in his inscriptions, was the fourth This last-named queen was the mother of Ballāla II He is first mentioned in an inscription dated in 1165 A D (E C V, Channarāyapatna 210), but it is not quite clear whether that was the year of his birth That it cannot be the date of his birth seems inferable from the fact that in 1173 A D, the date of the death of Nārasimha I, he would be but 8 years old As we know that Ballāla II, his son, led in or about 1172-1173 A D, an insurrection against him, he ought to have been at least a grown up young man This is the more probable, as we find him described in Channarāyapatna 191 dated in 1168 A D, as ruling along with Mahādēvi (or Mahādēvi-arasi), his queen, probably as co-regent of his father (E C V), who must have been then about 35 years of age

His generals
and
ministers

Among the ministers and generals of Nārasimha was the celebrated Chāma-Dēva, the Chōla-Ganga prince, who had successfully assaulted Uchchangī under Vishnuvardhana He was the son of Chōla-Ganga Mahāpāla. Some of his cousins appear to have held petty chieftainships under the Hoysalas and the grants of some of these are recorded (E C XII, Chiknayakanhalli 29 and 30, mother's interests, Narasimha, son by Padmalak was as we have seen above crowned successor to the throne by Ballala II himself

Ballala II appears to have resided at his different capital cities during the progress of his campaigns or tours. Apart from Dorasamudra we have mention of Arasiyakeri as a rājadhāni or royal city. It is also described as bandura vada or treasury town (Arsikere 71 dated in 1173 A D). Its praises occur in many other epigraphs showing that it was a populous and prosperous place with large number of Brāhmanas, Jainas and Kūyālas (Arsikere 79 90 77 88 and 90). It attracted the attention of dancers like Recharasa who built the Sahasrakuta chaityalaya in it in or about 1220 A D (Arsikere 77). In 1191 A D we find the king residing in Bagali of which we have a glowing description. It was filled we are told with crowds of people and its treasury was filled with wealth. In 1196 A D during the campaign against the Savannas, he lived at Erambaraga in 1197 A D at Kukkannur Koppa and in the following year at Huligere (Arsikere 104 and 23 Belur 77 and Arsikere 103). In 1200 A D we find him in residence at Vijayamundra, which is called a rājadhāni and is said to be on the Tungabhadra. (Hassan 139 and Channarayapatna 172). It is evidently the same as the Vijayapur of other records (e.g., Channarayapatna 244) which is said to be Hallavur. He was residing at the same place in 1205 1209 1210 and 1211 A.D. (Channarayapatna 181 172 and 244 and Arsikere 40 and 137). This place has been identified with Hulloor on the Tungabhadra in the Rāni Benner Taluk of Dhārwar District.

During the reign of Ballala II Jainism and Vaishnavism flourished side by side without the exhibition of any ill will towards each other. An interesting

His capital cities.

Religion Architecture
and Sculpture

have administered Gangavādi 96,000 To commemorate his successes, he not only distributed gifts among the poor and helpless, but also restored the great tank at Vijayādityamangalam (present Bētamangalam) which had been breached for a long time, had the big sluice built and erected there a temple of Duigaiyār, endowed it with lands and established a mahā-grāma This was in 1155 A D Some years later, in 1167 A.D., the commander-in-chief Amalēsvaya-dandanāyaka, built a permanent encampment at the place and lived there (Ibid Bowringpete 8) Then, we have the great minister Heggade Damayya. A grant of his dated in 1162 A.D. is recorded in the Krishna temple at Tonnur (M A R. 1907-08, Para 41). Two other ministers of Nālasimha I are referred to in E.C IV, Krishnarājpete 36 These were Heggade Sivaiāja and Heggade Somēya. (M A R. 1920, Para 73) Another was Māchaya, styled great minister and Sarvādhikārī (Ibid.).

Provincial Rulers

A subordinate chief (Sāmanta) was Gūli-Bachi, who ruled over the Marugare-nād in Kaydālī in the Tumkur District He is described as the lord of Mānyakhēdapura, i.e., Malkhēd in the Nizām's Dominions. He was probably connected with the ancient Rāshtrakūta rulers of that place His genealogy extending to several generations is given in (E C. XII) Tumkur 9 dated in 1151 A D He was the son of Adala and a Gangāputra He was the patron of the four creeds, Bauddha, Jaina, Saiva and Vaiṣṇava He built in Kaydala temples dedicated to Ganēśvara, Nārāyana, Chalavarīśvara (after his grand-father), Gangēśvara (after his father) and Rāmēsvaya (after his daughter), besides Jaina basadis in the name of his mother He also made the big Bhīmasamudra and Adalasamudra tanks He was evidently a very liberal minded chief and made Kaydala a grand place. His sēnabōva further made the nārāyaṇant Heragu (1218 A D) Kedarasvara at Halebid (1219 A D) Virabhadra at Halebid (Circa 1220 A D) Sahasrakuta basti at Arakero (1220 A D) Isvara at Arakero (Circa 1220 A D) and Isvara at Nanditavara (Circa 1220 A D) It will be seen that the era of construction began in right earnest after the termination of the war against the Sevunas which ended about 1196 A D. From that year to the date of his death the work of building and beautifying went on apparently uninterruptedly throughout the whole period of a quarter of a century that remained of Ballāla's reign. No wonder that a reign so successful in war and in peace came to be reckoned an epoch by itself and made Ballāla's name famous in the history of the period to which it relates. (For further particulars about the temples mentioned above see ante under Architecture and Sculpture)

As throwing light on the social conditions of the time may be noted a few facts. We read in one epigraph an account of some merchants of Brahman descent one of whom imported horses elephants and pearls in ships by sea and sold them to kings and another who transported goods from the east to the west and from the north to the south and vice versa. (E C V, Arakero 22 dated in 1188) Devoted servants and others gave up their lives in a variety of ways such as by hook swinging burying under death from an eminence such as from above a high pillar killing by means of swords by self inflicted wounds etc., in fulfilment of their vows that they would not survive their patrons masters or sovereigns. Thus we hear of a woman giving her head to the hook on the death of her mistress. (E C VI Molkalmuru 12 dated in Circa 1215 A D) The suicide of prince Lakshma and his thousand followers referred to below is another notable example of this kind of devotion conditions.

Social

against the Nīlگیرis and the Coimbatore country. (E C IV, Introd 21) The Dandanāyakas Mariyane and Bharata served in this reign also (E C.IV, Nagamangala 32, E C. Siavana-Belgola 115)

Architecture

Until towards the close of the reign of Nārasimha I, conditions continued peacefully enough, to permit of the construction of temples in the newly developed style of architecture Nārasimha's reign saw the addition of many of these, as many as the five specimens being known These are —

Hoysalēsvaya, at Halebid (Circa 1141 A D), Jain basti of triple type at Chōlasamudra, (1145 A D), Kēsava temple at Honnavara (1149 A D.),
 Īsvara temple at Anekonda (Circa 1160 A D), Kēsava temple at Dharmapura (1162 A D),
 Kēsava temple at Hullekere (1163 A D);
 Hoysalēsvaya temple at Tenginigatta (Circa 1163 A D), Kēsava temple of the triple type at Nagamangala (Circa 1170 A D), Brahmēsvaya temple at Kikkēri (1171 A D), and
 The Buchēsvaya temple at Koriangala (1173 A D)

Further details about these temples will be found in the chapter on Architecture and Sculpture

Insurrection- ary war of Ballāla II, 1772-3 A D

About 1772-3 A D , Nārasimha's son Ballāla II raised an insurrection against the king As we have seen, he was already in 1168 A D , co-regent of his father and ruling with him Probably disgusted with the lascivious life of his father, and helped at least by one leading general who subsequently became his minister, he rose in rebellion against his father and attempted to set up independent rule One contemporary record (a varga dated in 1172 A.D , near the Īsvara temple to the south of Huvinahalli, Hole-Narsipur Taluk) suggests that the king was then resident at Dōrasamudra and that in the sovereign (Vysore and Coorj from the Inscriptions, 104)

Thus ended the energetic and distinguished rule of forty seven years of Ballāla II during which the Western Chalukyas and Kalachuryas came to a close the Sevunas were driven back the Chōlas were breaking up, and the Hoysalas remained as a dominant power in the south. There was thus ample justification for Ballāla II styling himself Emperor of the South in his later inscriptions (E C VIII Sorab 110)

Narasimha II next succeeded to the throne having been crowned king on the 10th of April 1220 A.D. (E C V Channarayana 172b). He was known also as Vira-Narasimha. He had been co-regent of his father during the latter's lifetime. He proved himself a worthy successor to his father. If his father extended his conquests to the north he made the Hoysala name famous as far as Ramāvaram. Hardly had he ascended the throne than he had to beat off an attack of a certain Bijjana. Bijjana's forces were destroyed and his horse was seized alive and made over to the king (E C V Belur 113 dated in 1220 A.D.). In several inscriptions he is spoken as the sprotter of the Magara kingdom the displacer of the Pāndya and the establisher of the Chōla kingdom. That these claims are not mere poetic embellishments is proved by a number of records both in and outside the State.

Narasimha II
Vira-Narasimha, 1217
1235 A.D.

Of these the destruction of the Magara kingdom is first referred to in an inscription of his dated in 1220 A.D. The identity of this kingdom and its exact location are not yet settled. From an epigraph dated in 1220 A.D. we might infer that his attack on this kingdom was a wholly unprovoked one. Saying to himself: Why am I called master elephant when there are no troops of

Destruction of the Magara
kingdom,
Circa 1220
A.D.

own right An inscription dated in 1173 A D , states that he was crowned at Dōrasamudra on the 22nd of July 1173 A D (E C. VI, Kadur 4, 136 and 139). His reign vied in glory with that of his grand-father Vishnuvardhana and the whole dynasty came to be later called Ballāla after him.

Expedition
against the Changālvas,
1173 A D

Though the Changālva king had helped him in his rebellion in 1171 A D., Ballāla had to send, in 1173 A D , an expedition against him Bettarasa, the Hoysala general, attacked Mahādēva, the Changālva king, who retired to Palpare, a fort in Kiggatnād in South Coorg Bettarasa pursued and defeated him and made Palpare his own capital. But the Changālva chief Pemma-Vīrappa later on attacked him, aided by the Kodagas of all the nāds, and was near gaining the victory, when Bettarasa eventually triumphed with the aid of an officer named Mādayya-Nāyaka, who fell in the fight. This is the earliest specific mention of the Kodagas (or people of Coorg) we have so far found (E C. IV, Hunsur 20) This determined attack of Ballāla II may have been provoked by the assumption (or imitation) at the time of their titles—Lord of Dvārāvātīpura and bhuja bala—by the Changālvas together with a claim to be independent. (See Ibid, Hunsur 111)

Conquest of the Pāndyas
of Uchchangī,
Circa 1117
A D

But Ballāla's great victories were to the north. An early conquest of his was that of Uchchangī, the Pāndya fortress, to which repeated references are to be found in his inscriptions Highly exaggerated accounts of the strength of this fort occur in them Thus we are told that its extent was such as to enclose the three worlds, while its summit soared with the sky higher than the king of the birds (E C V, Channarayapatna 209) The Chōlas had, it is said, laid siege to it for twelve years without success and abandoned the task as hopeless. On sovereign (Uysore and Coorj from the Inscriptions, 104)

Thus ended the energetic and distinguished rule of forty seven years of Ballāla II during which the Western Chulukyas and Kalachuryas came to a close the Sevunas were driven back the Chōlas were breaking up, and the Hoysalas remained as a dominant power in the south. There was thus ample justification for Ballāla II styling himself Emperor of the South in his later inscriptions (E C VIII Sorab 140)

Nārasimha II next succeeded to the throne having been crowned king on the 16th of April 1220 A D (E C V Chonnarāyapatna 172b). He was known also as Vira Nārasimha. He had been co-regent of his father during the latter's lifetime. He proved himself a worthy successor to his father. If his father extended his conquests to the north he made the Hoysala name famous as far as Rāmēvaram. Hardly had he ascended the throne than he had to beat off an attack of a certain Bijjana. Bijjana's forces were destroyed and his horse was seized alive and made over to the king (E C V Belur 118 dated in 1220 A D). In several inscriptions he is spoken as the uprooter of the Magara kingdom, the displacer of the Pāndya and the establisher of the Chōla kingdom. That these claims are not mere poetic embellishments is proved by a number of records both in and outside the State.

Nārasimha II
Vira-Nārasimha, 1217
1235 A.D

Of these, the destruction of the Magara kingdom is first referred to in an inscription of his dated in 1220 A D. The identity of this kingdom and its exact location are not yet settled. From an epigraph dated in 1220 A D we might infer that his attack on this kingdom was a wholly unprovoked one. Saying to himself 'Why am I called master elephant when there are no troops of

Destruction
of the Magara
kingdom,
Circa 1220
A.D

mentioned by Hēmādī as having been captured by Bhīllama from a king named Autula or Autara (M A R 1907-1908, Para 45). At the end of the pursuit, Ballāla II halted and re-formed his forces and reduced all the forts between Soratur, Embarrage (Yelburga in the Nizām's Dominions), Kurugod (near Bellary), Gooty (in Anantapur District), Bellittage (probably Belatti near Lakshmēsvar), Rattahalli (in the Dhārwar District) and the proud Vnātanakōte (i.e., Hangal). The reduction of these forts was probably effected between 1193 and 1196 A.D. (Bombay Gazetteer 505). About 1193 A.D., Lokkigondi in the Dhārwar District became his temporary capital and from there he appears to have moved on to Eimbarage about 1195 A.D. From these places he reduced the forts mentioned. Some of these did not yield easily. Lokkigondi was defended by Jaitugi, the Yādava (Sevuna) king, and seemed invulnerable with high ramparts and lofty bastions on which were mounted astonishing flag staves. (E C V, Belur 204, Arsikere 5, both dated in 1194 A.D.) The possession of these strongholds made his power secure over all the southern part of the dominions which had passed from the Kalachuryas to Sōmēsvara IV, the last Western Chālukya king, and from the latter to Bhīllama, the Sevuna king. From the Gadag and Annigere records of Ballāla II, dated in 1192 A.D., we learn that in his campaign against Bhīllama, he pushed to the north of the Dhārwar District, defeated Brahma, the general of Sōmēsvara IV, and Bhīllama and his minister Jaitasimha, who has been identified with Jaitasimha of another Gadag record of 1191 A.D. (E I III, 217). The same records put forward the claim, that, as the result of these conquests, Ballāla II, by the favour of the god Nārāyana (of Gadag), acquired the supremacy over the Kuntala country, and the universal sovereignty of the Western Chālukyas. This must have occurred about the middle of 1191 A.D., when according expressively put in one record) and established Rājaraṣa Chola III on the throne. This should have occurred some where about 1220 A.D. as inscriptions of about that date (e.g., EC VI Chikmagalur 66 EC V Channarayana 197) refer to the latter incident. Rājaraṣa III had been apparently imprisoned and Nārasimha II advanced as far as Srirangam, beat off the invading Pandyas and released him from the hands of Kopperanṅga a vassal of his who had revolted against him. Rājaraṣa III was however so weak a prince and his kingdom had been so badly broken up by the Pandyan war of succession and other causes that this Pallava feudatory Kopperanṅga raised a second revolt against him and imprisoned him a second time on this occasion in the fortress of Sundamangalam in the present South Arcot District (See ante under Rajaraja Chola III). On this occasion Narasimha vowed, "This trumpet shall not be blown unless I shall have maintained my reputation of being the establisher of the Chola kingdom" (EC VII 45 FI VII, 160). He accordingly sent an army under generals Appanna and Goppaya to the rescue of Rājaraṣa III and they released him for a second time from confinement. The story of this rescue has been already told at some length in the account of the reign of Rājaraṣa III (See ante). This second restoration of Rājaraṣa III probably took place between the years 1229 and 1232 A.D., the Tiruvondipparam record which refers to it being dated in the latter year (See ante under Rajaraja Chola III). After relieving Rājaraṣa Chola III Narasimha seems to have fought the combined army of the Pandyas and Kādavas (Pallavas) in a ninety days battle at Srirangam and defeated them. This was followed by his establishing a capital near Srirangam. A record dated in 1233 A.D. states that Narasimha himself was in residence at Pāṇchāla in the Chōla country (EC VII Channagiri 52). The battle fought at Srirangam and the release of

mentioned by Hēmādī as having been captured by Bhīllama from a king named Autula or Autara (M A R 1907-1908, Para 45). At the end of the pursuit, Ballāla II halted and re-formed his forces and reduced all the forts between Soratur, Embarrage (Yelburga in the Nizām's Dominions), Kurugod (near Bellary), Gooty (in Anantapur District), Bellittage (probably Belatti near Lakshmēsvarī), Rattahalli (in the Dhārwar District) and the proud Virātanakōṭe (i e, Hangal). The reduction of these forts was probably effected between 1193 and 1196 A D (Bombay Gazetteer 505). About 1193 A D, Lōkkigondī in the Dhārwar District became his temporary capital and from there he appears to have moved on to Embarrage about 1195 A D. From these places he reduced the forts mentioned. Some of these did not yield easily. Lōkkigondī was defended by Jaitugi, the Yādava (Sevuna) king, and seemed invulnerable with high ramparts and lofty bastions on which were mounted astonishing flag staves. (E C V, Belur 204, Arsikere 5, both dated in 1194 A D). The possession of these strongholds made his power secure over all the southern part of the dominions which had passed from the Kalachuryas to Sōmēsvara IV, the last Western Chālukya king, and from the latter to Bhīllama, the Sevuna king. From the Gadag and Annigere records of Ballāla II, dated in 1192 A D, we learn that in his campaign against Bhīllama, he pushed to the north of the Dhārwar District, defeated Brahma, the general of Sōmēsvara IV, and Bhīllama and his minister Jaitasimha, who has been identified with Jaitasimha of another Gadag record of 1191 A D (E I III, 217). The same records put forward the claim, that, as the result of these conquests, Ballāla II, by the favour of the god Nārāyana (of Gadag), acquired the supremacy over the Kuntala country, and the universal sovereignty of the Western Chālukyas. This must have occurred about the middle of 1191 A.D., when according away from crossing the Tungabhadra which marked his northern boundary. An inscription at Basral states that it was the hereditary minister Mandanāyaka Harihara, of Addayida who actually defeated the Sevuna troops when they laid siege to a place in the Hoysala territory. He is specially credited with capturing whole lines of cavalry from the Sevuna army mounted on his one thorough bred horse (EC III Mandya 121)

Numerous inscriptions show that Nārasimha II had come into conflict with the southern Pāndyan king of the time Māravarman Sundara Pāndya I. He is described in one record (EC XI Davangere 25 dated in 1224 A.D.) as having received the submission of the Pāndya king (he is said to have rolled on the ground) and to have finally set up a pillar of victory in Setu (i.e. Ramāvaram). In this same inscription he is represented as the thunderbolt to the rock Pāndya. (See also EC V, Belur 151 of 1227 A.D. where he is spoken of as having reduced the Pāndya king to the position of a servant and EC VI Kadur 12a dated in 1228 A.D. where he is spoken of as the confiner in narrow limits of the Pāndya empire)

War against the Pāndyas
of Madura,
Circa
1221 A.D.

After the restoration of the Chōla king Rājārāja III for the second time, Nārasimha II seems to have occupied Kānchi the old Pallava capital. The boundaries of the Hoysala kingdom are given in a record of 1228 A.D., as Nangali on the east, Kongu on the south, Ālvakhēda on the west and the Heddoore on the north (EC V Channarāyapatna 204). But in a record of the following year he is said to be ruling from Kānchi with the surrounding ocean as his boundary (EC XII Tiptur 42). Another record, dated in 1228 A.D., states that Nārasimha pursuing after the Prikalinga kings penetrated their train of elephants, displaying unequalled

Occupation of Kānchi,
Circa 1229.

show, was the Vṛōdhikrit year, Saka 1114, 1191-1192 A D He maintained his position and it was enjoyed by his successors also, though with a more limited extent of territory, in some cases. (Bombay Gazetteer, 503).

His generals, ministers and feudatories

His first minister Tantiapāla Hemmadī has been already referred to. What became of him after Ballāla II assumed the throne is not known. In the earlier part of his reign, Bharatamayya and Bāhubali were his ministers (E.C IV, Introd 21) In 1175 A D, Mahāpiadhāna Saivādhikānī Dandanāyaka Bittimayya was evidently the prime minister. (E C IV, Mysore 8) Mahāsāmanta Gōvī of Huliyēra is mentioned in two epigraphs (E C XII, Chiknāyakanhalli 13 and 20 dated in 1181 and 1188 A.D) He is praised as the supporter of the four creeds—Mahēsvāra, Bauddha, Vaishnava and Arhat. An epigraph dated in 1182 A.D. mentions Chandramauli, the ornament of ministers He was a worshipper of Siva and evidently not only a patron of learned men and learning, but also himself well versed in logic, literature, Bharata-Sāstra and many other arts His wife was Achāmbike, a lady of great grace and beauty (E C V, Channarayapatna 150). She was the daughter of one Sovanna and a devout Jain in religion. She caused to be built the Pārisva-dēva temple at Siavana-Belgola, now known as Akkana basti, to which at Chindramauli's instance, Ballāla II generously granted a village (Ibid, E C. II Siavana-Belgola 327) She obtained from the king the grant of another village for the worship of the Gommatā (Siavana-Belgola 256) She had a son named Sōma (Ibid, 327) Then we have the general Machumayya, who, in 1189 A D, was ruling over Konganād (E C V, Arkalgud 79) About 1191 A.D. the kingdom was in a state of great prosperity under general Madhubī or Madhusūdhana (Ibid Arsikere 115). He was devoted to the worship of Siva composer of Davangere 25 adds—Nārasimha was the first having by his bravery defeated Banūdara (i.e. the Magara chief), so among councillors Pālāva was the first having guarded the whole of the Hoysala empire. Can further praise be added he says quoting the proverbial saying— After drinking milk can any thing else be taken? Pālāva is said to have composed a Haricharitra in Shatpadī metro which has not come down to us (EC VI Introd 21 Karnataka Haricharite, new Edn 341 5). Nārasimha's chief accountant was Visvanātha, a Brahman of Lokkagundi in Bolvola whose oldest brother claims to have taught the king letters and accounts and made him proficient in arts. Visvanātha himself was so clever that he could write the letters with both hands and perform a hundred avadhānas (mnemonic feats) so that the learned who examined him nodded their heads doubtless in approval. The two brothers are said to have become ornaments in the council of the king (EO V, Channarayapatna 203 dated in 1223 A.D.) Visvanātha is spoken of as a follower of the Svāmi of Sindavige. Another disciple of this Svāmi was Vēdārtha Vaijanātha bhatta (EC V, Arsikere 123 dated in 1237 A.D.) who has been identified with the poet Vajanna the author of a Sanskrit couplet inscribed on the Hoysaleswara temple at Halebidu (EO V, Belur 238 assigned to about 1280 A.D.) The period of Nārasimha's reign was not apparently wanting in literary effort.

During Nārasimha's reign the Hoysala kingdom enjoyed internal peace and external fame. If we may believe the composer of Arsikere 82 (EO V) the country had, during his time, yōjana to yōjana towns surrounded with gardens, tanks filled with lotuses and groves for travellers to rest in. Trade seems to have flourished and people certainly appear to have been happy and

Architecture
and Sculpture

the province (Ibid Shikapur 133). In 1204 A D, it was governed by Kammata-Malla-dandadhīpa, who is described as "the celebrated minister" of Ballāla II. He is also spoken of as an "abode of fame" and "in literature a Vidyādharma". The latter's minister was Sūrya Chamupati (Ibid Shikapur 225). The names of others will be found in the Bombay Gazetteer, 505-506. They are omitted here as their jurisdiction lay outside the present limits of the Mysore State.

Domestic life

Ballāla seems to have had a number of queens, of whom at least eight are known from inscriptions. These were —

Padmāvati or Padmale, entitled Pattadaśasi, Ketaladēvi, also called Piri-śasi and Pattadaśasi, Tulavamahādēvi, Bammaladēvi, Umādēvi, Sāntala-dēvi, Abhinava-ketaladēvi and Baichala-dēvi.

Bammaladēvi is mentioned in inscriptions dated in 1174 A D, and 1177 A D (E C. V, Channarāyapatna 229 and Arsikere 62). She is represented as ruling the kingdom with Ballāla II from Dōrasamudra. Her uncle (māva) is praised in Arsikere 62, in which she herself is spoken of as a terror to co-wives and as the uprooter of the families of the hill-chiefs. Ketaladēvi is mentioned in Hassan 54, assigned to 1176 A D, as "a rutting elephant to co-wives." (E C. V). Tuluvāladēvi is mentioned in an epigraph dated in 1189 A D, found at Dyamenhalli, Arsikere Taluk (M A R 1911, Para 101). We have mention of Umādēvi (or Mā-dēvi) for the first time in an inscription dated in 1173 A D (M A R 1926, No 41), then in another record dated in 1190 A D (Arsikere 85), again in a third inscription dated in 1209 A D, she is spoken of as "the senior queen" and "the crowned consort" (Arsikere 40). Her household had a son named Frevaṅga Deva by Gaurala Devi the daughter of Bellappa Nayaka one of his body guards. She is described as a jewel of women. Nothing is known of the subsequent history of this prince. Nārasiṃha II seems to have died in or about 1231 A.D. as we have records of him up to that year. (Channarāya paṭṇa 221)

Somavara also called Vira Sōmavara Sōma and Savi Deva succeeded Nārasiṃha II on the throne. As an epigraph dated in 1251 A.D. is stated to be of his 21st year he should have been made co-regent from about 1230 A.D. (E.C. III Sermāpatam 110). According to the Badinalu inscription however his initial date is 1228 A.D. He was a contemporary of the Chōla king Itajendra Chōla III who succeeded Rajaraja III after murdering him. (See ante under Chōlas)

Sāma r
Vira Sōmavara,
Savi Deva o
Sāma 1231
1262 A.D.

Itajendra Chōla III was the nephew of Sōmavara who appears to have helped him in his war against the Pāndyas. Sōmavara indeed claims that he uprooted Itajendra Chōla III in battle but gave him protection when he claimed refuge. (E.C. V, Arsikere 123 dated in 1237 A.D.)

War against
the Chōlas,
Circa 1237
A.D.

In this year, we hear of Vira Sōmavara being engaged in a victorious expedition against the Kādavarāya, apparently one of the successors of Kopperunjinga. (See ante under Chōlas)

Campaign
against Kādavarāya,
Circa 1237
A.D.

A record of 1240 A.D., from Kadur states that he was marching against Gandagūpāla. This is evidently a reference to the conflict with the Pāndyas that occurred in 1237 A.D. (E.C. VI Kadur 180). Vira Sōmavara appears to have pushed on his victory against the Pāndyas as far as Ramāsvaram where he erected a pillar of Expedition

against Pāndyas of Mādura
Circa 1237
A.D.

various dues (E.C XI, Davangere 105) In 1207 A D , she was instrumental in obtaining a grant for a new temple erected at Bandalike (E C VIII, Shikarpur 235) Her younger brother Mādhava-dannāyaka is mentioned in an inscription dated in 1209 A.D (Ibid, See translation, under No 235) Mr Rice has suggested that as the Kēdarēsvara temple at Halebid has been attributed to Ballāla II and Abhinava-Ketala-Dēvi, it seems probable that they were influenced to erect it by the example of the Dakshina Kēdarēsvara temple at Balagāni (E C, VIII, Introd 32, fn 2) Padmala-Dēvi's son was, according to numerous inscriptions (Belur 115, etc), Nārasimha. This Nārasimha became Yuvarāja during Ballāla's life-time (Channarayapatna 243, dated in 1210 A D) and was in 1220 A D. crowned king by Ballāla II himself before his death and established in the kingdom (Channarayapatna 1721) Nārasimha had a younger sister Sōvala-Dēvi, whose beauty, virtues and extensive liberality are praised (in Channarayapatna 243, dated in 1210 A D.) Sōvala-Dēvi established the agrahāra of Sōmanāthapura, which was equal to Valabhi, at Hāruvanahalli (modern Hainhalli in Arsikere Taluk), where there is a fine temple of Sōmēsvara (Arsikere 123) Ballāla II, Padmala-dēvi and then son Nārasimha are all represented in inscriptions dated in 1210 A D , as ruling together (E C. XI, Holalkere 13, 14) Baiebala-dēvi is mentioned in only one epigraph dated in 1218 A D. (E C VI, Kadur 129) She founded the agrahāra of Piasanna MādLavapura, previously known as Kēsiyahalli and built a Piasanna-Mādhava temple in it She was the daughter of Madiyakka, and obtained a grant of lands for it with copper sāsanas signed by the king's own hand (Ibid). It does not appear that of these eight queens known to us, any more than two had children born to them. While Umā's son Kumāra-Panditayya is not known except as the promoter of her

Vira Somesvara in the Jambukesvara temple in which he mentions 'the image of the lord Poyalesvara he set up at Kannanūr alias Vikramapuram' (V E R 1892 Para 7) In the Jambukesvara temple, Somesvara set up images in the names of his grand father Ballala II his grand mother Padinala his father Narasimha II and his own queen Somala. (Ibid) One record describes Vira Somesvara as the talisman (raṣṣāman) or protector of the Chola king (Rājendra Chola III) This is dated in 1257 A D (E C IV Krishnarājpēṭe 9) A record of 1272 A D, refers to his speedy conquests of the Chola king and of the foremost leaders of the Pandyan king (E C VI, Kadur 125) This refers obviously to the events that took place between 1237-1240 A D, as narrated above. The Hoysala records however, do not reflect the fact that Rājendra Chola III later became a bitter foe of Somesvara. His permanent settlement in the Chola country was probably the cause of this later enmity. Having come to help he had preferred to stay on. This naturally gave offence to the nephew. Hence we find Somesvara being treated as a foe by Rājendra Chōla III in certain of his records. In these, Sōmēsvara receives the title of Māma Sōmēsvara Kāladandan or the hostile rod of death to uncle Sōmēsvara. In one record, we are told that Sōmēsvara was so thoroughly humbled that he was compelled to put on Rājendra Chōla a leg, with his own hands the 'anklet of heroes. In another record we see mentioned certain of the ministers and officers of Sōmesvara engaged in a temple enquiry in the dominion of Rājendra Chōla III. (V E R 1918 Para 13, Appendix C No 49) This indicates that the power of Rājendra-Chōla was recognized by the reigning Hoysala sovereign. Of course, such a state of affairs cannot have been reached without preliminary contests which apparently enabled Sōmēsvara to call himself the uprooter of Vaishnava grant of this reign dated in 1175 A.D., is one in favour of the Adalaperumāl (or Varadarāja) temple at Kānchi. In certain grants, the grandsons of the immediate disciples of Rāmānuja appear as donors. A mantapa called after himself was caused to be built by Vīra Ballāla at Tonnur, rendered sacred by its association with Rāmānuja. The gōpura at the Krishna temple at that place is also connected with his name (M A R. 1907-1908, Paras 42-43). The Kālāmukhas continued in favour in and around Banavāsī, Aisikere, etc (See Aisikere 62 and 103 and M A R. 1911, Para 101). Ballāla II visited Sravana-Belgola and made grants there as usual. Buddhism seems to have lingered on in and about Baligāmi but was decaying. Despite the wars which were more of the offensive than of the defensive kind, the country enjoyed the blessings of peace and prosperity so much that the descriptions we read of in the inscriptions of the reign leave the distinct impression that the people were happy, that the cities were filled with corn and other goods and that there was general contentment. This universal peace in the land is reflected in the increased activity shown in the building of temples and beautifying them on a colossal scale. The largest number of temples built in any single Hoysala king's reign was in that of Ballāla II. At least twenty-two temples, some of them double and a few triple, are known to have come into existence during the period he was king. These are —Akkanna bastī at Sravana-Belgola (1182 A D), the Amritēsvara at Amritapura (1196 A D), Singēsvara at Hebbalalu (1200 A D); Sāntinātha-bastī at Jinanāthapura, Mahālingēsvara at Māvattanahalli, Chattēsvara at Chatchattanahalli, Tīmūrti and Anekal at Bandalike, Kōdanda-Rāma at Huenagalur, Siddhēsvara at Kodakanī, Mallēsvara at Huliyar, Āndāl and Sankēsvara at Belur, Kēsava at Angadi and Sāntinātha-bastī at Bandalike (Circa 1200 A D), Kūti-

kānchi on the east Belur on the west the Poddoro (krishna) on the north and Bayalnād (Wynād) on the south (E C IV Mandya 121)

Within a few years from that date he had established his capital at Kānnanur, where he stayed on till 1254 A D This indicates an extension of his territories southwards as far as Srirangam

The Mahāpradhāna Paramasvāmin Dandanāyaka Haribara who had previously held office under his father continued to serve under Sōmēśvara He was the recipient in 1237 A D of a grant in favour of the temple of Mallikārjuna built by him at Basaral in the name of his father (E C III Mandya 122) Srīranga Dannayaka and his son Pērkadī Deva are also mentioned as high officers during this reign (M A R 1917 Para 101) They appear as donors in certain inscriptions at Agaram near Yelaudur one of them dated in 1248 A.D (Ibid M A R 1918 Para 96) Another general of Sōmēśvara was Brahma dandanāyaka. He apparently led the expedition into the Pāndya country He is said to have forced the enemies, by destroying their groves towns and chatras to take refuge under the scanty shade of trees the branches of which had been broken off by buffaloes (E C V Channarāyapatna 238 dated in 1249 A D) This Brahma-dandanāyaka was probably the same as the Bommanna-Dandanāyaka who granted the villages of Kondajji and Halli Hiriyur in the Gnhhi Taluk as a Sivapuri to Sivayōgi Chikka Aghamana-Dēva A few of the donees mentioned in this grant it is worthy of note were women (M A R 1907 Page 4) That women held a high position during the period is testified to by another record (E C V Arakere 108 dated in 1255 A.D) This relates the conferment of the title and status of Ganakumārī on one Chandavve the daughter of a famous Malayala merchant resident at Sōmēśvara's Court

His principal generals and ministers

Death of Ballāla II,
1220 A D

Ballāla II died in or about 1220 A D, in the heyday of his fame full of years and deeply mourned by his people. (E C V, Channaiāyapatna 211*b* and 172*b*) His death proved too much to Kuvāra-Lakshma (i e, Kumāra-Lakshma) his minister and general, cherished by him as his son. As the pillar inscription recording his self-sacrifice at Halebid puts it, "between servant and king there was no difference, the glory and marks of royalty were equal in both" "His wealth and his life, Kumāra-Lakshma devoted for the gifts and for the victories of Vīra-Ballāla-Dēva and conquered the world for him as far as the southern ocean." "Of the sixty-four branches of learning, there was not one of which he was ignorant of two only was he ignorant,—how to say no to supplicants, and to suffer defeat" He had received the decorations of the Todar and the pende (jewelled anklets). His wife was Suggala-Dēvi, who also wore a todar on her left foot as a sign of devotion to her husband. He had a company of a thousand warriors, vowed to live and die with him. He set up a vīra-sāsana on which, as evidence that Garuda alone was his equal in fidelity to his master, images of himself and of Garuda were equally engraved thereon. "While all the world was praising him as the founder of the greatness and increase of king Ballāla and the cause of his prosperity—the Jandēsa Lakshma, together with his wife, mounted up on the splendid stone pillar, covered with the poetical vīra-sāsana, proclaiming his devotion to his master; and on the pillar they became united with Lakshmi and with Garuda" (E C V, Belur 112). The sculptures on the pillar point unmistakably to suicide, being all representations of men with swords cutting off their own arms and legs, even their own heads. Mr. Rice has suggested that Lakshma was a prince of royal blood and was perhaps a half-brother of Ballāla II, whose devotion to him was so great that he and his men refused to survive their

Lakshmi Nārāyaṇa at Hosaholaln (Circa 1250 A.D.) a triplo one and

Poṭṭa at Aṭṭaguppa (Circa 1250 A.D.)

For further information as regards these temples see ante
under Architecture and Sculpture

Somēśvara visited Dorasamudra in 1252 A.D., and Death 1254
A.D appears to have died two years later in 1254 A.D. On the occasion of his death one of his generals Kannoya Navaka his three wives and ten maid servants and twenty-one man servants it is said six times embraced Garuda (to show their lasting loyalty towards Somēśvara) from the head of an elephant and killed themselves (E.C. IV, Krishnarajpete 8 and 9 M.A.R. 1915 Para 83). It was this Kannoya Nāyaka who opposed the Sevanna forces in 1242 A.D. (See above). This act of self sacrifice is comparable to the death of Prince Lakshmi and his thousand followers on the death of Nārasiṃha II. (See above)

On the death of Somēśvara in 1254 A.D., a division of his kingdom was effected between his two sons Nārasiṃha
III Vira
Nārasiṃha
1254-1291
A.D Nārasiṃha III also called Vira Nārasiṃha, got the greater part of the ancestral kingdom, with Dorasamudra as its capital, while his half brother Rāmanātha (or Vira Rāmanūtha) remained in possession of what is now Kolar District and the Tamil territories conquered in the south by Nārasiṃha, with Kannanur as his capital (E.C. V Channarāyapaṭṇa 231). This division was apparently made as a matter of convenience for we find inscriptions of both the brothers as far south as Tanjore, at Sendalai and Mannargudi (M.E.R. 1896 1897). The collisions that frequently occurred between them probably show that they were either dissatisfied with or did not like the partition and the fact that inscriptions of both are found far down south indicates that each claimed the southern

Death of Ballāla II,
1220 A D

Ballāla II died in or about 1220 A D, in the heyday of his fame full of years and deeply mourned by his people (E C V, Channarayana 211b and 172b) His death proved too much to Kuvāra-Lakshma (i e, Kumāra-Lakshma) his minister and general, cherished by him as his son As the pillar inscription recording his self-sacrifice at Halebid puts it, "between servant and king there was no difference, the glory and marks of royalty were equal in both" "His wealth and his life, Kumāra-Lakshma devoted for the gifts and for the victories of Vīra-Ballāla-Dēva and conquered the world for him as far as the southern ocean." "Of the sixty-four branches of learning, there was not one of which he was ignorant of two only was he ignorant,—how to say no to supplicants, and to suffer defeat" He had received the decorations of the Todar and the pende (jewelled anklets). His wife was Suggala-Dēvi, who also wore a todar on her left foot as a sign of devotion to her husband He had a company of a thousand warriors, vowed to live and die with him. He set up a vīra-sāsana on which, as evidence that Garuda alone was his equal in fidelity to his master, images of himself and of Garuda were equally engraved thereon "While all the world was praising him as the founder of the greatness and increase of king Ballāla and the cause of his prosperity—the dandēsa Lakshma, together with his wife, mounted up on the splendid stone pillar, covered with the poetical vīra-sāsana, proclaiming his devotion to his master, and on the pillar they became united with Lakshmi and with Garuda" (E C V, Belur 112). The sculptures on the pillar point unmistakably to suicide, being all representations of men with swords cutting off their own arms and legs, even their own heads. Mr Rice has suggested that Lakshma was a prince of royal blood and was perhaps a half-brother of Ballāla II, whose devotion to him was so great that he and his men refused to survive their

The incidents referred to in this record should be the same as those mentioned in another from Channarayana dated in 1276 A D (E C V Channarayana 269). These are confirmed by a third record from Chitaldrug (E C V Chitaldrug 12 of 1260). As Mahādēva's rule ended in 1271 A D the details furnished by the latter inscriptions should be referred back to 1271 A D the date of the Nāgamaṅgala record the more so as they are nearly identical. According to the Nāgamaṅgala epigraph the great Sevuna king Mahādēva was marching forth to battle without fear mounted on his elephant when it refused to stand and he had to take to his fine horse but this also becoming frightened he said in terror Flight is best (pulāyanam kusalam) and fled in one night. The Channarayana record adds the detail that having entered the battle Mahādēva was unable to endure and leaving his cavalry force ran away in a night saying flight was best i.e. safest in the circumstances. In both these inscriptions the name of Perumāla Deva Dannaṅga the great general of Narasimha III, is mentioned and he is described as a source of security to his sovereign. The context does not make it clear whether it was he who led the Hoysala forces to battle against the Sevunas. It is said of him that in view of both armies he offered up the lotus of the brave Ratnapāla's head to the goddess of Victory and captured his jaramike (curtain or tent) and received the name of Jaramike Nārāyaṇa. Ratnapāla was probably the leader of Mahādēva's forces and he lay dead on the field at the hands of Perumāla. The Sevunas however did not forget their defeat, the more so as they appear to have established themselves in a part of the present Chitaldrug District not far away from Harihar. An epigraph at this place (E C VI Davangore 50) states that in the reign of Mahādēva, Śāluva Tikkama, his general had led a victorious expedition to the south and invaded elephants of which I am master" —he marched without stopping for a hundred gāvudās and overthrowing formidable enemies in the east, captured hundreds of elephants with which Magara came against him and brought them in with his horse (E C VII, Channagū 72). As the result of this expedition, he became possessed of a wealth of elephants, horses, jewels and other valuables, such as had never been acquired before (E C V, Channarāyapatna 197, dated in 1223 A D). In connection with this campaign is related an incident in another record (Channarāyapatna 203 of 1223 A D) which is noteworthy. When advancing against the Magara king, Nārasimha encamped at Chudavādi and gave a feast to celebrate the addition to his necklace of an emerald received from Munivaiāditya. This must have been a stone of unusual size and value. Mr. Rice identifies Chūdādi with Chūdagiāma, or Mudiyanur in the present Mulbagal Taluk, (E C X, Mulbagal 157) and suggests that Munivaiāditya was "an old title belonging apparently to a landed chief in Melai (or western) Malayapādi (Channagū 162) and the Magara kingdom may have been identical with the Mahārajavādi of which the Bānas were in possession in the ninth century" (Mysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions, 104-5). Dr. Hultzsch, however, locates this territorial division somewhere in the Coimbatore or Salem district and Mr. Venkayya has suggested that it may correspond to the Magadai-mandala (in the present South Arcot district) of Tamil inscriptions, which was ruled over at the time by a certain Ponparappinān.

Restoration
of the Chōla
king Rājarāja
III, Circa
1220 A D
and Circa
1232 A.D

That Nārasimha II actively interfered in the affairs of the Chōla kingdom there can be no doubt whatever as contemporary records in the Chōla country testify to it (See ante under Rājarāja-Chōla III). He beat off the Pāndya king, Māravarman Sundara-Pāndya I, from the Chōla country ("cleft the rock that was Pāndya" as it is to take food, but drove him back as far as Dumini (Ibid Belur 165) Ankoja was helped in his heroic onslaught by Nanjoja and Gullaja, who, it is said, forced the enemy back, crying "The king, the king! (Ibid, Belur 164) Three years later, in 1279 A.D., the brave Chikka Ketaya and his son Ankoja incurred the king's displeasure, the former being put under arrest and the latter being attacked, apparently under royal command (Belur 166) Ankoja's son Daggaya ran to his father's aid from Dorasamundra, but fell fighting in battle at Belavadi (Belur 167)

In the conflict of 1278 A.D., one Singaya Dannāyaka was killed. In the renewed attempts of 1280 A.D. Renewed attempts Ramanātha appears to have been assisted by the then Gajapati king and after a battle fought at Soleur a compromise seems to have been effected. In the flight of 1280 A.D. which was not far away from Belur, a number of men fell, after doing some destruction among the invaders. In 1290 A.D., Ramanātha made a final attack with his specially raised forces on Dorasamundra where his brother was then residing. Apparently he was beaten off and compelled to retreat.

In 1285 A.D., Nārasimha III led his forces against the Nidugal fort, and by destroying Bageyakere, broke its pride. The ruler of Nidugal, it will be recalled, had rendered help to the Sevuna general, Saluva-Tikkama, against Nārasimha III in 1276 A.D. (E C V, Arsikere 151) Attack against Nidugal fort 1285 A.D

Among the most distinguished of the generals of Nārasimha III was Perumala-Dannāyaka, a Brāhman and a distinguished warrior. Nagamangala 39 and Channarāyapatna 269 furnish many interesting details Generals and ministers of the reign.

Rājaiāja-Chola III are not only fixed by inscriptions but also by a Sanskrit work called Gadyakaranāmrita by Sakala-Vidyā Chakravartī, who fixes the events just before the marriage of Sōmēsvara, the son of Nārasimha II, in 1234 A D. The name of Perumunga is given in this work as Nijāku (?) and the fortress where he was confined as Jayantimangalam, apparently another name for Sēndamangalam of the inscriptions. (M. A. R. 1924, Para 70).

Sevunas
turned back,
Circa 1224
A D

The Sevunas, whom Ballāla II had so valiantly fought and beaten, again made attempts (Circa 1224 A D) to press towards the south, but then multitudinous army was opposed and then leaders Vikramapāla, Pavusa and others were left dead on the field (E C. III, Mandya 121; E C XI, Davangere 25). A spirited account of this war is given in a record dated in 1249 A D, in the reign of Somēsvara, the son of Nārasimha II. On seeing the commanders of the army of the haughty Sevuna king coming against him, Nārasimha being enraged, saying "I will show them the terror of my arm, bhai, bhai," set the lusty elephant on which he was mounted towards them, and slew the undoubted heroes Vikramapāla and Pavusa mad on war" (E C VI, Chikmagalur 20. See also E C IV, Nagamangala 98, dated in 1229 A D, and Krishnarajpete 63 dated in 1237 A D). Evidently Nārasimha II took a personal part in this war. This battle was so sanguinary that, we are told, the Tungabhadra was filled to the banks with streams of blood. The Sevuna army was apparently done to death almost to a man (E C V, Hassan 84 of 1230 A D). Despite this success, there is reason to believe that Nārasimha II lost most, if not all, of the territory north of the Vaidha and the Tungabhadra. It is evident the Sevunas recovered from their defeat and took the offensive against the Hoysalas and Nārasimha just succeeded in keeping them

Perumale Samudra after himself. Other charities of his in favour of the Panchalingathirtha are recorded in Chitaldrug 32 (E C VI). Another famous general of Narasimha was Sumi, who was humble enough to describe himself as having descended from the race born from the feet of Brahma. Some of his forbears had seen service under the Chalukya kings. He caused to be built the splendid temple of Sumanāthapuram, one of the best examples of Hoysala art and the agrahara adjoining it (E C III, Tirumakudla Narasipur 97 and Introd. 19 and 30). He also caused to be built the lofty eastern gate of the Harihara temple of five storeys at Harihar (E C VI Davangere 36, dated in 1208).

No details are available about the queens of Nārasimha III, but that he had a son named Ballala III (or Viraballala) and certain other unnamed sons seems certain. One record speaks of him as the own son of Narasimha III (M E R 1912 Para 47, No 81 of 1912) which shows that he had other sons, probably by mesalliance. Chikka-Kētaya, who is described as his son, was probably so called by way of courtesy, the more so, as Chikka Kētaya is spoken of as having a son Ankoya in the same inscription capable of the heroic deeds attributed to him. (Belur 164 and 165). At the date of these inscriptions, 1276 A.D., Nārasimha III could have been only 36 years and he could not have had a son and grandson capable of taking such prominent parts in war as are attributed to Chikka Kētaya and his son Ankoya. Another epigraph (Belur 160 dated in 1274 A.D.) mentions another son Komara-Mallī Dūvannayaka and refers to a gift made by him.

The reign was peaceful enough for the people to build and dedicate temples in the names of their chosen

Architecture
and Sculpture.

valour." This probably refers to the driving out of Kānchi, some years before he occupied it, the Telugu-Chōda chief Tikka, who also claims to have been a Chōla-sthāpanāchārya. (See ante under Rājaiāja-Chōla III)

Nārasimha's
titles, generals and
ministers

Nārasimha ruled as an independent sovereign, most of the records relating to his reign giving him the paramount titles of Samastabhuvanāśraya, Sīprithivallabha, Mahāiājādhwāja and Paramēśvara though the Basral record quoted above styles him simply Mahāmandalēśvara, but adds Nissankapratāpachakravartī. A Siavana-Belgola record (Siavana-Belgola 186) styles him Pratāpachakravartī. A minister was Amita and he and his son Ballāla-dandadhīpa were, according to a record dated in 1223 A D, among his chief supporters. (E C V, Channarayapatna 197). Amita founded a temple at Sivara "for all the gods such that it seems as if a creation of Aja, Hari and Hara" (Ibid). This should be the present Amitēśvara temple at Sivara in the Channarayapatna Taluk. The generals Appayya and Samudra-gōpayya, who rescued Rājaiāja III, the Chōla king, have been above referred to. His chief minister and perhaps greatest general was undoubtedly Polālva-Dēva, who had for his titles Tolagadakamba (unshaken pillar) and Vaishnava-chakravartin (or chief among Vaishnavas). He had served under Ballāla II, but came to more prominent notice during Nārasimha's reign. He belonged to Nāranapura in the Āndhra country and was the son of Atuāja or Attarasa. His praises are set forth at great length in a Harihar record dated in 1224 A D (E C. XI, Davangere 25). He built the great Hariharēśvara temple at Harihar in 1224 A D. In the council, we are told, he was the tongue, the other councillors being like statues, in war he was a shield against the four-fold armies of the southern king. As among kings—the has identified it with Kundana near Hosur in the Salem District. He also thinks that this is the Kundana after which Hesar Kundana mentioned in Malur 100 (E C V) takes its name it being so called to distinguish it from Kundana of the Bangalore District (M E R 1911, Para 18). A few Hoysala inscriptions have been found at this place (Kundana near Hosur) though none of them refers to it as rājadhāni. It however appears to have borne the alternative of Dēvar Kundana. Devar being an abbreviation for Devasamudraṇi, a tank close by it (M E R 1912, Para 46). The southern boundary of his dominions extended from about Honnudiike in the Tumkur Taluk to Lakkur in the Malur Taluk, the western being east of the range of hills north from Dēvaraya durga. His queen was Kaṇṇalādēvi, the daughter of a certain Ārya pillai, and his queen's younger sister seems to have been known as Chikka Sōmala Dēvi, being so called apparently to distinguish her from queen Sōmala-Dēvi, the mother of Rāmanātha. (M E R 1892, Para 7) Rāmanātha too assumed the title of Sārvabhauma Chakravartin or Sārvabhauma Pralāpa-chakravartin (M E R 1909 Para 76). Another probable title of his was Rājakkalāḍyaṇ, i.e. father of kings, a title which was subsequently assumed by the Pāndya king Jātāvarman Vikrama-Pandya. (M E R 1910, Para 50) His minister (in the 11th year of his reign) was Pakkadikara Sōmaya Dandanayaka. (M E R 1918, Para 69) His chief minister, however was Mahāpradhāni Virayya Dandanayaka mentioned in an epigraph (M E R 1920 21 of 1920) in which his sons appear as donees. (Ibid Nos. 41 and 56 of 1920) In the Kolar area, Ilavanjūrāyar appears as one of his ministers (E C X Kolar 239), along with Manjyarmavuttār who is (Ibid Bowringpete 23 and 25a) called the king's son. Towards the close of his reign he appears to have made an attempt to extend his territory over the portion of the kingdom which did contented. A very interesting description is given in the record referred to above of a merchant from Kērala named Dāmōdara-setti, who was greatly honoured in the Hoysala kingdom. He was a native of Kolemūka, to the east of the Pēiēru river, and was, it is stated, an expert in the examination of goods and animals. An inscription dated in 1255 A.D., gives further information about him and his family. Dāmōdara's brother Kunjanambi is said to have been an expert in testing all manner of gems. It would appear he made himself agreeable to both the Hoysala emperor in the south and the Ballāla (apparently the then Sevuna king) in the north and gained great credit as a truthful negotiator by effecting an alliance between the two kings (E.C. V, Aisikere 108). There was scope during this reign for the further construction of temples. Among the more important of these were the following—the Harihar temple at Harihar (1224 A.D.); Mūla-Singēsvara at Bellur (1224 A.D.), Kallēsvara at Heggele (1232 A.D.), Galagēsvara at the same place (Circa 1232 A.D.), Sōmēsvara at Harnhalli (1234 A.D.), Kēsava at Harnhalli (Circa 1234 A.D.) and Mallikārjuna at Basaral (1235 A.D.). Of these, Harihar is one of the most famous, while as examples of triple temples, the Mūla-Singēsvara and Basaral are worthy of note. (For further information on these temples see ante under Architecture and Sculpture)

Domestic life
and death,
1235 A.D.

Nārasimha II seems to have had only two wedded queens Umā-Dēvi and Kālala-Dēvi (Belur 182 and Channarāyapatna 203). Of these, Umā-Dēvi appears to have been the senior queen. Kālala-Dēvi had, by 1223 A.D., borne Nārasimha, a son Sōyi or Sōmēsvara-Dēva, to whom the king's sister Sōvala-Dēvi was like a mother (E.C. V, Aisikere 123). According to another record, (Channarāyapatna 204, dated in 1228 A.D.) Nārasimha rapidly declined and practically came to an end. Except for the loss of the southernmost provinces of the Trichinopoly and Tanjore Districts the Hoysala kingdom does not appear, however, to have suffered otherwise in extent. The whole of Kongu and practically the whole of the Mysore country was still in the possession of Ballāla III. The fight for dominion which began in the last days of Narasimha III must have continued also into his reign as is evidently hinted at in one epigraph from the Bangalore District (EC IX, Kankanhalli 28). Subsequent to the short reign of Visvanātha there was apparently none left to continue the line of Rāmanātha. Ballāla III thus became the sole ruler. In an undated inscription, assigned by Mr. Rico to about 1300 A.D., he is represented as securely seated on his throne at Hosavidda and ruling the kingdom (EC X, Goribidnur 49). Whether this inscription belongs to 1300 A.D. or is later than 1310 A.D. as it might well be, from the mention of the capital Hosavidda, he was undoubtedly ruling in 1301 A.D., over the territories round Kolar till then in the possession of Rāmanātha and his son Visvanātha for we find him remitting the taxes on temple endowments and making fresh grants to the temples throughout the area (EC X, Chikballapur 20 dated in 1301 A.D. and Malur 71 and 100 both dated in 1301 A.D. EO IX, Bangalore 51 and 65 dated in 1301 A.D. and Nelamangala 38 dated in 1301 A.D.).

In 1299 A.D. he appears to have put down certain refractory chiefs in the Banavāsī area. Kotli Nāyaka one of them was taken prisoner and his elephant captured (EO VIII, Sagar 45). He next marched on Gāṅgōya Sahani and demanded tribute encamping at Sīrasī (Ibid). A number of chiefs headed by Gāṅgōya advanced on him and demanded the surrender of his elephant. A sangamary

Insurrection put down, 1299-1300
A.D.

victory. (E C XI, Davangere 25, E C V, Channarāyapatna 203 dated in 1223 A.D.) This expedition was, probably under the command of Appanna-Dandanāyaka the same general who defeated Perunjanga and released Rājarāja-Chōla III from his captivity. According to an inscription at Trumaiyam in Pudukkōttai, he settled some disputes between the Saivas and Vaishnavites of that place. This inscription is dated in the year of Māravarma-Sundara-Pāndya II (A D 1239-1251), whose contemporary Sōmēsvara should have been. Among the tracts conquered by Appanna were Kana-nādu and Murappunnādu in the Pāndyan country. In the latter, the Pāndyan king Māravarma-Sundara-Pāndya II made the grant of a village in Sōmēsvara's name. (M.E R. 1907, Para 26)

Kannanūr, new capital in Chōla kingdom, 1239
A.D

He evidently took possession of part of the Chōla kingdom, which was now completely broken up, and was ruling from there, from about 1239 A D, his capital being at Kannanūr or Vikramapura, to the north of Sriangam, in the Trichinopoly District. (E C VII, Tirumakudlu-Naisipur 103 and Nanjangud 36). He is said to have created Kannanūr for his pleasure by the might of his own arm and there, with an interval in 1252 A D, he stayed till 1254 A D. Whether Kannanūr is identical with Vijayaājēndiapattana, another town which he is said to have brought into existence in the Chōla kingdom, is not yet settled (M.A.R. 1913, Para 80). This latter town is referred to in two inscriptions at Ellesapura in Hole-Naisipur Taluk, dated in 1238 A D. At Kannanūr are still to be seen the remains of an extensive fort, parts of its ramparts being still visible. In the fort is a temple partially in ruins, on whose south wall is to be seen an inscription of Vira-Rāmanātha-Dēva, in which the temple is called Poysalēsvara. This is apparently the temple referred to in an inscription of

(EC VIII, Shnuogā 68) He re entered Dorasamudra on 6th May 1313 A D when the king gratefully remitted certain taxes to the god Rāmanātha at kudali By 1316 A D, the capital was rebuilt (EC III Mandya 100)

But a second Muhammadan invasion sent by Muhammad of the house of Tughlak in 1326 A D completely demolished the great city (The attack mentioned in Arsikero 31 dated in 1331 A D probably refers to the second expedition of the Muhammadans) Ballala appears to have retired at first to Tondannr (Tonnur near Seringapatam) and thence to Annasamudra or Annamale (Tiruvannāmalai in the South Arcot District, the well known Trinūmalee of the days of the Mysore wars) He is represented as having resided there in 1318 A D (EC IV, Channapatna 73) but he was next year at Dorasamudra (Ibid Channapatna 12) He returned to Unnāmale-pattana in 1328 A D and lived on there till 1331 A D, and even as late as 1342 A D (EC IX, Dodballapur 14 18 Dēvanhalli 1, Hoskote 124 Dēvanhalli 60 Channapatna 71 Bangalore 21 24 120 Hoskote 149 Dēvanhalli 16) But he visited Dōrasamudra in 1334 A D (Channapatna 7) and resided frequently at a place called by a variety of names—Vira-Vijaya Virupākshaputra (Hoskote 43) Hosavīdu, Hosanād Hosadurga, etc. This place has not yet been satisfactorily identified Mr Rice locates it in Mysore and has identified it with Hosur in Goribidnur Taluk and Hosadurga in the Chitaldrug District (EO X Introd XXXII) Mr Krishna Sāstri would however, suggest that it is the same as Hosapattana or Hospet in the Bellary District, where Bukka-Vodeyar of Vijayanagar was ruling in the early years of his reign (The Hoysalas in M S J II 128) Others have suggested it was a place subsequently called Vijayanagara. (See below) Meanwhile,

Second
Muhammadan
Invasion
1326 A.D

Rājēndīa-Chōla III " in his own inscriptions (M.E.R. 1913, Para 43)

War against the Sevunas,
Circa 1229
A D

An inscription dated in 1229 A D states that he "first" fought against "the famous Krishna-Kandhara" This is doubtless a reference to the Sevuna king of that name who ruled from about 1247 to 1260 A D (E.C. IV, Nagamangala 98). Another dated in 1237 A D, uses the same phrase. A third inscription dated in 1248 A D terms him a "wild-fire to the forest, the Sevuna king" (E.C. V, Arkalgud 12). An echo of the same fight is heard in another record (E.C. IV, Krishna Rajpete 8, revised as mentioned in M.A.R. 1915, Para 83) where the forces of Singhana, the predecessor of Krishna Kandhara, are referred to as having been successfully opposed in 1242 A D. by Kanneya-Nāyaka, the general of the Kannadiga troops. As he is said to have fought the Sevuna king in 1229 A D, i.e., five years before he came to the throne, (following Seringapatam 110), he must have led an expedition against him while he was still Yuvarāja. If, however, the Badinalu record is correct in fixing his year of accession in 1228 A D, this expedition against the Sevunas should have occurred in the very first or second year of his rule. The Sevuna king, however, continued to make incursions into the Hoysala country. A general of Krishna Kandhara, for instance, claims in a record of his sovereign at Dhārwar, that he acquired the territory of the turbulent Hoysalas and even set up pillars of victory near the Cauvery (Fleet, Kan Dyn. Bomb 73). This is not heard of in Hoysala inscriptions of the period. Similarly a record at Pandhapur (near Sholapur) states that the Hoysala king Sōmēsvara made a gift to the god there in 1236 A D (Bomb A.R., 1897-1898).

In 1237 A D, the boundaries of Sōmēsvara's kingdom are thus described —

Chief among the generals of Ballala III was Madhava Dannayaka the son of Perumala Dannayaka who appears to have lived in the earlier part of this reign as well. He and his sons are the Nava Dannayakas of tradition (See Coorj Inscriptions, Intro. 20-21). Madhava was Mahāpradhāna or chief minister. He is said to have been born at Maggoya, modern Haradanahalli, Chamarajnagar Taluk. (M.A.R. 1912, Para 93). Madhava or Mādanna is said to have received favours from the great minister Bembeya-dannayaka (E.C. VII, Shimoga 69 dated in 1320 A.D. Intro. 34). Madigidēva-dannayaka is another minister who is mentioned in several inscriptions (E.C. VI, Holakere 136 dated in 1307 A.D. M.A.R. 1915 Para 85). Mādhava Dannayaka was governor of Padinālkunād with his seat of government at Terakanāmbi in the Gundlupet Taluk. He was in power from 1311 to 1318 A.D. (E.C. IV, Gundlupet 45 and 58, Chamarajnagar 116 and 193). He is described as death to the Kongas subdaer of the Nilgiris pursuer after one Arasnganda Rāma (see Gundlupet 44 and 65) an influential chief spoiler of the goods of Sarbha and lord of Svastipura, a place not yet identified. He was a devout Vaishnava. He set up the god Gōpinātha at Gōvardhana giri, now known as Gōpālasvāmī betta in the S.W. of Gundlupet Taluk. He granted a large sum of money for building a mantapa at Melkote in 1312 A.D. (M.A.R. 1907 Para 24). He was the conqueror of the Nilgiris and the founder of the Dannāyakanakōte now included in the Satyamangalam Taluk of Coimbatore District. (M.E.R. 1906 07, 49-51). He had two sons Ketaya and Singaya. A grant made by Ketaya who succeeded his father in the governorship of Terakanāmbi (Gundlupet 69) was made for the merit of his younger brother Singaya in 1345 A.D. the gift consisting of land included in the village of Ottakkumundan identified with modern Ootacamund. After Madhava (also called Mādappa) Tirupattur in the present North Arcot

Domestic
life

Sōmēsvara appears to have expended his wealth in making costly gifts such as the hranyagarbha, tulā-purasha, etc., and assumed, while at Kannanūr, the grand title of Sārvabhauma, or universal emperor. (E C V, Arsikere 108). At least three of his queens are known Bijjala-Dēvi (or Bijjala-Rāni or Bijjali), Sōmala-Dēvi, and Dēvala-Dēvi, the Chālukya princess. By Bijjala-Dēvi, he had a son named Nārasimha III or Vīra-Nārasimha, and by Dēvala-Dēvi, a son Rāmanātha or Vīra-Rāmanātha and a daughter called Ponnambalamahādēvi (E C V, Belur 74 and 92, Channarayapatna 231)

Trade and progress in Architecture

Despite the wars Sōmēsvara indulged in, there seems to have been peace in his home provinces and trade appears to have flourished. A trader of the Malayāla country Kunjanambi by name seems to have wielded at the time considerable influence at his court as also at the court of Krishna Khandhara, the Sevuna king. He was instrumental in getting an alliance established between the two kings. He appears to have been a great merchant and an expert in testing all kinds of gems (E C V, Arsikere 108 dated in 1255 A D.) The peaceful nature of the times is reflected in the number of temples, some of them of great sculptural beauty, that were erected in this reign. Among these were the following thirteen —

Lakshmi-Nārasimha, a triple one at Nuggihalli (1249 A D), Sādāsiva at Nuggihalli (Circa 1249 A D), Lakshmi-Nārasimha at Javagal (Circa 1256 A D) also a triple temple, Īsvara temple at Budanur (Circa 1250 A D), Padmanābha at the same place (Circa 1250 A D), Panchalinga at Gōvīndanahalli (Circa 1250 A D), a quintuple one, Kēsava and Kēdārēsvara—at Galapura (Circa 1250 A D); Mallēsvara at Hulikal (Circa 1250 A D), Kēsava at Tandaga (Circa 1250 A D),

history. He is called Hampoja Vodeya as well in certain records (EC IV, Yelandur 29 dated in 1342 A.D.) Ballala III had, besides the above mentioned brothers, another son of the name of Tipparasa Bhairavadevarasa (VER 1918 Para 60) and a daughter who married Mahapradhana Machaya Dandanayaka who receives the sobriquet of "aliya (meaning son in law) in some inscriptions. (EC \, Goribidnur 16) It was his son Gangi Deva who was Governor of Penukoda in 1338 A.D.

The Muhamadans appear to have invaded the country once again in 1342 A.D., when Ballala III attacked them but lay dead on the field of battle at Berni on 8th September 1342 A.D. (EC VI Kadur 75 dated in 1367 A.D.) The disturbed character of his rule is fully reflected in the want of activity during his period in the architectural line. Except for two temples erected at Hedatole (Lakshminikantha and Nagarāvara), circa 1292 A.D. there is little else to his credit. He was a weak though personally brave king. He was wholly unequal to his task and though he fell fighting for his kingdom there is not much to admire in him.

Death of Ballala III
1342 A.D.

At about the time of the death of Ballala III Harihara I, the founder of the Vijayanagar dynasty, was already established in the Honkan. Ballala's viceroy at Barukur in 1340 A.D. was a certain Dēvappa-Dandanāyaka. Ballala visited this stronghold in 1341 A.D. A representative of his, further north on the West Coast was a certain Sankaranāyaka to whom the Rāni of Barsalore was subordinate. The latter has been identified with the chief of that name subdued by the rising Vijayanagar chiefs Harihara and Bukka. Another subordinate Vallappa-Dandanāyaka who frequently figures in the later records of Ballala III has been identified with Aliya or 'son in law' Vallappa a Mahāmandalēśvara under Harihara I. Another

Break-up of Hoyasala kingdom
1343 A.D.

kings of the dynasty made its downfall only a matter of time While it lasted, during a period of nearly two and a half centuries, it ran a course of brilliant exploits both

To face page 1409

Ballala II dated in 1209 and 1220 A D. In one the rent of an agrahāra including tribute is fixed at 100 nishka out of which 18 nishka are assigned for the recital of the śāstras and bhaktarīti (F C V Channarayana 172). Of these different coins the gadyānam is probably the gadhīyapana which has been identified by Cunningham with the śadbodhika drummas of the Jaunpur inscription. They are found in S W Rajputana Mewār Malva and Gujrat. They are thick pieces of silver derived from the Sassanian type but so degraded in execution as to show little similarity to their originals (See Rapson Indian Coins, 31). The name of gadyānam so commonly met with in the Mysore inscriptions of this period is distinctly a corruption of gadyānam which itself seems a variant of gadhīya. The pon was a gold coin based on the weight of the seed kalanju or molucca bean (castalpa bonduc) probably about 50 or 60 grains in weight. The han of later days was doubtless a corruption of the Kannada honnu and the Tamil pon. The nishka originally signified a gold ornament but later was the name given to a gold coin which has a history going back to Buddhist times. (Rapson Ancient India, 217). It is not a little curious that these ancient coins should have persisted during Hoysala times despite the new coinage introduced by Vishnuvardhana.

An inscription of Nārasiṃha II mentions the gold coin Bhujabala māda (M.E.R. 1897 No. 406 of 1896) apparently coined on the model of the Chōla gold coins called māda. A māda was equal to half a paṇḍa. Though the abovementioned coins are referred to in inscriptions no finds of them have so far been made in the State.

The accompanying pedigree of the Hoysala dynasty is based on the materials thus far made available in the different archaeological and other reports.

Pedigree of the Hoysala
Dynasty

SĒVUNAS

The Sēvunas (also called Yādavas of Dēvagiri), who were the great rivals of the Hoysalas in contending for the possession of the Western Chālukya and Kalachurya dominions, claim descent from Krishna, through Subāhu, a universal monarch, who divided his empire between his four sons. The second son, Drīdhaprahāra, obtained the south, and his descendants ruled over the Seuna or Sevuna country, extending from Nāsik to Dēvagiri. He was succeeded by twenty-two kings of his line, down to Bhīllama (Cf Bhandarkar's Early History of the Dekhan), who was contemporary with the Hoysala king Vīra Ballāla II, and from whose time alone the history of Mysore is concerned with the dynasty. They style themselves lords of Dvārāvati (the capital of Krishna, not that of the Hoysalas), and their standard bore the device of a golden garuda. They generally describe themselves as destroyers of Mālava Rāya, terrifiers of the Gurjara-Rāya and the establishers of the Telunga-Rāya. They overcame the Kalachuryas and became masters of all the western Dekhan, having their capital at Dēvagiri, the ancient Tagara, now known as Daulatābād. Their destruction was due to the incessant warfare they carried on with the Hoysalas, which, in its turn, invited the same Muhammadan invasions from Delhi which proved so disastrous to the Hoysalas and ended their rule. The following is a list of the kings of this dynasty —

Bhīllama	1187-1191
Jaitugi, Jaitrapāla	1191-1210
Singhana			1210-1247
Kandhāra, Kanhara, Krishna			1247-1260
Mahādēva	.	.	1260-1271
Rāmachandra, Rāma Dēva	..		1271-1309
Sankara-Dēva	1309-1312

We have already referred to the severe struggles that took place between the Hoysala and Sēvuna armies for the possession of the Chalukya Kalachurva dominions and how Ballala II by a series of victories over the forces of Bhillaina and Jaitugi carried his conquests up to and beyond the Krishna. The bloody battle of Boratur previously mentioned checkmated Sevuna ambitions for a time. Later the Sevunas gained the advantage and the Hoysalas were forced to retire to the south of the Tungabhadra. The earliest of the Yadava inscriptions in Mysore are of the time of Singhana and he probably took advantage of Ballala's death to extend his power to the south. In this and the succeeding reigns a portion of the north west of Mysore was permanently in their possession. According to one epigraph an army of 30 000 horse sent by Singhana captured the hill fort of Gutti (i.e., Chandragutti) in 1239 A.D. (E.C. VIII, Sorab 319). His attempts to collect the local revenue however, seem to have been resisted by force (Ibid Sorab 420, 217). About the same time, the Sindhas attacked his army at Nematti (E.C. VII, Honnali 54 55). Kandhara was Singhana's grand son. He describes himself as thruster out of the Hoysala king and restorer of the Telunga king (Ganapati of Orangal). His general also boasts of subduing the Rattas the Kadambas of the Konkana the Pandyas of Gutti and the turbulent Hoysalas, and setting up pillars of victory near the Cauveri. This is probably a reference to his fight against the Hoysala king Somāśvara. (See ante) Mahadōva was Kandhara's younger brother and attempted to establish his own son on the throne after him. But Rāmachandra, son of Kandhara secured it. His general Sālva Tikkama professes to have captured Dōrasamudra and obtained a tribute from it of all manner of wealth, especially horses and elephants. On the other hand a Hoysala record states that he fled in a single night. Sālva-Tikkama made some additions to the great temple at Harihara which Krishna himself had visited and city, retired to the fort, sacks belonging to passing rain, but really filled with the town, levying heavy ts, and besieged the fort t that a larger army was Rāma-Dēva to offer 50 f Meanwhile, the king's with a large force, and,

, attacked the Muhammad-first, he was defeated.
demands, but the contest ad not the troops in the fort hat their provision was salt greed that the enemy should s of pearls, 2 of jewels, 1,000 lk, etc , besides an annual How the aged Jalāl-ud-dīn torious nephew, and how the latter with the basest treachery assassinated him while making professions of attachment are matters of history.

Alauddin seated on the throne again sent an expedition in 1199 A.D. against Devagiri which had withheld the promised tribute. It was commanded by the eunuch Malik Kafur surnamed Harar Omari (A thousand haras that being the price for which he had been bought as a slave. He had been the slave of a merchant and taken prisoner in the conquest of Gujarat but having attracted the king's notice was speedily raised to the highest offices in the State.) Kafur overran the whole country and Rana Deva finding resistance hopeless submitted and offered to go to Delhi. He was there received with distinction and restored to his kingdom with additional honours which kept him faithful during the rest of his life. In this expedition occurred an incident deserving to be mentioned. On the conquest of Gujarat that ruler's wife Kaula Devi had been taken captive and being admitted to Alauddin's harem by her beauty and talents gained his favour. She had charged the commander during this expedition to recover her daughter by the Gujarat Raja who had been long sought in marriage by Sankara the son of Rana Deva but refused as she was a Rajput. Now, however the Gujarat Raja in his exile had consented and sent her under an escort to Devagiri. No clue could be gained as to where she was when a party from the camp going to see the caves of Illora by chance fell in with the escort. They were forced to fight in self-defence, and captured the princess. But it was not till afterwards they knew the value of the prize. The girl was carried off to Delhi where the king's son Khizr Khan being brought up with her, became enamoured of her and ultimately married her. Their loves are the subject of a celebrated Persian poem by Amir Khasru.

Third Mu-hammadan invasion,
1309 A D

In 1309, the army under Malik Kāfur passed through Dēvagni on its way to the conquest of Orangal (Wairangal), and was hospitably entertained by Rāma-Dēva. But the following year Sankara-Dēva came to the throne, and the army being on its way to the conquest of Dōlasamudra, he was less friendly

Fourth Mu-hammadan invasion,
1312 A D

Soon after, he withheld the tribute, on which Kāfur a fourth time marched into the Dekhan, in 1312 A D, seized Sankara-Dēva, put him to death, and took up his own residence in Dēvagni

Fifth Mu-hammadan invasion,
1318 A D

In 1316 Haripāla, the son-in-law of Rāma-Deva, in common with many of the conquered princes, raised the standard of revolt in the Dekhan and recovered their possessions, expelling the Muhammadan governors. The paroxysms of rage into which Alā-ud-dīn was thrown by this intelligence brought on his death, hastened, it is said, by poison administered by Kāfur. The latter attempted to place himself next on the throne, but he was assassinated, and Mubārak succeeded. In 1318 A D, he marched into the Dekhan, took Haripāla prisoner, and ordered him to be flayed alive and his head put up over the gate of his own capital. Thus ended the line of the Sultans of Dēvagni, and in 1328 A D., Muhammad Tughlak removed the capital of his empire from Delhi to Dēvagni, giving it the name of Daulatābād.

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA

Page	Line	Add
		CHAPTER XL
541 544	10	For "Chilukyas" read Ch lukyas. Add after breast - king Mahēndravikr may mean was a contemporary of Harsha. His work Mattavilāsa / Ukhasina is interesting for several reasons. Not only is it the only early farce known but also it comes from the south and shows some of the same technique as that of Ukhasa. Dr A. H. K. Ith who, on the whole, writes appreciatively of it in a special section devoted to it remarks that, "the author undoubtedly shows a considerable knowledge of the tenets of the Buddha and the play is not unamusing." The style is certainly appropriate to the subject matter; it is like that of Harsha - simple and elegant, while many of the verses are not without force and beauty. ..... The king has the merit of avoiding the gross vulgarity which marks normally the later work of this type. (The Sanskrit Drama 182-183) The Ukhasina picture to us the decadence of Buddhism in the south at the time to which it belongs (first quarter of the 7th century A. D.) and the variety of Prakrit it exhibits—for a short play it has both Canar and Magadhi—would seem to indicate that these dialects were in common use at the time in the South (Ibid 183).
562	Marginal note	Before the word Idue add iv
563	Marginal note	Before the word Pattavatilaka kula add (iv)
569	Marginal note	Before the word Pallava add (vi)
568	15	After (E I IV 140) add - Brahmadāsam, a village in the Chayyar taluk of North Arcot District, is called in the earliest records Rājamallā-Chaturvedīmangalam of Tiruvēgambapuram. It is not impossible that the village owed its origin to one of the Western Ganga kings named Rājamallā. The Rājamallā referred to may have been Rājamallā I who married Pallavādhirāja's daughter. But it is more probable that he was Rājamallā II, eldest son of Nītimārga, who distinguished himself at the battle of Samiye and an inscription of whose has been found in the North Arcot District. (E I IV 140) As mentioned in the text, he is said to have overcome the Kongus five times. In Rājārāja-Chōlā's time it was known after his two titles, Parikrama-Chōla-Chaturvedīmangalam and Kēralāntaka-Chaturvedīmangalam later still

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA—contd

Page	Line	Add
		CHAPTER XI—contd
659	11	as Karaikkōttu-Brahmadēyam or Brahmadēsam. It was an agrahāra and a ghatika-sthāna . It had an organized village assembly called Ganapperumakkal or Ganavāriyapperum-makkal or Anyashṭa-Sattu-Sabhai , the meaning of which term is not clear. Many committees must have worked under it. (For details about them, see M E R 1916, Para 8) "
666	13	After "in Coorg" add—"The Vallimalai Jaina cave inscription was excavated by the Ganga king Rājamalla, the son of Ranavikrama, grandson of Śrīpurusha, and great-grand-son of Sivamāra (M E R 1895, No 6 of 1895). One of the Jain images represents Dēvasēna, the pupil of Bhavanandin, who was the principal preceptor of a Bāna king (M E R 1895, No 7 of 1895). This image and another were set up by the Jaina preceptor Āryanandin (M E R 1895, No 8 of 1895) "
701	At bottom of page	After "feudatories" add—"An inscription which has been assigned by Mr. Rice to 997 A.D., explains Nitimānga's name by suggesting that he was "versed in the Dharma of ruling the world over according to the Niti-Sāstra " and calls him "the foremost of kings" (E O IX, Channapatna 48) "
707	For "mal no"	Add—"Recently a Sānskrit historical work (Ganga Iamsānucharitam) in prose and verse dealing with the genealogy of the Ganga dynasty of the Oriya country has been traced. It is by Rājaguru Vasudēvanātha Sōmayājīn of the Atiyagōtra. It is a work in ten Parichchedas and awaits critical examination. See T C of Mss of the Madras Oriental Mss Library , IV : Skt A R No 3030, pp 1115-1117) "
707	For "mal no"	For "Chilukyā" read "Chalukyā" "
707	For "mal no"	For "Chilukyā" read "Chalukyā" "
707	13	After the word "subjects" add—"Nripatunga. During the reign of this Ganga Pallava king, the temple of Venkṭeśa-perumāl at Tirumakkudal in the Madhurantakam Taluk, Chingleput District seems to have come into existence (M E R 1916, Para 11) "
707	13	After words "T S I 1912-31" add the following— "An inscription at Ramadurga, Alur Taluk, Bellary District (M E R 1920, App No 698 of 1919, para 13) states that Duddaya remitted at the direction of his father, certain of the taxes levied on 12 mudalis (or divisions) including the shālaka , in Bellary District. Probably the shālaka was not in the direct line of ruling."

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA—contd.

Page	Line	Add
CHAPTER XI—contd.
1256	27	After the words "regual year," insert the word "whioh"
1257	10	For "Jativarman" read "Jativarman"
1261	10	For "Chaturvēdimangalam" read "Chaturvēdi-mangalam"
1260	Last line	For "Rudauba" read "Rudrāmba"
1268	Last but one line	After the word "maintains" insert a comma
1264	8	Before the word "the" add the word "and"
1264	11	After the word "began" insert a point
1265	22	After the word "Kampana" insert a point
1268	7	For "Tiruvoniyur" read "Tiruvorriyur"
1269	From bottom	After "Madias" insert a comma
1272	5	For "tālayānān" read "talayānān"
1278	4	After "suggestion" insert a comma
1279	17	Before "built" insert "etc."
1284	Marginal note	Before the word "Towns" add "(b)"
1285	38	After "merchants" add —"During the reign of Rājendra-Chōla, there is mention made in an inscription dated in the 9th year of the existence of a gadiṇai (ghatika) at Vēmbarrūr, modern Vēppattūr, Tanjore District (M E R 1909 Appendix B No 293 of 1908, dated in 1021 A D)"
1286	12	After "(M E R Para 28)" add —"In an inscription dated about the 11th century A D, registered as No 256 of 1912 (M E R 1913 Appendix B) a guild of merchants describe themselves as consisting of various sub-divisions covering from the 1000 (Districts) of the four quarters, the 18 towns, the 32 Vēlaipuram and the 64 ghatikāsthānas . It would seem as though India was conceived of as possessing, about the 11th century, 64 ghatika-sthānas (M E R 1913, para 25)"
1286	Marginal note	Before the word "The" add "(c)"
1288	Marginal note	Before the word "Money" add "(d)"
1333	9	Omit "and" before "59"
1333	19	For "dandadhīpa" read "dandādhīpa"
1333	25	For "under ground" read "underground"
1333	25	After "Nilgiris" insert a bracket
1339	4	For "husband" read "step son"
1343	3	Before the word "the" insert a semicolon in place of the comma
1345	22	Omit double inverted commas after the word "born"
1347	7	For "Gongai" read "Gangai"
1351	3	After the word "carried," insert "on"
1351	3 From the bottom	For "represented" read "referred to"
1357	15	For "Yōgandharōyana" read "Yōgandharāyana"
1357	19	After "indeed" insert the words "he is"
1358	18	For "Idā" read "Idā"
1360	9	Omit the word "the" before "five" and for "five" read "ten"

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA—concl'd

p. no.	Line	103
CHAPTER XI—concl'd.
120	at end	1 r 1123 read "112112."
111	marginal note	For dayagula read Gava-Gunda
121	2	For 117 read 1171 113
102	Footnote	Add after "hm" —Whether King Hallala of Daksamula referred to in the Nilam is halpanam by Valya-bak-artin (see M. O. M. Library Terminal Catalogue of M. A. Vol. IV 1st Sahit. C. P. 125 II. N. 564) can be identified with King Hallal remain to be determined
151	11	After "large insert"
154	2	(omit comma after "was"
157	4	For "Mahap Jann" read Mahap adha a
158	21	For "M. Hume" read M. Hume
156	3	1 r Mela aukt vara read Mela nkh vara
157	2	After alternative "and" in me
157	23	For Jayakhaladyan read Jayakhaladya n
160	20	Insert a comma after "chief"